The spring-time revell'd in his blood,
And love his eye display'd.

In this young man we now see Cornet Carl, who, in the affluence of pleasant and fresh feelings, which the morning hours of life and nature united alone bestow, looked around him.—now up to the bright blue heaven, now down to that reflected in the diamonds of the grass glittering in morning dews; now to the far distance, where the rosy-hued light clouds withdrew themselves ever farther and farther.

A delicious balsamic odour came caressingly upon the wings of the zephyrs—

Thus far had I written, amid the ever increasing warmth of the feelings, when I suddenly perceived so strong a fragrance of rose-essence that my head became quite confused; at the same time I became aware of a buzzing and humming around me. I lifted my pen (which just at this moment was as if it were possessed) from the paper, and looked around me.

What a sight! The room was full of little shining cherubs, with garlands of roses in their hands, garlands of roses round their heads, and whose incessantly trembling wings occasioned that extraordinary buzzing. The longer I observed these wonderful beings, the more dazzling and bewildering seemed to me the colours which shone in their eyes, upon their cheeks, upon their pinions, and so on. And as I turned my eyes from them, upon other objects,—behold, then seemed to me my ink white, my paper black, my yellow walls were green, myself (in the glass) couleur de rose. No wonder was it that the rose odour mounted up into my head.

Now I recognised the little rascals. I had seen them before; and who has not seen, who does not know them? It is they who play their jugglery upon the girl of seventeen, and turn her head a little. It is they who confuse the eye of the youth, and let him read in the tablets of his future "pleasure and usefulness," instead of "usefulness and pleasure." It is they who bear the blame of people giving themselves so much trouble about nothing, running thirty miles after a jack-o'-lantern; that people many a time cannot see clearly enough to lift up their hand and catch hold of their good luck which goes close beside them. It is they who, like April weather, travel about, deceiving the whole world, and making fools of the whole world; who contrive that P. gets married, and that B. remains unmarried, and that both do wrong; who occasion A. to say "Yes," J. to say "No;" and they both say wrong. It is they who throng even into the banking-house of Beräkenman, make him confused in his bills, and cause him to write down a seven instead of a two. It is they, in short, who buzz so unmercifully, humming and whirring around the bard, and often cause him to produce that which has no sound reason in it, to paint reality with false colours, and to mislead himself and others. Charming phantasmagoria of the imagination, little rose-coloured rogues! Who knows you not? But who avoids not, who would not willingly chase you away, who has for once experienced your tricks and your cheats? Who, in particular, who lives and weaves through the rez-de-chaussée of every-day life, works with discretion and order to throw his shuttle into the simple web, must he not take care, more than any one else, that he do not allow his brain to be mystified and his thoughts bewildered by your rose odour?

I saw in what danger I stood, upon what a dangerous path my pen had begun to travel. I laid it down, rose up, drank two glasses of water, opened the window, breathed of the yet snow-cold April air, looked up to the bright heaven, looked down into the court where they were hanging out clothes, next turned my attention upon three cats, which always sate in a ground-floor window opposite to me, observing, with philosophical looks and little motions of the head, the world around them; with one word,

I allowed my looks to take hold of the every-day world around me, and come out from the world of fantasy which raised me upon the wings of my youthful remembrance, and spread itself around me. One of the pretty little rogues had whispered in my ear, "One may permit to oneself a little falsehood, merely to produce a good effect;" and if I had not in time looked about me, and bethought myself; then perhaps, might the reader have happened to see such a spring, and such a love, the like of which is nowhere to be found, unless, perhaps, in Arcadia.

When I returned from the window, the air of the room was free and fresh. The little rose-coloured shapes of delusion had vanished, and I again saw all objects in their true and natural colours.

The picture of reality must resemble a clear stream, which, during its course, reflects with purity and truth the objects which mirror themselves in its waves, and through whose crystal one can see its bed and all that lies thereon. All that the painter or the author, in the representation of these, can permit to his fancy, is to act the part of a sunbeam, which, without changing the peculiarity of an object, yet gives to all hues a more lively brightness, lets the sparkling of the waves become more diamond-like, and lights up with a purer brilliancy even the sandy bed of the brook.

In the strength of this new discovery, I assume with calmness the part of sunbeams, allotted to me in all discretion, and allow it to pour its brightness over a true representation of spring and love. But sunshine may weary, like every thing else, when it lasts too long (as, for example, in Egypt), therefore I will allow my sunbeams merely here and there to glance forth during our wandering through the elysium of youth, and to light up only the places where I desire that my reader should pleasantly delay his steps; or, also, where I have a desire to sit down to warm and rest myself. Let us now step out of the shadow into

THE FIRST SUNBEAM.

It shines through a gloomy pine wood, and presents us with a view of an open space. In the background we see that little grey house which figured in the scenes of a foregoing chapter. In the foreground we see the green shores which are bathed by the clear waves of a lake. Granite rocks rear up here and there their unshapely forms, and stand like sentinels around the heaven-blue palace of the water-lady; young birches peep forth beside this with green crowns, and rock their branches, rich in joy, in the west-wind which plays around, full of life and delight, in one word, full of spring.

On the shore of the lake, in the green birch-wood, we perceive a young man and a young lady sitting beside each other upon the flower-decorated grass. They look happy,—they seem to enjoy nature, themselves, every thing. He relates something to her; his eyes beam; now they look up to heaven, now glance around, with an expression of proud, blessed consciousness; now they rest for a long time upon her, as if they would read into her soul. Now he strikes his breast; he stretches forth his arms, as if he would embrace the whole world; he speaks with all the warmth of a deep and inward devotion, and must therefore most certainly persuade. She listens kindly to his words: they seem to please her; she smiles, sometimes amid tears, sometimes with an expression of surprise and admiration; clasps together or lifts up her hands with an exclamation of lovely delight, and looks in an especial manner all the more convinced. Convinced of what! Of the young man's love?

Fish, fish!

Must it be of love directly?

No,—convinced that Gustaf Wasa was the greatest king; Gustavus Adolphus, the greatest knight which ever lived; that Charles the Twelfth was as great a hero as Napoleon, as well as that the Swedish people were of all people the first and foremost on the earth.

Some of my readers, who have a particularly good memory, or else an uncommon faculty for guessing, may perhaps send up the rocket-like idea:

"Here have we certainly Cornet Carl and his Lianza borealis, or the handsome Hermína!"

So it was.

"But how have they made acquaintance?" asks some one perhaps.

I answer, see the Old Testament, First Book of Moses, twenty-fourth chapter. Eleazar's acquaintance with Rebecca. The modifications which are caused by the difference in ancient and modern times, manners, and modes of speech, between an Idyllic scene in Mesopotamia in the time of the Patriarchs and one in Sweden in the nineteenth century, are not so important as to induce me to give a new sketch of a scene which would only give occasion to every one to repeat Solomon's tiresome, but true proverb, "There is nothing new under the sun;" and besides, would excite in me the unpleasant feeling of giving a feeble copy of a beautiful original—but enough; here also was a weary traveller, a well, a young maiden who came with a pitcher to draw water, and who gave to the traveller to drink. This one had to be sure no camels, but still a gentle, thankful heart, for all love, excepting Christians, impenetrable. And this beautiful weakness and this noble strength caused him to accompany that kind maiden to her home, and carry for her her pitcher of water.

Since we have now taken a draught of light (for, in order not to offend the Temperance Society, I will not call it a dram) of the first, we will go over to the #### SECOND SUNBEAM.

Which will give us a sight of the Wood-family, as well as an insight into Cornet Carl's heart, which may afford us an oversight of that which may be the intention of fate regarding him, and may lead to moral reflection on the superintendence which it is good for every one to have over his heart amid the magic play of life.

If Hermína might with justice be compared to Rebecca, yet the Baron K—, Hermína's step-father, had not the least resemblance to the hospitable Bethuel. Cold and unfriendly in the extreme, he almost repulsed the young wanderer. His wife, the already announced Woodlady, was not much kinder. It seemed as if she felt both fear and vexation to have been discovered in that hiding-place. But no one could long be fearful, or cold and unfriendly, towards a young man like Cornet Carl. His candour, his amiable and fresh cheerfulness, the goodness which beamed from his whole being, his simplicity, together with a certain noble grace in his deportment, which he derived from his father; his careless, free, gentle look, which always met clearly and calmly that of others, which attached to him persons of the most dissimilar temperaments, characters and minds, and made them always happy with him: People felt themselves involuntarily inclined to put confidence in him; wished to live in his society, as they wished to live in open natural scenery,—because in such they feel life to be lighter, themselves happier and better; because wo there—but what is the use of making a memorandum of that which everybody knows by heart.

Cornet Carl wished to captivate, and captivated actually both Baroness K— and her husband, so that they assented to his desire of visiting them again, if (and this was made an express condition) he would promise that to no one, and not even to his family, would he mention his acquaintance with them, or their place of residence.

The Cornet promised this, because—because he felt a particular, indescribable desire to come again.

A few days were sufficient to make him aware of the singular and unhappy misunderstandings which reigned in this family; but it was a long time before he understood the causes of them. Baron K— was a Swede, his wife and stepdaughter Italian, who had arrived with him in Sweden about two months before. Their dresses were splendid and remarkable, and elegant in a high degree. Their behaviour, their mode of speech, their accomplishment, their talents, betrayed that they belonged to the higher and more refined circles of society; and yet they lived now in want of many of the necessaries of life—N. B. of those which become necessary to the effeminate children of the world. Excepting one single room in which, as it were, was heaped together all the splendour which had been rescued from a shipwreck of fortune, all in the house exhibited actual poverty. The daily food which the handsome Italians enjoyed, was no better than that which every peasant family in Sweden had. The Cornet, for his part, always declared that there was no better diet than herring and potatoes.

Between Baron K— and his wife it was almost always stormy weather. There seemed to be between them now the most vehement love, and now the most decided hatred, which sometimes in the deportment of the Baroness assumed an expression of proud disdain, whilst he gave vent to expressions of anger and rage. Scenes often occurred between the unhappy pair, in which they mutually made the most bitter reproaches and accusations; the most insignificant trifles could give occasion thereto. An almost senseless rage on his side, exclamations of despair and tears on hers, ended such scenes mostly. The character of the Baroness seemed fundamentally to be noble; but she was at the same time, inflexible, proud, and passionate in the extreme. Her husband, at the same time weak and despotic, was of an outrageous and unbroken temper; only in moments of a kind of remorseless calm, which he sometimes had, might it be suspected that here also existed a nobler nature—a something which deserved to be loved.

Patient, kind, and gentle, as a suffering angel, stood Hermina, spreading the snow-white wings of her innocence reconcilingly between these natures, angered and embittered in the strife of passion.

She was what is called a beautiful spirit. But this was not born so, like her lovely body. It was formed by early suffering, early experience of domestic sorrow and trouble, especially through an early awakening of religious feeling, which enabled her to bear with patience, to resign with smiles, sacrificing her pain to Heaven, and working full of love and unwearingly upon earth. To lessen her mother's suffering, and to obtain for her somewhat more of comfort, she took upon herself even the coarsest business of the house, which otherwise would have been done by the one maid of the family. And it was affecting to see that lovely, ideal, finely accomplished being, working like a maid-servant, carrying burdens under which she sunk; that is to say, under which she would have sunk, had not Cornet Carl come and set things in order, and take the burdens and carried them upon his own shoulders. From the hour in which he came, there was a great change for Hermina. As Jacob served Laban for the beautiful Rachel, so served Cornet Carl Baron K—, to alleviate Hermina's pain. He hunted and fished, provided stores for the kitchen, and was only with difficulty prevented from being cook himself, when he saw how the beautiful face and hands of Hermina would be burnt by the fire. Help of any other kind he dared not to offer in their poverty, to these proud and high-minded gentlefolks.

Hermina had hitherto served her mother almost like a slave, but without being rewarded with the tenderness which she so well deserved. The Baroness K— seemed accustomed to receive sacrifices without thanks; still less did she seem willing to make any herself.

She bore with difficulty the troubles of adversity and poverty in which she saw herself placed. She required that Hermina, as well as herself, should continually be both tastefully and handsomely dressed, and which a very rich wardrobe, brought from Italy, enabled her to do. It was as if she wished in these relics of departed pomp and splendour, to find consolation for her present fate; or as if she could not believe that this fate was actually serious, but merely a momentary enchantment, which might be dissipated at any hour; as if she expected that some fairy's wand would change the little grey house into a palace; and she held herself therefore in readiness, in a dress suitable to her rank and her dignity, to receive visitors and congratulations.

Hermina was treated by her stepfather at the same time with indifference and severity, and one saw plainly, that that which she did for him, she did not do for his sake—but for God's sake.

From the moment when the Cornet came into the house, he had there a sort of power, which increased daily, and this he made use of to make Hermina's life happier.

Baron K— was for the most part absent during the day, and did not return till evening; sometimes also he remained two or three days away. During these intervals of peace, the Cornet contrived to procure for Hermina a liberty which she never knew before, and which she now enjoyed with childish delight. He induced her mother, who had a feeling for the beauties of nature, to take long walks in the wild but romantic district. Botany had formerly been her favourite pleasure; the Cornet revived her taste for it—sought for flowers everywhere (even I fancy where none were to be found), that he might convince the handsome Italian, who was charmed with the abundant vegetation of her native land, that Sweden was as rich in flowers as it was in heroes and iron. At least it was certain (and that he himself acknowledged afterwards) that he had not the least diffidence in representing the mountain cudweed, trefoil, dodder, the marsh ledum, the sweet gale, wormwood, tansy, and such like, as most uncommon and remarkable productions of nature.

He mentioned in particular, as the most beautiful thing in nature, that wonderfully charming flower which has derived its name from "the world's greatest naturalist, the Swedish Linneus." He tried to inspire the Baroness and Hermina with the greatest possible desire to find this miracle of a plant. Every day he had new suspicions about their being able to find it in some new district; he sought long—long and well, and discovered it only at that moment when he discovered his love.

These walks gave the Cornet continual opportunities of being with Hermina. He gave her his arm in walking; when they rested he shaded her from the sunbeams; by degrees he induced her to run about and climb among the rocks, in one word, to enjoy the free, fresh, youthful life, of which her days passed hitherto in the stillness of a convent, had given her no idea. As she now, with the rosy hue of health and gladness upon her cheeks, beautiful and light as a nymph, floated about in the charming scenery full of fragrance and spring, and often turned her angelic countenance beaming with grateful devotion towards him, who was the cause of her life's enjoyment, then—then felt the Cornet something wonderful in his heart; a warmth—a delight—an altogether something which had been to him hitherto a totally unknown feeling.

The Baroness seemed to contemplate the two young friends as two children, whose sport she allowed, because they still brought all their gaiety, all their flowers, as a sacrifice to her. The Cornet possessed the good faculty of keeping people in good humour with themselves, and therefore with others.

After all, however, he was most useful to Hermina in the moments when the so often recurring unpleasant domestic scenes, drew from her bitter tears, which she for the most part went to conceal in the kitchen. There he followed her, consoled her with brotherly tenderness, or endeavoured by conversation or interesting stories, to lead her thoughts to pleasanter subjects.

On one of these occasions Hermina was needed and called for. She was not instantly found, and this occasioned severe reproaches from her stepfather. The Cornet took up these as a glove thrown to him, and the manner in which he replied to the challenge obtained for Hermina greater freedom. He might now frequently go out alone with her. Her education in the higher branches of knowledge had been neglected. He was her teacher, especially in Swedish history, he was to her as a brother. She soon gave to him too the sweet name; and as they one day had been studying together the Swedish grammar, they came to the decision that thou was incomparably more beautiful than you, and that they must use it to each other.

Hermina again was for Cornet Carl one cannot exactly say, an instructress, nor precisely a sister; but she was so unobtrusively the light of his eyes, the gladness of his life, she was his —. It is high time to inform my reader, and especially my young lady reader, how it was with Cornet Carl. He was—in love.

That indeed nobody would have guessed. He himself neither believed, nor suspected, nor guessed it before

THE THIRD SUN-BEAM.

As he walked one evening, at the going down of the sun, on the shore of the mirror-calm lake, Hermina leaned upon his arm. She was silent and pale. Pale with that paleness which shews that the heart is joyless; that she was resigned, but that she suffered.

A scene deeply agitating to her gentle spirit had just occurred between her parents. Cornet Carl had borne her away from them almost by force, and now endeavoured, but without success, to divert and enliven her dejected mind. After they had walked for some time, they seated themselves under the birch-trees, beside a mossy wall of rock, and observed silently the dying purple, which painted itself in the mirror of the water, and upon the woody heights of the opposite shore.

It was then that Hermina first turned a tear-moistened eye to Cornet Carl, and said, "Thou art very good, my brother." She wished to say more, but her voice trembled; she paused, seemed to struggle with her emotions, and continued as she half turned from him her countenance: "Thou tarriest here on my account, out of kindness to me, and thou hast for my sake borne many disagreeable and heavy hours, and—thou couldst nevertheless be so happy; thou hast indeed a father, a mother so good, so excellent—sisters whom thou lovest so much,—they must miss thee—return to them—and remain with them—be happy—never come back hither!"

The Cornet sate silently and looked on the lake, and as if in a mirror of the soul, he looked at the same time into his own heart.

"Why shouldst thou continue to come hither?" began Hermina again, with a persuasive expression in her sweet gentle voice. "Thou givest thyself a deal of trouble, a deal of vexation, and yet thou canst not change my fate. My father has to-day spoken bitter, threatening words to thee—ah, leave us! Why shouldst thou delay? Be not uneasy for me, Carl! God will strengthen and help me!"

"Hermina!" said Cornet Carl, "I cannot leave thee—but it is as much for my sake as for thine."

Hermina turned to him her countenance with an inquiring look, whilst some large tears slowly rolled down her cheeks.

"Because—because," continued the Cornet, deeply excited,—"That, Hermina—because I love thee beyond all description—because I have no happiness in the world, if I do not see thee, am not with thee."

Hermina's angelic countenance beamed with astonishment and inward gladness.

"There is, then, somebody who loves me—and that is thou, my brother! How good God is to me!" and she extended to the Cornet her hand.

"Dost thou also love me?" asked he, with a secret trembling, and held the small white hand in his.

"How could it be otherwise!" replied Hermina. "I have been indeed, for the first time in my life, happy since I knew thee. Thou art so excellent, so good. Thou art the first person who has loved Hermina."

"And the first whom Hermina has loved!" asked the Cornet, not very stout-heartedly.

"Yes, certainly! except my mamma!"

An inward feeling of felicity overcame the two young lovers; and as if Amor himself in a rosy cloud had sunk down upon the heathy turf beside them, there floated around them, at that moment, a delight, so sweet, so enchanting (certainly Olympus had not more beautiful ambrosia), that Cornet Carl, amid the delight of his soul, sprang up and exclaimed, "This is the Linnæa! My life's flower is found!" It grew really in long leafy trails down the mossy rocks. Soon was a wreath woven for Hermina. Who can describe the scene of pure and inward happiness, of innocent joy which followed! Hermina was pale no longer—the question was not again thrown out whether Cornet Carl should return to his family. Hermina was indeed his. He was Hermina's. They understood each other, they were happy. All was become good, they should always be together. Nobody could divide them more—they belonged to each other, on earth—in heaven.

Nature seemed to sympathise with the young happy pair, mild and full of love, she enclosed them like a tender mother in her caressing arms.

Who would not willingly give ten heavy years of autumn for one moment of spring and love!

THE FOURTH SUNBEAM

—shines over the Cornet's wrath so grimly.

One warm pure day the Cornet arrived at the house in the wood, heated, wearied, longing, pining, thirsting to cast a kindly glance on his beloved, to receive a refreshing draught from her hand. Scarcely had he reached the house

* I know perfectly well what a heap of Romance-gold I at this moment push from me. I see plainly how this little crumb of a novel might have been better, might have been more interestingly carried out, conducted with more animation; how both the coming in and the going out of this piece might have made my book go off splendidly. But this would have required more words; ergo, more lines; ergo, more paper, and my publisher is so horrified lest my book should be too big, and cannot be sold for a rixdollar banco, that I see myself compelled to crush together my soul and my ideas, that I may get my book into the shops within the stipulated price. My publisher fancies that the Swedish public will not lay out very much in such every-day things. I think that he is right, that they are right, and that I am right, to write accordingly.

when he heard the sound of her harp. He hastened up, and beheld Hermina more lovely, and more tastefully dressed than ever, sitting with the harp in her lily-white arms, and beside her,—O horror, O lightning, and thunder, and death! work of the nether-regions, invention of hell! beside her sate—not Cerberus the spectre, with three heads; no, worse!—not Polyphemus with one eye; no, worse, worse!—not the Evil one—no, worse, worse, worse, far! Ah, it was not "The Beast" which sate beside "The Beauty;" no, it was a young man, handsome as a statue, another Prince Azor.

The handsome, proud, calm, cool, refined, and ornate Genserik G— observed with astonishment the heated, dusty, and more than that, as he seemed, the highly confounded Cornet H—. Soon, however, he elevated his Apollo-figure, advanced, with animation full of grace, towards the new-comer, extended to him his hand with friendly condescension, rejoiced to see him in the country, and reminded him of the last time they had met in Stockholm. The Cornet seemed not at all to rejoice, and scarcely uttered one civil word on the subject. Genserik went again to Hermina, and asked her to sing. The Cornet went up to her under some pretence, and whispered to her, "Do not sing."

With commanding voice and look, the Baroness desired her daughter to sing. Hermina sang, but with a trembling voice. The Cornet seated himself in a window, and wiped with his pocket-handkerchief the perspiration from his brow. He spoke, during the whole time that Genserik's visit lasted, scarcely three words; in part, because nobody talked to him; in part, because the young G— talked incessantly himself. And he talked so well, had such select and polite turns in his conversation; told a story with so much interest,—he had so much knowledge and insight into things, that it was a real pleasure to listen (horror to the Cornet). Besides this, he had a consciousness of his own worth, which raised it all the more in the thoughts of others.

"I am—I have—I do—I consent—I think—I wish—I will—I have said," was the theme around which and to which his thoughts and words always played rondo, at all times returned. Summa: that I became by degrees, so great, so important, swelled so greatly, that Cornet Carl saw his I, as it were, melt away or crushed down. He felt himself almost stifled in that oppressive atmosphere, and was obliged to seek for breath in the fresh air. He walked up and down in the orchard, amid desperate thoughts.

"What bad-weathered wind, surely coming from the sand-desert of Zahara, had blown hither the young Law-commissioner, the fatal Genserik G—! The Baroness paid him extraordinary compliments. What does that mean? He is rich, he is handsome, accomplished; he is Law-commissioner, he is—ah, good heavens, what is he not? He shewed evidently his admiration for the lovely Hermina—in particular (it is enough to make one mad) for her singing.

"And Hermina! why did she sing, when I asked her not to do so? Why did she let compliments be paid to her by a strange fellow—a Law-commissioner into the bargain! Why did she give to her only friend hardly a friendly look! Why did she not take one single step to obtain for him—so much as a glass of water; but let him stand there and wipe his forehead and be thirsty, and be plagued and tormented both body and soul!"

Nobody replied to the questions of the unlucky lover. The heaven was cloudy about his head, and his feet got entangled in the trodden-down rows of peas. Suddenly he heard the tramping of horse's hoofs. It sounded to the Cornet like the kettle-drums of gladness. Genserik rode away, and the Cornet returned hastily to the house, to receive an explanation and satisfaction. He received neither. The Baroness met him coldly and repulsively. Her severe and watchful eyes rested upon Hermina, who sate and sewed, without venturing to look up. It was in this moment of mutual constraint and displeasure, that the Cornet was surprised by the visit of his family. How it then went on, the reader knows.

A time of grief followed for the Cornet. He could no longer go to the house of his beloved without finding Genserik there before him. His rival was openly favoured by Baron K— and the Baroness. The Cornet was treated by them with more and more indifference. Hermina alone was gentle and kind; but dejected, silent, reserved, and avoided his questions.

In order the better to watch and observe the movements within the Wood-family, the Cornet determined to undertake a so-called journey on foot; which consisted in this, that he quartered himself in a hay-barn as near as possible to Hermina's place of residence; here he slept at night, and during the day wandered round Hermina's dwelling like a bee around flowers.

One may be happy in such a barn—yes, lying upon straw or hay, may fancy oneself in heaven! But if the thorns of grief stick in the heart, then it is certain that the barn and its bed of thistles add pain to torment. The Cornet made a memorandum on this subject.

A great change, by degrees, now took place in the Wood-house. There was an abundance of eatables, wines, and many articles of luxury; there was an increase of several servants. Baron K— was in brilliant good-humour; the Baroness more majestic and proud. The Cornet all the more superfluous and overlooked. Genserik G— grew over his head. The greatest antipathy sprang up between the two young men; but the Cornet, angry, bitter, and biting, shewed mostly to disadvantage beside the uniformly cheerful, always coldly polite, and calm Genserik. He felt this, read it in all countenances, and became thereby the more embarrassed. He played what is called a "miserable fiddle;" and that we may no longer weary the ears of the fine-feeling reader with it, we will look about us in the

FIFTH SUNBEAM.

More dissatisfied than usual with Hermina, her clouded friendliness, her reserved manners with herself, with the whole world, Cornet Carl walked one evening, full of thought, up and down in the sighing pine-wood. When he reached the spring where he had first seen Hermina, he stood with troubled feelings, observing in its clear mirror his sun-burnt, dissatisfied looks, his face so little handsome, comparing it, in thought, with Genserik's handsome, bright, and circumspect appearance. Suddenly then he saw in the well a face looking down beside his own. It was beautiful as an angel—it was Hermina. A shiver of delight thrilled through the Cornet; but was quickly stifled by a bitter feeling.

"Hermina," said he, "it was certainly Genserik thou thought of meeting."

Hermina stood silent a moment, then laid her hand gently upon his arm, and only said, "Carl! have we ceased to understand each other?"

He looked at her, and her gentle, loving, but tearful eyes met his.

Lovers! if the silken skein of your love and your happiness has become entangled, and you wish to strengthen it, do not talk. Look at one another!

Cornet Carl felt all at once as if a veil fell from his eyes—the mist vanished from his soul. All at once was clear to him; and so heavenly clear. Long stood the young lovers silently there, and drunk light, and peace, and felicity, from their mutually bright beaming eyes.

As there was no longer any spark of uneasiness remaining in their souls, the lovers began to make explanations and declarations.

"Is it not thou," said Hermina, among other things, "is it not thou who first loved me; who made me feel that there was a pleasure in living? And even if thou hadst not done so, how canst thou think that I could place a cold egotist like G— beside thee?"

"But he is so confoundedly handsome!" said the Cornet, laughing, and yet half confused.

"Is he? That I have not remarked. He does not please me. I know one who pleases me—one whose face it does me good to see—one whom I think handsome. Wilt thou see his portrait?"

She led him to the spring. The Cornet saw there with satisfaction his sunburnt countenance beaming with joy.

"But thy parents favour Genserik —"

"And I favour thee."

"He loves thee."

"And I love thee."

"Hermina!"

"Carl!"

When a person has left this earthly life, to go to a better in heaven, people say, full of confidence, "Peace be with him!" And then they turn to think about other things.

Even so when two lovers turn from the valley of care of this life, and enter the bright heavenly kingdom of reconciliation, one may say, "Peace be with them!" and think upon other subjects.

Yet we will, as the last "God's peace be with it," cast now a

SIXTH SUNBEAM.

And this smiles over the delight which beams upon Cornet Carl during several happy days. He was sure of Hermina; and her silence, her reserve, her politeness towards Genserik, his multiplied visits, his I, his lover-politeness—Baron K— and his wife's coldness towards him (Cornet Carl)—nothing more disturbed him. The barn afforded him a heavenly bed. The spring in nature mirrored the spring in his soul. The woods, flowers, waves, winds, birds, all sang to him, and for him. "Gladness! gladness!" Gladness!—Ah, Rinaldo, Rinaldo! Hark! The trumpet's clang calls thee from Armida, and thou must resign gladness.

The trumpet's sound! Not from the fields of Palestine—not from that promised land—but from Ladugardsland; or rather from the Ladugardsgård. All as one! Now, Rinaldo, Cornet Carl, thou must leave her who is more virtuous, more discreet, therefore more beautiful than Armida. Thou must tear thyself from her enchanted palace, the little grey house. Thus wills that unmoveable General-in-chief of all life-regiments, Fate, who pays so little regard to the demands of the heart.

The trumpets sound, duty calls—to the camp, to the camp; and then, is extinguished in the lovers' parting tears.

In order to spare our own, we command our thoughts, turn to the right, march! again to Thorsborg. There we shall, with old acquaintance, go about new business, as if

TO DIG THROUGH THE EARTH, ETC.

ONE evening, as we were all assembled around the sick-bed of the blind girl, Professor L— read aloud a translation of Herder's "Ideas." The subject was the development of mankind in another world; the explanatory hints, as regards his transformation, which are given to us on earth, by the changes which we remark in the kingdom of nature, and which are all a gradual advance towards perfection.

Professor L— closed with this remark on the foregoing: "The flower seems to us at first as a vegetating seed, then as a sprout; this puts forth the bud; and now the flower first unfolds itself. Similar unfoldings and changes are shewn to us by other existences, among which the butterfly is a well-known symbol of human transformation. See there crawls the ugly, coarse, greedy caterpillar; his hour comes, and a feebleness of death comes over him; he fixes himself firmly; he swaddles himself up, and spins here at his own shroud, as if in fact the organs of his new existence were within him self. Now the rings work, now strive the powers of the new organization. The change goes on slowly at the beginning, and seems destructive: the ten feet remain in the dried-up skin, and the new being is now unslapely in all its limbs. By degrees these shape themselves and come in order, but the existence awakes not before this change is perfected: it now presses towards the light, and the last development quickly takes place. A few minutes only, and the tender wings become five times greater than they were within the covering of death. They are gifted with elastic power, and with the splendour of all beams which can be found beneath the sun. Its whole nature is changed: instead of the coarse leaves upon which it earlier fed itself, it enjoys now the nectar-dew from the golden cups of the flowers. Who, in the form of the caterpillar, could have divined of the existing butterfly! Who would recognise in it the same being, if experience had not shewn it to us! And both these existences are only periods of life of one and the same being, upon one and the same earth. What beautiful development must not lie in the bosom of nature, where the organic sphere is wider and greater; and where the periods of life which it unfolds embrace more than a world.

"And thus nature shews to us also, in this analogy of existence, that is, of progressively perfecting existence, wherefore she weaves into her realm of shapes the slumber of death. It is a beneficial stupor, which enwraps a being, and within which the organic powers strive after new development. The being itself, with its greater or less degree of consciousness, is not strong enough to see and direct its combats. Thus it slumbers and awakens first, when it stands forth perfected. The slumber of death is also as it were a fatherly, gentle alleviation; it is a composing opiate, under which operating nature collects its powers, and the feeble invalid is refreshed."

Here L— ceased. A deep and pleasant emotion had overcome us all. We sat silent, with looks riveted upon the poor invalid, down whose cheeks large tears gently rolled, whilst low, lamenting tones came from her lips. Her Honour embraced her with tenderness. The Colonel laid his hands as it were in blessing upon her head. A deep, sonorous, continued snoring drew, at this moment, all our regards upon Lieutenant Arvid, who was sleeping comfortably in a corner of the sofa, with mouth open, and nose turned up in the air. This trumpet tone was a signal of revolt for Julie, who with glowing cheeks vanished from the room. After a moment I went to seek for her, and found her standing upon the steps before the house, leaning with crossed arms upon the iron balustrades, and looking fixedly upon the bright evening heavens, in which pale stars began to appear. "Julie!" said I, laying my arm around her waist.

"Ah, Beata!" sighed Julie, "I am unhappy—I am very unhappy! Must I remain so for my whole life?"

Before I could reply, Lieutenant Arvid came out on the steps, and exclaimed with a yawn, "What the thousand are you doing here, Julie! Standing and getting cold—getting cold in the head and chest. Come in again, dearest. I fancy, too, that they have begun to bring in supper. Come, then!"

"Arvid," said Julie, "come here to me for a moment;" and she took his hand kindly, and said with animation, "See how beautiful every thing is, this evening; let us go into the park. There, you know, where we once agreed to—I want to talk with you there, to beg something from you—"

"We can just as well talk with one another in the room—"

"Yes—but it is so lovely this evening. Look around you! Listen to the bird, how sweetly it twitters! Do you hear the wood-horn yonder: Look there, too, where the sun descends—what soft crimson—ah, it is a lovely evening!"

"Charmant, my angel," replied Lieutenant Arvid, with a suppressed yawn; "but—I am outrageously hungry, and perceived a delicious smell of chops as I passed the kitchen. I long to meet with them again, in the saloon. Besides, now there ascends a cursed mist. Come, my angel!"

"Arvid!" said Julie, drawing back her hand, "we have such dissimilar inclinations—such different tastes. I see—"

"Don't you like chops?"

"God bless you, with your chops—I do not speak of them. But of our inclinations, our feelings—they do not accord—"

"Yes; that I can't help."

"No; but I fear that we are not fitted for each other—that we shall be unhappy—"

"Ah, thou dear one! that may be. One should not meet trouble half way. That takes away one's appetite. Come, let us eat our supper in peace. Come my little wife—"

"But I will not—and I am not your wife," said Julie, as she turned herself from him; "and," added she, a little lower, "will not be your bride any longer."

"Will not?" said Arvid calmly. "Yes, but you see there are some difficulties in giving that up. You have my ring, and I have yours,—besides, I am not very much afraid; girls have their caprices. Nay, nay, let it be till morning. Adieu, Julie! I go to eat some chops, do you swallow down your caprices," and he vanished in the eating-room.

Julie took my arm and went down into the orchard, whilst she wept violently. I walked silently beside her, waiting for her to open her heart with some complaint against her bridegroom. But she was silent, pressed my hand, and continued to weep.

As we turned into a side alley, a figure wrapped in a cloak came slowly towards us. Professor L—'s voice proceeded from this, and began kindly joking Julie on her romantic taste for evening walks. When he approached us, he saw her weeping eyes, and became suddenly silent and grav.

"Professor L—," said Julie, half merrily, and with a voice half choked with weeping, "tell me, what must a person do, when he sees that he has begun a very foolish business and cannot go on with it—"

"Then," said Professor L—, "wisdom must bear the consequences of folly."

"And one should be unhappy for one's whole life!"

"Unhappy one should not be,—but better and more prudent one should be, and should make all past errors steps by which one should ascend nearer to perfection."

"That sounds beautiful, most especially edifying—and in the mean time one should grow weary of wisdom and perfection for a whole life,—and find every day insufferable."

"Only a very weak person," said Professor L— mildly, "can so sink under the weariness and anxiety of life. The most gloomy and joyless position in life has its points of light, if one will but see them. Within ourselves we may in every care and trouble most surely find the springs of consolation. If our surrounding circumstances disturb or vex us, let us seek for some plan of freedom and an inward rich life within ourselves. Then may we say with Hamlet, 'O, I could let myself be enclosed within a nutshell, and fancy myself lord of an immeasurable world!' To become acquainted with this world which lives within us, to regulate it, to bring it into clearness and progressive development, is an enjoyment which no position in life can deprive us of, and an enjoyment which we must soon acknowledge as sufficient to make us love even the coldest earthly life. To learn to think, is to learn to live and enjoy."

"But," sighed Julie, "how can one learn to think with a——"

"With a man who only thinks about chops!" ended I in spirit.

"Good books," continued L——, "are gentle comforters, guides, and friends. With their help one can, if one earnestly wishes it, not go wrong in bringing one's inward life into equipoise and consistency." He was silent for a moment, and added with warmth and emotion, "my books, how much have I not to thank them for!"

"You have been unhappy!" said Julie, with heartfelt sympathy.

"Every thing which I loved most tenderly on earth, have I lost—and that not merely through death. Since my childish years has this trial followed me. Every thing upon which I warmly fixed my heart has been torn from me. Many a bitter moment has passed since I was able to bow myself submissively before the will of the Eternal God, and yet——"

"O that one could comfort you," exclaimed Julie, with child-like fervent devotion.

"I have," continued L——, "sought to strengthen my heart, to preserve it from suffering so bitterly. I have struggled long with its sensitiveness—I am no longer young—and yet (this he said with a sorrowful smile) I shall have perhaps soon to go to my books to find consolation."

"I wish I was a book!" said Julie with tears in her eyes.

Professor L—— looked to her with fatherly—no, not exactly fatherly, but nevertheless indescribable tenderness.

"Good, amiable girl!" said he in his beautiful, harmonious voice; and continued after a moment, more calmly, "It is weakness to complain. We find strength to endure, in prayers, and in the fulfilment of our duties. Let us obtain our strength from these fountains."

He extended his hand to Julie, who gave hers weeping.

At this moment we reached a ditch, from which three little black figures, which seemed to ascend up from the earth, met our astonished eyes. And scarcely less astonished were we as we recognised the little Dumplings and a playfellow with them, standing up to the middle in a deep ditch, and sunk in deep deliberation. To our repeated questions regarding all this, succeeded on their part, first silence, then some confused sounds, at last the discovery and the rather dim explanation of their great secret. They had merely undertaken to dig through the earth, and to give their family, and in particular the Colonel, a great surprise thereby.

That which now arrested their progress was certainly not the difficulty of the undertaking, bah! but a deep thought, which arose in the brain of the little Claes, that when they had got through the earth they then should probably fall through it, and then where should they come to!—that—would Professor L—— be so good now as to tell them that?

We now all laughed together.

Professor L—— deferred his explanation to the morrow, and, joking kindly, sent the pigmies with their giant-schemes home. A messenger came at that moment after them and us, to say that we were waited for at supper. The little triumvirate set off at a short gallop. We followed more slowly after, but now were surprised by Lieutenant Arvid's cursed mist, which stood like a wall between the orchard and the castle court. We now observed for the first time, that Julie was without a shawl. I was not much better provided for. L—— took off his cloak, and insisted on wrapping it round Julie. She would not at all listen to it, because L——'s health was not of the strongest. They would have stood till now contending and protesting, if I had not come between with a compromising project, and proposed that they both should make use of the very wide cloak. It was adopted; and Julie's delicate zephyr-like form vanished in the corner of the cloak, which she laughingly wrapped around her. And the train went forward through the night and mist.

That was, however, a little crazily done, thought I afterwards. The late Madame Genlis and M. Lafontaine no less, in their romance-world, never would have let two lovers come under a cloak without making use of such an excellent opportunity for a declaration of love, and I should really wonder, if Mrs. Nature did not this time open a way, let some sigh, some word——

I listened attentively as I followed the inhabitants of the cloak, but—they were silent,—no word, no sound. Yes, now!—What was it? Julie sneezed. Now L—— said, indeed, "God help!" and this may help them to something—no, he said nothing.

We leave the orchard, we go across the court. Will nobody speak then? Now!—no. We mount the steps, we enter the door; now then!—no! The cloak falls from Julie's shoulder; she thanks and curtsies, L—— bows.

As we came into the saloon Lieutenant Arvid sat and ate chops. They had waited a long time for us. For our excuse I related the contention about the cloak.

During the whole of supper, her Honour shook her head at Julie to reprove her for so great, unheard-of imprudence as to go out so late without a shawl.

When Lieutenant Arvid perceived the eyes of his bride which had been weeping, he seemed very much confounded, but probably he thought "it will all be right when she has eaten and slept:" for he made no haste over his supper, and afterwards sought no opportunity of conversing with his bride, and went to bed at his usual time, and with his usual calmness.

But Julie's uneasiness did not leave her; on the contrary, it seemed to increase. In vain Arvid prayed her to take "a little nap," and to consider him as a "cushion." She seemed no longer to find repose upon it. In vain his father came, old General P——, with his magnificent equipage, and besought his little daughter-in-law to drive out with "the Swans"—it helped nothing. There daily occurred between the betrothed a many little quarrels, which assumed, spite of Arvid's unexampled phlegm, more and more of a serious character. Her Honour, who now became observant of this, was at first quite uneasy, and always held herself prepared to knit together again the broken thread of unity with some good-humoured jest, or some conciliatory word. It succeeded, to be sure, still; but—every day became anew entangled.

Thus went on a time. Cornet Carl set off at the breaking up of the camp to Roslagen. From this place he wrote the most despairing letters on account of dust and heat, and vexation, and ennui, and such like. About botany he said not a word.

During the whole of the summer Elisabeth's condition remained the same, and Her Honour continued to consider the milk diet necessary for my chest and my melancholy.

The Paræ spun the life's thread of the rest of the family of common flax, mixed with a little hemp, but still more silk, till the end of the month of August—when they lifted the shears. Let us see—

WHY?

AFTER a heavy and sultry day, a mass of storm-clouds collected themselves together, and covered the whole heaven at sunset. A sort of silence of death spread itself over the whole region. One heard no sound from speedily home-going herds, no birds twittered; the leaf of the aspen moved not; even the swarms of gnats ventured upon no hurrah, as usual at the going down of day; the whole of nature stood as if in a painful expectation of something mysterious and uncommon occurring.

Later in the evening began the fearfully beautiful scene.

Pale lightning illumined every minute the whole region, which in the intervals was wrapped in an almost night-like darkness; and by the lightning-flashes was shewn how masses of clouds assumed ever darker hues, and in threatening shapes congregated together above the castle. Now and then a rapid tempest passed through the air, to which again succeeded a dead calm. With a dull but strongly increasing noise was heard the thunder-chariots rolling furth from many sides.

Her Honour hastened from stove to stove, from window to window, to see that all were well secured. Julie and Helena stood with their father in a window, and drew closer to him at every fresh flash, every fresh thunder-peal.

I went to the blind girl. She sat upon her bed in a stooping, bent position, expressive of the utmost weariness of life, and sung with a low and melancholy voice—

It is night, it is night!
My eyes are dark, on my heart is blight,
For repave it longesth.
Give me rest, give me rest,
And now in the house by the earth-worm possess'd,
O pallid death's angel!
O let me sleep low,
Ah! I am so weary of watching and woe,
So weary of living!

Here the arms fell, and her head, in weariness of life, sank down on the cushions. She was silent a moment; I saw her smile mournfully, and then begin again to sing, but in a clearer voice and more cheerful tone—

When the morning dawns clear,
And the song of ree-nion my grave draweth near,
Which calls to excuse,—
Shall I see thy day,
King of light, and from earth's sordid clay
Raise up my forehead?

Here her tears began to flow; and changing her tone, she sang, weeping and in broken stanzas—

O mother, O mother,
Be my defender,
Clasp thou thy daughter,
The guilty, repentant!
Teach her what prayer is,
Teach her what hope is!

Give to her tenderness,
Give to her quietness!
O mother, O mother!
Warmly embrace me,
Clasp to thy bosom,
So tender, so loving!
Let me experience
How in affection,
Bosom to bosom,
Thrills an divinely!

Ah, so'er have I known this,
O earth whilst abiding!

Lonely I wander,
Lonely, love truly;
Lonely I suffer,
Bitterly, bitterly!

And e'en in dying,
Still I love lonely!

O mother, O mother!
Take me, O take me
Hence from the cold world,
Hence from its sorrows!

Glimmering spark of light,
From the dust call me!
Lift me from darkness,
Raise me to splendour!

A violent thunder clap, which echoed through the whole castle, interrupted her song; to this succeeded others, even more rapidly and more violently. A wild storm began to rage at the same time.

"Is anybody here?" asked the Blind. I went up to her. She said, "I heard music, which does me good. Lead me to the window."

When she came there, she crossed her arms on her breast, and turned her face up to heaven. The lightning flashes passed over the lovely pale face, whilst the terrific claps of thunder seemed as if they would strike down the being which, with a kind of defying gladness, raised a calm brow towards the spirit of destruction.

By degrees, violent feelings seemed to arise in Elisabeth, and the combat in nature found an echo in her soul. Suddenly she exclaimed, "I see something! A fiery hand, with burning fingers, passes over my eyes!"

She stood a moment, as if in eager expectation, and then said with a kind of quiet rapture, "How glorious, how glorious, the singing up there among the clouds! Sister-harmonies, do you call my heart! Here, in my breast, is the first voice,—there, now sounds the second. Now there is unity—now is there life and gladness! Fire of heaven! Maternal-breast! clasp me in a burning embrace! Mother, mother! is it thy voice which I hear!—thy hand which I saw!—which I see—I see now again! Beckonest thou me? Callest thou me?"

"Air!" shrieked she now wildly and commandingly, "lead me out into the free air! I will hear my mother's voice,—I will fly to her breast and be warm again. Without are wings of fire they will sustain me. There is a chariot—hear now its rolling! it will take me. H, hce, hence! dost thou not see hands! they beckon. Hear voices! they call—ha! dost thou hear!"

I embraced her with tenderness, and besought her to remain still. She interrupted me, as she solemnly said, "God may refuse to hear thy last prayer, if thou refuse mine. He will bless thee, if thou comply with mine. Lead me, lead me out into the open air! It will be the last time that I shall ask any thing from thee. Thou knowest not how all my weal and woe depends upon this moment. Lead me into my kingdom—the kingdom of the storm—there, there only shall I experience peace, Beata, good Beata! See, I am quiet and collected, I am not mad. Hear me, hear my prayer! I have lain in fetters all my life—let me, only for one moment be free, and all my many bleeding wounds will be healed."

I had not courage to withstand this voice, these words. I led her down upon the terrace, which extends on the wall of rock a considerable way outside the castle. The young girl who was Elisabeth's maid, from fear of the storm, would not accompany us.

I soon repented of my complaisance. Scarcely were we come out into the wild uproar of nature, than Elisabeth tore herself loose from me, sprang forward a few paces, and then standing still, raised a loud cry, full of wild, insane delight.

It was a scene of terrific beauty. The lightnings crossed around, with red tongues, the whole region; the storm swept around us, and now rolling, now whizzing thunder claps circled over our heads. Like the spirit of the tempest, the Blind stood upon the rocks with wild, sorrowful gestures. Then she laughed and clapped her hands together in insane gladness, then turned herself round about with extended arms, whilst she sung with a strong and clear voice—

Lightning and flashing,
Flaming waves dashing,
From the world's sea of fire!
Wild tempests quaking,
And riven chains breaking
The grave's silence shatter!

Thunders—and all ye Mighty, I call ye
From the world's sullen breast,
Behold in a woman
Your queen, who doth summon
You, hear my behest!

Lightning, forth wing thou,
Sing thou, O sing thou,
Hail Freedom to thee!

The victor's song rings now,
Life findeth wings now;

I am the free!

Again she laughed wildly, and exclaimed, "How glorious, how glorious! how splendid! How glad I am, glad! glad! Now is my day of rule come!—A crown, a crown of fire, will descend from the dark clouds and be placed upon my head. My day is at hand, my time is come!"

At this moment, to my indescribable comfort, the Colonel stood at the side of the unhappy one.

"You must," said he, "return to your room."

With a hasty movement, Elisabeth withdrew her hand from his, and instead, as before, of submissively complying with his wishes, she stood now before him proudly and insolently, with the look of a Medea, and repeated, "My hour is come! I am free! Must? Who dares to say that word to me, here in this place! Stand I not in my own realm? Has not my mother fetched me in her arms? Seest thou not how her arms of fire embrace me, and repel thee?"

The Colonel, who dreaded an increasing outbreak of her insanity, wished to take her in his arms, to carry her again to the castle, when Elisabeth hastily, with infinite tenderness, laid her arms around his neck, and said to him, "So, if I clasp thee in my arms, and thou me in thine, then will my mother take us up both in her bosom of fire. What bright and heavenly bliss! This is my day—my hour is come! I am free, and thou art taken captive. I defy thee—I defy thee ever again to become free!"

Was it the word defy which awoke the defiance of the man, or was it some other feeling, but the Colonel suddenly released himself from Elisabeth's arms, and stood still at a few paces distance from her.

"Yes, I defy—I defy thee!" continued she. "Thou hast fettered my limbs, thou hast bound my tongue; and yet I now stand before thee powerful and strong, and like lightning, will launch against thee the fearful words. 'I love thee! I love thee!' Thou canst no longer forbid them to me, thy wrath is powerless. The thunder is with me—the tempest is with me! Soon shall I be with them above, for ever. Like a cloud upon thy heaven shall I follow thee all thy life; like a pale ghost shall I hover above thy head; and, when all is silent around thee, thou shalt hear my voice exclaiming—'I love thee! I love thee!'"

A strange and deep emotion seemed to have overcome the Colonel; he stood immovable, with his arms folded, but dark fire flashed from his eyes.

Elisabeth continued with a quiet enthusiasm, "O how deeply have I loved thee! So deeply, so warmly, no mortal ever loved! Heaven, which thunders above my head—earth, which soon will open my grave,—you, take I for eternal witnesses! Hear my word! Understand thou, thou, my life's beloved torment, noble, lofty object of all my thoughts,—of my love, of my hatred, yes, my hatred,—hear how it sounds—'I love thee!'—with my being's most inward, most holy life have I loved thee;—deep as the sea, but pure as heaven was my feeling. Thou hast not understood it—nobody on earth could understand it,—my mother knew it,—and He who is above us all. If we had lived in a world where words and deeds could be as innocent as feelings and thoughts—O then, like a bright, warm flame might I have enclosed and shone around thy existence—have penetrated thee with felicity,—have burned a pure sacrificial flame for thee alone. Such was my love. But thou didst not understand it—thou didst not love me—and thou repulsed me, and thou forsook me—and I became guilty,—but loved nevertheless,—and love now—and always, and eternally,—and—alone!"

"Alone!!!" exclaimed the Colonel, whilst a powerful feeling seemed to transport him out of himself.

"Yes, alone," repeated the Blind, confused and trembling, "could it be otherwise? I have sometimes suspected—but—O my God, my God! could it be possible? O say, is it possible! By the eternal happiness which thou deservest,—and which never can be mine,—by the light which thou seest, and which I never shall behold,—I conjure thee—say, say, hast thou loved me?"

A moment's perfect silence reigned in nature. It seemed as if it would listen to the answer, which I also awaited with trembling anxiety. At length, pale, slow lightning flamed around us.

Solemnly, with a strong, almost powerful expression in his voice, the Colonel said:

"Yes!"

The Blind turned upwards her countenance, beaming with superhuman bliss, whilst the Colonel continued with violent and deep emotion:

"Yes, I have loved thee, Elisabeth, loved thee with the whole power of my heart—but God's power in my soul was more powerful, and kept me from falling. My severity alone has saved thee and me. My love was not pure as thine. It was not the poison which thy hand gave to me, which disturbed my health—it was the combat of passion and desire—it is the care for thee. Elisabeth! Elisabeth! thou hast been infinitely dear to me,—thou art so yet—Elisabeth."

Elisabeth heard him no longer; she sunk down as if it were under the load of happiness which fell upon her; and I sprang towards her at the moment when she fell like one dying upon the earth, whilst her lips whispered with an indescribable expression of happiness, "He has loved me!"

The Colonel and I were scarcely able to carry her to her chamber. I trembled—his strength was as if paralysed. A sweat of anguish hung in drops on his brow.

Elisabeth recovered, in a short time, her consciousness; but when she re-opened her eyes, and the stream of life again rushed through her veins, she merely whispered, "he has not despised!—he has loved me!" and remained still and calm, as if she had closed her account with the world—as if she had nothing left for her to wish.

During the remaining part of the night, the storm raged terrifically, but the lightnings shone now upon the countenance of the blind, beaming with inward happiness.

From this moment, and during the few days which she yet lived, all was changed to her. All was peace and gentleness. She spoke seldom, but pressed kindly and gratefully the hands of those who approached the bed upon which she lay almost immovable. One often heard her say, softly, "He has loved me!"

One day her Honour stood beside Elisabeth, she who did not seem aware of her presence, and repeated with inexpressible delight the words so dear to her. I saw an expression of pain depicted on the mild, kind countenance of her Honour—saw her lips tremble, and some tears roll down her cheeks. She turned herself hastily, and went out. I followed her, for she had forgotten her bunch of keys. We went through the ante-room. The Colonel sat there, his head bowed upon his hand, as if he were reading. He had his back turned to us. Her Honour stole softly behind him, kissed his forehead, and stifled, as she went into the bed-room, her forth-bursting sobs. The Colonel, astonished, looked after her, glanced then upon his hand, wet with the tears of his wife, kissed them away, and resumed his thoughtful posture. After a moment I followed her Honour into her bed-chamber, but she was not there; her hymn-book lay open upon the sofa, and its leaves bore traces of tears. At length I found her, after I had gone about through all the rooms, in the kitchen, where she was rather scolding the cook, because she had forgotten to cut the cutlets from a breast of lamb which was frizzling over the fire; which oversight actually was unpardonable, as I had already told her twice that we should have breast of lamb for dinner, and cutlets for supper.

"One cannot trust to any but oneself," said her Honour to me, a little piqued, as I gave to her her bunch of keys.

I now left Elisabeth neither day nor night.

With an astonishing rapidity her earthly existence seemed to speed towards its end. It seemed as if the first word of affection which she had heard, had been the signal of her afflicted soul's deliverance.

It is so with many children of the earth. They strive against the sting of affliction for many and many a year—live, suffer, and contend. The sting is broken, and they fall down powerless. Happiness reaches to them her beaker. They set their lips to the purple edge—and die!

Besides Helena and me, Professor L— was almost constantly with Elisabeth. In part he read aloud to her, in part he talked with us in a manner which was calculated to elevate her slumbering feelings of religion, and strengthen her faith in the dear truths which stand like bright angels by the couch of the dying.

Once he proposed to her several questions on the condition of her own mind. She replied, "I now have not strength to think clearly. I have not power to examine myself. But I feel—I have a hope—I have a presentiment of clearness!"

"May the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee!" said Professor L—, with quiet dignity and prudence.

The next day Elisabeth besought the whole family to assemble around her. As we all, together with Professor L—, were assembled in mournful silence in her room, Elisabeth called by name those whom she wished to approach her bed,—seized their hand, kissed it, as she uttered with humble devotion the word "Forgive!" So she went through them all. No one was able to speak, and that mournful "Forgive!" "forgive!" was the only sound which interrupted the sad murmur of sighs.

The Colonel and his wife stood there now together. Elisabeth was silent for a moment, and breathed heavily and with difficulty. At last she said, "Will my friend come to me!"

The Colonel went forward—she extended her arms to him—he bent himself down to her—they kissed. O what a kiss! The first and the last—that of love and of death!

No word was spoken. Pale as one dying, and with uncertain steps, the Colonel withdrew. With trembling voice, Elisabeth said, "Lift me up out of bed, and lead me to Mrs. H—."

We did so. She shewed an unusual strength, and supported by two persons, went to the other end of the room, where her Honour, who did not seem aware of her design, sat weeping.

"Assist me," said Elisabeth, "and place me upon my knees."

Her Honour rose up hastily, to prevent its being done; but, notwithstanding, Elisabeth hastily lay at her feet, kissing them, whilst she stammered forth, with convulsive sighs, "Forgive! forgive!"

She was borne almost lifeless again to her bed.

From this moment the Colonel did not again leave her.

Through the night which succeeded this day, and the day following, she lay still, but seemed to suffer physical pain. In the evening, as Professor L——, the Colonel, and I sat silently by her bed, she woke out of a still slumber, and said aloud, in a clear voice, "He has loved me! Lord, I thank thee!"

After this she sank into a kind of sleep or stupor, which continued probably an hour. Her breath, which during this time had been very rapid, began by degrees to become feeble. A long pause occurred—then came a sigh—then a longer interval—and then again a sigh. All at once the breath seemed to cease. It was a terrible moment. A slight spasm passed through the limbs—then a violent sigh or gasp, followed by a sadly-mournful sound—and all was still.

"She has ceased to be!" said the Colonel with a suppressed voice, and pressed his lips upon the death-pale brow.

"She sees now!" said Professor L——, and raised a solemn and beaming look to heaven.

The joyous air of the summer evening played in through the open window, and the birds sang gaily without in the hedge of honeysuckle. A gentle rose light, a reflection of the lately descended sun, diffused itself through the chamber, and spread an illuminating glory over the deceased.

So still, so free from pain, lay she now there! She who so long had combated and despaired—so calm, so still now! Over the white pillow, and even down to the floor, fell her rich brown hair. On her lips was an extraordinary smile, full of an expression of sublime knowledge. I have seen that smile upon the lips of many who sleep the sleep of death. The angel of eternity has impressed upon them his kiss.

Peaceful moment, in which a heart which has so long throbbed with disquiet and pain, experiences rest! Peaceful moment, which reconciles every enemy to us, which draws near to us every friend, casts oblivion over every error, the beams of glory over every virtue, which opens the blind eyes and releases the bonds of the soul! Beautiful and peaceful moment, although borne upon the wings of a nocturnal angel, thou smilest towards me like the rosy hue of morning; and when I see thee advance towards another, I have many a time longed thou shouldst come for me also.

THE SKIN GETS ENTANGLED.

ELISABETH was no more. She had been like a gloomy thunder-cloud, and darkened the bright heaven of existence which most nearly surrounded her. When she was gone, all experienced a sentiment of peace and security. Many tears were consecrated to her mournful memory. but no heart recalled her. Pitiable Elisabeth! thou first gavest peace when thy own heart enjoyed it in the grave.

We see every day that the most insignificant, the least endowed persons, but who are kind and gentle, become more beloved in the world and more lamented than the distinguished, richly gifted, who misuse their talent; who, with all their beauty, their mind, their warmth of heart, have not made one being happy.

The Colonel alone retained for a long time a gloomy state of mind, and was more reserved than common towards his wife and children. Their tenderness and attentions, however, as well as the beneficial operation of time, began by degrees to dissipate this gloom, when circumstances connected with his domestic circle anew shook his rest, and agitated his naturally powerful feelings.

One day, Arvid's father, General P——, burst into the Colonel's room, full of fury. First of all, he relieved his heart by a salvo of curses and oaths; and when the Colonel coldly asked what it all meant, he stammered forth, almost beside himself, "What does it mean? What does it mean? Thousand d—ls! It means that your—your—your daughter is a cursed—"

"General P——!" said the Colonel, in a voice which brought the angry man quickly to himself, and who replied rather more quietly, "It—it—it—means that your daughter plays with truth and faith, that she befools—fetch me seven thousand!—that she will break off with Arvid, will return to him the betrothal ring. Fetch me seven! that Arvid is beside himself, that he will shoot himself through the head, so violent and frantic as he is; and that I shall be a miserable, childless old man!" Here a few tears rolled down the old gentleman's cheeks, and he continued in a voice in which anger and pain contended: "She sports with my son's peace—sports with my gray hairs. I loved her so tenderly; as a father, brother. As a father, I had set also my hope of the happiness of the evening of my life upon her. It will be the death of me. She says directly to my Arvid's face that she will not have him; directly in my son's face. Fetch me seven thousand! He will be a laughing-stock to the whole country. He will shoot himself, brother; he will shoot his brains out, I say; and I shall be a childless, miserable old man," etc. etc.

The Colonel, who had heard all this in the most perfect silence, now rang the bell violently. I was in the next room, and went in to the Colonel, in order a little to reconnoitre, and to prepare Julie for that which awaited her.

The Colonel's countenance betrayed anger and severity. He desired me to tell Julie to come down to him.

I found Julie in the greatest anxiety; but, from the General's visit to her father, prepared for that which was before her.

"I know—I know," said she, growing pale at my message, "it must come out—it cannot be helped."

"But hast thou actually," I asked, "broken off with thy bridegroom?"

"I have—I have probably," answered she, troubled and full of anxiety; "I cannot now tell all—yesterday evening a word escaped me against Arvid—he was cold and scornful—I was violent, he was in a passion and rode away in anger."

Again we heard the Colonel's bell ring.

"My God!" said Julie, and pressed her hands to her heart, "now I must go—and must have courage. Ah! if it were not for his contemptuous look—tell me, Beata—did papa look very solemn!"

I could not say no; prayed her not to hurry herself—to consider well her own promise, once so solemnly given, the Colonel's strict principles regarding the sanctity of such a promise.

"Ah, I cannot—I cannot! was all that Julie was able to say, while trembling and pale she went down stairs to the Colonel's room. When she came to the door she paused, as if to strengthen her resolve, said "I must!" and went in.

In the course of about half an hour Julie came into Helena's room, where I also was, and looked quite inconsolable. She threw herself upon the sofa, laid her head upon Helena's knee, and began sobbing loudly and violently. The good Helena sat silent, but sympathetic tears ran down her cheeks, and fell like pearls upon Julie's golden plaits of hair. When, after a little time, Julie's suffering seemed somewhat to allay itself, Helena said tenderly, as she passed her fingers between her sister's rich curls, "I have not arranged thy hair to-day, sweet Julie. Sit up a moment, and it shall soon be done."

"Ah, cut off my hair—I will be a nun!" replied Julie; but for all that rose up, dried her eyes, let her arrange her hair, assisted Helena with hers, and was calmer.

So certain is it, that the little occupations of everyday life possess an often wonderful power to dissipate troubles.

When we inquired what had really happened, Julie replied—"This has happened, that I am condemned for the whole remainder of my life to do penance for the thoughtlessness of one moment—and to be a wretched being—that is to say—if I submit to the sentence—but I will not—rather papa's displeasure—rather—"

"Ah, Julie, Julie!" interrupted Helena, "think well about what you say!"

"Helena, you know not what I suffer, how I have struggled with myself for a long time. You know not how clearly I see the lamentable and the miserable part of my fate, if I must be Arvid's wife. Ah! I have hitherto gone as if in sleep, and sleeping I gave him my hand,—now I am awake—and should not withdraw it if I saw that I gave it to a—"

"Arvid is a good person, Julie!"

"What do you call good, Helena? Those who merely are not bad? Arvid (I have tried, I have proved it) seemed good, because he has not been tempted to be bad; calm and collected, because he troubled himself about nothing but his own convenience; reasonable, because he sees no further than his nose extends. Ah! he is merely a collection of negatives—why should one fear to add to his collection, and make him a present of another no? Do not imagine that it will trouble him long—he does not love me—he cannot love, he has no feeling! Ah! he is a bit of moist wood, which my little fire would in vain strive to kindle; the same would by degrees vanish in smoke, and in the end quite go out."

"If even, sweet Julie, Arvid be not the man whom you deserve, and who would make you, as your husband, happy, why should not your fire nevertheless burn clearly? Arvid is, indeed, not bad; he would never become a spirit of torment to you. How many wives are there not, who, united to husbands who beyond all comparison stand far below them, yet develop themselves as noble and excellent beings; create happiness and prosperity around them, and enjoy happiness through the beautiful consciousness of fulfilling their duty. See our cousin, Mrs. M——, how estimable and how amiable she is! And what a man is her husband! Look at Emma S——; look at Hedda R——."

"Yes, and look at Penelope and sisters and company—ah, Helena, these women have my high esteem, my reverence, my admiration. I would resemble them; but one thing I know clearly—that I cannot do so. That independence in opinion and judgment, that calmness, that clearness, that certainty and perspicuity of principle, which are so necessary when in married life one would take the lead—this I have not—not at all! I am exactly one who requires to be guided—I am a vine-branch, and need the oak for support. At this moment my understanding has developed itself—I feel a better being arising within me—a new world opening itself for me! Would that I might wander through it on the hand of a husband whom I could love and esteem; whose heart would reply to the purifying fire within mine; who with the light of his clear understanding would illumine the twilight in my soul; (behold Professor L——, thought I)—oh, how much better a being should I then be!—and arrive at a goal which I now rather imagine than see. But with Arvid, see Helena, with Arvid—my world would be like a store-room—I myself like a bit of mouldy cheese.

"It is truer than you think. Ah, it is a mournful affair, this marrying. There are a great many with whom it has happened as it now might happen with me—they have hoisted the sail of matrimony in foolishness,—have fancied they should reach the island of bliss,—and have been stranded, and fixed for the whole of their lives upon a sand-bank. Like the oyster in its shell, they have crept about and sought for a little sunshine, till the merciful wave came—"

"Julie! Julie!"

"Helena! Helena! It is a sketch from every-day life; every day strengthens its truth. How many noble natures have been ruined in this way! And so will mine be, if I am not able in time to sail past the sand-bank."

"Julie! I fear that this cannot be done. Papa's principles are immovable; and among these stands foremost firm adherence to a promise. And I think that he is perfectly right. Besides, as regards the annulling of a betrothal, the taking back of a given promise of marriage, there lies in it a something so deeply wounding to female delicacy, that I consider —"

"Delicacy here, and delicacy there: I consider it quite indelicate, and in particular quite absurd, that a whole life's happiness should be sacrificed to delicacy."

"Could you be happy, Julie, if you lost your connexions—your father's affection—the esteem of the world?"

"The esteem of the world—I would not give many stivers for it; but the esteem of those whom I love—ah Helena, Beata—is it indeed possible that I could lose that? Then it certainly would be better that I condemned myself to be unhappy —"

"You shall not be unhappy, Julie," said Helena, as with tearful eyes she clasped her sister in her arms—"you shall —"

"Of that you know nothing, Helena," interrupted Julie, with irritable impatience; "I know that I should be so. There is a something still, besides Arvid's unworthiness, which would make me so; it is the certainty that I have missed my goal—the certainty that I might have had a nobler, a happier lot—that I might have lived upon earth for the happiness of a superior and excellent being. Ah, I feel it. I might, like a lark, have winged myself on high in freedom, light, and song; and now, now, I shall, as I feared, crawl about on the sand-bank of life, like an oyster, dragging along with me my prison!"

By the repetition of this horrible, but no less correct comparison, a new, vehement grief overcame Julie: she threw herself again down on the sofa, and remained the whole day without eating or being willing to hear any consolation. Her Honour ran, partly herself, and partly sent me, incessantly up and down stairs with drops and smelling-waters.

Julie was really, though not seriously, unwell, and remained two days in her chamber, during which she did not see her father. Neither Lieutenant Arvid nor the General were heard of during these days, to the great comfort of Julie.

Her Honour had always had her own little tactics, or domestic policy, whenever any misunderstanding occurred between her husband and her children;—namely when she talked with the first, her words were always on the side of the latter; and with the latter she asserted and proved to them that the first was in the right. Her heart was, I fancy, often a deserter to the side of the weaker, because when, in certain cases, every thing was obliged to yield to the iron will of the Colonel, her Honour always caressed her children with redoubled tenderness. She had now also talked with her husband in Julie's behalf, and for the releasing her from her engagement, but found him inflexible ("impossible!" said her Honour); and when she now saw Julie so wretched, she was imperceptibly towards him—not unfriendly—God forbid!—but, nevertheless, a little less friendly; in appearance (I'll answer for it that it was not so in reality) somewhat less anxious about his comfort and satisfaction in a many little things. A certain unpleasantness, hitherto altogether foreign to the family, prevailed in the house for some days.

"If the mountain will not come to Mahomet—Mahomet must go to the mountain," said the Colonel to me, one morning, with a good-tempered smile, as he was about to go up the stairs which led to Julie's room.

At that very moment a travelling-carriage drove into the court, and Cornet Carl, with a flushed and almost bewildered countenance, sprang out and up the steps, embraced with silent fervency his parents and sisters, and besought, after this, a moment's conversation with his father.

The moment extended to an hour, when the Cornet, with a pale and disturbed countenance, came alone out of his father's room. As if unconsciously, he went through the sitting-room and saloon into her Honour's boudoir, without seeming to be aware either of her or me, and seated himself silently with his elbows rested upon a table, and covered his eyes with his hand, as if the daylight distressed him.

With maternal anxiety her Honour observed him; at length she rose, stroked his cheek with her hand caressingly, and said to him, "My good boy, what is amiss with thee?"

"Nothing!" answered the Cornet, with a low and suppressed voice.

"Nothing!" repeated her Honour. "Carl, thou makest me anxious—thou art so pale—thou art unhappy!"

"Yes," replied the Cornet, in the same low voice.

"My child, my son! What ails thee?"

"Every thing!"

"Carl! and thou hast a mother who would give her life for thy happiness?"

"My good mother!" exclaimed the Cornet, and clasped her in his arms: "forgive me!"

"My best child! tell me what I can do for thee! Tell me what thou wantest—tell me all! It must have an outlet some way—I cannot live and see thee unhappy!"

"I must be unhappy, if I cannot obtain, or raise on bond, the sum of ten thousand rix-dollars. If I get them not to-day, Hermina is—my Hermina is in a few days the wife of another! Good God! the happiness of my whole life, and that of another, I would purchase with this beggarly money—and it is denied me! I have spoken with my father—opened to him my heart—told him all. He has this sum—I know it—and he—"

"And he has denied thee?"

"Positively, decidedly. He says that it is the inheritance of the unhappy and the needy; and for the sake of these suffering strangers makes his own son unhappy!"

With this the Cornet started up, and went with great strides up and down the room, as he exclaimed, "What low being has dared to blacken Hermina to my father—this God's holy angel! She would deceive me! She—she loved the detested G—! He only, or his emissaries, have been able—"

Here the Cornet massacred a carriage with its accompanying horses (the equipage of the little Dummies); and her Honour, terrified, removed from her son's neighbourhood a vase with flowers, whilst she, attentive to his complaints, asked anxiously,—"But why! But how!"

"Do not ask me now!" said the Cornet impatiently. "I can say only this now, that my life's weal or woe rests upon my obtaining to-day the specified sum of money. I may become the happiest being on the earth, or the most unhappy; and not I alone—"

"Carl!" said her Honour solemnly, "look at me! God bless thy honest eyes, my son! Yes, I know thee. Thou wilt not let me take a step, the consequences of which I may repent."

"My mother! wouldst thou repent having effected the happiness of my life!"

"It is enough, my child. I go now to speak to thy father. Wait me here."

In a violently excited state of mind the Cornet awaited the return of his mother. I saw that in a moment he was in that delirium of youth which makes it appear incredible that any one can oppose their wishes or their wills. In such moments people cannot bear the word "impossibility." They seem to themselves as if they could command the sun even, seem as if they could tear up the roots of the mountains; or, which is all the same, tear up the principles from a firm human breast.

It was a long time before her Honour returned. Julie and Helena accompanied her. She was pale; tears glittered on her eyelids, and her voice trembled as she said, "Thy father will not; he has his reasons; he thinks that he does right, and does quite certainly what is best. But, my good child, thou canst be assisted, nevertheless. Take these pearls and jewels. They are mine—I can dispose of them—take them. In Stockholm thou wilt receive a considerable sum for them."

"And here, and here, best Carl," said Julie and Helena, whilst with the one hand they reached to him their treasures, and threw the other affectionately around his neck: take these also, Carl; we pray thee, take, sell all, and make thyself happy!"

A dark crimson flushed the countenance of the young man, and tears streamed down his cheeks. At that moment the Colonel entered, stood in the doorway, and riveted a keen glance upon the group which occupied the back-ground of the room. An expression of anger, mingled with scorn, lighted up his face. "Carl!" exclaimed he with a strong voice, "if thou art sufficiently unworthy to take advantage of the weakness of thy mother and sisters to satisfy thy blind passion, then I despise thee, I will not acknowledge thee as my son."

Deeply unhappy, and now so deeply misjudged, the bitterest indignation poured its gall into the heart of the young man. He was deathly pale, his lips convulsively compressed. He stamped his foot violently, and was out of the door like lightning. A few minutes afterwards, he mounted his horse, and galloped across the court.

THE CORNET! THE CORNET! THE CORNET!

"Halloa! it sounds through the wood."

HALLÖA! it sounds. The hunted fly, and the hunters follow. What is the game? An unhappy human being. And the hunters! The furies of anger, of despair, and frenzy. How they drive! An unexampled chase! The hunted fly, and the hunters follow. Halloa! halloa! They lose not the scent—they follow—they follow, through the thickest wood, over the dancing billows, over hill, over dale, with gaping jaws—will swallow their prey—it goes bound after bound—but runs wearily on its course. Halloa! halloa! it will soon be ended!

Onward! onward! spurred the pursued his sporting horse, which flew foaming over hedges and fences. Wild tumults raged in his soul. Wrapt in a cloud of dust, he posted over the road through gloomy and wood-over-grown tracts, whilst he thought to stupify every feeling, every thought in his soul, and listened only to the admonitory forward! forward! which rung in every throb of his fever-wild pulse.

The peaceful inhabitants of the cottages, which rushed past like a storm-wind, sprang in astonishment to their door, and asked in wonder, "What horseman is that who is run away with?" And one of them (Stina Ander's daughter at Rörum) declared that she had seen a hound and a hare come forth; the one out of the cottage, and the other out of the wood, and sitting, the one opposite the other with staring eyes; saw the wild rider, after which, quite bewildered and out of sorts, they had sprung past each other; the hare into the cottage, the dog into the wood.

The wild rider, Cornet Carl, made no halt till he pulled up at the gates of the Wood-house, so well known to us, threw himself from his horse, and sprung up the steps. All the doors in the upper story were fastened; all was still. He sprang down the steps. All the doors in the lower story were fastened; all was still and dead. He sprang across the court to a little out-building, and pushed open a door. There, humming a psalm, and spinning flax upon a whistling wheel, sat within the cottage a little, wrinkled old woman.

"Where are the gentlefolks! Where is Miss Hermia!" exclaimed the heated, almost breathless Cornet.

"Ha!" answered the little old spinning-woman.

"Where are the gentlefolks!" cried the Cornet, with an annihilating voice and look.

"What d'ye say!" replied the old woman, as she poked her nose comfortably into a little snuff-box.

The Cornet stamped. (A mended cup fell down from the shelf, three crippled glass jingled together). "Are you stone-deaf!" shrieked he, at the highest pitch of his voice. "I ask which way the gentlefolks from here are gone!"

"Which way! To Thorsborg; does the gentleman mean! Ay, then go over the fields, and—"

"I ask," screamed the Cornet very loudly, in despair, "where the gentlefolks are gone to from here."

"To Fromere! Yes, yes—then you must go—"

"It is beyond all patience!" said the Cornet, in despair, "it is enough to drive one mad!"

"Ay, ay, indeed!" sighed the little old woman, perplexed and terrified at the appearance of the Cornet's anger, and went quickly to pick up the pieces of the broken cup.

A small piece of money upon this flew under her nose, and the stranger had vanished.

"God preserve me! God bless!" stammered the astonished and pleased old woman.

Another door on the same floor now flew open before the powerful grasp of the Cornet's hand.

On her hearth, beside her pig (that is to say her child), sat in the room a fat, dear mother, feeding her little bristly-haired boy with hasty-pudding.

The Cornet repeated here his questions, and received for answer—

"Yes, they are set off."

"But where! say where! Did they leave no message,—no letter for me!"

"Letter? Yes; I have one that was left for the Cornet H—, and I was just thinking of setting out with it to Thorsborg, as soon as I have put a drop of gruel into the boy, poor thing—eat, boy."

"In heaven's name give me here the letter directly—haste, go this moment, I say, after it, go—"

"Yes, yes—I'll go as soon as I have put these drops of gruel into the boy. He is hungry, poor creature—eat, boy!"

"I will feed the boy, give me the spoon—only go and fetch the letter here directly!"

At length the woman went to her chest. The Cornet stood on the hearth, took gruel out of the pot with the spoon, blew it with anxious countenance, and put it into the little fellow's open mouth. The woman tumbled the things about in her chest, sought and sought. Snuff-box and butter-pot, stockings and under-petticoats, hymn-book and bread, came one after another, and lay all about the floor—the letter not.

The Cornet tramped and stamped in painful impatience.

"Be quick there! No, is it not there? Ah!"

"Directly, directly! wait only a bit, wait—here, no, here; no, wait a bit—wait."

Wait! One may imagine to oneself whether the Cornet was inclined now to "wait a bit!"

But the letter was not forthcoming. The woman put by her things, and muttered between her teeth—

"It's gone—it's not to be found!"

"Not to be found!" repeated the Cornet, and poked in his terror a spoonful of hot gruel into the throat of the boy, who set up a loud roar.

The letter was not to be found. "The boy must certainly have picked it up, have torn it in two, or else have burned it," and the dear mother, who was more concerned about her boy's trouble than the Cornet's, said angrily to the latter, "Go to Löfstaholm, there you can take leave. The gentlefolks are gone there, and Miss Agnes was here to-day with Miss Hermina."

The Cornet left a rix-dollar as a plaster for the scalded throat, and cursing half aloud the goose and the gosling, mounted Blanka again, who in the mean time had been cropping the yellow autumn grass which grew here and there in the court.

Now to Löfstaholm. Six miles had to be got over. Blanka felt the spurs, and sprang off at full gallop.

A river divides the road. The bridge was broken down, and was under repair. There is yet another way—but that makes a bend of a mile and a half. Blanka soon snorted courageously in the waves, which washed the foam from neck and nose, and kissed the feet of the rider as he sat in his saddle.

Two travellers at some little distance began to talk.

"Do you know, mother," said the one thoughtfully to the other, "I think that it is the Neck himself, who has ridden on the black mare through the river."

"Do you know, father," said the other, "I think it is a bridegroom who rides to his beloved."

"Trust me, my old fellow!"

"Trust me, my old woman!"

And "trust me, my reader," the rider stands now on the opposite shore; and forwards, forwards speeds he again through wood and field.

Poor Blanka! when the white walls of Löfstaholm shone forth amid the green-yellow-brown trees thou was not very far from being knocked up, but at the sight of them the rider somewhat relaxed his speed, and when come into the court, Blanka was able to rest, and to draw breath by the side of the three other riding-horses, which proved that Löfstaholm had guests at this moment.

The iron-master and knight, Mr. D—, sate in his room and contemplated with the mein of a satisfied connoisseur, a head in black chalk, done by the promising daughter Eleonora, and the iron-master's lady, Mrs. Emerentia D—, whose maiden name was J—, stood beside him reading with delighted attention, a poem on the pleasure of "Rural Life and Simplicity," written by her most hopeful son Lars Anders (whom the family called "the little Lord Byron"); as Cornet Carl stepped violently into the room, and after a slight apology, without troubling himself as to what people thought of him, his state of mind, and his questions, prayed to know what was known here of Baron K— and his family's hasty journey.

"Nothing more than this," said Iron-master D—, and wrinkled up his brow, "that they passed by here yesterday afternoon, and that Baron K— was pleased to come up here and say rude things to me, and to pay me, it may be, a fourth of the sum which I have lent to him out of pure kindness, an eternity since.—A Dido,—Cornet H—, by my Eleonora—"

Mrs. D— took up the word. "The Baroness, or what must one call her (for I have the idea that she is no more a Baroness than I am), was not pleased once to move to me from the carriage. Yes, yes, one gets beautiful thanks for all the politeness one shews to people. No, she sate as bolt upright and stiff as a princess in her carriage,—her carriage say I—yes, very pretty—young G—'s equipage it was, he himself sate in it like a caught bird in a cage,—and that perhaps made her so proud."

"G—'s carriage! G— with them!" cried the Cornet, "and Hermina!"

"Sate there, and looked straight before her like a turkey-hen. Yes, in that girl I have been quite mistaken. I thought that it was a shame for her, and allowed my daughters to take a little care about her and encourage her musical talent. Therese, in particular, was actually bewitched with her. But I soon found that I had committed an imprudence, and that she, as well as her family, in no respect was fit society for my daughters. All kind of strange reports are in circulation respecting these high bred gentry—they have sent themselves off in a manner—"

A servant now came in with tobacco-pipes, which he arranged in a corner of the room. The Iron-master D— thought it as well to continue the conversation in French.

"Oui, c'est une vrai scandale," said he, "une forgerie de tromperie! Un vrai frippon est la fille—je sais ça—et le plus extrêmement mauvais sujet et sa père."

"Son père," corrected Mrs. D—, "et le pire de toute chose c'est son mère. Un conduite, oh ! Ecoute, cher Cornet, dans l'Italie, le mère et le fille et la pere—"

All at once there occurred in the next room a fearful noise, a screaming, a laughing, a tumult, a jubilation beyond all comparison. There was scraping on fiddles, there was jangling with shovels and tongs, there was singing, yelling, piping, and in the midst of this din were heard all kind of exclamations, of which this alone was intelligible :

"Papa ! Papa ! now we know the piece ! Now the scene is in order ! Hurra, hurra !"

The jubilant herd rushed now like a foaming torrent into the room ; but when the wild young people beheld Cornet Carl, their delight was beyond all bounds. A universal cry was uttered :

"Iphigenie, Iphigenie ! Hurra ! hurra ! Cornet H— Cornet Carl will be our Iphigenie ! Hurra ! Long live Iphigenie the Second, long live Cornet Iphigenie ! Long live—"

"Death and hell !" thought the Cornet, as the wild crowd regularly fell upon him, and endeavoured to drag him with them, amid the cry, "Come Iphigenie ! Come Cornet Carl, hence, hence ! We will have a rehearsal immediately ! The Cornet may hold his part in his hand—come, come, only !"

"Hocus-pokus about Cornet Carl ! Fall down on your knees, and rise up as Iphigenie."

This last was bassooned forth by the sweet little Agnes D—, who stood on tiptoes to hang a veil over Cornet Carl's head, but could not reach up to his ears. Lieutenant Ruttelin came to her assistance. Eleonora D— and Mina P— had already swung a large shawl over his shoulders, and three young gentlemen endeavoured to wrap him round with a sheet, which should be a gown. Among the seconds of the Misses D—, Lieutenant Arvid was also to be seen.

The Cornet resisted ; it was in vain ; he raised his voice, shouted to and with them,—in vain—he could not, amid the noise around him, either make himself understood, or once heard.

An actual despair out of pure vexation overcame him, and brought him to a desperate resolution. Making use of his strength, not in the most polite manner, he pushed with both arms right and left the people from him, tore off the sheet, and—ran—ran through an open door, which he saw before him, and striking into a long row of rooms, looked neither to the right nor the left, but ran, ran, ran ! Ran over a servant girl, three chairs, two tables, and came at length from room to room, out into a great dining-room, on the other side of which was a porch. This the Cornet knew, and was just about hastening there, when he was aware of the jubilant herd, with the loud cry of Iphigenie, Iphigenie ! who were coming through the porch to meet him. The Cornet, in the greatest distress of mind, was just about to turn round, when he saw near him a half-open door which led to a little winding staircase.

He shot down this like an arrow. It was dark and narrow,—turned and turned. It began to turn round in the head of the Cornet itself, when at length his feet reached firm land. He stood in a little dark passage. From an iron door which stood ajar gleamed a stripe of light. The Cornet went through this door also. Through an opposite window, defended with stout iron bars, shone a feeble and descending autumn sun, and lit up the white-grey stone walls of the vaulted room. The Cornet found himself—in a prison !—no, in a store-room.

The Cornet sought after a way of escape. There was indeed in the little passage a door, opposite to the door of the vault, but it must be opened with a key, and no key was there. The Cornet sought and sought—in vain. He sat down on a broad-chest in the vault, freed himself from his shawl and veil, and heard with satisfaction how the wild chase rushed forth overhead, and seeking traces of him, drove about in the neighbourhood ; but he heard them always sufficiently near, to prevent him from coming up. Unhappy, indignant, weary, embittered with the whole world, he stared before him almost without the power of thinking. A dish of confectionery, the remains of a party, of veal cutlets, and currant-cream, standing in the sunshine on a table, met his eye kindly and invitingly.

The Cornet experienced a strange emotion ; in the midst of his despair, plagued with a thousand tormenting thoughts, he felt—hunger.

Poor human nature ! O man, crown of creation ! Dust-king of the dust ! Is it heaven or hell, which storms within thy breast ! Eat must thou nevertheless ! One minute an angel, another an animal ! Poor human nature !

And on the other side :

Happy human nature ! Happy duality, which alone preserves the unity of the being. The animal comforts the spirit, the spirit the animal, and thus alone can the human being live.

The Cornet lived,—was hungry,—saw food, and did not long delay the satisfying of his hunger therewith. The party was soon added to the more substantial stuff.

Forgive ! forgive, young lady reader ! I know—a lover, a hero of romance in particular, ought not to be so prosaic, so earthly, and our hero is perhaps in danger of losing all your kind sympathy. But reflect, reflect charming creatures, who live on rose-odour and feelings, he was a man, and worse, a Cornet ; he had had a long ride, and had not eaten a morsel the whole day. Reflect on that !

"But is it becoming to eat in this way in other peoples' store-rooms ?"

Ah, my most gracious Chief-mistress-of-ceremony ! when a man is very unhappy and very much embittered, very heart-inwardly weary of the world, then people think that everything is becoming to them, which in any way is becoming in itself, and does not overturn anything but convenances. One has then an actual delight in trampling upon these, as upon other kind of weeds, and is often in that kind of state of mind, a beautiful cosmopolitan spirit, which makes one capable of saying, "Get out of the way !" to the whole world.

Cornet Carl had just cleared the party out of the way, when a tumult, increasing in strength, renewed its shrill cries after the unlucky "Iphigenie !" and a rattling and noise on the top of the stairs made known to him that the hunting-herd spied out and were upon his track. Quite beside himself, he sprang to the window, seized with all his might one of the iron bars, with the intention of loosening it, and, cost what it would, of making his escape.

O ray of deliverance! The Cornet seized the key, it went into the keyhole; and, as if chased by furies (the Cornet thought in this moment of bewilderment that all the sweet, accomplished Misses D—— had Medusa-heads), flew through a long passage out into the porch, down the steps, over the court, and upon the back of Blanka. Scarcely was he in the saddle, before, like a swarm of bees streaming out of the mouth of the beehive, the raging herd burst forth from the gate, singing, nay, screaming in chorus—

Iphigenie! Iphigenie!
Heavens, what gross poltroonery!
Lovely maid, where art thou, then?
Come again, O come again!

The Cornet dashed off, and soon vanished from the eyes of the chorus, behind the trees. Three young gentlemen, who, in the joyousness of their hearts, believed nothing else than that all this was merely a madly merry frolic, mounted their horses in a twinkling, and followed the fugitive.

When the Cornet saw himself again pursued, he suddenly rode more slowly, to the great astonishment of the chasing triumvirate, who speedily overtook him, and surrounded him with shrill laughter and cries.

"Aha! aha! Now we have the Cornet fast—now there is no more help. Give yourself up captive, Cornet H——, and turn round directly with us." And one of them seized upon his horse's bridle.

But the arm was rudely struck back; and looking stiffly and proudly upon his pursuers, the Cornet said with warmth—

"If the gentlemen had the least grain of sense, they must have seen directly that I am in anything but the humour to play and to be played with. They would now also see that all these frolics are to me disgusting. I wish them at the devil, and you with them. Leave me in peace."

"That's very abusively said, the thousand!" said one of the triumvirate, and put his horse at the same pace as Cornet Carl's; whilst the other two gentlemen, standing rebuffed and taking counsel together for a moment, galloped back again amid loud laughter.

The Cornet rode gently, and looked with a keen, angry, and inquiring glance at his unbidden companion, who observed him with a pair of large, clear light blue eyes with a kind of ironical quietness.

The two silent riders now reached a cross-road. Here the Cornet turned himself proudly to his companion, and said—

"I presume that we part here; good night, sir."

"No," replied the other, carelessly and ironically, "I have now a few words to say to you."

"When and where you please," said the Cornet, frowning up.

"Hoho! hoho!" said the other, ironically; "do you take the matter so ill? Where and when you please, are indeed words which we may use as a kind of challenge—when and where one pleases to take one another's lives. Now, for my part, that can certainly be when and where you please; but this time I do not mean it to be so serious. I only accompany you to hold a little conversation, to see whether I cannot enliven you a little, excite you a little—to converse with you."

"With certain people," said the Cornet, "I converse most willingly with the sword in my hand—that keeps at a distance."

"Sword!" said his opponent carelessly: "why a sword!—why not rather with a pistol! That talks louder, and serves also to keep folks at a distance. I don't fight willingly with the sword."

"Perhaps with pine rather," said the Cornet, disdainfully.

"Yes, pine; or rather hair-pins," replied his opponent, smiling, as he took off his hat, and from the richest plaits of hair which ever adorned a lady's head, drew a large hair-pin, to which he (or rather she) fastened a little note, which she reached to the Cornet with the words, which she uttered in a very different tone—

"If you find this more painful than the point of a sword, forgive those who must bring it to you against their will."

And the blue-eyed horsewoman, Therese D——, gave the Cornet a friendly, compassionate look, saluted him lightly, turned round her horse, and vanished quickly from his wondering eyes.

But these soon expressed another feeling, for he recognised in the address of the note the handwriting of Hermina. With feelings which one can easily imagine, the Cornet opened the letter and read the following:—

"My only friend upon earth! farewell! farewell! If thou come, it is too late. I have been compelled to yield to my mother's despairing prayers. To-day I set off to Stockholm. Tomorrow I am Genseerik's wife—if I live till then. My brother, my friend, my all,—ah, forgive me! Farewell!"

HERMINA.

"Now to Stockholm!" said the Cornet, with desperate and firm determination to win her—or die!—"Thanks, eternal Heaven!—there yet is time."

The evening began to be stormy and dark. The Cornet felt nothing, and cared for nothing around him, but rode at full speed to the inn.

"This moment, a stout active horse!" cried the Cornet in a thundering voice; "I will pay you what you will!"

In a short time a snorting steed neighed merrily under the wild rider, who with voice and spur still more excited his courage, and with the blind fury of impatience sped onward, onward, over —; but let us take breath for a moment.

KLA-WHIT! KLA-WHIT!"

The Corpse Owl.

It was night. The moon's silver flood streamed quietly down over the castle of Thorsborg, where all seemed still, because no light shone from the deep windows, speaking of a wakeful human eye, of a heart which knew no rest. Ah!—and yet—

The clear lamp of night shone into the Colonel's room, and lighted up, one after another, the gilded-framed family portraits, whose forms seemed by the pale bluish beams to come again to life, and from the night of antiquity, in whose shadows their joys and pains, hatred and love, prayer and glances, had long been extinguished, now looked forth with quiet dreamy smiles upon the combats of their living descendants with the dark powers of life, and in the spirit of these thoughts—which thought alone perceives—whisper,

Thou wilt forget, wilt be forgotten quite—
The combat of the day be hid in night;
Repose will follow when thy strife shall cease.
Spirit keep this in mind,—and have thou peace!

Peace? Quiet, apparitions!—you wish to comfort. But there are moments when thoughts upon this word of the grave and of heaven make us shed bitter tears.

The Colonel stood in his window and looked out into the moonlight night. His lofty brow was paler than common, and dark fire beamed in his deep-set eyes.

A storm-wind raged now and again through the court-yard, and carried along with it heaps of yellow leaves, which struck up a whirling dance before the old rock-firm building, and reminded one of courtiers, who tried to amuse their dark glancing prince. The flag-staff on the tower swung round gratefully, and an uneasy, anxious whistling, such as in stormy weather one hears in great buildings, passed lamentingly here and there through the castle. This sound was worthy to be the messenger of misfortune; it distressed the hearer like melancholy forebodings. White clouds, of strange, fantastical shapes, were driven over the heavens, and resembled hosts flying forth with torn banners. They wrapped a storm-sail over the queen of night, who nevertheless quickly broke through it with conquering beams, and at length they assembled themselves in dark grey masses lower down on the horizon.

The Colonel contemplated with uneasy and gloomy feelings the wild conflicts of nature. He bitterly felt that the spirit of discontent with his poisonous breath disturbed also the peace of his hitherto so happy and united family. He, who loved his own family so dearly, who was so tenderly beloved by them in return, he was no v all at once become as it were a stranger to them. Wife, children, removed themselves from him—turned their faces away from him; and it was his fault; he had refused their prayers; they were unhappy through him; and at this moment, when his conscience bore witness that he had firmly adhered to his principles of right—that, without wavering, he had acted up to his severe but lofty ideas—in this moment painful feelings arose in his heart, which seemed to accuse him of having erred in their application, and thereby, that he had caused suffering which he might have prevented—that he had embittered the days of those beings whom he was called upon to make happy and to bless. A physical sensation of pain, which was peculiar to him, and which he mostly perceived when his soul was painfully excited—a spasm of the chest, which made breathing difficult, was now more than commonly acute during these gloomy thoughts. He felt himself solitary; no one, at this moment, felt tenderness towards him; nobody's thoughts hovered above him on the peace-bringing dove-wings of prayer; he was solitary! A tear forced itself to his manly eye, and he looked up on high with a dark wish soon to leave a world where pain ruled.

man being with outstretched arms floated alone, along the starry vault; it appeared to descend lower and lower, and the outstretched misty arms seemed to approach the Colonel. He thought upon Elisabeth—upon her love—on her promise to be with him after death. Was it not as if her spirit would now embrace him? Was it not her apparition which now, when every affectionate voice was silent around him, descended that she might solitarily call to him through the night, I love thee! I love thee!

Nearer and nearer came the ghost-like appearance; the eye of the Colonel followed it with melancholy longing, and almost unconsciously he raised his arms towards it. Then was it suddenly snatched up by the storm-wind,—the extended arms were rent from the misty body, and in broken, wild flames, like a mysterious fantasy, the white cloud passed by above the turrets of the tower. Space was desolate. The Colonel laid his hand upon his breast,—it was desolate there. Some deep sighs laboured forth from its painful recesses. At this bitter moment some one approached him with soft footsteps—an arm stole under his, a hand was laid familiarly and tenderly upon his hand, and he felt a head lean softly upon his shoulder. He looked not around—he questioned not—he knew that she now was near him, who for so many years had shared with him joy and pain; she alone could divine his hidden pain,—she alone in the silent night came to him with consolation and love. He laid his arm quietly around the companion of his life, and held her closely to his breast, when soon both the inward and outward pain allayed themselves. Thus stood the wedded pair for long, and saw the storm travel over the earth and chase amid the clouds. They said not one word in explanation of that which had occurred, not one word of excuse. What need was there of it? Reconciliation clasped them to its heavenly breast. They stood heart throbbing to heart, they were one.

The storm, which increased every moment, moved with raging winds the tower-bell, which had just struck twelve. The dull strokes of the bell were perceived. The Colonel held his wife closer to his breast, who at this moment was thrilled by an involuntary tremor. She looked up to her husband. His eye was immovably riveted upon one single point, and hers, following in the same direction, remained still and immovable like his.

On the road, which was visible from this side, almost in a straight line to a considerable distance from the building, a black body was moving along, which, as it approached the castle, assumed every moment a larger size and more extraordinary form. Before long they could distinguish by the light of the moon, that it consisted of several persons, who in a particular manner seemed held together, and as it were moved together very slowly, but altogether in a body. Now it was hidden by the trees of the avenue—now again it was in sight and much nearer. Several men seemed to be carrying something heavy with great care.

"It is a funeral procession!" whispered her Honour.

"Impossible! at this hour!" replied the Colonel.

Nearer and nearer came the dark mass. Now it entered the court. The wind blew wildly and bestrewed it with withered leaves, and took with it the hats from the heads of several of the bearers, but none of them went to seek after them. The procession advanced right forward to the principal building. Now it ascended the steps—so softly, so carefully; blows thundered at the door,—all was silent and still for a moment,—the door opened and the train entered the house. Without saying a word the Colonel left his wife and went hastily out of the room, the door of which he locked, and sprang down stairs. The bearers had set down their burden between the pillars of the hall. It was a bier. A dark cloak covered it. The bearers stood around with uncertain and dejected countenances.

"Who have you there?" asked the Colonel, in a voice which as it seemed that he had not the power to prevent trembling. No one replied. The Colonel went nearer, and lifted up the covering. The moon shone through the lofty gothic windows down upon the bier. A bloody corpse lay there. The Colonel recognised his son.

O paternal pain! Cover with your wings, ye angels of heaven, your smiling countenances, look not down upon a father's pain! Be extinguished, extinguished, ye beaming lights of the firmament! Come, dark night, and with thy holy veil, hide from all eyes that pang which has no tears, has not a word. O never can human eye penetrate a father's pain!

Noble and unfortunate father! When we saw thy eyes fixed upon thy son, we turned away ours—but thou hadst our fervent prayers.

All the domestics were, together with myself, put in motion by the arrival of the message of misfortune, we all stood dumb around the bier. At a motion of the Colonel, and the words, "a surgeon!" every one was in activity. A messenger set off directly to the city to fetch a skilful surgeon and one well known to the family, and the lifeless body was lifted from the bier, and carried to a chamber. The tears of the bearers fell upon the body of their beloved young master. The Colonel and I followed the slow mournful procession. I dared not look at him, but heard the deep almost rattling sighs by which he breathed with the greatest difficulty.

When the body was laid upon a bed, they began, almost without hope, eagerly to make use of all means which are available to revive a fainting or swooning person. The feet were brushed, the breast, the temples, and palms of the hands, were rubbed with spirits. Blood now began to run slowly from a wound in the head; it was bound up. Busied with the feet, I ventured an anxious, inquiring look at the Colonel—but turned it away again hastily with horror. He was the colour of death—a spasm had drawn together and disfigured his features. The lips were closely compressed, the eyes fixed. All at once I felt, as it were, a light tremor pass through the stiffened limbs which my hands touched. I scarcely breathed. It was repeated—I looked up to the Colonel.

The one hand he held tight upon his breast—the other he conveyed to his son's mouth. He seized mine and led it there. A faint breath seemed to come from it. A feeble throbbing moved on the temples; a sigh, the first salutation of reviving life, heaved the breast, a faint tinge of life spread itself over the face. The Colonel looked up to heaven. O with what an expression! O fatherly gladness! thou art worth being purchased with pain. Look down O angels of heaven, into the blessed father's heart! It is a sight for you.

Now the slumbering eyes opened, and mirrored themselves in the father's look, which, with the highest expression of anxious gladness, rested upon him. They remained thus fixed for a moment, and then softly closed again. The Colonel, terrified, placed his hand again upon his son's mouth, to ascertain if the breathing were weaker than before; then the lips moved themselves to a kiss upon the paternal hand, and an expression full of peace and reconciliation spread itself over the young man's countenance. He continued to lie immovable, with his eyes closed as of one sleeping. The breath was drawn feebly, and he made no effort to speak.

When the prudent and affectionate Helena sat beside me on her brother's bed, the Colonel left us to seek for his wife. He beckoned to me to follow him, and I sprang up stairs, pinching my cheeks the while that I might not look like a messenger of death. Her Honour sat motionless, with her hands clasped together; and, in the moonlight, was not unlike one of the pale ghosts of antiquity which glanced around her in a silent family circle. When we entered, she said to us with quiet anguish,—“Something has happened! What has happened! Tell me—tell me every thing!”

With admirable calmness, with inward tenderness, the Colonel prepared his wife for that which awaited her; and endeavoured, at the same time, to inspire her with a consolation and a hope, greater, certainly, than he himself cherished. After this, he led her into the sick-room. Without speaking a single word, without uttering a sound, without letting fall a tear, the unhappy mother went up to her son, who now appeared to be nearer to death than at first. The Colonel stood now at the foot of the bed, and preserved his manly, powerful deportment; but when he saw his wife softly lay her head down upon her son's bloody pillow, and with all a mother's love and a mother's indescribable expression of pain kiss his pale lips, and the uncommon likeness of both countenances became now more striking amid the mournful shadow of death, which seemed, as it were, to rest upon both—then he bowed down his head, hid his face with his hands, and wept like a child. Ah! we all wept bitterly. It seemed to us as if the spark of hope, which was just kindled, was extinguished—and nobody thought that the mother would survive the son.

And yet, human cares, gnawing pain, sharp sword, which pierces through the inmost of the soul—you kill not. The wonderful seed of life can nourish itself even with sorrow—can, like the polypus, be cut asunder and grow together again, and endure, and suffer. Sorrowing mothers, wives, brides, daughters, sisters—womanly hearts, which sorrow always strikes deepest and breaks, you bear witness to this. You have seen your beloved die—have believed that you died with them—and yet you lived, and could not die. But what do I say! If you live, if you are able to submit yourselves to life, is it not because a breeze from a higher region has infused comfort and strength into your soul! Can I doubt of it, and think of the noble Thilda R—, the mourning bride of the noblest husband! Thou didst receive his last sigh—with him thou lost all upon earth—thy future was dark and joyless,—and yet thou wast so resigned, so gentle, so friendly, so good! Thou didst weep; but saidst consolingly to sympathising friends, "Trust me—it is not so difficult." O then they understood that there was a consolation which the world gives not. And when thou, endeavouring to mitigate thy pain, saidst "I will not make him uneasy by my grief," who could doubt that he whose happiness on the other side of the grave thou soughtest to preserve, was near thee, and surrounded thee with his love, and strengthened thee, and comforted thee!

"And there appeared to her an angel of heaven, and strengthened her."

Patient sufferers, hail to you! You reveal the kingdom of God upon earth, and shew us the way to heaven. From the crown of thorns upon your heads we see eternal roses bloom forth.

But I return to the inconsolable mother, whom the first unexpected blow of misfortune had overpowered. She collected herself—to go through a long time of trial, for her beloved wavered a long time between life and death. She herself failed of strength and resolution properly to attend upon him. Had it not been for Helena, had it not been for the Colonel, and had it not been (I shame to say it) for me—then:—but now we were all there, and therefore (through the mercy of God) the Cornet remained—alive.

In times of sorrow and mourning, souls become united. When outward misfortunes assail us—then we draw one towards another, and it is for the most part when watered by the tears of pain, that the most beautiful flowers of friendship and devotion grow up. Within the family, a common misfortune mostly effaces all little contentions and misunderstandings, to unite all minds, all interests in one point. In particular when death threatens a beloved member, then are silenced all discords in the family circle, then only harmonious, even if they be mournful feelings, move all hearts, attune all thoughts, and form a happy garland of peace, within whose bosom the beloved invalid reposes.

After this occurrence with Cornet Carl, and during the course of his illness, all unpleasantness, all constraint in the H— family vanished; every care, every feeling, every thought, united themselves around him, and when his life was out of danger, when he began to enjoy himself—O how vividly they felt; how highly they loved one another!—and what an indescribable necessity there was to make one another happy; how they feared in any way to darken the brightening heaven!

It was extremely affecting to me,—but I cannot imagine what is come to me to-day that I wish to touch the heart so much—and to make my readers weep, both at my sorrow and at my joy,—as if there did not fall useless tears enough in the urn of sensibility,—or as if I myself had become regularly low-spirited with the H— family. Let us therefore pay a flying visit to the D— family, and see whether we cannot amuse ourselves a little. Through the power of my magic-wand (the most miserable goose-quill on earth), we will now betake ourselves, that is to say, my reader and me, for a moment to

LÖFSTÄMPLIN.

BREAKFAST was in. The table was full of people. Upon the table stood bowls, and skales were proposed.

"The thousand fetch me!" said a voice (which the reader perhaps recognises), "if I have not a desire to drain the cup to the very dregs once more in a skål to Miss Eleonora!"

A lively neighbour, as red as a peony, said, kindly admonishing, "What would Julie H— say to it?"

"Julie H—. The thousand fetch me! I don't trouble myself about that which Julie H— says. Miss Julie may see what she has occasioned with her caprices. It would please me, fetch me the thousand! some fine day to send back her betrothal-ring. Yea, yea!"

"Skål—Arvid!" cried Lieutenant Ryttelin, "a skål for independent men!"

"And for their friends!" cried the little Lord Byron. "I mean their lady friends," whispered he to Eleonora—"But it will not do for the rhyme's sake—do you understand!"

"Yes, I don't trouble myself much about that," she replied.

"Lieutenant Arvid! Lieutenant Arvid P—, I have the honour to drink skål to you!" exclaimed the Ironmaster D—.

"And I, and I, and I!" repeated many voices.

"Fill up your neighbour's glass, Eleonora!"

"Ladies and Gentlemen! I propose a skål for Lieutenant Arvid's bride—that she may be-think herself, and what belongs to her happiness—and take him again into favour."

CHORUS. "Yes, that she may—"

A voice. "Ladies and Gentlemen—the thousand fetch me! ladies and gentlemen—that is an affair—fetch me the thousand! about which I don't trouble myself. I have a great desire not to be taken into favour again—I—but—but to—yea, to send back her betrothal-ring—the thousand fetch me!"

CHORUS. "Skål for independent men! Skål for Lieutenant Arvid!"

"And skål for girls without caprices; skål for my Eleonora and her sisters!" cried the Ironmaster D—.

CHORUS. "Skål, Skål!"

"Drain the bowl!" added the little Lord Byron, with a grimace.

TEA AND SUPPER.

I HAVE just had the honour of seeing my readers at a little déjeuner; I now pray for the honour of entertaining them at a little supper. Nay, nay, do not be frightened! It will not be great, nor grand; nor will it be like a rousing up of his Excellence Ennu, nor will keep you up in wakeful pain beyond midnight.

I cover a little round table in the blue boudoir at Thorsborg. In the middle of the table Helena has placed a large basket of grapes, and wreathed it with asters, gilliflowers, and other flowers which still retain their hues under the pale beams of the autumn sun. Around the Bacchus crowa are arranged those simple dishes, of which one finds mention made in the legend of Philemon and Baucis, as well as in all idyls where suppers are talked of. I shall waste, therefore, no paper by the enumeration of milk and cream and other pastoral dishes.* Her Honour would perhaps not forgive me for passing over in silence a dish of honey-cake, from which flowed an aromatic juice, as well as a great tart (to the perfecting of which she had lent a hand) filled with plums—more light, enticing, and delicate than one can—the Colonel, it is true, declared that when he had eaten a piece it lay rather heavy on his stomach,—but, as her Honour, after a little vexation, said, “one does not know what oppresses some folks. Gentlemen have such curious ideas!”

At that very moment, for which I pray the attention of my kind reader, her Honour left off rubbing, for the fifth time, a speck from a water-bottle, which in the end she discovered to be a peculiarity in the glass itself, and therefore, alas, immovable! At this moment there assembled by degrees, in the room, lighted mildly by a lamp, Julie (without the betrothal-ring), Professor L—, the Magister with his pupils, and, last of all, entered, between his father and Helena, Cornet Carl, who for the first time since the fall from his horse joined the family circle during the evening hours. Her Honour went to meet him with tears in her eyes, kissed him, and allowed herself no rest till she had seated him on the sofa, between the Colonel and herself, comfortably supported by soft cushions, which she even would place around his head in such a manner as if it could only be sustained by the help of winged cherubs. The Colonel observed too, with sweet roguish pleasure, and a laconic—“Ay! ay!” how the cushions tumbled to right and left. Her Honour declared that the Colonel blew them. When she had settled them to her mind, she seated herself silently, and contemplated, with a tender, pensive smile, the pale countenance of her son, whilst tears, which she herself did not observe, rolled slowly down her cheeks. The Colonel looked at her so long with a mild serious eye, that at length she was aroused by its expression to attention to herself, and she immediately conquered her emotion, that she might not disturb the rest of her beloved invalid.

It was delightful to see how the little Dumpplings, with looks full of appetite, and open mouths, brought to their sick brother of the good things with which Helena had loaded the table, and how indescribably difficult it was for them to resign the plates. Julie knelt before her brother, and chose, from a dish which she had set upon the sofa, the largest and most beautiful grapes, which she gave to him.

I had almost a mind to ask Professor L— what book it was which he read so devotedly and with such attention. He would either have answered “Julie,” or he would have looked a little confused, and have turned to the title-page of the book, which would have looked very suspicious, namely, as regarded the reading of the book.

In the looks of the greater part of the little company, this evening, there was a something very unusual—a constraint, a liveliness, a something, in a word, like that which sparkles in the eyes of children when they on Christmas-eve expect the arrival of the Christmas-goat.

Cornet Carl alone was dejected and silent: the indifferent, feeble expression of his eyes testified of a joyless heart; and although he replied mildly and kindly to all the evidences of affection which were heaped upon him, there was a something so mournful, even in his smile, that it called forth tears afresh in the eyes of her Honour.

In the mean time the Magister went fishing after somebody who would play chess with him. He had more than once set out the chess-pieces on the board, and turned it round, and coughed at least seven times, to give a sort of signal that opponents desirous of battle might now announce themselves. But as no combatant presented himself, he set out now on a crusade to seek out such, and challenge them. Professor L—, who saw himself first threatened with a challenge, stuck his nose so solemnly into his book, that the Magister lost courage to venture the attempt, and turned to Julie, who fled to the other end of the room. After that, he was about to try Helena, but she was so occupied with serving at table;—now he came up to me with a determined countenance. “I must,” I said, “go and see whether we shall have moonlight this evening.” We had last night the moon in the wane.

The poor Magister at last, with a deep sigh, threw a glance on the little Dumpplings, who were just now seizing upon the tart, and admonished them to make good speed, as he was thinking of shewing them the movements of the chess-pieces.

The Colonel, who blew his tea, and who with a smile observed the movements of the little company, now raised his voice, and said, giving to every word an unusual emphasis,—

“I have been told to-day that Lieutenant Arvid P— has sought from Eleonora D— (and has found it too) consolation for the instability of a certain young lady.”

O how Julie crimsoned. Professor L— dropped his book to the floor.

“I fancy,” continued the Colonel, “that this may be very good. Eleonora D— is, I believe, a clever girl, who knows what she is about, and understands how to take the best side of others. Arvid P— is a good match for her, and she is a good match for Arvid. I wish them all possible happiness.”

“I too!” said Julie half-aloud, and stole towards her father, delighted to discover in his words an acquiescence in the dissolution of her betrothal. She looked at him a moment, with an expression in which hope, joy, tenderness, and doubt alternated; but when his eye, full of fatherly gentleness, met hers, she threw her arms around his neck, and gave him more kisses than I could count.

* Ah, heaven have mercy on me! It comes now clearly into my mind that Baucis, when the unexpected strangers arrived, ran out in order to sacrifice to their entertainment her only goose. And I, who have invited so many strangers to supper, can treat them neither with goose, calf, nor turkey! I am ashamed of myself, up to the eyes!

Professor L— threw his arms around himself (with the mind probably of embracing somebody), and contemplated the beautiful group with a look—oh, how eloquent is a look sometimes!

"Give me a glass of wine, Beata!" exclaimed the Colonel, "I will drink a joyful and joy-bringing skål. A glass of Swedish wine of course!"

(Friendly reader, it was berry-wine he meant—and which he called for me to bring him. Forgive this little boasting.)

I gave it to the Colonel.

"Skål to thee, my son Carl!" cried he, with a beaming glance.

At this moment harmoniously sounded a fine harp—accord from the next room. An electrical thrill seemed to go through everybody in our room, and a sort of illumination kindled up all eyes. The Cornet was about to start up, but was held back by his father, who laid his arm round him; whilst her Honour, in anxiety of his evidently violent emotions, threw upon him more eau de Cologne than was reasonable or agreeable. To this harp—accord followed another, and yet another. Thus, like the delicious odours of a spring morning, there gushed forth by degrees an enchanting stream of beautiful and pure melody, which now rose, now sunk, with infinite delight, and which penetrated so beautifully the inmost of the heart, that one might have said that the finger of an angel touched these strings. To these tones were soon united a voice even still more delightful. A young female voice, pure, clear, and melodious, which trembled in the beginning, but by degrees acquired more and more certainty, and sang with more and more enchanting expression:—

Remember'st thou the moment when Thy heart a heart had found,
And wert so blessed—and love's flame burned,
And lit life's barren ground?

It was so sweet, it was so bright,
The world was all so fair,
Each thought bore up to heaven's height
Our gratitude and prayer.

Then came a time, whose bitter we Did soul from soul compel,
And sadly passed from tongue to tongue
A trembling fare thee well!

Farewell all joy which earth can give,
Farewell all pleasures here!
Farewell, my friend! O care is o'er
See all again is clear!

See, thy beloved is near to thee;
Meets thee with blissful heart,
And whispers, "I am ever thine,
We never more shall part!"

What did the Cornet do in the mean time? A firework of joy and rapture flashed from his eyes. His feet moved, he stretched forth his arms; but withheld by the arm, by the prayer and eye of his father, he could not rise from the sofa. The soul also soothed its vehemence during the song; feelings of quiet happiness seemed to possess his soul, and he looked up to the ceiling with a look as if he saw heaven open.

Her Honour, who in the mean time had gone out, returned at the close of the song, leading by the hand the enchanting singer—the angelically beautiful Hermína. The Colonel rose, and went to meet them. With real fatherly affection he embraced the charming creature, and presented her solemnly to the company as his fourth beloved daughter.

Let nobody blame the Cornet that he did not instantly spring up and throw himself on his knees before his beloved. He really could not do it. The feeling of transporting happiness was too strong for his exhausted strength, and a transient faintness overcame him at the moment when he saw, on the hand of his mother, that beloved being enter the room whom he had believed to be lost for ever. Her Honour now emptied over him her whole bottle of eau de Cologne.

As he again opened his eyes he met those of Hermína, which, full of affection and tears, rested upon him. The Colonel took the hands of the young lovers and united them. The whole family closed in a circle around the happy pair. Words were not spoken; but those looks, those smiles, full of love and bliss—O how much better they are than words!

PROBABLE CHORUS OF MY READERS.

But how! But what! But why! But when! How came it about! How did it go on!

I shall have the honour, methodically and orderly, as is becoming to a House-counsellor's, on this subject to give my

EXPLANATION.

When a jelly has nearly finished boiling, one throws into it white-of-egg (as is said in artistical phrase) to clear it.* So also, when a novel, little story, or literary composition of any kind, approaches its completion, then one throws in an explication or explanation, to get rid of the sediment; and this is generally much of the quality of white-of-egg, namely, is sticky and cementing, clear and clarifying, and tolerably insipid.

I see already what faces will be made over my white-of-egg chapter, and am myself rather uneasy and anxious about it, and think it will be best, instead of my own written word, to give my reader part of a conversation which one fine November afternoon took place between Mrs. D—— and Mrs. Mellander, who was her's, as well as the whole neighbourhood's newspaper and advertising gazette; but in order to spare my reader the mistakes and conjectures of the two ladies, I will, unknown to Mrs. M—— and Mrs. D——, introduce a prompter on the scene; that is to say, a breath of the spirit of truth, which, whether it passes over the field of the history of the world, or through the smallest chink in the door of domestic life, is an important, always dear-bought auxiliary or assistant. My prompter is besides unlike him who is engaged at our royal theatres, in this, that he prompts not the actors, but the spectators to the right track. But to the affair.

(Mrs. D—— sits over the afternoon coffee.

Mrs. Mellander comes in).

Mrs. D. Nay, my sweet Mrs. Mellander, nay at length—welcome! I have waited almost half-an-hour. The coffee is almost cold—I must certainly have it warmed.

* The reader is respectfully requested to recollect that the House-counsellor's good fortune, or ascent, was prepared or boiled up in a wine-jelly. Now, therefore, in grateful memory of the offspring of hush-horn, she serves up therewith a dessert.

Mrs. M. Heaven forbid! my little, your Honour—cold or warm is good enough for me.

Mrs. D.—(as she serves her). Now Mrs. Melander, now, what news?

Mrs. M. Ay, your Honour, now I am, thank God, clear about all—a bit more sugar—if you please.

Mrs. D. Nay, tell me, tell me, then! I have heard say that the little wood-beak yonder,—Hermina, is adopted by the H— Family as their own child—that she and Cornet Carl are betrothed—and that there soon will be a wedding.

PROMPTER. Not for three years, says Colonel H—. The Cornet must first travel, and look about him in the world; and Hermina (her Honour says) must first learn Swedish rural economy, and that of itself will require three years.

Mrs. M. It seemed to me that somebody was talking near us;—are we alone?

Mrs. D. Not a Christian soul can hear us.

Mrs. M. Nay, then I shall tell your Honour a horrible story—but see—I will not have it said that I told it.

Mrs. D. Not a Christian soul shall know of it.

Mrs. M. Well then! It runs so. In the beginning, the present Baroness K— was in foreign parts married to a Swedish nobleman, who was called something of Stjern—and had by him a daughter—no other than that handsome young Hermina; about whom neither father nor mother troubled themselves greatly—because, do you see, they wished to have had a son, and the girl must have had a sad time of it at home. Now—in the mean time comes Baron K— there abroad—into—Taly—or whatever the country is called—and sees the handsome lady, Hermina's mother—falls madly in love with her, and she is over head and ears in love with him. Her husband was aware of it—there was a horrible disturbance in the house, and the two gentlemen got to fighting.

PROMPTER. A duel.

Mrs. M. The end of it was that Baron K— was obliged to leave the country. He returned now to Sweden, and lived there for a while a godless life, gambled and rioted till all his affairs fell into disorder. One day he heard that the husband of the handsome lady abroad was dead—and set off speedily, and thought to get a handsome wife, and with the handsome wife's money to pay his debts. Now—he courted the widow—she said yes to him—married him in privacy, thinking afterwards to get the forgiveness of her old father;—but he (a rich and high-bred personage) became raging mad against her, and disinherited her. Yes—the new-married folks had nothing to live upon in foreign lands. Nay—then they came handsomely hither, and on the very morning the trading-house in which was the remainder of K—'s property became bankrupt—and now sprang the creditors from all sides upon him, and he was obliged regularly to hide himself from them; therefore he lived in that little Wood-house there, and would let neither dog nor cat see him; and when perchance people came there, he was as mad as a wild bull—and was angry with his wife, whom he fancied had deceived the people there. Yes, —if must have been an unhappy and miserable life.

Mrs. D. But how came young H— there?

Mrs. M. Yes, heaven knows that!—that I have not been able rightly to get at—but there he came—and the two young folks fell in love with each other. About the same time also there came there the handsome, rich Law-commissioner G—, and fell in love, too, with the little Hermina.

Mrs. D. That is altogether incomprehensible! The girl is altogether not handsome—no frischeur, no colour.

Mrs. M. Ah! what is she beside the sweet Miss D—s? Like a radish beside beet-roots.

Mrs. D. (offended) Mrs. M— means probably roses.

PROMPTER. Peonies.

Mrs. M. Yes,—I mean so exactly,—of course. Where was I just now? I have it. Nay—the young H— travelled in the mean time, and remained away the whole summer, and the Law-commissioner went continually to K—'s, and made himself agreeable. One fine day he was there courting—and what do you think? Hermina would not have him—and gave him a direct no. Nay there was a disturbance in the house!

Mrs. D. The girl always seemed to me a romantic fool.

Mrs. M. In the autumn all Baron K—'s creditors set upon him and would have money, or would take him to prison. Your Honour sees the affair was this, that he during the summer had secretly visited Stockholm, and gambled and won, and therewith had maintained the house-keeping and kept off the creditors for a time. But all at once his luck took a turn, and he came into horrible difficulty. He then swore a deep oath, and said to Law-commissioner G—, "Pay for me ten thousand rix-dollars—and you shall have Hermina for my wife." And he replied, "As soon as she is my wife, I will pay the money on the morrow." The Baron would at first terrify Hermina into saying, "Yes." But it would not do. He then threw himself on his knees before her and prayed, and the Baroness did so too—and the girl cried, and said merely, "Give me three days time." The parents would not, but were obliged to submit; and during these days she wrote to Cornet H— that he must come to her hand-over-head—

PROMPTER. Not verbally correct.

Mrs. D. — that he should pay the sum of money, and have her for wife.

PROMPTER. She did not write so.

Mrs. D. An intriguing thing!

Mrs. M. Yes, truly! Nay—the Cornet came home quite beside himself; wished to have the money from his father, who said—no.

Mrs. M. Yes, yes; the old ones are all covetous. Nay, the rest I know. There was a dispute between father and son. Mrs. H— got into it—they said foolish things to one another.

PROMPTER. False!

Mrs. M. Yes; it became a regular family quarrel. The Cornet rode away desperate—came to the place in the wood,—found the K—s gone, was as if out of his mind, rode hither and thither—the whole day, and met at last with an acquaintance whom he challenged.

PROMPTER. False!

Mrs. D. Yes—and was carried home at night, as if dead, to his parents. But which way had K— taken?

Mrs. M. That was in this way. There came people out who positively would seize upon Baron K—. Then he and the Baroness assailed Hermina with prayers, so that she, out of anguish of heart, said yes to anything. Law-commissioner G— talked to the creditors, and promised to pay them in a few days. And so he conducted Hermina to Stockholm, that there on the following Sunday the bans might be published once for all, and directly afterwards they be married; all was to be done secretly, and in haste, because every one, and the Law-commissioner in particular, was afraid of young H—.

Mrs. D. But how came it that there was no marriage?

Mrs. M. Ay, because Hermina became ill, and nearly half mad, like Clementina in Grandson (a novel, your Honour knows), and she was about to put an end to her life.

PROMPTER. False!

Mrs. D. How wicked.

Mrs. M. Her mother then became anxious, and sent a messenger to Colonel H—, with whom she had formerly been very well acquainted.

PROMPTER. False! false! false!

As the prompter seems of the three speakers to be the one who knows best the progress of the pair (probably because he holds the manuscript in his hands), thus he may step down upon the stage, and endeavour to disentangle that which he is as capable of describing, as the others of relating falsely.

PROMPTER. My gracious ladies and gentlemen, the affair is this: Hermina's suffering of soul, against which she had so long combated, brought on, during the days permitted to her, a sort of still insanity, which terrified all those around her. Genserik G—, who discovered in Stockholm how desperate K—'s affairs were, and who plainly perceived Hermina's dislike to him, withdrew from the game, and vanished all at once, without any one knowing where he was gone. Baron K— saw quickly that nothing could save him from ruin, and determined to fly, and his wife to accompany him. It was in this moment of hopelessness, when a new star ascended for the unhappy husband and wife. They approached each other,—they wept together—a veil of oblivion was dropped over the past—they promised to support one another through the weary journey of life; their earlier love awoke, and allowed them to hope, that if they preserved its fire, they might even in the depths of misery find some happiness. The heart of the Baroness, whose ice-suffering appeared to have broken, bled for Hermina, and shuddered for her fate, of having to wander around the world with her unhappy parents as a prey to want and misery. One evening as she sat observing the lovely, pale girl consumed with care and suffering of mind, who now lay in a quiet slumber, she knew that her heart was breaking, and subduing her feeling of pride, she seized her pen and wrote the following lines to Colonel H—'s lady—

"A despairing mother calls upon the mercy of a mother. In four-and-twenty hours I shall leave Stockholm, to fly out of Sweden. My daughter I cannot and will not take with me. I will not see her become a prey to misery, for it is misery which I go to meet. Your estimable character, the kindness which I have myself seen beam from your countenance, has given me courage to turn myself to you with this prayer. O! (if you heard my trembling lips utter it—if you saw in my breast the broken and repentant mother's heart, you would listen to my prayers); receive, receive my child into your house, into your family! In mercy receive her! Take my Hermina under your protection; take her as maid to your daughters—for that, at least, the grand-daughter of the Marquis Azavello might be suitable. Now she is weak and ill—weak in body and mind; she is not good for much now, but have patience with her; ah! I feel—I become bitter, and—I must be humble! Forgive me! and if you will save me from despair, hasten, hasten hither like an angel of consolation, and clasp my pitiable child in your protecting arms. Then will I bless you and pray for you; O may you never know a moment as bitter as this!

EUGENIA A—."

This letter was received by Mrs. H— some day's after her son's accident. She showed it to the Colonel. Both of them immediately set off to Stockholm, and returned with Hermina, who from this moment received from them the affection of parents, and who soon in the atmosphere of peace and love which surrounded her, bloomed forth as lovely as she was happy.

[Exit PROMPTER to make room for BEATA HVARDAGSLAG, who looks very much disposed to talk.]

Few people upon the theatre of life love the dumb parts. Every one wishes to come forward in his place to say something, even were it nothing more than "I am called Peter"—or "I am called Paul, look at me! or listen to me!" and as I, Beata Hvardagslag, will not do myself the injustice to appear more discreet than I am, therefore I again step forward and say, "listen to me."

Baron K— vanished hastily with his wife out of Sweden. They took their way towards Italy, where the Baroness wished to make another attempt at reconciliation with her father. They expected during this journey to have to struggle with every difficulty which want and poverty can occasion; but it was otherwise for them. In many places on the way they found, quite incomprehensibly, that they were provided for by some person quite unknown to them. In different cities lay sums of money ready for them to take up,—a good angel seemed to attend and watch over them. The Baroness's letter to her daughter contained these tidings.

"It is all my husband's work," said her Honour to me one day, with a beaming expression of pride, affection, and joy. "K— was his enemy during his youth, and had done him many wrongs. Although since that time they have been altogether separated, I know that my husband has not forgotten K—because he cannot forget it—but such is his revenge. He is a noble man—God bless him!"

I said "Amen!"

THE LAST SCHEME.

August 1830.

THE widowed Provostess, Mrs. Bobina Bult, sat in her travelling carriage, with the reins in her firm hands. Round about her were packed, in hay, a mass of eatables in bags and tubs; in the middle among these, her good friend, C. B. Hvardagslag.

The August evening was mild and beautiful, the way was good, the horse cheerful: and yet Mrs. Bobina's set-out looked shabby; for before her went an empty cart, driven by a young peasant lad, who seemed to have made up his mind to try her patience; as he drove, step by step, with her carriage, preventing us from passing him; because, when we turned to the right, he turned to the right; and when we to the left, and tried to get past him, he was there before us. And all the while, he sang with a full throat, songs on most disagreeable subjects; looked often round at us, and laughed scornfully. I looked up to Mrs. Provostess Bobina Bult—for I am, alas! a little lady, and she is tall grown, and straight and powerful as a house-beam,—and I remarked how her under-lip projected in a manner which I knew to betide anger. I saw her chin and the point of her nose grow of a crimson colour, and her little grey eyes shoot out arrows of vengeance. Many a time did we, both by good and bad words admonish the boy to leave the road free, but in vain. Provostess Bobina bit her lip, gave me the reins without saying a word, jumped out of the car, took some prodigious strides, and stood, one, two three, beside our tormentor; seized him with a strong hand by the collar, dragged him out of his cart, laid him on the ground before he had time to think about resistance, and gave him, with the heavy handle of her whip, some blows upon the back, while she asked him whether he would beg pardon and mend, or prove still farther the strength of her arm. Probably he was already convinced of its unusual strength, for he was speedily humble and repentant, and promised all that one wished. Provostess Bult now allowed him to get up, and gave him a short but powerful penance-sermon; the conclusion of which was so beautiful that it moved me, moved herself, and even the peasant lad, who wiped the tears from his eyes with his hat brim. "I know thee," added Mrs. Bobina, "thou art from the parish of Aminne; thy father has long been sick; thou canst come to me at Lofby on Monday morning, and have something for him."

We now drove on unimpededly, but had now and then a detention by the way. In one place, we helped an old woman who had been upset with her cart; in another place the Lady Provostess disappointed to release, with much difficulty a great pig, which had set itself fast in a hedge, and whose lamentable cry went to the very inmost of the heart.

At the down-going of the sun, we saw its beams salute Lofby. Small columns of smoke rose corkscrew-like from the cottage chimneys, dispersed themselves in the clear evening air, and united themselves in a light transparent cloud, which like a rose-coloured gauze veil, floated over the village, which, with its pretty houses, green gardens, and its murmuring, clear river, presented a charming view, as we slowly drove down an easily-descending hill, which quickly branched out into two arms; one of which carried us to our home, lying some fifty paces from the village.

The cows came in long rows from the pasture meadows to be milked, with jingling bells and peaceful lowing. Wood-horns sounded, peasant-girls sang with clear and shrill voices; and to this sound was added the bing-bong of the church bells, which sung on the Saturday evening, "Good-night" to the week, and announced the day of rest. Mrs. Bobina Bult's countenance was joyful and solemn. Everybody greeted her kindly and reverentially, and kindly she greeted everybody. When we had arrived at our little school, the swarm of children broke forth from the house amid sounding cries of joy, and embraced her with unbounded rapture and affection. Caresses and gingerbread were divided among all.

Many things now took up the time of Provostess Bobina. One girl had just begun to weave a web, another had just finished hers—these the Provostess must see.

A servant man had cut his leg; the Lady Provostess must bind it up; a little sick boy in a neighbouring yard could not rest (so his mother said) till he had seen the Lady Provostess. A dear married couple had fallen out, and agreed that the Lady Provostess should settle things between them,—and so on, and so on.

First of all, Mrs. Bobina talked with all her scholars; prayed with them all; wept with one little one deeply repentant for a serious oversight in the course of the day; admonished another; praised a third; and kissed and blessed them all, and went to look after her duties out of doors. When the clock struck eleven she had bound up the wound; mightily scolded at first, and then reconciled the married pair; comforted the little boy, and so on. When she returned she looked at the prices of weaving; arranged about the work and housekeeping for the morrow; eat in haste two potatoes with a little salt, and then went to the other end of the village to convey to an expectant, sick, and unhappy mother, the joyful tidings of a child now turned from the paths of vice.

I sat in the mean time in my room. Four little girls lay in beds around me, with rosy cheeks and snow-white sheets, sleeping quietly.

The calm beautiful August night, which was so warm that I could have my window open; the silence and repose around me; the light breathing of the slumbering children, had in them something delightful and pacifying, and awoke in me that still, pensive feeling which spreads calmness over the present, and often fans the remembrance of former years within us. The moon, that friend of the days of my childhood and youth, arose and looked kindly and pale over the birch-groves into my room. Its light stole caressingly over the closed eyelids of the children, then shone quietly upon a face which the days of life had withered—upon a breast whose feelings years have not yet been able to calm. O how wonderfully floated forth upon the friendly beams all those, so dear to me, mournful and joyous memories of my past life,—how clearly they ascended from the night, and crowded to my heart, so animated and warm! All the people with whom during my life I had come in contact, and who had become dear or important to me, seemed as if they would assemble around me, and revive their influence by word and glance. The H— family, from whom I now had been separated for nearly a year, came at this moment so near to me that I seemed as if I could talk with its amiable members, ask them how all stood within their home,—whether they were happy, whether they yet called me to mind!—Yes—whether! For I had received, for a long time, not the least token of remembrance, not a line, not a word. A childish anxious feeling of being forgotten—of rightly belonging to nobody—of being to persons whom we esteemed so highly and loved so much, so little—so nothing at all—overcame my heart for a moment. I could not help weeping—I sate with my handkerchief before my eyes, when Provostess Bult, who had seen me at the window from the court, came in. She questioned me seriously, like some one who will know a thing to the bottom, and I confessed my weakness with humility. She blamed me with warmth, admonished and kissed me with motherly tenderness, and bade me go to bed directly, and for her sake to take care of my health for a long time.

She left me; but I did not obey her just then—struck a light, lighted my candle, and sate down to write a lecture—to myself. At that moment I heard the clock strike half-past twelve. All at once there was a noise in the house, and directly afterwards somebody sprang up stairs, and came to my room. My door opened softly, and the widow Lady Provostess Bobina Bult, in nightcap and slippers, with her bed cover over her shoulders, stood there with joy-kindling eyes, and a thick letter in her hand, which she reached to me. "From H—s! from H—s!" she whispered. "I would not wait any longer for the city-messenger; but just as I was laying myself down I heard him coming. I had a presentiment! Good-night! Good-night! God give thee joy!" And forth was Mrs. Bobina Bult.

August 13, 1830.

It is a clergyman's little wife who writes to you. It is two months since I was no longer Julie H—, but Julie L—. I had not courage to write before. I have been bewildered in my head, and properly anxious for some time. The causes:—first, the horrible respect I had for my dear husband,—yes,—I actually did not know for a time how I should conduct myself with my admiration of Professor L—, feelings of my inferiority and my precious self love, which would not allow, under any condition, Julie H— to go—how shall I say it—under its true price. And then—this blessed country house-keeping!—cows and sheep, and eggs and butter and milk, and so on, and a deluge of small things—and then mamma, who was so uneasy, and would help me; but—now,—by degrees every thing is come, for all that, into wonderful order. The little god with arrow and bow helped me. My good L— is, I fancy, more solicitous to please me than I him,—yes, he was and is, God be thanked, rightly in love with me. After I saw this there was no need

—I took courage. Cows, calves, and hens throve; under the great kettle of the house-keeping there was a brisk fire,—and inamma was easy, thank God. And my husband—of course he was pleased,—because I was pleased with him.

Beata, do you know what I pray for, morning and evening,—yes, every hour,—with all the fervency of my heart!—"O God, make me worthy of my husband's love. Give me ability to make him happy!" And I have received much ability,—for he is (so he says and seems) very happy; if you knew how fresh he looks—how gay! It is because, do you see, I look after him; he does not look any longer so shabby as formerly; and then—he does not sit up at night; that he has left off. And nevertheless he thinks and writes (as he himself confesses) more freely and more powerfully than formerly. Besides this, I take good care not to disturb or trouble him when he is in his study, writing and reading. O!—when I wish very much to see him for a moment, (he is, after all, handsome, Beata!) I steal softly in, play him some little trick, lay a flower in his book, or kiss his forehead, or such like, and then go quite softly out, and receive, when I turn myself round to shut the door, always a beam of his eye, which follows me as it were secretly.

For the rest I endeavour to form myself into a right estimable clergyman's wife. I wish people to call L—'s wife a pattern for all the wives of his congregation. Don't imagine that with all this I forget, or neglect, my little outer man: O no! I take counsel very often in the glass, but do you know which glass I most frequently consult! Ay, that which I see in L—'s eyes—it is so charming to see oneself en beau.

O Beata! how much more noble it is to be united to a person, whom one highly esteems and honours, and who is, at the same time, so good! As Arvid's wife, what a nonentity I should have remained, what a life of nothingness I should have led! Now I feel with inward joy that every day I ascend higher in my own esteem, and that of my husband. It is a happy feeling—to ascend.

Do you know that Arvid is married—has been so for three months. His wife, Eleonora D—, always looks very wide awake—and he looks—one may say—almost obliged to be cheerful. I fear that his good rest is a little disturbed. Poor Arvid! The young couple, in the mean time, give magnificent feasts and entertainments. The old gentleman P— drives (certainly intentionally) almost every day past here with his "swans" and his daughter-in-law, in the handsome landau, and drives quite slowly, as if he fancied he was driving the funeral procession of my good luck; but I feed my ducks with joy, and with a heart free from care; not kindly to Eleonora, and thank the Eternal Goodness for my lot.

It is Saturday evening. I expect my husband home. In the arbour outside my window I have set out our little supper table; asparagus from our garden, beautiful raspberries and milk—L—'s favourite dishes—complete our supper. The angelic Hermina Linna decorates at the moment the table with flowers. How lovely she is, how good she is, how indescribably amiable, no one can imagine! She has almost supplanted us with our parents—and yet, one forgives her so willingly. Ah! brother Carl! thou hast found a beautiful pearl. He will soon leave the shores of the Mediterranean, to find again in his beloved North his life's pearl, and to shut it up in the muscle-shell of marriage. Ha! how did I hit upon that narrow simile! Yet it must stand. Beams only the sun of love into the mother-of-pearl habitation it will float forth upon life's stream, a little island of bliss. Carl writes home such amusing and interesting letters. His soul is like a museum, among whose jewels Hermina will live. Thus, indeed, of a truth, like a pearl in gold. Do you know what happened to Carl before he left us? One fine evening he went to sleep—a ornet, and woke—a Lieutenant! Was it not harming!

To-morrow, my beloved parents and sisters come here to dinner. It will be a happy day.

I have told you how happy I am, and yet I cherish now one wish and one right vividly, the fulfilment of which will complete the measure of my happiness. My good friend there is in our house one little room, pretty and comfortably papered with green, and with white curtains (precisely such as you like), looking out on meadows where fat cows, which give the most beautiful milk, graze pleasantly; in the room is a bookcase, a—yet it is so tiresome to describe!—come and see it, and if it please you, and you think you can be at home with your entertainers, then—call it yours. My good friend, come to us—come. Now I hear L— coming at a distance. He comes into my room. I shall pretend that I neither see nor hear him. One must not spoil these men, and make them fancy that one listens to their steps. Yes,—cough—embrace me—I shall not stir, nor drop my pen. One must not always submit; one must not spoil his — wife; and therefore Julie must give me the pen, and, sitting upon my knee, see me write that for which she will inwardly be sorry.

Our good friend, Beata, come to us. We expect you with open arms. In our home you will find yourself well off. Come and see how I hold Julie in check. In order to give you a proof of this, she shall not, spite of her zeal, write one word more to-day.

14th of August.

I cry, I laugh, I am beside myself—and yet I must write. Do you know who is here? who is just come! Guess, guess! Ah, I have not time to let you guess. Emilia is here, my sister Emilia! Emilia the good, Emilia the gay, Emilia the handsome—the happy Emilia! And Algernon is here, and the little Algernon—the most magnificent little boy on the earth! Mamma dances with him, papa dances with him, Emilia dances, Algernon dances, L— dances. Wait, wait, I will come and sing, and cannot write a word more, so sure as I am called

P.S.—Beata, come back to us!

THE H— FAMILY."

Amiable and happy family, I thank you; but Beata will not come. I shall write this answer to-morrow. Innocent children, who slumber around me, I shall remain with you, because I can be useful to you. Happiness resigned often gives contentedness of a higher kind—it gives peace. O might I only know that—whilst every day's quiet billows uniformly, but silently, bear me onward and towards that silent shore—and every day will be blessed.

Nightly mists rise up from the meadows announcing the morning, and admonish me to rest. Around the hillock of my life ascends also a cold mist. If it come nearer, I will write at once, and take leave of the H— Family.

PREFACE TO TRALINNAN

(THE BONDMAID).

A beloved friend, to whom I would communicate my warm interest in the Northern Legends of the Gods, read aloud with me during solitary autumn evenings in the country, a learned disquisition upon them. Her countenance continued steadfastly cloudy and dissatisfied during the whole, and when she came to the words—"Loke, found the half-roasted heart of a woman;" she flung the book vehemently from her and exclaimed—"Nay! I can bear this no longer! It is too monstrous! too disgusting! It makes me actually ill!"

"And yet," I zealously interposed—"I assure you there is much and deep meaning in this mythology, and the greatest interest, if we—"

"That may be," interrupted me my friend somewhat impatiently, "but to comprehend it, I promise you I must take another method. Do you write something about this meaning that you consider so deep, and then I shall see whether I shall comprehend or endure it."

The challenge was accepted with laughter; the execution of it drew forth tears—for the misery and the darkness of the past arose, and was felt as present. Three days after our little conversation, the BONDMAID was written; and I proposed to read it aloud to my friend, while by way of prologue I said, "I have here endeavoured to collect into one tangible picture what our forefathers believed respecting gods and men, about life and death, heaven and hell, as well as earthly things. In the dawn of the world, as in that of the day, we see first the shadows of night still rest on the earth, yet at the same time we behold the morning red of the eternal truth, and herald of the sun, in whose light our race has acquired light, and the slave his freedom." My friend listened to my prologue in silence, and I commenced my reading.

It is always a hard matter to go through with, as my friend, whenever I begin to read to her any of my compositions, is sure to begin mercilessly to gape. I say "to go through with," because I have found that if the article rivet her attention, which, heaven knows is not always the case, the gapiags quickly disappear, and give place to most lively and enchanting sympathy. As now, therefore, with a secret glance at my friend, I began to read aloud "the Bondmaiden," and with a dreadful feeling saw her let one undisguised yawn follow another; I pretended not in the least to perceive it, but read on, and soon beheld to my great consolation, the mouth close itself, and the eyes and ears become profoundly attentive. The result of the reading was, nevertheless, but little edifying.

"Ah, my poor soul!" said my friend with a deep sigh, "that truly was no amusing history! For your Krumba, or Tumba, or Katakumba, is too hideous; and then the conclusion—ah! it is horribly tiresome altogether!"

I defended my Bondmaiden the best that I could, at the same time observing that her name was Kumba, and not either Tumba or Katakumba. My friend's last words were, "It may be very true that she is beautiful. I would willingly wish to believe so; but I beg to be excused liking her. There is interest enough about her; but the conclusion, the conclusion . . . !"

The Bondmaid continued a good while after this in silence, undergoing, the while, first one and then another change, but still without being able to win my friend's favour. I have now resolved to make the public, from whose decision, as from that of God himself, there is no appeal, the judge between us; and to hear what it says of the Bondmaiden. My friend assures me, that no one can desire more cordially than she, that "Katakumba"—she has perversely taken a determined whim to call my Bondmaiden thus—may be admired; and I protest to my friend, that no one can more heartily chime in with her desire than

SCENE I.

The Flower Garden. FEIMA binds up flowers to their supports. KUMBA waters them.

FRID.

THE morning is delicious and clear. Yet glitters in the grass the honey-dew from the tree Mima. The Nornor sprinkle its crown with water from the sacred fountain, and let it softly rain down in heavenly sweetness over the flowers and leaves of the field. The bee sucks it from the bosom of the flowers, and then bestows the precious juice on man, which is delicious both to the sick and the sound. How beautiful, how rich, is Nature, how full of wisdom are all her arrangements! How great is the goodness of God, who shaped the earth for mankind like a cup filled with honey!

Brightly advances the sun on his hero path. Receive my greeting, thou radiant creation of the All-Father, thou at whose fire spirits of light and spirits of darkness assemble themselves affectionately to prepare the golden harvest of the earth! Here all burns, here all rejoices in the splendour of the All-Father's eye! The All-Father is light, is fire. Love, too, is fire, is an animated flame sprung from the All-Father's bosom. O Sun! thou, the image of his person; thou, warm and glorious as love; I bow myself in adoration before thee, and pray thee to protect a flame as pure and powerful as thine. A beam of thy fire kindle thou in the eyes of King Dag; it burns yet more beautifully in his heart; he is the descendant of a divine race;—protect him, illumine his voyage over the great sea! Make his path light, his arm strong and victorious! Conduct him home to the court of his fathers, to his faithful bride; and, kneeling by his side, I will consecrate to thee a better offering than now, thou glorious king of day!

Bond-maidens, it is good! The flower-garden is well tended. The beauty of the plants gladdens both eye and heart. Soon, too, will King Dag see it, and reward your care. He has commissioned me to give you a testimony of his favour. He will one day give you more beautiful ones himself. Feima, take this silver chain. Thou shalt wear it on thy wedding-day. The same sun which blesses my union with King Dag shall witness thy marriage with thy faithful Hreimer. He shall be my master-gardener. The cottage, which I have caused to be built for you, will soon be completed. I wish you always to remain with me and the king. Thou shalt brew the mead for our wedding; and thou wilt do well, Feima, to call the good Disor to thy aid, that it may be clear and strong.

FEIMA.

[Falls down and will kiss Frid's feet. Frid extends to her her hand.]

Princess! thy favour is great! We will live and die for thee! How beautiful is thy hand; how white, how silken. Only King Dag has hands as beautiful as thine!

FRID.

More beautiful, Feima, because they are stronger. Kumba, thou art the most intimate of my attendants. From the years of childhood have we been together. Thou shalt always be near me. Take this golden ring.

KUMBA.

King's daughter, that is not for me.

FRID.

I give it thee.

KUMBA.

My hand is brown; my fingers are short and bony—what shall the golden ring do there? It does not become me. Retain thy gift. Thy favour is all that I desire.

FRID.

O very well! I will keep my ring, but—till thy wedding-day. I know that Klur loves thee. Thou wilt not always be hard with him. He shall put the ring on thy finger. (Kumba turns away.) If thou hast a wish, thou shalt tell it me, that I may gratify it. I desire that all should be happy. Ah! see, see here reddens a rosebud! Welcome, thou little harbinger of the highest happiness! (kisses it.) Kumba! Feima! tend it well. Protect it from the night chill; moisten its root with the clearest water. "When the rose-buds reddens, then shall I be near thee!" wrote last to me, King Dag. This rose is the first which reddens this year in the flower-garden. Perhaps when this flowers opens, shall my life's happiness be in bloom. Tend well the delicate bud, bond-maidens! Ye shall not do it in vain. Kumba, in about an hour I shall expect thee to attend me to the bath.

KUMBA.

I will be punctual.

FRID.

Once more—take care of my rosebud!

SCENE II.

KUMBA. FEIMA.

FEIMA.

How good she is!

KUMBA.

She is happy!

FEIMA.

How beautiful she is, and proud! Well is she worthy to be beloved by a king like King Dag. Kumba! What art thou doing? Thou breakest off the bud which she bade us cherish!

KUMBA.

She can have so many others.

FEIMA.

O Kumba! that was ill done. Ought not her slightest wish to have been a law to thee? She, thy lady, thy benefactress!

KUMBA.

I am her slave!

FEIMA.

And yet is she so gracious, so condescending to thee! Fie! Kumba!

KUMBA.

Reproach me not. My mind is embittered. I will die!

FEIMA.
Die! Wherefore?

KUMBA.
I am a slave!

FEIMA.
And has one of our race ever been treated better than thou? Has not the king's daughter exempted thee from laborious occupations? Hast thou not from childhood been allowed to be near her, and treated better than all the servants? Does she not give thee better clothes, better food? Dost thou not go freely about in the royal halls? Hast thou not there been instructed in much that thralls are not wont to know?

KUMBA.
Feima! Why dost thou call me fortunate? Call me unfortunate! Why was I not left in the humble cottage, with poverty and hardship, and taught by custom to endure the stern lot to which I was born? Why did the bondmaid receive a dwelling in the halls of kings, and learn to compare? Why did I learn to love beauty and greatness, when my lot was ugliness and insignificance? Why did I receive instructions which taught me only to despair?

FEIMA.
Ah! it was thy proud heart which taught thee to feel thus! It is thy haughty spirit which converts the sweetness into poison!

KUMBA.
Frid too is proud, and yet in her that is no fault!

FEIMA.
No! for pride becomes her; but pride does not become us. She is of the race of the Jarls; we of that of the Thralls.

KUMBA.
And yet Feima, the Saga says, that the father of our race was a god—yes, the same god who afterwards became the father of the haughty race of the gods. We are the elder brethren and sisters. Why are we suffered to creep in the dust, when the younger brethren are exalted to God's heaven?

FEIMA.
I do not know. But this I know, that it would not befit thee to wear Frid's crown on thy head, her golden girdle around thy waist, and to walk so slowly and proudly as she does. I feel that I could not help laughing at that.

KUMBA.
Woe is me! I know it too. In me that were ridiculous, which in her is beautiful. I am called, and I am, Kumba.* But it is precisely of that that I complain. Why am I so?

FEIMA.
And I know too that there are much good and many joys for us if we can but bridle our minds and our desires. Have we not the sun's light and warmth? Have we not the fragrance of flowers as well as the king's daughter? Have we not the enjoyment of the cottage which protects us; of food which we eat? Can we not, under the guardianship of good masters, possess our husbands and children as well as the Jarls?

KUMBA.
Slaves!

FEIMA.
Hreimer is a slave; yes, and his hand is sooty, but diligent and faithful is that hand; his heart is good, and his glance tells me how dear he holds me. By his side I shall live happy and free from care, for we love one another, and we love our masters, and know that they will not separate us, or sell our children away from us. We desire nothing better than always to live in their service.

KUMBA.
Happy thou!

FEIMA.
The same happiness may be thine if thou wilt; Klur loves thee.

KUMBA.
Fie, fie, fie then! I speak not of him.

FEIMA.
And if thou wilt not have a husband; if thou wilt remain single, what more pleasant lot canst thou have than to serve the noble Frid, and live in the royal halls, and see around thee men and women of the race of the Jarls? That, indeed, is great and beautiful.

KUMBA.
Miserable! Know, Feima; farther towards the north, towards the region where giants and horrible dragons have their abode, there is found amid ice-clad mountains, a people not far removed from beasts. Their clothes are the skins of wild beasts; their dwellings, caves and clefts of the rocks; their speech a bestial noise. Well, then, amongst this people, in their woods, I should feel myself happier than here, in the halls of the king's daughter!

FEIMA.
Thou wouldst prefer living amongst detestable monsters of the woods rather than with the good and beautiful Frid? Thou wouldst rather freeze in their caves, and hunt in their woods, than plait her golden hair and bathe in a silver ewer her white feet?

KUMBA.
Yes, that would I.

FEIMA.
Wonderful! And why?

KUMBA.
Because there I should be free! Because amongst them I should be somewhat.

FEIMA.
I do not understand thee. But if thou findest thyself so unhappy here, wherefore, Kumba, dost thou not make thy prayer to Frid for thy freedom? She loves thee, and could certainly not refuse thy request. Wherefore dost thou linger where thou art in torment?

KUMBA.
Ask me not!

FEIMA.
Thou art very strange. Thou wilt and thou wilt not.

KUMBA.
Woe is me! It is so. My feet are riveted to the spot which bears me.

FEIMA.
Sister! poor sister! I compassionate thee!

KUMBA.
Well mayest thou. But the powers who made the races of the Jarls and the slaves, who gave to the one gold and to the other dust—of these will I demand, Was it just that ye dealt thus?

FEIMA.
Kumba, tempt not the gods!

KUMBA.
They who require of men worship because they conferred on them a wretched life—who demand praise and offerings for the clod of earth which we cultivate with the sweat of our brow for others—to them I will say, "In your unjust selfish existence—"

* Clumsy.

SILENCE! O silence! It is horrible to hear thee! Thy eyes flash, Kumba! Thou blasphemest!

KUMBA.

But if I do murmur and blaspheme in despair over my lot, what then? In a little time I shall grow dumb in the work—in a little time the blaspheming spirit will disappear like a vapour in space, and be as it had never been. But it has not disturbed the rejoicing songs of Valhalla; aloft there is not heard its pain and complaint. And when the achievements of the mighty shall live immortally in the songs of the Scalds on the earth—when their glory shall be admired by succeeding generations—who shall know anything of the life of slaves, of their virtues, their sufferings? Dumb, beneath the burden of their labours, they have sunk into the earth, and are forgotten. Where is found justice for them, in heaven or upon earth? We are born to no end.

FEIMA.

Nay, that I cannot believe. Say not our holy Sagas, that for us, too, shall be found room after death, there, where every one shall receive his reward for what he has done on the earth, whether it be good or evil?

KUMBA.

Seest thou the pale grey cloud in the distance, which sails over the wild heath? Seest thou, far off in the marshes, the vapours tossed about by the wind? There beholdest thou the life of a slave after death. Seest thou the sun, how he warms the world from the inward glow of his own happiness; the stars by night, beaming down tranquilly, as kings from their thrones, as happy spirits in the courts of the gods—there hast thou the immortality of the noble-born of the hero-race. Dark is our life on the earth, dark on the other side of the grave! It is not good to go poor to Odin—the poor find in his halls no room. Alone for a nobly-born hero, alone for a king who carried far and wide the blood-dripping sword, resounds the road to Valhalla; for him only are adorned its couches, for him its cup is burnished, and the Valkyrior bring wine. The joys of heaven are made only for the great, the happy on earth.

FEIMA.

But it is said likewise, that the servant who comes in the train of a great lord can slip into the glorious Asgård; therefore, often do the servants kill themselves on their master's corpse.

KUMBA.

Fools! Yes, to become slaves to them after death as they have been here. "Wretches" are the slaves termed by the Scalds; and justly, for wretched is their lot even there, beyond Hela's nocturnal halls. Thralldom and fatigue await them as here. And for such of us, who do not accompany some mighty lord in death, there shall be no resurrection—we have here lived in pain.

FEIMA.

Ah! my heart tells me different. It says that the gods will never take away again the existence which they have given.

KUMBA.

Seest thou the worm in the sand which is tortured and dragged along by ants? See how it writhes, how it is agonized! Let it be! If thou rescuest it, a thousand others will still be tortured. In vain dost thou writhe, worm. Thy tormentors drag thee to the hillock, to the un-honoured funeral-pile, from which no glorifying flame ascends, and where thou shalt speedily become nothing. Is not the worm created by the gods as well as we? They regard not the worm; they look not down on us. Our fates are alike.

FEIMA.

No; no! I would not believe that, if thou said it a thousand times. They who have served in truth shall certainly hereafter dwell in peace and joy. But, were it indeed not so, were it otherwise—

KUMBA.

What then?

FEIMA.

From the dust was I taken. The goodness of God gave me life. I have seen the beauty of the sun; I have enjoyed the fruits of the earth, the freshness of the water, the cool shade of the trees—I have loved. If the gods shall one day reduce to nothing the dust which they have raised up, I will then praise them for the life which I have enjoyed; and will deliver again into their hands what from their hands I have received, if not without regret, at least without complaining.

KUMBA.

Shall I admire, or shall I despise thee?

FEIMA.

We are small; let us in humility acknowledge it. Humility is the soul's repose. O Kumba, Kumba! Leave thy proud heights—bumble thyself. See, it is only by stooping that thou canst gather this beautiful flower. Quit the regal palace if thou art not happy there, but go not amongst the wild people. Come to us, sister; come and remain with us. Hreimer and I will love thee, cherish thee, perform the heaviest tasks for thee. Choose a husband, possess a cottage, and press a child to thy bosom. My mother has told me, that when she gave me birth the world became light to her, and that she would not have exchanged me for a kingdom. The animals, which are so much beneath us, how they love, how they rejoice themselves in their young! Become a wife and mother, Kumba! become good and happy.

KUMBA.

The cradle and the bier are the tools of the Norðnor, and no one can escape his fate. I will not give birth to a being doomed to unhappiness.

FEIMA.

Hreimer and I are happy, and yet we are the children of slaves.

KUMBA.

My mother was amongst the slaves of Queen Gunnild—she was the most faithful of her servants. Poor and heavy was her lot, yet did she wish to live. My father was a free-born person, who thought little of forsaking the woman who loved him, and the child she had borne to him. I remember a night—that night has stretched itself over my whole life. Flames arose from a pile—they ascended high into heaven. It was the corpse of the queen which was burned. My mother was amongst those who tented the pile; she, with many others, were cast alive into the flames! The queen, it was said, needed her attendants in the other world. I stood amongst the people, still a child, and heard my mother's cry, and saw her burn. Fatherless and motherless, I went thence into the world alone, and wandered in the woods without knowing whither. There came people who seized me, and carried me back to the court of King Atle. They said that I wished to run away and I was conducted to the presence of the king. I answered haughtily to his questions, and he caused me to be whipped till the blood came, in punishment, as he said, of my disobedience. Thou, Feima, then lay on thy mother's bosom—thou didst not understand what I felt.

FEIMA.

But Frid, King Atle's beautiful niece, understood it. She begged thee from the king, and cherished thee like a mother, although she was scarcely older than thyself. She endeavoured to recompense thee for all that thou hadst suffered.

KUMBA.

Then did I sit in the nights, and gazed on the wandering stars, on the flying clouds. I asked them of my mother's fate; I called her name, and listened. The night wind flew complaining over the heath, and the fog bedewed me with tears. See, there, the only answer that I received.

FEIMA.

O canst thou not forget the horrors of thy childish years in all the kindness which has been showered on thy youth? And what dost thou know? Perhaps thy mother's soul lies happily in the sunshine which now closes thee in its warm embrace. O that it would become light in thy soul, and that thou couldst see life and thy own destiny in a clearer vision! It is long since thou hast offered to the gods. Come, sister, come! Let us go to the holy fountain of offering on the mountain. Dost thou see this silver-penny? I received it once from King Dag. I will now offer this for thee. Carry thou also thither an offering of something dear to thee, that we may win the favour of the Powers, and that they may hear our prayers.

KUMBA.

And what wouldst thou that I should solicit?

FEIMA.

A pious, a contented mind.

KUMBA.

Am I then so wicked, Feima?

FEIMA.

Sister, pardon me the hard word;—thou art not good.

KUMBA.

Thou speakest the truth. But, Feima, I have wished to be good. O! had the gods heard my sighs, Feima, I should now have been pious; like Frid, I would wish to make all happy. Seize, torment a bee, and it will sting, and leave poison in the sting; but leave it in its freedom, let it possess its wings and its flowers, and it will suck and confer only delicious sweetness.

FEIMA.

And what wouldst thou desire of the gods?

KUMBA.

Beauty, high birth, wealth, and—a king's love; room in the halls of Odin after death, for me and all my race.

FEIMA.

Kumba, thou art mad. Thy glance is wild. Poor sister! Thy mind is diseased. Come, O come with me to cool thy brow with the holy water, and offer and pray with me in the still morning, while the tumult of the world is hushed, and when Heimdal's ever-listening ears can be reached even by the lowest prayers. Come!

KUMBA.

I will not, sister. At the prayers which now arise within me, thou wouldst be horrified, and the gods would reject me. Thou art right. My soul is sick. Therefore go leave me alone. Go!

FEIMA.

And what shall I say to the king's daughter, when she inquires after her rosebud?

KUMBA.

Tell her that a bitter north wind took it off.

FEIMA.

Then thou wilt not accompany me?

KUMBA.

No, I say; no! Leave me alone.

FEIMA (aside, as she goes away).

I will then go alone, and pray for her. Yet—Hreimer, will gladly accompany me to offer with me for the unhappy sister. [She goes.]

SCENE III.

KUMBA (alone).

Yes, go! Offer, pray to the mercenary, the unjust gods. I am not childish enough to do that. But she is good and pious. Were I but pious as she! Can I not be so? No! for I know more than she; my eyes have pierced deeper into the dark disposal of events; and a poison corrodes me, which she does not know. "Why dost thou not fly?" she demanded. "Wherefore dost thou not solicit thy freedom?" Unhappy power, which binds my will and my soul! Abhorred, beloved torment, which causes me to court what I never can win, and to seek what I ought to fly from, thou wilt tyrannize over me in life and in death. Ah! why saw I the glorious object that I am not to possess? Why should I behold a day which will never shine for me? Why, stern and terrible fate, didst thou allure me up into the light, only to plunge me deeper into my darkness? The mischief is now done; my eyes are dazzled, my glance is fascinated, my heart is doomed, my life is given over to misery. Here is my torment, and here must I remain; so will the inexorable Powers. I must, because I must hear his name pronounced. Not to hear him mentioned, is not to get air to breathe. I must see him again, once more hear his voice, and live in the lustre of his eyes. O King Dag! wilt thou notice the bondmaiden? Wilt thou give one look, one thought, to her who would gladly die for thee? Thou wilt clap thy proud steed with thy strong victorious hand; but it would be defiled by the touch of the hand of Kumba. For Frid—for the king's daughter—is thy hand; for her, thy embraces, thy kisses, thy great, proud hero-heart. And her do I tend and adorn every day, that she may become more beautiful for thee, and all the happier in thy love. Every day shall I see her beauty and happiness, and feel myself devoured by envy. O depth of anguish! O bottomless pit! In thee am I doomed to live and move for ever! [She pauses.]

In the cold, foggy Nifelheim is the fountain Hvergelmer. Streams of poison rush from it; and in its depth, amid countless snakes, lies the great snake Nidhogg, which gnaws at the root of the tree of the world—gnaws, gnaws till it decays. When I was very young, the Saga easily made me shudder. I am now quite at home in it. I seem sometimes indeed to be myself the fountain, that mist is my world, and that the worm gnaws at the tree of my life. [Again silent.]

Sometimes dark thoughts rise up within me. It is said that elves of darkness, which live on the northern edge of the earth, beneath the deepest roots of the Tree of the World, sometimes ascend thence, and speak words with the children of men, which fright the light of day. Hell sends them forth to execute its commissions and affairs. It seems to me as if at times the voice of evil spirits spoke within me, and exhorted me to . . . .

[Another silence.

If I could but die, and find rest! Could my life, after death, but become pleasant; might once the freed spirit but look down from heaven upon the earth, where it had suffered and been tormented . . . Did I but know that a merciful God had prepared for his tired and weary child a peaceful and bright abode, where it might repose after its hard conflict, O then could I still submit myself! could then renounce, then . . .

[Weeps.

But, O ye Gods! ye have forgotten us, and therefore is my spirit exasperated. To your favourites you have given all, to us nothing. Nothing? Yes, bitterness! poison! But with the poison there is strength. Ye Gods! if from the drops, which from hour to hour you cause to drop into my bosom, there swells a stream which burns and destroys, the guilt fall—on you!

SCENE IV.

Frid's Bedchamber.

FRID. KUMBA.

FRID

Kumba! Plait my hair, and anoint it with the oil of the south, which I received from King Dag.

KUMBA.

What thou commandest I will do.

FRID.

And while thou plaitest it, relate to me some of the Sagas which thou knowest so well. It is justly said that the dwelling of the Sagas is surrounded by the murmurs of cool billows, to whose rushing Odin gladly listens. Enlivening and soothing at the same time are Sagas and song,—a worthy pastime for the race of the gods.

KUMBA.

Wilt thou, king's daughter, hear the ancient Sagas of Rig ?*

FRID.

Gladly.

KUMBA.

Heimdal—so it is said; the trusty and wise god, went once on a time to walk in the country, and came on the sea-shore to a house which he entered. The door stood wide open; a fire burnt on the hearth, and within ate the inhabitants, grown grey with labour, Æ and Edda, in old-world garments. Edda took out of the ashes the heavy, thick, seed-mingled cake, brought forth the soup in a bowl; but the greatest delicacy was the sodden calf. Heimdal, who called himself king, continued three nights there, and nine months after his departure, Edda gave birth to a son, which was baptized and named Träl (slave). He grew and flourished, was of a dark complexion, had wrinkled skin on his hands, contracted knuckles, thick fingers, an ugly countenance, a humpback, and long heels. A beggar-girl came to the house; her feet sore, her arms sunburnt, her nose hooked. She was called Trälinna (bondswoman, or female slave). She lived there with Träl, the heavy days, and bore him sons and daughters. Their employment was to twine boat ropes, to drag loads, to carry firewood, to keep and fatten cattle, herd swine, watch the goats, dig turf. From her came the race of slaves.

* Introduced into the older Edda. See Geijzer's, "Sven Mikes Hålder."

Rig went farther, and found in another house another pair. The door stood a-jar; fire burned on the hearth. The husband was shaping a tree into a weaver's beam; his beard was trimmed, his hair cut on the forehead; he had a close shirt, which was fastened by a clasp at the neck. The wife twirled the spinning-wheel, spun thread, and converted it into clothing. She had a fillet on her head, a brooch on her bosom, a cloth round her neck, and ribbon on the shoulders. The couple were called Æfe and Amma. Rig was hospitably entertained, and stayed with them three nights. Nine months afterwards, Amma gave birth to a son, rosy and blooming, with sparkling eyes. He was baptized and called Karl. He grew and throve, learned to tame oxen, to cultivate land, to build houses, forged horse-nails, made carts, drove the plough. To him was conducted home as a bride, Snör, hung round with keys, in kirtle of goat's hair. They exchanged rings, spread the sheet, built a house. They had sons and daughters, and of them are come the race of Karls, or free men.

Rig went further. He came to a hall. The door was closed, and adorned with a ring. He entered. The floor was strown. There sat, the couple, looking each other in the eyes—Foder and Moder. There work was play. The husband shaped bows, twisted strings, polished arrows. The wife ironed and starched her sleeves, and made up a head-dress. She had a jewel on her breast, a silken kirtle, blue figured linen, a countenance more beautiful, a bosom more charming, a neck more white than the recent snow. Moder spread the figured white cloth on the table, set on it the thin white wheaten cakes, and dishes of embossed silver, full of all kinds of meat, pork, and roasted birds. There was wine in flagons and embossed cups; they drank and talked till the day dawned. Rig remained three nights there also, and after nine months, Moder brought forth a son, who was wrapt in silk, was baptized, and called Jarl. His hair was flaxen, his cheeks bright, his eyes keen as those of a young eagle. He grew up, twisted bowstrings, shaped bows, flung the spear, shot arrows, shook lances, rode horses, hunted with hounds, drew the sword, and exercised himself in swimming. Then came Rig again to the court, taught him Runes, gave him his name, and acknowledged him as his son. The young Rig therefore marched over the rocks in war, won victories and lands, distributed goods and estates, and married the daughter of Herve, the slender, fair, noble Ema. Of their sons, the youngest was Kour. He contended with his father Rig in the knowledge of Runes, and won. Then was it the son's lot to be himself called Rig, and thenceforth to understand Runes beyond all others. From him are descended the Jarls and kings.

Here ends the Saga about Rig.

FRID.

Thanks, Kumba! The Saga is beautiful and full of meaning.

KUMBA (aside).

Beautiful!! Yes, for her.

FRID.

But my attention was distracted while I listened to it. A great, a precious, and almost affecting recollection came vividly on my soul. To-day, three years ago, I saw, for the first time, King Dag.

KUMBA.

Ah! speak of that! (aside). The poison is sweet!

FRID.

Thou knowest that my father's brother, the gloomy Atle, had in an engagement killed King Dag's father, the victorious King Iivar. King Dag, and his brother Ragnar, revenged their father's death, and stormed my uncle's castle. Shut up in the inner room of the castle with my tender brother Arild, I heard the din of arms, and the battle-cries of the warriors. Arild clenched his little hands in wrath. I prayed to the gods for his life, for I held him as dear as a mother. Suddenly I heard a cry, accompanied by a wild jubilation of victory. "Atle is fallen! The brave Ragnar has slain him!" But immediately thereon—"Ragnar is wounded! Ragnar is dead! Revenge! revenge!" Amid a horrid din, steps drew near the room. Before the strokes of war-axes, the door went to pieces. At this moment I felt not fear, but wrath and a proud desperation. I had seized spear and shield, and stood there resolved to die, rather than to surrender myself a prisoner; and till my last breath to defend the little one. "Back!" thundered a lordly voice to the on-pressing martial throng; and environed by the flashings of bloody swords, as by a thousand jagged lightnings, I beheld before me a man—a god he seemed to me to be.

KUMBA.

It was he!

FRID.

Yes, it was he! It was King Dag! "Yield thyself!" exclaimed he to me. In answer I sought his breast with my spear. My trembling hand was arrested by his sword, and he disarmed me. Bleeding, I sunk by my brother's side, exclaiming, "Mercy for him! Mercy for the child!" "Death to the traitor's son!" cried wildly the warriors, and rushed on. King Dag turned himself to his people, and covered us with his shield. "Back!" exclaimed he once more commandingly to the wild troop. "With women and children we contend not." The victory is won. Down with your weapons!" But a frantic lust of murder had taken possession of Ragnar's people, and they cried—"Blood for blood!" Then shouldst thou have seen King Dag! Glorious and strong as the god Thor, he lifted his broadsword in defence of the helpless. Like lightning flew its strokes whistling through the air, and fell on the blood-thirsty warriors. Heaps of dead were round his feet.

KUMBA.

The brave! the glorious!

FRID.

Seized with amaze at his superhuman strength, Ragnar's people began to give way. Then cried King Dag—"Hither, my men! Every true friend follow me!" He lifted up Arild, and placed him in the arms of one of his warriors; he took myself in his own, and guarding me with shield and sword, he broke through the tumult of war. I saw nothing more. A swoon overpowered my senses; my eyes were closed.

KUMBA.

But he watched over thee?

FRID.

When I opened them again, it was night; but a night lighted up by a red and wild splendour. I saw from the distant strand a castle stand all in flames; but cool winds fanned my cheek, and father and farther over the dancing waves, conveyed me the winged sea-dragon, and my little brother stood beside me under the purple pavilion, and clasped his hands in childish joy over the novel spectacle. Before me, on his knee, his godlike beautiful countenance illumined by the flames of the burning, and with uncovered head, lay King Dag, and I was his captive!

KUMBA (aside).

Happy lot!

FRID.

Ah, yes! His captive. For my heart had been conquered,—the brave, the noble one; and I could not then, as I wished, in proud anger turn from the victor my glance. By his strength he had disarmed my hand, by his love he now sought to win my love; and when he prayed me as beautifully, as mildly as Balder, when he begged me, as a favour, to accept his kingdom and his crown, then I let him see what my heart felt, and he pressed me to his heart, and called me his bride.

KUMBA.

Thou happy one!

FRID.

Yes, I was happy. Days and nights went on, and life was to me like a beam of the light of God's heaven—all around me was so beautiful. The sea-dragon flew over the blue sea, under the dark-blue heaven, and the waves danced merrily around the prow, covered with golden shields, and the wind sung in the purple silken sails, splendidly embroidered with rich silver vine-branches. By day, King Dag exercised his men in martial manœuvres, and fired them to an almost frenzied, yet joyous, daring, while I watched them from the royal pavilion. When the evening came, and sea and winds were lulled, then took King Dag his harp, and played and sang by my side, which made my heart beat with transport. Then burned the stars clearer, and the spirits of the sea arose in enchantment to the surface of the water; then seemed the sea to burn with a strange light, and we floated onward as on waves of fire. All things did homage to the glorious one, and he did homage to me; yes, happy was I, happy, amid the dangers of war! My father's castle was plundered and burnt. Enemies' hosts invaded King Dag's realm. We possessed no home. Then the son of Valhalla conducted me to the temple of Upsala, and gave me there an asylum, while he advanced against his enemies. He returned and brought me to this strong castle; but was himself again soon obliged to leave me, in consequence of a vow which forbade him to celebrate a jovious feast before he had freed his unfortunate sister Gudrun out of her ignominious captivity. Here should I remain, guarded by his trusty men, till he should return from the Saxon coast.

KUMBA.

And if he do not return? If he perish in strife on the distant strand?—

FRID.

No, no! I fear nothing. A far-precient Vala, a renowned prophetess, who visited the temple of Upsala, has told me his fate. His course will be long and victorious. From this campaign he will return happily, and rich in honours and treasures.

KUMBA.

Thou hast seen the temple of Upsala, the magnificent court of the gods! Thou hast lived amongst Diar and Divo. Were they beautiful and happy?

FRID.

Yes, yes, beautiful and blessed. A noble tranquillity, an infinite dignity repose on their features, and breathe through their whole being.

The cares and the joys of earth touch them not; they stand high above them, gazing into the clearness of the heaven of the gods. The countenance of the chief priest is majestic as we conceive of that of Odin, full of power and mildness. All disquiet dies in him who contemplates it: the before stormy heart hushes itself involuntarily at his glance, and is at peace.

KUMBA (aside).

Peace, ah! And I? (aloud). And the temple and its happy abodes are really splendid!

FRID.

Beyond all description. Of gold and precious stones are the walls; a radiance glows thence, which illuminates the country far around. The gorgeous splendour of the interior of the temple testifies to the power of the divinity; while the silence in the sacred groves, in the lofty halls, interrupted only by the solemn songs of the Diars, speaks of its sublimity, and draws the spirit to contemplation. Had I not so deeply loved King Dag, I should have dedicated myself to the service of the gods, and continued there amongst the sacred Assyniors.

KUMBA (aside).

She chooses between the throne and the temple. But I?—

FRID.

When I recall those days, a wonderfully delightful and solemn feeling seizes me. Ah! it was beautiful in the courts of the temple, in its lofty halls! Pondering on the counsel of the gods, silently walked the deep-thinking Diars.—

KUMBA.

And didst thou learn their secret wisdom—the verses which teach how to quiet waves, quench fire, and dissipate care? Didst thou get to know about the beginning and the end of all things?

FRID.

No! I was too young, and too much engrossed by the outward splendour of life, and by my love. My voice, indeed, blended with the songs of the Assyniors, and I took part in their nocturnal dances, in their ceremonies; but their meaning I understood not. They regarded me—and justly—as not worthy to comprehend them.

KUMBA.

And what, indeed, is all the wisdom of the priests, in comparison with the love of such a king as King Dag?

FRID.

Thou sayst truly, Kumba. But had I never seen him, then could I have preferred, beyond any earthly throne, to live as a priestess in the holy temple. Asg'rd, as it is also called, is an image of the celestial Asg'rd, the eternally green Gudhem; and beautiful is it, amid offerings and songs of praise, to walk before the gods on earth, and up to their everlasting abodes above us.

KUMBA.

That I can believe. Are there always offerings in the temple?

FRID.

Yes, often; but there are in particular three great annual festivals, which were instituted by Odin. Recently has been celebrated the Sacrifice of Victory, that takes place in spring, when the open waters invite to Viking-voyages.

KUMBA.

And do they indeed sacrifice men?

FRID.

Yes. Most commonly slaves and malefactors.

KUMBA.

Slaves and malefactors?

FRID.

Yes, but sometimes also the noblest life. The victim is led forth festively adorned; the seats of the gods are tinged with blood; it is also sprinkled on the assembled people. The smoke which ascends from the flame of sacrifice is delicious, and fills the halls with a delicious aroma. Sweetly sound in accordance the songs of the priests.

KUMBA.

But the victims, the victims! do they complain not? do not their shrieks of misery ascend above the songs of the priests?

FRID.

Their wailings are prevented; or are drowned in the songs of praise.

KUMBA.

They are drowned by the songs of praise!

FRID.

Yes, and no dissonance disturbs the majesty and beauty of the lofty solemnity. But what is this, Kumba? I hear the tramp of steeds, the pealing of horns; the drawbridge is raised! There must be tidings—important ones! Good Kumba, go, fly, and bring me word what it is.

[Kumba goes.]

SCENE V.

FRID (alone).

It is certainly a messenger from King Dag! My heart assures me of it;—how it beats! Still, thou unquiet one, still! O the pleasures and the pangs of love! And yet, beloved pangs, I would not exchange you for the Assynior's eternal repose! O my king! to love thee, that is my life; but if my heart beats thus at the anticipation of a message from thee, how shall I be able to see thy face and not die of joy?

SCENE VI.

FRID. KUMBA.

KUMBA.

A letter—from—King Dag! With it there are costly presents—

FRID.

A letter! Give it me, give it me! O ye dear Runes! (kisses the Runic tablet and reads). He comes, comes soon! Before the next new moon he is here! Victorious, rich in honour and spoil, comes he to his bride, "the eternally beloved." O my bridegroom! O my Dag!

KUMBA (aside).

And I?

FRID.

I will myself make the arrangements for the messenger's reception. I will myself speak with him. I must see the man who has lately seen my beloved; I must hear him talk of King Dag. Kumba, go thou and work on the golden girdle, and be diligent, Kumba, that it may be quickly ready. I will wear it on the King's arrival. I desire that he should find his bride beautiful. I shall then really see him soon! Happy I!

Goes.

SCENE VII.

KUMBA (alone).

But I! Why was I born? Shall I now see them, their embraces, hear their sighs of love and vows of truth? Shall I adorn her for him; help to make her still more beautiful in his eyes? So has she commanded. O ye great! ye dream not that a slave also has a human heart. You trample it under your feet, and give it not a thought, and take not the slightest heed of its death-pangs. "They frown their complaints," said she, "that the joy of the high solemnity may not be disturbed." They dragged them forth to the stone of sacrifice; they murdered them, and drowned their complaints. Out of the fire which devoured their quivering limbs, there arose a sweet odour for the chief priest who sung the praises of the gods. But the men! the slaves! the poor! no help, no escape. They must submit. They were dragged forth spite of prayers and resistance. They must submit. Horrible doom of the Norna! Hard necessity! And for me to—but why necessity for me? If I will, who can constrain me? Can I not, if I will it, command both my own fate and that of others? Necessity exists only for the weak. The strong makes his own laws, and compels even the gods. My stature indeed is low, but my will is strong. Let the sacrificers tremble.

If I should kill Frid, and clothe myself in her garments, and deceive King Dag in the obscurity of night? Loke was cunning, and Loke was successful. I feel that his fire burns in my veins. (She puts on Frid's mantle, and puts her crown on her head.) In truth a glorious costume. Well may the heart beat proudly beneath this splendour. Now am I the king's daughter. (She gazes at herself in a burnished steel shield.) Woe is me! I am it not. My figure is short and thick, my eyes small, my hand rough. Woe! I am the bondwoman's daughter, and my lot is fixed, woe! (Flings down the robe and crown and stamps violently.) No, I will not; I will not long endure this torture. The snake rages in my vitals, and I long after something which may still its hunger. It must be done—by some means! Shall I go to the temple, and gaze into the divinely tranquil countenance of the chief priest, which allays all disquiet? No; I see the sacrificial knife in his hand!—the victim bleeds,—the sacrificers cry—it is the tranquillity of the gods!

CHORUS OF SPIRITS OF LIGHT UP IN THE AIR.

Look to heaven,
To the sun look,
They deceive men never;
Shrieks of victims
Shall have ending,
God's sure goodness never!
Offer hatred,
Offer vengeance,
Mood of revengeful will,—
'Tis but torture;
But the true heart's
Lot is lovely still.
Wonder not then
At the lofty
Peace of powers sublime,

See how brighten
Earth's own fortunes
In the far-off time!
From the depths, and
From the heights, will
There be heard a voice,
That to captive
And to mourner
Shall proclaim—"rejoice!"
Dumb shall grow each
Elfin chorus;
But in heaven's acclaim
Lofter spirits
Shall adore the
World-Redeemer's name.

KUMBA.

(Wakes out of deep thought, and says slowly.)

But, perhaps, after the conflict—after the sacrifice, after the last bitterness, the last eclipse—it will become light—it will be calm, for the victim! If one surrenders oneself freely, bleeds quietly, prays, and dies!—I hear happy voices speak of peace and reconciliation,—but, perhaps, they are only seductive illusions. I have had such before!—

CHORUS OF SPIRITS OF DARKNESS UNDER THE EARTH.

Sweet is revenge, for
It strengthens and quiets Feelings of storm in
The suffering heart.
Drink of its fountain,
Heart, thirst-consumed,
Deep be thy draught,
And thy thirst is no more.

Savish souls waver—
They will and they will not;
Dare, then shrink trembling,
And perish in pain!
Spirits heroic
Dare, and accomplish,
Quenching their pangs
In the conqueror's blood.

KUMBA (as before).

Yes. Yes, they were illusions—and I was merely weak. I hear well-known voices ascend out of the depth, and reproach me with it. Despicable is the eternally-complaining, eternally-hesitating soul. Despicable I will not be. I know what I will do. Yonder, far amongst the rocks, on the desolate shore, which the traveller dreads and the mariner shuns, dwelleth a sorceress, noted for her various knowledge, and exercising the mighty magic art—Seid. To her I will go—will bestow on her the most precious thing which I possess, on condition that she exerts her magic art for me, and gives my heart rest. Ha! this thought invigorates my soul. It is said that snakes and wolves are her companions. Them I fear not. I have known them as they raged here within me. Away! away! To her! to her!

SCENE VIII.

FRID (alone, standing in a window of the Castle.)

FRID.

What a storm! The night is wild, and in vain have I sought rest upon my bed. The seagull's cries sound shrill amid the roar of the waves. Ran's daughter, the dolorous, the poison-mixing, who, with pale hair, wander from rock to rock, seeking warm human hearts that they may press to their cold bosoms, how they now rave and foam, trembling over each other—the terrible ones! Wildly dash pale lightnings from the careering clouds. O ye friendly powers, who desire the good of men, protect my beloved one on his voyage. Conduct him victoriously through the storms and the waves! He is a true descendant of the race of the gods, and so is his bride. Protect, bless us both!

[She is silent.]

Is it the gloom of night which thus operates on my mind, or—is it an unhappy foreboding? But there is a strange feeling in my bosom, and gloomy thoughts arise there, like the black elves out of the earth. Frid was not formerly weak and easily terrified; she had not trembled at the thunders of war; and when the winter-night came black and threatening, then I thought on King Dag and remained cheerful. Why then now? Now that he is no longer far off, now that he approaches every moment nearer to me, when I shall speedily look into his clear eyes—wherefore now this inquiet, this secret quaking in my heart?

[Pauses.]

The sky is dark and wild. On the desolate coast gleam meteor lights. I know that they are base creatures, and seek to injure mankind. But ought, indeed, flames, gleaming spirits of witchcraft, to work evil to a descendant of Balder? Ought King Dag's bride to fear them? She will not.

What strange power is it which moves itself in the air—so strong, so mighty to disturb? And this light, so mild, almost faint, like a feeble petitioner—whom does it guide through the dark night? Why is this light so different to that of the sun in splendour, and in its effect on the heart? How it battles with the dark clouds! Now it is quenched. Strange world, strange dark deep!—

I have been very happy. I have gone through life as in the radiance of a strong sunshine. If at any time the night threatened me, there came only a brighter day. But if the night should now come in earnest, and change my life into darkness!—

I have not reflected much on life. The very happy merely enjoy, and do not think. I have enjoyed life, and praised the goodness of the gods. But many are not so happy as I am. Many have little or no gladness. How do the world and the gods appear to them?—

Thoughts arise in me which I never had before. The lot of life seems to me strangely dealt on the earth. Why do some men receive so much and others so little? The goodness of fate sprinkle the branches of the tree of the world with life-giving streams; but the drops fall unequally. O! but the fresh, the richly-sprinkled branches, will bend themselves over the dry ones, and impart to them of their moisture. This is certainly the will of the benevolent gods, and Frid's highest happiness shall be to follow it. And if some time my hour should come, my hour to suffer—what is that? Ye gods! what a hideous shape rides there on the pale moonbeams! He is little and black as a son of Hel. Is it one of the spirits which was born to Loke by the witch Angurboda; or is it a creation of my sick imagination? No, it draws nearer! It is no illusion!—Speak, hideous one! Who art thou? What is thy will?

BLACK-ELF.

From the under-earth I come on a message to thee.

FRID.

To what end? Wherefore?

BLACK-ELF.

Misfortune awaits thee. Death threatens thee.

FRID.

Death! Ah, no! I will not die, no!

BLACK-ELF.

Death is near thee.

FRID.

Nay, nay! Ah! What dost thou at my heart? It is become so heavy. Away, black one, away! Thou mayest not injure me! I am of the race of the gods.

BLACK-ELF.

Hel waits for thee in his dark dwelling.

[He vanishes.]

FRID.

I will not! No, I will not! Away! Ha! What a frost there is in my veins! Kumba! Kumba!

SCENE IX.

KUMBA. FRID.

KUMBA.

Princess?

FRID.

Kumba! I am ill! Nay, turn not so pale, Kumba. It will go over. Is he gone, the hideous one? Seest thou nothing, Kumba?—there, in the moonshine?

KUMBA.

I see nothing—except the shadow of thy own head on the wall. Look thyself.

FRID.

I have, indeed, had a bad dream. It was a miserable dream—a very miserable dream. It agitated me deeply. It was a weakness. Give me something to drink.

KUMBA.

Take this draught. It will strengthen you.

FRID.

Thanks—I need it. How thy hand trembles, good Kumba. The drink was good. Thanks, Kumba!

KUMBA (after a moment's silence).

Dost thou feel thyself better?

FRID.

Yes—I am better. I am calmer now. Go again to thy bed, Kumba. I, too, will go to rest, and endeavour to forget this dream. Good-night.

KUMBA.

Good-night!

[She withdraws.]

FRID.

I will try to sleep. I will no longer think on this hideous apparition. It was, perhaps, only a deception, a night shadow, which will vanish in the light of day. I will sleep,—I will sleep..

ACT II.

SCENE I.

The Flower Garden. The evening.

KUMBA. FEIMA.

KUMBA.

Thou weepst, Feima.—Wherefore?

FEIMA.

Canst thou ask? Is not the daughter of kings sick, sick to death? Do not her steps every day become fainter, her cheeks paler? See we not the traces of bitter tears on that countenance which before beamed only with smiles? Is not her very voice weak and faltering?

KUMBA.

And therefore dost thou weep?

FEIMA.

Yes; I weep, I will weep, that the lovely, the divinely-good Frid shall go away from the earth; that Hreimer and I shall lose our beloved mistress; that the young king will come home, and find his beautiful bride grown pale. How desolate will the rose-garden be, when we no longer see there the daughter of kings, no longer hear her silver voice; no longer see her beautiful countenance, she, the queen of all flowers! O it was a feast for me even to look upon her!

KUMBA.

Thou callest her the divinely-good. Why didst thou do that?

FEIMA.

Is she not so? Does she not desire to make every creature happy?

KUMBA.

Out of her rich treasure, she gives some gold dust and throws it around her. Who could not do that? What endures, what suffers she for the help of her fellow-creatures? Does she, indeed, touch with a finger the burden under which thou art bowed down? Does she stoop in order to alleviate thy fatigue?

FEIMA.

Kumba, thou art strange! Can, indeed, one of the race of the gods do thus?

KUMBA.

Why not, if it be good? Is not goodness, is not mercy divine?

FEIMA.

Yes; but the high gods, and their descendants, cannot perform the labours of slaves. It is not befitting them. Every one has his proper part.

KUMBA.

See then—it is therefore that I cannot do homage to thy gods, because they deem themselves too good to do good to us. My God, he before whom I would bow my knee, must do otherwise..

FEIMA.

And how?

KUMBA.
He should cause himself to be born in a lowly hut; he should participate in our burdens and our sufferings; he should choose his friends from amongst the despised and poor. He should, like the slaves, be scorned by the high, and partaking in their whole fortune, should, although innocent, be put to death as a malefactor. But after death, he should come again in his glory to his own, and say to them,—“I have suffered this with you and for you, that you might not despair, but believe that the Father of all looks down upon you; for on the other side of Hel’s dwellings, he has prepared a place for you, where you shall rest from your labours, where your tears shall be wiped away, and where you shall live in glory with me to the end of the world!” Oh, many other words should he say, at which the earth should tremble—power should be thrown down—chains should burst, and the fates of the slaves be changed . . . the earth be bathed in blood! . . . Ha! glorious, glorious!

FRIDA.
What spirit speaks through thee? Foam stands around thy pale lips. And thy words! How wild and strange they sound! Kumba! listen! Thou terrifiest me; but I understand thee not.

KUMBA.
That I believe.

FRIDA.
But this I understand, that she is good who gave me this chain, who built for Hreimer and me a cottage; who every day made my heart glad with her friendly words. I know that I would rather bear burdens twice as heavy than see her oppressed by the least thing. When she commands, and I obey her, I know that it ought so to be, and that it is best for us both that it should be so.

KUMBA.
Thou art a slave, body and soul. Remain in thy dust!

FRIDA.
I will so, Kumba, and it shall not hinder me from being contented, and from believing in the goodness of the gods to great and small. To the gods will I now pray for the daughter of kings, that she may be restored to life, to her young consort and us. Blessed be he who heals her; blessed be he who averts from her Hel’s cold hand! But cursed be he who desires her suffering! And if it be a human hand, may it be thus cursed! May Nifelhag’s cold poison-stream drop for ever on the traitor’s heart; may he never enjoy gladness on the earth!

KUMBA.
Sister, speak not thus!

FRIDA.
Yea, thus will I speak! I will work evil to the evil one who desires the death of the good one! But I will not yet despair. I will sacrifice and pray for her. Seest thou this beautiful chain? I received it from her; for her will I offer it for the reconciliation of the unfriendly powers!

SCENE II.

KUMBA (alone).
Blessings, curses, all are alike to me now, and stir my heart scarcely more than a faint evening breeze stirs the leaf of the aspen. Thus has it been within me since I ate of the she-wolf’s heart, as the old woman’s in Jernskog. It made my heart hard and cold. The swelling, its scathing torture, ceased. Hunger for revenge grew strong for action. I took courage to give to the proud daughter of kings the poison-draught which the sorceress had prepared. Since then there lies a trance upon my soul—it seems to me to sleep heavily, heavily;—will it not awake?

[A pause.]

Frid is dying. Now is her joyous career closed. Now she partakes the mortal fate of others, and can learn what suffering is. Now will she not embrace, and be embraced by King Dag. All this beauty, this pride, this splendour will wither, moulder into dust! No more will she pass like a reproach over my life, my feelings. I shall get rest!

FRIDA. Thou didst promise it me, mighty, dark Grimgarda; but yet lives a gloomy disquiet in the depth of my soul. I thirst after her tears. Methinks they would cool my tongue. A hunger devours me to see her sufferings, to hear her lamentations. That must proceed from the she-wolf’s heart. Before, I was not so hard. And yet—if it could but be undone—if I could in the fountain of Urda purify myself from this guilt . . . and yet go away and die innocent! . . .

But it is too late. Therefore away, foolish thoughts! It is too late; I cannot return; and therefore forward, forward into the night, till all becomes dark; forward into hardness, till all becomes rigid and dead. Powers of Aifgrund, strengthen my heart! I cannot win reconciliation with heaven. Well then, Aifgrund! give to me, then, the benefit of my crime. Frid approaches. I will fix my attention on her feeble gait, on her pale countenance, her dimmed glance. Ha! now be proud, daughter of kings! Boast now of love and honour! I will hide myself behind the hedge of roses, and listen to her bewailings. Sweeter will they be to me than the song of the nightingale in the evening.

SCENE III.

FRIDA (her appearance betrays a great debility, a wasting suffering).

FRID.

This is the hour when all things weep the death of Balder. There is no tree, no leaf, no flower, which is not bathed in silent tears; the very stones are bedewed with sadness. Now is Nature weak; her soul is moved; now can she perhaps feel sympathy with the sufferings of a daughter of humanity; and will hear her prayer, and put an end to her torment.

[She supports herself thoughtfully against a tree. He died—the good, wounded by the hand of a subtle foe, and in the same instant Peace quenched her torch and Discord kindled her crackling flames. Pain and tears made their home on the earth. Before, it was not thus; before, it was very different. The gods played joyously on the green earth, and in love created the race of men. Jeffermar came and excited war; and monarchs arose, and strife . . .

I did not notice this before, but now I see it, for the agony which consumes my body opens my eyes to the world’s suffering. What is good, what is pure in life? Does not the serpent of Midgard coil his venomous circle round the earth? Does not Nidhogg gnaw at the root of the Tree of the World? Is there not found a concealed worm in every human heart, in the bosom of every flower? It slumbers for a while, and the flower diffuses its fragrance, and the man smiles. But it waxes, comes forth, and stings, and the flower withers; and the man dies.

My hour, too, is come; my hour of suffering. Since the night when the Black elf came with its message of terror, a secret disease corrodes my heart, and my days and my nights are without repose. My eyes are weak, my lips parched, my knees tremble—my strength of life dies away! . . . .

O Dag! O my bridegroom! What wilt thou say when thou comest to thy castle, and findest thy bride changed into a pale ghost? Yes, perhaps before . . . . but not that were too cruel! To die without having seen thee were eternal misery. Not so savage the Nornor are not! O no! Stands not the All-Father's heaven above me so clear and mild? Stand not the beings of nature all around me so tearful and tender? Why, then, should I despair? Why should I not yet hope to regain life and happiness? Perhaps this suffering was merely sent to make me better, and more grateful. I will bow myself before the gods of nature, and implore them for help, for great is my suffering, great my need of alleviation.

O ye friendly powers which murmur in the green trees! Strong and healing are the juices which the sun pours into your bosoms. Proud and strong do ye stand against storm and winter, but on the head of the weary wanderer you stretch your protecting arms, and give a covert to the young of the bird. Hear, ye gentle existences, my lamentation and my prayer. Torture consumes my limbs, and will sink by degrees my body to the grave! Tell me, O tell me! have you strength which can give life to my strength; manna, which can invigorate mine?

THE SPIRITS OF THE TREES.

We have it not!

FRID.

Ye spirits which sport in the bosom of the flowers, which glance up so beautifully and joyously at the light, ye whom I trusted, and loved, and kissed; say ye lovely, gracious beings, can ye alleviate, can ye help me?

SPIRITS OF THE FLOWERS (softly and sadly).

We can not.

FRID.

Ye pale dwarfs, which dwell in cliffs and stones! I turn to you now, and implore, implore with tears, for great is my suffering! You, too, weep the death of Balder. O! certainly, goodness like gold dwells within your bosoms. Deny me not. Give healing; give help!

THE DWARFS (roughly).

No!

FRID.

Everywhere refusal! . . . that is hard. Nature abandons me. Mighty All-Father! wilt thou also do so? To thy heaven I venture to lift my hands, and pray for that life which I received as a gift from thee. Burns not thy evening-heaven so gloriously in the light of thy countenance? Dost thou not look down upon the earth with love, and on the beings whom thou hast created? All-Father! listen to my prayer! Let me live! Let me, at least, once more witness the return of my bridegroom; let me yet once see, and embrace my Dag! And if thou grantest my request—send me a sign. Let a star fall, let a sough pass through the grove!

[Pauses.]

All is hushed! It is silent as the grave. The red flames of evening expire and the welkin grows dark. Denied! Denied here! Denied or unheard. It is then certain! I must die!

[Retires in silence.]

KUMRA (comes forth).

Beautiful! glorious! She sighed; she prayed like me, and was unheard like me. Now are we alike, daughter of kings. Pleasure sits like a cramp in my heart. For this moment of enjoyment have thanks, mighty Grimgerda!

SCENE IV.

A Room in the Castle. FRID lies on a couch.
It is deep twilight.

FRID.

Long, long hours, how heavily ye stride on; and nothing affords one moment of rest or forgetfulness. The worm gnaws, and eats even deeper into the tree of my life. Hresvelger, devourer of corpses!—thou who sittest at the northern end of heaven, and wastest with thy wings—I hear thy cold wind murmur around me. O I am sick, sick even to the soul! Darkness has obtained power over me! My Dag is absent!

I shall die. I shall quit the friendly earth. I shall relinquish my chosen consort, never more to be enlightened by his glance, never more led by his hand. How will it be with me? They tell of heavenly dwellings, where the noble and the just find entrance when they issue from Hel's dark realm. What are they? Are they indeed for me, and how will it be with me in them? Shall I never see again my beloved king? Shall I love him still, when death chills my heart? Ah, what is my life without my love! How uncertain, how desolate, pale and wild is all in the realm of shadows!

I shall die! I feel how my life dwindles away. Shall it sink into eternal night? But if all here in life—love, virtue, suffering, patience, should be in vain—O bitter, bitter thought!

Good All-Father, no! That cannot be. I will hope, I will trust in thee. Thou didst create the sun and love—thou must be as good as thou art powerful. I will put my head beneath thy hand, and will praise thee even in the embrace of torture. When my tears fall, they shall not accuse thee. Forgive my weakness, my complaints! They will soon be over. I have loved thee, and trusted in thee. I will love thee and trust in thee still, and in my love will find strength to bear my fate. [A pause.]

How peaceful is it become within my bosom! I breathe more easily. Methinks that a breath of life is breathed upon my forehead. It grows light. [A radiant Light-Elf appears at the foot of Frid's bed.]

What an apparition! My eyes are dazzled!

[She covers her eyes with her hands. After a moment she again looks up.]

Is it still there? Beautiful, radiant being! whose splendour is like that of the sun, whose countenance is mild as that of a vernal sky. Who art thou? And whence?

LIGHT-ELF.

My home is the pale azure space. I am of the race of elves, a guardian genius for mankind.

FRID.

O thou comest to me as a messenger of life and gladness! Thou bringest me certainly some of the apples of Iduna, which have power to renew the youth even of the gods. Thou comest to restore to me health and happiness—my heart tells me so. Or why else shouldst thou come so kindly and radiantly? The gods have sent thee to me to put an end to this bitter trial, to give me again my Dag! Why is thy mild glance so powerful? Why dost thou quench thy clear beams? Ah, shine, shine, gracious being! Kindle with thy light the beams of life again in my bosom.

LIGHT-ELF (sorrowfully).

Daughter of man! I cannot!

FRID.

Cannot? Art thou not sent hither by gracious powers to raise and gladden?

LIGHT-ELF.

I came to console thee—to make thy death less bitter.

FRID.

Must I then die?

LIGHT-ELF.

The Nornor have determined it.

FRID.

The goddesses of Fate? The inexorable, the fearful! What have I done to them? Why do they desire my death?

LIGHT-ELF.

Daughter of man, I do not know. The children of Alfhem are permitted to know the will of the Mighty One, but not to penetrate its causes.

FRID.

Then why comest thou to me? Why shouldst thou, by awaking fresh hopes, awaken fresh pangs? Leave me! I can die without thee. Leave me! Thy light gives me pain.

[The LIGHT-ELF retires, and waits at the bottom of the room like a faint glimmer.

FRID.

Is he gone? I was impatient, hasty! How weak I am! And he came to give me consolation—But what? Do I not see yonder, although feeble, his friendly gleam? O come again, thou lovely, gracious being! Pardon the weakness of the dying. Come back! and if thou hast comfort to give me, speak to me, and strengthen my soul—

Thou art very good, and it does my heart good. I feel that to thee I can open my innermost heart. See, friendly being, I have suffered much in a short time; and my own anguish has made my eyes quick to perceive the sufferings of mortals. It has seemed to me that nothing was good on earth; and there have been moments in which I have doubted of the goodness of the gods—of all that makes life valuable; for all under the sun was uncertain and changeable—all flowers blooming only to wither—all creatures born only to die.

LIGHT-ELF.

Does not the heaven vault itself eternally over the changeable earth, embracing it from morning till evening? So does the All-Father surround the world, and bear it in his faithful embrace. The sun continues for ever the same; and in the sun thou beholdest an image of the All-Father's ever-watching eye!

FRID.

Yet war exists on earth; and the old legends prognosticate a fearful strife, in which the earth, and men, and gods shall perish.

LIGHT-ELF.

They will rise again, glorified. One God, mighty, just and good, will then reign in all. Balder will again live upon the earth, and all evil will disappear from it. O daughter of man! the path of life is strife; but the goal is peace, and the means, reconciliation. A day shall come when heaven and earth become one, and gods and men, as of old, shall on the ~~Idavall~~ Idavall play happily together.

FRID.

But when the powers contend, when worlds perish and are born again, O say! when shall the souls who are already—hence find their home?

LIGHT-ELF.

Many good houses has the All-Father for the just on earth. But the most beautiful is the lofty Gimle; a house more fair than the sun, and roofed with gold. There shall faithful and word-keeping men dwell.

FRID.

Is there a home there for me? Shall my dwelling be Gimle the lofty?

LIGHT-ELF.

Daughter of man! I cannot tell thee that; for many are the races of man, and many are the houses. Perhaps Frigga will take thee up into her glorious Vingolf, amongst the blessed troops of the Assyniors. Perhaps wilt thou become one of the chosen virgins who dwell with Gellon in his heavenly palace. Thy dwelling I cannot declare; but one thing I can promise thee, in the name of the mighty gods—life after death!

FRID.

And tell me, O tell me!—for, of all things, that is to me the most important—shall I, beyond death, see again my beloved king, my bridegroom?

LIGHT-ELF.

Is thy soul strong in its love to him?

FRID.

Without him life has no value for me; but to purchase immortality for him, I will myself become nothing.

LIGHT-ELF.

O then rejoice, daughter of man! For if thy love is stronger than death, then death can never again have power to separate you.

FRID.

Almighty and good gods! What sayest thou?

LIGHT-ELF.

After death thou shalt become his Fylgia, and guide him through all life's dispensations. In his dreams thou canst approach him, and whisper in his ears thy eternal truth; thou canst warn him of the dangers which menace him, of the foe who seeks his life. When he reposes from his fatigues in war, thou canst draw near to him in the shape of a bird, and enchant his soul with song. Changed into the loveliest rose, thou canst breathe fragrance for him, and in fragrance impart thy love. When a treacherous enemy lies in wait for him, thirsting for his blood, thou canst take his form, and the traitor shall cast his spear at thee, and pierce—only the air! But thou weepst? . . . .

FRID.

For joy! How delightful are thy words, beautiful child of the azure welkin. Why do they not let death become bright? I shall no longer fear the time which separates me from earthly life, since, O my Dag! I shall then better be able to accompany and serve thee than I am in this mortal shape. But tell me more, O spirit of light! tell under what circumstances his death-hour also shall arrive!

LIGHT-ELF.

His Fylgia can cause him to fall with honour amid the glory of battle and victory. For him the house of spirits cannot be dark, for thou wilt be there to receive him. The King of Shadows will unite thee to thy consort

FAID.

Beautiful, but wild sound thy words. Shudderings pass through me. Dark seems to me life in the kingdom of the dead. Yet love lives there, and in the Spirits' house I shall meet my consort. But afterwards, O Spirit of Light!—afterwards—shall he leave me? May I accompany him to Odin's radiant halls? May I not sit there on the seat by his side, and fill his cup with wine?

LIGHT-ELF.

Mortal! ask no more. No more can I tell. Deep are the councils of the gods, and the children of Alfhem cannot fathom them. Many a secret rests yet in the breast of the mighty; many a beauty, many a strength, which one day shall be revealed. Many stars, yet unknown, shall be kindled in the All-Father's heaven.

FAID.

And the life which shall be kindled in this celestial home—shall it no more die?

LIGHT-ELF.

That is known to the gods; we know it not.

FAID.

Radiant pictures hast thou given me, but surrounded by darkness. My soul is sorrowful.

LIGHT-ELF.

O daughter of man! Complain not, but humble thyself before the will of the gods. For too insignificant is man, that the gods on his account should lay open their sacred depths. Be satisfied with the light which their goodness bestows, and sink consoled into the All-Father's embrace.
[He disappears.]

SCENE V.

A wild Scene of Rocks. It is night.

KUMBA.

Where am I? . . . I have lost my way. Around me glide the spectres of night, and over me thunders the Avenger. It is so dark both without and within my bosom; is so stifling. Air! light!

[Thunder and lightning. A tree near KUMBA falls headlong. She darts forward, and seeks refuge in a cleft of the rocks.]

What was that? Ha! merely a tree which fell, struck by the thunderbolt. Why do I tremble? Why am I terrified? Are not these bare uplands familiar to me? Are they not pale scenes out of my soul's thunder-night?

[A pause.]

Why is it now so hushed, so silent? This silence is torture. Why gleam the wan stars so wildly over the crags? The whole sky is one cloud. Can they see through the clouds? What comes sailing there over the black ridge of rocks? Ah, merely a cloud, a dark thunder-cloud. It shrouds the stars; good! I am tired of wandering about! I have long gone round as in a magic circle;—I must rest.

[Pauses. KUMBA leans against a rock, and afterwards proceeds more calmly.]

It is the hour when the wilderness is alive; when its miscreations, born at midnight, roam forth to visit the dwellings of man. The moon, the sun of dark spirits, sends abroad her wan beams to light them in their nocturnal way. There rides Mara on her dragon-steed, she who stifled King Vanland in his pleasant sleep, before he could say farewell to his family. There rise Dodman and Dralin's daughter from the bogs, and with peering eyes creep small spirits forth from their caves. Painful feelings, wicked thoughts go they to awaken in the souls of those who rest on their beds. They seek to create disquiet, I seek rest. I seek the sorceress, she who deceived me. I will compel her to keep her promise. But it is so dark; I cannot find again the way to her house. Who shall shew it to me?

Ha! the whirlwind, the spirit of the sorceress! That tells me that the old woman is not far off.

[A fresh whirlwind.]

Again! Good! I come, Grimgerda. Have thanks for thy strengthening summons.

[Thunder and lightning.]

Why quakest thou, tree, till thy very roots tremble? Why this howling in the wood? Joturen makes such a riot amongst the rocky hills that the giant cauldrons ring. Startled creep the dwarfs back into their hiding-places, terrified at the thunder of the gods. Cowardly creatures of earth! Cold drops of perspiration, indeed, stand on my brow; but I shrink not away like you! Lighten, lighten, Father Thor, angry ruler of the cloudy air; and if I must be thy Thrall after death, then is it only reasonable that for once thou shouldst serve me, and light up my earthly way with thy flaming glances.

[Fierce lightnings, amid which KUMBA disappears among the crags.]

SCENE VI.

A black mountain Cave. Within glimmers a red fire. A kettle stands on the fire; three Vipers hang over it, out of whose mouths venom drops. The Sorceress Grimgerda stirs the kettle while she mutters softly and makes mystic signs. Black-cloves, wicked Disor, and Imps, move themselves restlessly in the cave. Two wolves watch its entrance.

IMPS.

What is that which rustles!

What is that which bustles!

In the wood and the dark out there!

A woman cometh hither!

Ah! now for a sly joke with her!

Quick! and we'll seize her ere she is aware!

GRIMGERDA.

Silence, witch-pack! to your places, or I shall teach you! If I receive company, what is that to you? If ye hold not your ungovernable tongues I will turn you into stones—as I once did with some of you—and you shall have to lick up the rain. Back into your caves, I say! Intoxicate yourselves with the substantial poison-fumes, and sleep in peace till I need you. Only my choice attendants shall remain near me. Out of the way, bantlings!

[The Imps being terrified away, four Shadow-shapes of a wild aspect remain about the Sorceress. The Wolves raise themselves and howl. At the same time enters KUMBA with a pale but defying face. GRIMGERDA strikes with her magic wand on the floor. The Wolves lie down, and KUMBA remains standing at the entrance of the Cave.]

GRIMGERDA.

Silence there, presumptuous child of man! I know thee.

KUMBA.

Dost thou know Kumba, the bondwoman's daughter? My feet mayst thou chain down, but not my will, my tongue.

GRIMGERDA.

Perhaps that too—if I wish it. But I wish it not—now. Come nearer. Why art thou come hither?

KUMBA.

To warn thee, witch, to keep thy vow.

GRINGERDA.

What! thou dost not speak civilly.

KUMBA.

Give me rest! Give me rest! Thou promised to give me rest. But thou hast deceived me.

GRINGERDA.

Speak not so loudly. Thou wilt waken my little ones who sleep.

KUMBA.

They sleep! It is now long since I have slept at all!

GRINGERDA.

What dost thou want?

KUMBA.

Every thing. O Gringerda! if thou hast a human heart in thy bosom, then conceive my distress, and help me. The strength which thou gavest me is gone. The tranquillity which I felt at one time is gone; an anguish consumes me, more tormenting, more horrible, than that which I experienced before my crimes. The light of the sun terrifies me; the murmur of the trees makes me tremble; no sleep rests on my eyelids; no tear refreshes them; and I cannot look upon her whom I have murdered, upon her who now wears away patiently in despair, without feeling my heart transpierced as with a poisoned dart. The dart is called—remorse. Remorse drives me to thee to-day. I will have my crime undone. Gringerda! thou who gavest the disease, knowest also the antidote. I entreat thee for a means to counteract the poison which kills the daughter of kings, the means to restore her again to life.

GRINGERDA.

Doth the arrow, once discharged, stop and turn back in its flight? Ask the stream to flow back to its source; the ridge of rocks to bend itself according to the changing current of the wind! Foolish mortal! That which is done cannot be undone; and a strong spirit denies not its own work.

KUMBA.

Thou can'st not?

GRINGERDA.

Cannot, because I will not; will not, because Jernskog's daughter cannot vacillate and repent.

KUMBA.

Can gold purchase salvation for the daughter of kings?

GRINGERDA.

I love gold; but I will not deceive thee. Gold and treasure cannot save her. She must die.

KUMBA.

It is determined then. She must die, and I—I am miserable!

GRINGERDA.

Poor child!

KUMBA.

Dost thou pity me? Thou understandest me then; and there lives a heart in thy bosom. O Gringerda! be good to me! I have suffered so much! Hast thou, too, suffered? Knowest thou the sorrow which devours the heart?

GRINGERDA.

I understand thee, and—it grieves me for thee. Here, my child, eat and strengthen thyself. Then we will talk further.

KUMBA.

No, no! I cannot eat.

GRINGERDA.

Such good is not often offered. It gives clearness and learning in a variety of ways.

KUMBA.

Give me peace! Give me a draught out of the cup of forgetfulness.

GRINGERDA.

The dead only drink that.

KUMBA.

Give me death then! Let one of thy serpents sting me.

GRINGERDA.

Serpents do not sting their like.

KUMBA.

Thy words, Gringerda, sting all the more. But I will forgive thee all, if thou wilt but give me death and forgetfulness, eternal, if possible.

GRINGERDA.

Thy only, who have not done something on earth memorable, something great, in good or in evil, can in death taste of the cup of oblivion.

KUMBA.

Woe is me! The draught is not for me then. Listen! There is a sleep, a trance, between life and death, in which man feels neither snow nor rain, neither day nor the heat of the sun; knows nothing, feels nothing, except a reluctance to awake. Say, canst thou not plunge me into that?

GRINGERDA.

Thou desirest that which can alone be the lot of mighty spirits. Kumba, daughter of the bondswoman, thou art not ripe for that.

KUMBA.

That too, dost thou deny me? (wildly). Well then, witch! discharge thy vow in another manner. I bought it dearly, and will not have done it for nothing. Thou promised my soul rest, and thou shalt keep thy promise, or I swear by Nastrand . . . . .

GRINGERDA.

Silence, wretched slave! Darest thou to menace me? Abase thyself! Creep like a worm in the dust at my feet, or thou shalt ride on the wolf, and be stung by serpents. Fall down this instant, and beg pardon, or . . . . .

KUMBA.

Or what? Dost thou think that thou canst frighten me, Gringerda? The pure light of the sun can terrify me, and the whispering of spirits in the wood can make me tremble; but thee—thee I fear not! Show me the torture which thou hast in thy power that is greater than that which I already know. Let thy wolves tear me to pieces. I will laugh at it. But in the hour itself of my death, dread thou me, Gringerda! It is not equal between us. What have I to lose, to fear? Nothing! But thou, witch, canst lose thy power and thy wealth. Tremble then! for I feel in my suffering heart a power which is greater than thine! Tremble, at the curse which in the hour of death shall issue from my pallid lips—tremble!

GRINGERDA (aside).

Ha! Strength! strength! Great strength! Good; thou shalt serve a still greater cunning.

[aloud]

Kumba! To what purpose this childish insolence and defiance? Why wilt thou provoke only an increase of thy misery? Be quiet, be obedient, and I both can and will keep thee.

KUMBA.

Ah, say how! Pardon my defiance, O Gringerda. I am still and obedient. Speak, speak!

GRINGERDA.

All the torments of thy soul proceed from this, that thou standest on the half-way. The escape from thy misery is called completion!

KUMBA.
Speak more plainly.

GRIMERDA.
Enter fully and for ever into my service. The first matter which I will give thee to complete shall be the ratification of our compact.

KUMBA.
And what shall be my reward?

GRIMERDA.
Thou shalt acquire great power already in this life. After death, I will awake thee, and doubly great power shall be given thee to injure the great on the earth, for no power exceeds that of the departed spirit. Thou shalt become as one of mine own, as one of the mighty Disor, which thou hast seen around me.

KUMBA.
Have they peace?
GRIMERDA.

Observe them.

KUMBA.
I see no pain in their features. There seems to play over their sallow lips a smile; but it is not glad. The countenance of some appear restless, and yet on the point of being changed into stone.

GRIMERDA.
Thou seest them now in their twilight costumes, in their night mantles, in which they recently made a journey into the world of men. But they do not always appear thus dim. When I will it, they glitter in their holiday attire, and at my beck a splendour surrounds them which surpasses that of the temple of Upsala. See for thyself.

[The Sorceress waves a wand, and the Cave all over appears as beaming with gold. The Witch and the Disors are seen in splendid dresses, and with jewelled crowns on their heads. After a pause, GRIMERDA speaks.]
Now, what thinkest thou?

KUMBA.
That is grand! (aside.) But they are none the handsomer for it.

GRIMERDA.
What sayest thou?

KUMBA.
I say that is grand!

GRIMERDA.
Yes, I think so. The like shall not be seen in the dwelling of the most ostentatious Jarl. [She makes another sign with the staff, and the splendour disappears.]

KUMBA.
But it seemed to me that the gold was red as glowing fire, and that I saw lizards and spiders running about amongst the precious stones.

GRIMERDA.
That is because thou art unaccustomed to such pomp, and therefore it causes, as it were, spiders' webs before thy eyes. But not only splendour and affluence are here offered by us, but joy too; and thou mayest well believe that it goes often right merrily here. Here one knows neither anguish nor remorse. Here we eat and drink well,—sleep when we will; and between whiles, dance and frisk to our hearts' content. Thou shalt have a specimen.

[GRIMERDA blows a horn. The cave seems at once to become alive. Black Elves, Dwarfs, and Spirits swarm forth, and riot about in a wild dance.]

KUMBA (aside).
A grander music to Algrund's dance. Is this toy? No, it is frenzy!

(Aloud to the imps, that will drag her into the dance).
Away from me, ye wild beasts! ye foul hobgoblins! I have no desire for your joy. Grimerda, let the tasteless dance have an end. It is irksome.

GRIMERDA.
It is not so easy to compel them to cease when they are become well heated in the dance. Cold water must then be had recourse to.

[She strikes with the witch-wand on the rocks. Streams of water spring forth upon the dancing goblins, who fly, howling and hurrying, terrified into their dens. The Witch laughs.]

GRIMERDA.
This merriment moves thee not because thou art unused to it. But ask my imps whether they think the dance tedious. When thou hast been some time with us, thou wilt find it as delightful as they do.

KUMBA (sighs).
GRIMERDA.
Well, bondmaiden, hast thou a desire to become free in my service?

KUMBA (indignantly).
Like one of these?

GRIMERDA.
No, freer. Listen, Kumba. I mean well by thee, and have something great in store for thee. I have discovered in thee a higher power than exists in all those who are about me, a power worthy of mine. I will give thee a commission, which an ordinary spirit could not accomplish. If thou executest it according to my instructions, the torment in thy bosom shall not only cease for ever, but I will regard thee as my daughter. Thou shalt partake of my wealth; and thy power to injure the great, and to command the low, shall become like mine. Thou shalt partake with me my dwelling; and when thou wilt, thou shalt change it into a gorgeous palace, and adorn thyself with . . .

KUMBA.
Let us make the business short. At what price wilt thou have my soul?

GRIMERDA.
Listen! and observe well my words. In the strongly-fortified castle, on the other side of the water, dwells a Jarl, named Harold Sigurdson . . .

KUMBA.
I know him. A handsome, and a brave man, and a friend of King Dag.

GRIMERDA.
I hate him; but still more sorely do I hate his wife, the proud Herborg.

KUMBA.
Very well.

GRIMERDA.
They have a child—a boy of three years old. His parents' greatest delight.

KUMBA.
That beautiful child I have carried in my arms!

GRIMERDA.
Thou shalt kill that child.

KUMBA.
I? ———A little child?!

GRIMERDA.
And before its heart's-blood cools, thou shalt—drink it.

KUMBA.
Detestable!

GRIMERDA.
That only can forever take away thy soul's sickness.

KUMBA.
No, no! I cannot do it.

GRIMERDA.

By this means only canst thou acquire my friendship, and participate in my affluence and my power; by this alone can the bondwoman's daughter become a free and mighty being.

KUMBA.

Great gods preserve me!

GRIMERDA.

Dost thou imagine that the gods will trouble themselves about thee? But I understand thy remorse, Kumba. Nature shudders at extraordinary deeds; but it is precisely this which separates the strong from the despicable spirit,—the power to conquer the weakness of nature.

KUMBA.

Short and good, I will not do it! Do with me what thou wilt—I do it not!

GRIMERDA.

Do it not? Do it not? We will see that! Thou shalt, thou must, thou shalt! Thou goest not hence alive if thou refusest to do it.

KUMBA.

Let thy wolves rend me to pieces,—I will not do it. My hate, impelled by wild passions, I could seek to gratify; but an innocent child, which never offended me—no! so fallen I am not. Thanks, Grimerda, that thou restorest my strength. I can now, miserable as I am, detest and despise thy treasures.

GRIMERDA.

Art thou proud of thy cowardice? Offspring of wretches, go! Thou art not worthy to be near the sorceress. Go, paltry one, and remain the slave of the Jaria.

KUMBA.

Better that, than to be like thee.

GRIMERDA.

Wretch! dost thou exalt thyself above me? Miserable, cowardly murderess! who hast not the strength to resist evil, hast not the courage to be strong in crime. Contemptible slave, be gone! My wolves would loathe thy spongy carcass! Go! but bear with thee the curse which I announce to thee—"Thou shalt neither find rest here, nor hereafter! Vacillating, dizzy, wavering, thou shalt wander about from morrow to morrow, and wear away thy life in anguish. Thou shalt wither as the thistle withers in the narrow clefts of the rocks. Thou shalt faint in the desert like the hunted wolf, and the sons of lamentation shall extend to thee a bitter drink of the poisonous tears of regret. After death shalt thy dastard soul reside amid the fog in the marshes of the corpse-coast, and in vain shalt thou attempt to lift thyself out of it to the high land. In vain shalt thou stretch forth thy shadowy arms to embrace a creature that can love thee. Alone and miserable shalt thou be tossed about by the wind, and seek earth's abodes only to terrify the innocent child, which loses itself in thy neighbourhood; and thy life and thy being shall be—unblessedness!"

KUMBA (coldly).

Thou tellest only what I already know. Hast thou no better curse, witch!

GRIMERDA.

Yes, I have; and though it costs me dear, it shall be pronounced—to crush thee. Know then, Kumba, that there is one who could save thee; who could give thee rest here on the earth, and after death bear up thy spirit to a glorious lot in the everlasting light—yes; if thou hadst sacrificed to him thy presumption, thy revenge, thy hate, as he desired of thee. But against him hast thou raved; the deliverer hast thou cast from thee, and eternally hereafter shall his shape haunt thee, punishing and avenging—behold him, and tremble!

[GRIMERDA waves her magic wand, and pronounces the following words with great exertion and with averted face.]

Thou whom I saw with the pale Hel! Thou whose countenance I cannot endure to behold! —White god without spot, without malice! Darling of the creator! Balder the good! Thee do I evoke to the circle of the earth! Thee do I call in the might of the powers of Asfrund to appear upon this spot, in order to avenge thyself! In the awful name of the eternal justice—

[A bright light fills the bottom of the Cave. In the midst of it appears the beautiful shape of a youth full of majesty and mildness, who fixes on KUMBA a severe and painful look. GRIMERDA remains standing, but with averted head, as if burned to stone. KUMBA gives a piercing shriek of inexpressible agony, and falls with outstretched arms on the earth. The scene vanishes; all becomes dark again, and a shrill laugh of mockery is raised by the Goblins who come into active motion.]

SCENE VII.

FRID reclines in a half-sitting posture on a splendid couch near the window. KUMBA stands at her feet and contemplates her. The sun is going down.

FRID.

Soon—soon will all be over! Soon shall I journey to the second light. For the last time do I bow my head before thee, O earth's glorious sun! Thanks that thou yet a while wilt warm my bosom with thy beams. Thanks for this last friendly caress. I see, but I feel it not. My life's sun also goes down, but the peace of even has descended on my heart, and I feel it—it is beautiful to die!

Ah! even in death my dim gaze turns towards the sea, and looks earnestly for the sail of the beloved, and calls him hence. But when he comes he will no more find his bride. She has gone away, but merely the better to follow and serve him. My soul is reconciled to death.

KUMBA (aside).

That which stirs within me no mortal can comprehend.

FRID.

Yes, my spirit is reconciled; all murmuring, all complaint, is departed. Mine eye, indeed, is dim; but one thing is yet clear and certain to me—death will not destroy my love, will not separate me from the beloved. See there shines already in the cloud Asabron, surrounded by the roarings of the heavenly water. Welcome to me, O sign of the favour of the gods, which shews me the way that I shall travel. I come quickly! All-Father! I am ready, for I am at peace with heaven, at peace with the earth!

KUMBA (aside).

How bright she grows! How I blacken! Woe! I hate her no longer. Hate has turned its point against myself.

FRID.

Kumba! My faithful attendant! Thanks for the affection thou hast shewn me on earth. Take this costly jewel in remembrance of me. Be free, Kumba; be rich and happy!

KUMBA.
Daughter of kings, I desire only one thing of thee.

FRID.
And what?

KUMBA.
Thy hatred. Know that thou diest by my hand; by the poison received from the bond-maiden. Know that she, like a snake, bit fast into thy heart, and sucked pleasure from thy tortments; know that she long hated thee . . .

FRID.
Almighty gods! Thou, Kumba? Ah, wherefore?

KUMBA.
For thy happiness; for thy beauty; for thy union with King Dag, whom I love; for the injustice of the gods, who gave thee all, and me nothing; for the pangs which envy and jealousy occasioned me! For all this have I hated thee, and taken revenge.

FRID.
O Kumba! Kumba! Thou couldst think thus of me; and I held thee so dear, and put such trust in thee.

KUMBA.
I have deceived thee. This hand has murdered thee. Abhor me; hate me!

FRID.
I sink into the All-Father's embrace. Thy hand gave me poison; but a higher hand has sealed my doom. I have gained by it, for I know that life and love will continue beyond death. For myself I complain no more, but for thee my soul sorroweth. Before I go, take my forgiveness.

KUMBA.
Canst thou forgive me?!

FRID.
O Kumba, hate not; I cannot hate, and therefore has my soul peace; but bitterness only is a torment in death. Thou hast not done me much wrong, Kumba! Thy mind was exasperated,—I understand it now. Pardon me, that in thy presence I was so happy, and did not notice thy suffering! Nay,—gaze not so wildly upon me;—give me thy hand. Let a tear of reconciliation moisten thine eye. Thou wert unhappy. That was the fault.

KUMBA (aside).
Exists goodness so great, love so unbounded? Woe is me! What have I done? My heart will burst!

FRID.
Thy lips move wildly, but I hear no sound. Dost thou remember, Kumba, the years of our childhood? Rememberest thou, when thou first came to me wounded, mishandled. These hands healed thy wounds, these eyes wept over thee. I loved thee at that moment, and I have loved thee ever since,—and now my spirit cannot depart in peace if thou hatest me. A stern power of witchcraft must have bound up thy heart. But thou shalt not thus harden thyself. Come nearer, Kumba, I will yet once more weep over thee.

KUMBA.
Thou has transpierced! . . . Behold me at thy feet. Hear my last prayer!

FRID.
My Kumba! speak.

KUMBA.
Let me die with thee. Let the same pile which sends thy soul on high, bear also to the other world that of thy guilty servant. In the realm of shadows I will slave for thee.

FRID.
Follow me in death. The God of gods will then determine our fate. Perhaps in a higher light, the daughter of kings and the bond-maiden are merely empty names. Let thy soul cling to mine; never was it nearer to me. We will both watch over him, whom we both loved.

KUMBA.
O these tears! they are a transport! Let me bathe thy hand with them.

FRID.
Bathe my hand with them; they warm my heart. O look out on the sea, Kumba!

KUMBA.
Gods! it is he!

FRID.
He comes! Methought that was his white flag . . . my eyes are dim. He comes!

KUMBA.
Thou wilt not see him! Thou diest! O thou must, must hate me!

FRID.
No . . . I forgive thee. Forgive thyself!

KUMBA.
Now! thou diest!
FRID (with arms extended towards the sea).
I go . . . to the second light! Thou, O my Dag, never shall I see thee again! [She dies.]

KUMBA.
Dead? Yes, dead! It is over! I will die also. Powers of vengeance, your judgment is upon me. She pardoned me, but can you pardon? In your hands I leave my guilty soul. Mighty Thor, accept the offering; and if with wild wings thou pursue round the earth my peace-abandoned soul, I will not sigh, I will not complain! I have deserved it. But one day—I know it—comes a greater than thou! . . . Will he take compassion on me? Will he permit the repentant spirit to find a quiet shore? . . . O can there be pardon? can there be atonement?!

[She sinks down at the foot of FRID's bed.]

LOW AND DISTANT CHORUS OF SPIRITS OF LIGHT.

From the depths, and
From the heights, will
There be heard a voice,
That to captive and to mourner
Shall proclaim—"Rejoice!"

Dumb shall grow each
Elfin chorus,
But in heaven's acclaim—
Loftier spirits
Shall adore the
World-Redeemer's name.

LESSER STORIES.

COURTEOUS PUBLIC,

A book is a traveller who betakes himself into the world, and is commonly provided with a letter of recommendation, either in the form of a Preface, in which the Author modestly steps forward, and prays to find acceptance; or in a Postscript, by which the Author recommends himself. If the book be its own letter of recommendation, it is indeed the very best of all. In the very early comprehensive anxiety that it may not be the case here, one hastens, first of all, to send in a little note, which may, in the warmest manner, recommend to the considerate kindness of the public this little book, and, at the same time, its little

AXEL AND ANNA;

OR,

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN TWO LOVERS.*

AXEL TO ANNA.

From henceforth let the February storm roar at my windows, destroy them, burst into my chamber, and cover me, and every thing that is to be found there, with his ice-mantle; henceforth let my uncle thunder and curse, let the maids scold, the dogs howl, the parrots scream. In my heart is spring—the world is an Eden, human beings are angels; and I am happy. Anna loves me! O tell it me once again! Is it then really true—is it possible! Anna, do you love me!

ANNA TO AXEL

I was yesterday at a ball—I danced—heard compliments,—nothing pleased me. Wherefore! Axel was not there! Is not this an answer to your question, Axel!

AXEL TO ANNA.

WITH A ROSE.

Take the rose! In it so fair
Is thy charming visage beaming;
In the rose's crimson gleaming
Shinee love's image also there.

Yet I would not see displayed,
Type of our love in it either;
Roses fade away and wither,
But our love will never fade.

From the days of Adam even,
Were they different from each other;
Earth is but the rose's mother,
Love, it is the child of heaven.

ANNA TO AXEL.

The rose is placed in water, your poem rests on my heart; and yet I am not content. What does this heart then desire! To-day it is five days since I have seen you. If you could only persuade your uncle to call upon us—but I know that is impossible. Therefore, peace, peace, spirit of disquiet!

AXEL TO ANNA.

O that I could cause an earthquake, so that the two stories should fall together—that I could stamp the floor through, and suddenly descend to where my thoughts and feelings always dwell! These, Anna, are simple possibilities in comparison with the impossibility of making the wilful old man move one step. I have stood a whole hour arguing with him. One must live with the world, whilst one lives in the world.—"No!" "Uncle, you look rather unwell!" "No!" "Uncle, you must take some relaxation." "No!" "Talk politics with lively neighbours." "No!" "Uncle, you become a hermit." "No!" "Dear Uncle." "No!" My dear, best Uncle." "No, and no, and no!"

After considering this chain of denials, which is more insurmountable than the Alps or Pyrenees, I proposed to myself several questions. "Wilt thou, through longing, bring a consumption upon thyself?" "No!" "Or the jaundice, from pure vexation?" "No; at least not in this instance." "Wilt thou make thyself happy?" "Yes." "See Anna?" "Yes." "Make the essay now!" Yes.—Hurrah!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Did not succeed. Closed doors. Your aunt has a cold—receives no visit. But now I will and shall see you. I know what I will do. I will go and place myself in the street, directly opposite your window. And should you not come to the window, I will stand there until I turn to stone.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Now, in the rain! That I forbid. Do you not see that the rain pours down in streams from heaven.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Wet as a sea-god, but happy as—as myself (there is no happier one), I sit again in my room and write to you upon a thick pile of paper, which I should copy for my uncle. But now I am content with all. I have seen you. I find every thing beautiful—even my uncle's style. How charming you are, Anna! You have really more than one point of resemblance with the Crown Princess, without which, now, no one can be pretty. She has large, heavenly blue eyes. Yours are certainly smaller, but equally heavenly. Truly she has dark-brown hair, and you light-brown; but the form of the little head—of the bewitching little head—is completely the same; and when I only think of your little nose,—like hers, so fine, small, and enchanting,—O I fall into ecstasy!

* The original title is literally "Correspondence between two Stories;" which, however, conveys no idea to an English reader. The Swedes, like most of the continental nations and the Scotch, live several families in one house, each occupying a story, or suite of apartments. These lovers, as will be seen, lived thus, and carried on their correspondence from different stories of the same house.—M. H.

ANNA TO AXEL.

But I am not in ecstasy, I am not charmed; I am dissatisfied, anxious. You have certainly taken cold; you will have a cold in the head—catarrh—fever—will perhaps die! To stand a whole hour in the cold and heavy rain! Axel, I cannot pardon you!

AXEL TO ANNA.

We come to-day, towards evening, to call upon you—we come to call, my most dear uncle, and his most obedient nephew. God bless the old man for his heavenly idea! Only take care that the door of the antechamber be not locked—that we can, unobserved, enter so far that we are not met with the eternal untruth, that “the family is not at home.”

Cold in the head—catarrh! Yes, I sneeze and cough,—but only from impatience. I have fever,—but it is a fever of joy.

AXEL TO ANNA.

could die from vexation. Did not Mr. P——, the eternal, unbearable Mr. P——, step in at the door just as we would go out? My uncle turned back; I gnashed my teeth. Mr. P—— seats himself. I double my fist. “We would just pay a visit,” I began (God knows in what tone). “We must——” “We must put that out of our minds,” said the uncle, interrupting the words of the nephew; “it can take place another time.” I banged the door to, with such violence that Mr. P—— started up from his chair.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Recipe for a Cold and Fever.

Drink three glasses of cold water, one after the other. N.B.—Only one every quarter of an hour. Between each go three times up and down the room. N.B.—Only one step is made in a minute; and at every step repeat—

Be pious and good,
Be patient of mood.

AXEL TO ANNA.

A bad cure; does no good. I have thought of one for myself. Lend me a curl of hair; only one, a single one from among the hundred which you have; only one—a single one. I will lay it on my mouth, on my forehead, on my eyes, on my heart. O do not refuse it me! Otherwise I shall fall most seriously ill. A lock of hair, good Anna, a single one!

AXEL TO ANNA.

[An hour later.

A curl! Can you really be so cruel, and refuse it me! See, I lie on my knees and pray for it.

AXEL TO ANNA.

[Half an hour later.

A curl, a curl, a curl!

AXEL TO ANNA.

[A quarter of an hour later.

I beg most humbly pardon for being thus often troublesome. This time shall certainly be the last; if not—shall I have a curl, or not?

ANNA TO AXEL.

Here, you have it—bad, impatient man! I enjoin a small fragment of a conversation which was held between me and my aunt, by the light of two sleepy, pale candle-flames.

AUNT.—Men are tyrants.

I.—Yes, truly, that they are.

AUNT.—Despots who, by flatteries or by power, accomplish their wishes.

I.—Yes, yes; alas, it is so!

AUNT.—Never marry, my child

I.—No; God forbid, dear aunt.

Sleep well, Axel.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Command me, Anna, to stand six hours in heavy rain just under your window; command me to go six miles for a flower which you wish to have; command me to kneel fourteen days; command me to have all my hair cut off to stuff your pillow; command me at the next ball, after the heart's-walts, to dance eight times, one after the other, with the full-rigged man-of-war, the dry Mrs. N.; command, beautiful tyrant! I obey. Command me, above all, that I come up every evening to snuff your candle. Its weak flame seems to exercise a darkening influence upon the otherwise clear lights of your understanding.

ANNA TO AXEL.

I command you to-day, between twelve or one o'clock, to stand in the doorway, or to walk up and down before the house. You can then greet us, and see my beautiful new bonnet, which my cousin, Lieutenant Emil Papperto, has assured me is very becoming to me.

AXEL TO ANNA.

The bonnet suits you very ill. The crown is too large, the poke too small. Your face looks in it as large and round as the full moon. I beg you to make Lieutenant Papperto a present of the bonnet, and for his good taste let him himself make use of it.

If you will step this afternoon to the window you shall see me ride past on my new horse, my beautiful Hercules, which I received yesterday as a present from my uncle. I am very well satisfied with the horse, since the five charming Miss Mullitons assured me (when I waited upon them this morning) that they had never seen such a beautiful animal.

ANNA TO AXEL.

If the beauty of a horse consists in having thick legs, a thick neck, a large head, large ears, and in galloping like a cow, Hercules is certainly unusually beautiful, quite unusually beautiful. If my counsel should be followed, I would beg Mr. Axel W. to make the five charming Miss Mullitons a present of the horse, and for their good taste let them make use of him.

AXEL TO ANNA.

If Miss Anna L. was somewhat gentler, and less biting, it would be far more becoming.

ANNA TO AXEL.

If Mr. Axel W. think of paying a visit on the story below him, I must inform him herewith that the family is not at home.

AXEL TO ANNA.

If Miss Anna L. believed Mr. Axel W. had any such intention, I must herewith inform her that she was mistaken.

AXEL TO ANNA.

[Two days later.

Anna's name-day! I have ridden six miles to-day in the early morning to fetch out of the Baron R's hothouse this bouquet, which Anna, I hope, will not be so cruel as to scorn.

AXEL TO ANNA.

I hope that you have received the bouquet. It was certainly not particularly beautiful; but in this season flowers are difficult to get.

AXEL TO ANNA.

For three nights I have not closed my eyes. I really believe that animal Hercules, which I have ridden several days, shakes one too much. To-day I have spoken with Franz Kunninger, and he will take the creature off my hands, although perhaps for only half the sum he cost. But I do not ask after that if I can only get rid of him.

ANNA!

AXEL TO ANNA.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Axel! I have thrown my new bonnet into the fire. I think my aunt would receive a visit this evening, if any one came; that is to say, if a certain old gentleman came—young ones she cannot endure. Yet I am of the opinion, that a certain young gentleman, who should steal in behind the back of a certain old one, would produce no bad effect.

AXEL TO ANNA.

My angel-girl, what a fortunate concurrence of circumstances! Your aunt receives visits this evening, and my excellent uncle wishes this evening to pay visits. He brushes the dust off himself with such zeal, that I could kiss him for it.

He has fully determined that the acquaintance shall commence to-day, since he has remarked that his servant is paying court to your aunt's housemaid, and to this he says he will put an end.

I have given the old gentleman various rules for behaviour. I have told him that now gentlemen kiss the hands of the ladies. He answered that this was a stupid fashion; I find it full of spirit. O Anna! thus I can once more kiss your hand,—your hand,—O joy!

Should Mr. P— come now, I strike him dead.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Millions of years would I give for an evening such as that of yesterday.

Anna, you looked like an angel with your curling hair and white dress—and a good advisable angel were you to me, you made me the happiest of those beings who breathe the air of this earth. How happy am I, and how happy must you be,—you who have made me so happy! O good God, what heavenly moments has one not on this earth against which one says so much that is bad! My uncle and your aunt did not dream that whilst they on the sofa by lamplight were working to dissolve one engagement, we in the twilight at the window closed another. I am like another man since I feel your ring on my finger. Anna mine! My Anna! O what a good and noble being must I now become!

AXEL TO ANNA.

How clear is the heaven, how fresh the air! I must breathe fresh air, my happiness oppressed me. I went out, almost danced through the city, sung aloud, behaved in such a manner that every one stared at me, and I had the desire to embrace every one. In my breast is a happiness which could make happy half a world. Anna, how I love you!

ANNA TO AXEL.

I also am unspeakably happy. Men love more passionately; but whether better, whether truer—Axel—that we shall perhaps experience in ourselves. I also feel myself better and nobler. I will become good, gentle, true, in one word a really amiable wife, and make Axel happy. Upon this I now think, whether I walk, stand, sit; whether I sew, play, sing or read; and that causes nothing to be either done well, or at the right time. "What is the matter with thee, girl?" demanded my aunt a short time since; "I think thou hast a fever, thy eyes sparkle so—dost thou feel headache?" "I feel rather something at my heart," answered I. "I must take immediately a good dose of Hoffmann's drops." Thor laughed! I also.

AXEL TO ANNA.

"What is come to thee, boy, why art thou so absent?" asked my uncle yesterday. "Wilt thou write so? The paper upside down, the pen upside down? Boy, I believe thou art quite upside down thyself!" "Ah, uncle—have you ever been in love?" "In love, boy? Yes; but then I thought also of marrying." "Yes, I also think of doing so." "Also of doing so? When one has nothing to live upon? Has ever such a thing been heard? Let us see; thou hast monthly thirty-six shillings from me; out of this thou wilt use twelve shillings to hold thy wedding; twelve shillings to commence thy housekeeping; there yet remains to thee twelve shillings and God's mercy for thee to live upon the remainder of thy life. Nay, I congratulate thee. Sunshine for dinner, and moonshine for supper; see, one shall get quite fat upon it!"

Wretched, when people to whom nature has denied every kind of judgment will be witty! Wretched that it should just occur to him to speak of his thirty-six shillings!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Did you see the poor woman with the children in the street just opposite? How miserable they were! I cannot help them, I have nothing now; but you!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Just now I received the money for Hercules, and more than I expected. For what do I want a horse? I can walk. I hasten.

AXEL TO ANNA.

[A day later.]

They are assisted; not alone for the moment, I hope, but for ever. They have a dwelling, clothes, food; work. They can and will work. I do not speak of their joy; through excess, it resembled sorrow. I prayed her to bless you. I am most sincerely happy.

ANNA TO AXEL.

A basketful of flowers and fruit, and undermost, five rows of Roman pearls, was brought me this morning by a little unknown girl. From whom she did not know—she had only received the command to deliver it to me. Axel, it is from you—that I know. Axel, Axel, such presents from you, who have little for yourself! I cannot receive it.

AXEL TO ANNA.

If you will cause me a bilious fever, you will say so. Good Anna, that you accept these trifles is my recompense—(mine, do you hear)—for wandering about the whole day, more like a beast than a man, out of pure philanthropy, without enjoying a single mouthful as big as a pin's-head; and for ultimately being obliged, at supper, to listen to a severe curtain-lecture from my uncle.

Regarding my finances, be quite easy. And the money for Hercules—should that, perhaps, lie by unused? I have money remaining. I can establish myself, my gracious lady.

ANNA TO AXEL.

In order to preserve you from a bilious fever, I will certainly accept this time your gift. But make me no more, I pray you; and at least, not again so soon.

AXEL TO ANNA.

When will that time, that happy time arrive, when I shall have the right to give you every thing, and you no longer have the right to refuse? When will the time arrive when I shall no longer require the pen as the interpreter of my feelings? When shall I speak with you—when dare to see you?

This is for me the Gordian-knot which I in vain strive to unloosen. I have the greatest desire to do like Alexander, and at one stroke to cut it through by carrying you off. After many fruitless attempts, I have perceived the impossibility of coming to you by any usual and natural means. Now I have the most desperate designs in my head. You have certainly heard speak of the ingenious man, who, in order to embrace his mistress, set her house on fire. What do you think of him?

ANNA TO AXEL.

That he was, is, and remains, an incendiary; and of such a one I entertain the greatest horror.

AXEL TO ANNA.

To place a ladder at a window, and, upon the wings of love, float up and in at the window, is and looks so strangely thief-like. But, Anna, to make a visit in a balloon has never, I believe, taken place since the time of that Turk who, according to the Persian legend, thus visited his fair one under the name of Mahomet. This would not be an impossibility; and I see possibilities in every thing, except in being longer able to live without seeing you.

ANNA TO AXEL.

To all heathenish visitors, let them enter even by ladders or in balloons, I am not at home. I declare that such a one I will not know, much less love.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Why do you never show yourself at the window—why never go out—why is a call never accepted? Why do you shut yourself up thus wilfully, thus eternally? Does this happen on my account?

ANNA TO AXEL.

My best Axel, my aunt is very ill—you know this. I dare not leave her a moment. With the greatest difficulty I steal away to write to you; and beg you, for God's sake, neither set our house on fire nor break my windows. Do you think that, among phials of drops and recipes, I am particularly comfortable? But the only thing I can do, the only thing also which you must do, is to be quiet, and await the proper time.

AXEL TO ANNA.

To be quiet! You might as well say this to the storm which now rages till the whole house trembles, I could wish that it would overturn it, if it, with a breath from the spirit of love, would cast you into my arms. Anna, what I now say, you must not take so literally. I wrestle with Fate and will bring her to yield, let this cost what it will.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Human beings have, after all, neither leopards' nor tigers' hearts in their breasts, my Anna! Do you not believe, that if we were to disclose our love to our relatives they would allow us now and then to see each other? Anna, you are my sun, the light of my eyes. If you conceal yourself longer, all around me will become pitch-dark.

Shall we dare the experiment? We have so little to lose by it, so much to win. Say yes!

ANNA TO AXEL.

You are right, Axel; we must make the trial. Do you speak first with your uncle; and when I have heard what he has said, I shall have more courage to reveal myself to my aunt. She is now somewhat better.

AXEL TO ANNA.

"Speak with your uncle;" this is uncommonly easily said—but done, that is something quite different. Do you know, my uncle is a man who has quite a peculiar humour, and above all, peculiar eyes. With these he can fix a person who is going to say something that does not please him, in such a manner that the word remains sticking in the poor fellow's throat to all eternity; and then such a tempest rises as can certainly be compared with none in Sweden, but only with those hurricanes which rage in the West-Indian islands. In the mean while I will sew myself a fur garment out of Job's patience and Solomon's wisdom, and dare the attempt.

ANNA TO AXEL.

No, no; be cautious! If you believe that it will displease him so much, and you have not courage enough, it is the best that we drive the whole attempt out of our minds.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Also quite easily said. But before I give up a resolution which I have once taken, may hurricanes, ten times more raging than the one which I will now brave, tear me into a thousand pieces, and blow them to all parts of the world. Farewell; I am now armed for the fight, and—I go!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Wait, Axel, wait! Ah, my dear friend, I fear this is a precipitate step. It is possible they may not consent in the least. Besides, we are both of us still so young.

AXEL TO ANNA.

I am in my twenty-second year, already last autumn I was one-and-twenty, therefore I am of age. You are quite seventeen.

ANNA TO AXEL.

That is true—and perhaps we are old enough.

But ah, Axel, this is the least! I see a thousand impossibilities before us. It is possible our relatives will not on any account give their consent to our union. We really have nothing, my friend! You have no situation, no money; I equally am entirely without fortune. It would be—it is, really foolish with such narrow circumstances to wish to marry. Let us wait, my friend, and well consider, before we risk a step which I now begin to fear might separate us for ever.

AXEL TO ANNA.

I will soon procure myself a situation.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Wait, therefore, until then.

AXEL TO ANNA.

As you command. I must admire your patience and prudence.

ANNA TO AXEL.

You are not angry.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Yes.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Wherefore; best Axel, wherefore?

AXEL TO ANNA.

Ah, nonsense!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Axel, you really grieve me extremely.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Do not detain yourself, young lady, by writing unmeaning words. Lieutenant Papperto might become impatient. I saw him more than half-an-hour since go up to you.

ANNA TO AXEL.

If Lieutenant Emil Papperto will make a call upon my aunt, and she will receive him, I cannot turn him out. My good Axel, be quiet!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Ah, what! Be quiet! I do not shoot myself, neither drown, hang, nor poison myself. Oh, I am quiet—quiet and calm like you; I only think what waistcoat, whether a red or a green one, would best suit the physiognomy of a fortunate wooer. I grant that Nature has not given me a red and white porcelain-face like Lieutenant Papperto, and ladies whom such a one pleases must think a brown and severe one less handsome. But fortunately there are people who can like a countenance of this kind very much. I will now go the Mullitons; Betty Mulliton is really a most lovely girl.

ANNA TO AXEL.

I congratulate you. If you have not yet decided regarding the waistcoat, I pray you to make use of the one contained in this packet, which I have embroidered for you, or rather have bought for you, since every stitch has cost a second of my night's rest. I think that it will be very becoming to a brown and severe countenance. My love to Betty Mulliton!

ANNA TO AXEL.

For the love of God, Axel, what has happened! You have been bled! You are ill! I also am almost ill through uneasiness. Axel, Axel, how wild and imprudent you are!

AXEL TO ANNA.

In somewhat cooler blood, and in a somewhat quieter mood, I hasten to say to you a word which vainly in my childhood they endeavoured by cudgelling to wrest from my lips;—a word, to escape which I have in later times fought a duel, and which to pronounce at thy feet, my Anna, my angel of Goodness and patience, I now yearn;—PARDON, O PARDON!

ANNA TO AXEL.

The Doctor, I hear, has forbidden conversation, and has ordered you, for several days, silence and rest. Be obedient, my best Axel, and shew in this way that you love me.

Do not think about anything unpleasant. I make myself your invisible sick-nurse. I come and seat myself upon your bed, in my white dress, and with my fair curls, just as I pleased you so much lately. You may not look at me; I draw the green curtains. You must sleep, and there will I sing a little cradle-song. Listen—or, rather, do not listen, but sleep!

"Young Axel is beloved by me,"

Anna sighed, and sung this ditty,

Thinking, "He is, what a pity!

Eaten up by jealousy!

"If, as bridegroom, thus he can

Be so stern, so crooked-pated,

How, when once together mated,

Shall we act as wife and man?

"Shall we say, all day, in strife,

"Wicked Axel!" "truthless Anna?"

Ah! 'twixt Axel, then, and Anna

What an enviable life!

"Axel, thou to me art dear;

Yet, ere such a life be spending,

Let our love have speedy ending;

Trust me that far better were!"

AXEL TO ANNA.

Axel heard fair Anna's song;

Would not mar its tuneful measure;

True, to hear the song was pleasure;

Yet it was a little long.

And thus sang he: "Should I kind,

Should I gentle be for ever;

Merry jesting were I never

In my heart's warm love to find.

"Who is it, excepting thee,

Could from jealousy defend me,

Ever blessed quiet lend me?

Anna, thou must marry me!"

ANNA TO AXEL.

Anna she heard Axel's song;

How impertinently muttered,

Scarcely can in words be uttered;

Hence 'twill be unanswer'd long.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Not so, good Anna; not so, but as follows:

This advice pleased Anna well;

She follow'd it, as reason's plan,

Became good wife to that good man,

And, in so doing, won a deal.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Nay, as you will. Invalids one dare not contradict. Take now and then a spoonful of this apple-jelly that I have prepared for you and sent.

It will do you good.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Anna, I am melancholy. The birds twitter outside my window, and build themselves nests under the roof. I must lie in bed—my only pleasure is to say rude things to the Doctor, and break his medicine bottles, which have no healing power in them.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Amuse yourself rather with reading this book that I send you; there is a deal that is good and true in it. Often when I was low spirited, and in a state of mind in which I saw every thing black, when all the strings of my soul had become inharmonious, has the reading of a good book again tuned them, and listening to their sweet, ringing harmony, I have thought :—

Now heave the foaming billows, now they fall,
Beneath our boat upon life's stormy flood;
Let never gloomy cowardice appal;
Let us hope ever! God is wise and good!

Even if at times the tempest howlath o'er us,
And gloomy night encompass us with fear,—
One moment wait!—the tempest dies before us,
And the still, peaceful heaven smileth clear.

And green-clad shores, enriched with many a blossom,
Reckon the sailor o'er the peaceful flood;
Thither he steers with thankful throbbing bosom,
And, filled with joy, says, "God is wise, good!"

AXEL TO ANNA.

That is He, that is He, and you are an angel. Anna! But the spirit of melancholy has seized upon my soul as well as my body to-day. I think, or rather I beat my brains, now too much to be able to read. A wretched crowd of gloomy black fancies surrounds me in my solitude, like ghosts which have risen up from Tartarus. What will become of you with this penurious and severe aunt, who will not open her doors to young and respectable men? Shall you sit year after year with her, and, like her, dry up and become hollow-eyed (which would be nothing to wonder at, since you see only her), and catch her cough? What will become of me with this old uncle, who makes me write out his memoirs and thoughts until my own become quite unclear! What, tell me, what?

ANNA TO AXEL.

Let us become whatever we may, only not unworthy and ungrateful creatures. Axel, you may never again speak of my aunt in this tone, she has her less amiable qualities, but she has also her good ones; and besides, I know, intends me so much good. Sooner than make her infirmities of age ridiculous, I would have them myself.

Your uncle, as you yourself have told me, has shewn you a deal of kindness.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Oh, they are both, without doubt, angels, true angels of light, who, however, let us sit in utter darkness. I am ill, and out of spirits.

ANNA TO AXEL.

I am so happy to-day. I have such good hopes. Whence and wherefore? Listen! I was yesterday in the church. The air was cold, the wind raged, my aunt would not let me go. I entreated and entreated, until the "No, my dear child!" changed itself into a "Nay, so go then, thou self-willed thing!" which sounded most harmoniously to my ear.

For whom I prayed most fervently in the church you will be able easily to guess. I prayed from the most secret recesses of my heart, as confidently as a child may implore an All-good Father. As I, in deep devotion, rose up with the congregation to sing the heavenly hallelujah, a sunbeam, clear and wonderful, streamed through the church-window and illuminated Westin's glorious altar-piece. The angels of Faith, Hope, and Charity, who kneel around the grave of the already ascended One, stood forth at once so living, so supernaturally true, that it seemed as though they opened their lips and joined in our song of praise. In my heart arose powerful and inward conviction, that all will yet be well! and with indescribable emotion I bowed myself to receive for us both the solemn blessing. Axel, all will yet be well!

AXEL TO ANNA.

On your account, my Anna, sweet angel, and through you, shall I become blest.

I also to-day have in my soul only joyful feelings, lovely hopes, old, good, and to me most heartily welcome acquaintance. I was up and sat at the window; I have tasted your excellent apple-jelly, and saw how the clear March sun melted the icicles which the cold night had laid upon our neighbour's copper roof. Upon this, I philosophised somewhat in this strain: as the light and warmth of heaven make the ice-veil of night to disappear, will also from thence the rays of a better fortune break through the powerful frost-mist which dims the perspective of our happiness. I gazed so long and so full of presentiment at the sun's activity, until I at length fancied I saw clearly one of the figures which the victorious, piercing sunbeams formed in their resisting ice, the ridge and form of my own nose. Somewhat farther on, close to the side of the chimney, I recognised with delight the form of your white, softly rounded forehead, which seemed modestly desirous of withdrawing itself from the kisses of the sun. O Anna! I must shew you one of these days how lovely this looked,—I must represent the sun.

ANNA TO AXEL.

I assure you that I am not at all curious. You have then got up! How I rejoice about it! The most unpleasant thing may happen to me to-day (if it only does not concern you), and I shall laugh at it.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Ha, ha, ha, ha! Do you know at what I laugh! At myself, my angel. I have such good hopes and presentiments, that I should find it quite natural if now a good friend should suddenly step in, and say to me—"Axel, thou art become an excessively rich man." I believe also, that I should not be astonished if suddenly little Cupids should sail in at the window, bringing a poor lover a talisman, by which he could command all the gifts of fortune; neither should I open my mouth very wide, if suddenly the ceiling of my room were to open, in order to let a shower of gold stream in! Every thing seems to me possible to-day, nothing would surprise me. I have opened my door and window to welcome my visitors; and whilst I wander smiling up and down my chamber, I now and then cast a glance up towards the ceiling.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Cure—draught! I beg pardon; but I am in a very bad humour. I have been obliged to close doors and windows. I became numb and stiff in all my limbs from this cold and draught. No one came. And instead of raising my looks towards the ceiling have carefully examined the floor; so that after a careful examination I can assure you that he who laid it down must have been an arch bungler, for not one deal is like another, either in height or width. I must now go out and breathe the fresh air. I am in health, and will be in health. My uncle and doctor may say what they will.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Anna, Anna! my Anna, my Anna! good

Anna, excellent Anna, angel Anna! Anna, my Anna, my bride, my wife, sing, spring, about Victoria!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Axel, Axel, incomprehensible Axel! what is the matter with thee? What has happened?

AXEL TO ANNA.

I have an office—I have an office! He came, the excellent friend through the door,—the angel from heaven. I had almost knocked him down as I went out. O what a friend! He it is who has resigned to me the situation, with its accompanying salary, which has been offered to him, because he had no need of it. He is rich, he has made me also rich. Oh, shew me a mortal who is happier than I! A lover whose—yet still perhaps—if he were already married. But that also in a short time I will become—if you will, my Anna—Anna!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Good Axel, is it possible! Is it then really true! I can scarcely believe it—I cannot take it in. Axel, my dear friend, shall we really become happy!

AXEL TO ANNA.

We shall. My whole life shall be consecrated to your happiness; and your happiness will always, as now, be mine. We can now marry when it is agreeable to us. I have a respectable situation; the salary is certainly not large, but our wants will be small. The comfortable things of life are mostly only for old people, who are no longer able to enjoy the happiness of the heart,—when one can no longer love and be beloved. Nay, why then it may, perhaps, be the best to sleep on a soft couch, that one is happy. We, my Anna, who may pluck in the May of life its most beautiful flowers, we will waken enjoy our felicity, and be happy, even were we poor; yes, even were we obliged to do without every thing. Do you remember with what emotion we once read near Medevi, of that married pair, who, after living together five-and-twenty years, felt themselves so unspeakably happy! O my Anna, do you yet remember this!

ANNA TO AXEL.

In truth, my best Axel—no.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Accompanied by a friend, Mr. L—— and his wife wandered through a wood. Here they encountered some gipsies, who were in great misery. L——'s friend pitied these poor creatures, who are exposed to all the physical calamities of nature. "Well," said Mr. L——, "if in order to pass my life with her (his wife), I must have subjected myself to a condition such as this, I would have gone about begging these thirty years—and we should still have been very happy!"

"Ah, yes!" cried his wife; "even then we should have been the happiest of human beings."

What words, my Anna, what words! They were spoken under England's heaven. Let us become worthy to speak them, one day, under Sweden's heaven.

ANNA TO AXEL.

For heaven's sake, best Axel. You do not mean! I do not rightly understand at what you aim. Yet I must confess to you, that to me, suffering, hunger, shivering, begging, appear less attractive. What do you really mean! A gipsy I will never become; that I tell you, were it only on account of the frightful complexion.

AXEL TO ANNA.

That is not necessary. Nothing shall prevent my wife being white, as well in her complexion as her clothes.

O my beloved Anna, do not overthrow my temple of happiness with your cold, calculating, worldly, and trifling spirit. Let us become happy, not for others, but for ourselves. If you desire this, we certainly can. My salary certainly is small, as I have already said—a nothing in comparison to that which I should wish to offer you. Three hundred dollars is our yearly income. That is truly little, very little; but your prudent housekeeping, my economy and order, will make every penny a dollar. A man requires really so little, only to live—life is really so short. Who has not much, has not much to care about.

With but little ballast, the jolly-boat sails so lightly and merrily on, now over rising, and now over sinking waves. Let us courageously step in;—the wind is favourable—the shores adorned with flowers—the heaven free from clouds—and before us wanders the mild star of love, which lights us as far as the haven. I am now too much excited; later, I will unfold to you my plans.

ANNA TO AXEL.

My good Axel, zephyrs seldom blow on the ocean of life—there very wild storms toss about. I fear very much that, at the first gust of wind, the jolly-boat, without ballast, might be upset.

AXEL TO ANNA.

If one is fearful and cowardly—yes,—if one loses one's equilibrium in the slightest gust of wind. But away with similes! They only confuse; I will dash straight into the affair.

I possess (as you know) a small farm near the city. This is small, quite small, and scarcely worth three hundred dollars, but still one could live very well there. A roof over their heads was all that our forefathers desired when they built their huts. And what a hardy, glorious people were they! We are less, and we have more. Two rooms and a kitchen has our little temple of happiness, a blooming potatoe-field surrounds it, and a garden, where the most beautiful fruit trees and the most lovely flowers can come forth, changes the whole place into a real paradise. A little hen-house. Anna, I will not pardon you if you should laugh.

ANNA TO AXEL.

I truly do not laugh, my best Axel.

AXEL TO ANNA.

A little hen-house, I would say, stands close by, and its pretty inhabitants will afford us profit and pleasure.

With regard to the fitting up of the interior—away with the luxury and cursed superfluity which has made my fatherland poor! Away with the false ideas of what is becoming, proper, respectable; despicable prejudices which only repeat, one should do as others do, away with you! To you I turn, simple manners, honour of the olden time. Temperance and contentment, the doctrine of our forefathers, be welcome and rule in my quiet house. A wood en bench appears soft when one is seated upon it at the beloved one's side; a bowl of milk, one simple dish placed by your hands upon the table, at which a friend, a friend who knows how to prize what is offered by sincere hearts, will not refuse to take his place—O what a meal! Kings, emperors, invite me into your golden halls! Proud and disdainfully will Anna's happy husband answer, No. O my sweet Anna, how quickly, how joyously, must our days pass away in this little earthly paradise! Hand in hand we wander through life, and die at length so sweetly in each other's arms! But pardon, I will not distress you—do not weep, my Anna!

ANNA TO AXEL.

I will certainly not weep, my best Axel!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Our clothes shall be simple, like our food, like our whole life. You must be always clothed in white, for then you are like an angel. The garden I attend to myself, dig, weed, plant, and water, with your assistance, on the days I am not occupied in the city. In the house, disposes and commands, with absolute sway, my ever industrious and circumspect little wife. When I return from my labour in the fields, or out of the city, your harp and your voice will transport me into heaven, or we eat together a simple meal which is savoured by our appetite and gaiety. For the evenings, when the great world with yawns seeks for pleasure where it never yet was found, at suppers, where one goes through a course of moral hungering, or at balls, where one dances as though for wages—in the evenings we read together, Tegnér's poems, Cooper's and Walter Scott's romances, and enjoy, whilst we ennoble our hearts, all the pleasure which genius can afford the soul and the heart. We must not neglect the theatre; in order to see Almlöf plays, we must rather neglect eating and drinking. Thus we are very often there. But you must have a maid-servant, that is true, for you must not burn your face and hands at the hearth. Besides, when I am at home, you must be always near me. O Anna, say, shall we not be unspeakably happy?

ANNA TO AXEL.

I hope so, certainly, my dear friend; but whether precisely in the manner which you have imagined to yourself I know not, I fear that you are precisely the one who is not fitted for such a simple shepherd's life; besides, this is put together in a strange enough manner. Do you yet know, what you once told me, how much pocket-money your uncle gave you yearly?

AXEL TO ANNA.

The dev—(I do not curse). I now remember. Full three hundred dollars—exactly as much as my future salary amounts to,—and this was, by the end of the year, entirely gone. But, angel Anna, when I am once married, you shall see something quite different; then I will become supernaturally economical; I will look at every heller.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Very pleasant for your wife! Willingly, best Axel, will I also look at every heller; and be as economical as possible; but with all this, I fear that, if we follow your plans, we shall become ever and ever more like the gipay pair. Have you considered that you drink three cups of coffee every morning? And when you were with us one evening, I saw that to three cups of tea you did not despise quite a profuse supply of tea-bread and rusks.

AXEL TO ANNA.

From this day forth, I will eat oatmeal-soup every morning and every evening, drink egg-beer, and soak brown bread in it, if you think the other too dear. You are right. Besides, as a patriot, one must renounce all articles which are not brought forth from the earth of our fatherland.

Agreed, Anna; we eat for a year, from this month forth, every morning, a dish of oatmeal-soup—every evening a cup of egg-beer, in our own little paradise. Besides, this is far more advantageous for the complexion and health than all the cursed tea and coffee drinking. And should it taste even like Peruvian-bark and rhubarb—

When Hobe Anna fills the cup,
Axel, as nectar, will drink it up.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Oatmeal-soup I can only get down with trouble; and egg-beer is, once for all, very disagreeable to me.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Who fears to share with me a dish of oatmeal-soup despises surely (and this I have observed well from the beginning) the little which I have besides to offer—my heart, my hand. It is true this is very little. The fool! who could be so bold and believe—but I begin to see my errors.

ANNA TO AXEL.

If I do not exactly fancy to eat oatmeal-soup and egg-beer, that does not prevent me, morning and evening, from being able to satisfy myself with a little cold milk instead of coffee and tea. Yes, a cup of cold milk and a morsel of brown bread will taste excellently. This is all that I need.

ANNA TO AXEL.

The little pretty house and the garden (which is to be some time) I find exceedingly agreeable; yet you have, in your tender partiality, conferred upon me a very extensive power of operation. I examine with trembling all the duties which will be imposed upon me in the future; always to be clothed in white, and to dig in the garden,—to put in order, to sweep, spin, weave, cook in company with a maid,—to play upon the harp and to sing,—to care for every thing in the house, and to be constantly with you when you are at home (which we will hope will be the greater part of the day),—to feed the fowls, to drive to the theatre, read romances with you,—with one word, represent six or seven personages at once. My good Axel, you will truly be forced to have, in future, some forbearance, like many others who demand too much from their wives.

ANNA TO AXEL.

[A day later]

I fear you are piqued, Axel; but this time, my friend, you are certainly somewhat in the wrong. To share in life, sorrow and joy with you, is, as you know, my most intense desire. Only on your account I wish that joy might preponderate; but your picture of the future gives me little hope of this. You look through a burnt yellow-coloured glass, which shews you the object neither clear nor true. I shall always tell you the truth, Axel.

ANNA TO AXEL.

[A day later.]

Meanwhile, were it a possibility, and did your uncle and my aunt give their consent, I would certainly not say no. We are really so young, and can work. Only we must strike out of your account this ever-white dress, the music, the play, and the very agreeable and beneficial reading, which, however, in such narrow circumstances, would steal away too much time.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Oatmeal soup tastes really not so bad, and egg-beer I drank fresh last evening. It does not taste exactly good; but perhaps it agrees with one well.

AXEL TO ANNA.

My angel, good Anna, you shall never either eat or do the least possible thing for which you have not a decided inclination. I should deserve to be condemned to bread and water, if I desired anything else. Do you see, heavenly maiden, that it was not after all, such pure earnest with the wooden bench, the single dish, and the one servant-maid. I have, do you see, speculated upon my uncle. He will certainly for decency's sake, when we help ourselves so excellently, assist us a little. My uncle is very far from being hard-hearted, and besides he is very fond of me, that I know.

ANNA TO AXEL.

My aunt is also sometimes very good, and loves me tenderly in her way I know; she has given me many proofs of this. Possibly she would also do something for us.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Anna, we will speak with our dear relatives,—shall we not? We will tell them every thing. Should they say no—Anna, I have your word,—you are already mine before God—and mine you remain, men will not separate us! Yet we must endeavour to move human beings to be human.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Yes, Axel, let us endeavour to soften the hearts of those against whose wishes and commands we neither may nor should act. Yes, let us try this.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Well, to-morrow!

ANNA TO AXEL.

To-morrow!

AXEL TO ANNA.

[A day later.]

My dear uncle is somewhat cross this morning. The coffee was cold, and the news in the papers was not according to his mind. "The rulers behave stupidly," said he. "I shall take care not to do the same, I must still wait some hours."

ANNA TO AXEL.

My dear aunt is also in an ill-humour. She has mislaid a piece of money, and broken a bottle of rose-water; but one would believe I had done it. Before three hours, at least, I dare say nothing.

AXEL TO ANNA.

The whole forenoon my uncle has thundered politics. Russia and the whole Ottoman empire have alternately come upon the carpet. I have listened with the most unwearied patience, and said, "Yea," "No," "all the better, dear uncle," or, "all the worse, dear uncle," just as was in accordance with the old man's jeans. What did this help? He became ever more and more jealous; he turned towards me, seemed to perceive in my person a representative of the Turkish empire, fell in a rage, so that I, in order not to receive blows, like the Sublime Porte, was obliged, in all haste, to make my retreat through the door. I am quite vexed about the lost forenoon.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Five times this forenoon have I opened my mouth to begin my little speech, and five times have I again closed it. To have prayed for anything would certainly have been fruitless. For my aunt sitting there in the corner of her sofa, with closely pressed together lips and severe looks, appeared a living, No! But this afternoon!

AXEL TO ANNA.

The old man is now fast, he shall not again escape. He is taking his afternoon nap. I will take great care that he neither goes out, nor that any one comes in to him, before I have been able to say: "I love Anna; I must have her for my wife, or die!"

ANNA TO AXEL.

Axel, how my heart beats! My aunt also is taking her afternoon rest! When she wakes I will speak with her. If she is only not too soon awakened for them, her temper is not good—still Manette! Do not mew so, there is the cream for my coffee; lap and be quiet. Ah! there buzzes a big fly—it will seat itself, perhaps, upon her nose—no—my good angel, send it away! Good, she sleeps quietly. But yet she will wake some time—and I shall speak. I tremble whilst I write.

Axel, how my heart beats! I hear it throb! It is painful! Art thou also in the same state of mind, Axel!

AXEL TO ANNA.

My heart beats, certainly, quicker and more powerfully than the pendulum of a clock; but I wish, did it pain me ever so much, that it would beat as roughly as a cooper's hammer, so that my excellent uncle, who entirely and wholly to pain and annoy me keeps sleeping on, might be awakened by it. Nothing is so unbearable as to wait, to live in uncertainty—to hold oneself ready. I have coughed, sung, made a noise before his door,—all in vain! As often as I listened, I have had the vexation of hearing him snore. Had he not locked himself in, one could have entered easily, blundered over the sofa, or found out some other polite manner of waking the sleeper. But now it is enough to drive one mad. I have the desire to set my curtains on fire, only to bring the fire drum past his window.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Do not be nonsensical, Axel, commit no folly. My aunt sleeps also, or pretends to do so; for as often as I have gone over to her and have looked at her, I have seen her opened eyes hastily close themselves. Most certainly she has remarked that I await her waking to say something to her. Does thy uncle still sleep?

AXEL TO ANNA.

Ever and eternally. His long deep breathing draws away the air from me at the same time; it is just as though I found myself in a cellar-vault. Does thy aunt still pretend to be sleeping!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Still. What shall I do?

AXEL TO ANNA.

Vexation! Now he has awoke, and has stolen forth like a mouse which is afraid of the cat. I heard a slight rustle at his door. When I rushed out to see what this was, I heard, quite down below on the stairs, a clip-clap of galosches, which in all haste hurried out of the door. I ran after him, and cried, "Uncle! uncle! I have something to say to you!" "To-morrow is also a day!" he answered, without looking back. I am in despair. He has remarked something.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Ah, Axel! my aunt has feigned sleep until now. It is now late in the evening, the worst time of the day to make confessions to her. Let it then remain as thy uncle said, "To-morrow!" Ah, it seems to me as though I had gained something by this delay.

AXEL TO ANNA.

A day of fruitless, painful waiting,—a sleepless night. See, this is my whole gain! But to-morrow!

AXEL TO ANNA.

[At midnight.

I cannot sleep. Anna, I have dark forebodings—the morrow will bring us no good. I have now no inconsiderable sum of money in my hands. I have sold something. But, however, what has that to do with the affair! Anna, would it—if our—but it will be best to speak about this when fate has decided.

I believe, my best Anna, the midnight hour shows me ghosts. Anna, I feel deeply, that if you do not wander by my side, my whole life will be only a ghost,—that is, a horrible nothing!

The clock strikes one, Anna. This stroke is our symbol—we also are only one. In the morning hour of life we have united ourselves,—I know that nothing can separate us. Wherefore, then, do I write so seriously? Wherefore am I in such a gloomy mood?

How slowly pass away the hours of the night! Thinking of you, and writing to you, I endeavour to give wings to the minutes. Now, when every thing around me is so still and peaceful, I hear all the more distinctly the storm within me—I cannot conceive how all can be so still, so silent, so dead. Is not this the world—are not human beings here—do not passions wake in their bosoms? Do I live solitary, and have all the spirits of disquiet which fled from reposing hearts assembled themselves in my breast! My gentle Anna, I feel it is a stormy ocean into which your gentle soul will discharge itself. But then will all attain rest!

I have sought after peace—in vain. Separated from you, I shall find it no more. The winged throbbing of the heart—and every throb a sentiment—how the minutes stretch themselves out into eternity! And every thing around me is so peaceful. Listen! the town-clock strikes two—will nothing then awake? Will no pain, no love, no yearning, raise its voice through the night? All is still—I alone wake—yet there calls the watchman; but how carelessly he announces to the world that the judgment comes!

It is morning. The world awakes—I am no longer so solitary. It is day also in my soul,—I am peaceful. The hour is here. It means—now!

ANNA TO AXEL.

I have received what you have written to me last night. Axel, could you believe that you alone were awake? Did you not hear the beating of my heart? O how extraordinary, that a mixture of wood, moss, and lime, which is for you a floor and for me a ceiling, should prevent two human hearts from understanding each other! Ah, were this now only somewhat farther off—I tremble!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Still I have hope, beloved, adored Anna; still nothing is lost. This morning, whilst my uncle drank his coffee, I took courage, prayed to God; thought, Anna! drew breath, and went in to him. "My best uncle!" I commenced quietly and solemnly—"My best nephew," answered he, "what shall 'my best uncle' do!" "Your goodness!"—"Now, what then—my goodness?" "I wish—I have."—"I wish—I have—nay that was really excellent!" (The old man has always had an extremely unpleasant manner of repeating my words, and then they always sound as stupid again.) "Dear uncle—I am in love!" "In love! Yes, that I have easily remarked in the jaundiced complexion which thou hast had this half-year past—this is the colour of love." "My uncle, the weal or woe of my whole life depends upon one single word. O my best uncle, who—" Now came a man, whom I wished at the witch's mountain, with the papers into the room. "My son," said my uncle, "come again in a few hours—then we can speak farther with each other. Now I must see how affairs stand between Turkey and Russia." I was precisely not in the mood to wait. I took the papers, stuck them in my pocket, and said in a firm tone, "Firm, uncle, you must hear me." He stuck his fingers in his ears, fixed his eyes upon me like two claws, and cried, "Not one word, not a breath! Give me the papers this moment, or I will never listen to thee again." I cried, and cried again still louder. At length I must, like a little west-wind, give way to the storm of the north. My uncle became again kind, and I went my way; for he would neither have heard nor understood me, as he had fixed his eyes upon his dear papers. An hour will soon have past; yet another, and then I go. O my Anna, my only one!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Turks and Russians, Russians and Turks, what are they and their interests to me!—Straw—paper-cuttings; and on their account must I sit here, as in a fiery furnace. Ah!—now, Anna!

AXEL TO ANNA.

It is past!—All is lost—not a spark of hope remains—I cannot see what I write.

ANNA TO AXEL.

And for me also—I receive a round No—and in such hard terms! O Axel! now I feel for the first time how unspeakably I love you!

AXEL TO ANNA.

To humble me! To threaten me! "Ridiculous—nonsensical!" To threaten to turn me out of doors—me—yes, people don't know me!

ANNA TO AXEL.

My aunt will marry me in a short time—but not to you. "This man, said she, "has his own bones, his own equipage, and is besides a respectable man."—I was forced to laugh, Axel. I have said to her—thou, or no one!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Anna, let us fly! Let us escape from these tyrants who will murder our happiness! The earth is large, a little corner upon it can certainly be found for us. All human beings are not barbarians. You are mine. I conjure you, I command you to follow me. To-morrow, more about this. Hold yourself ready. My determination is irresistible. We fly!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Axel, no! This would be wrong. Axel, reflect. Axel, my friend, my beloved, calm yourself, for my sake!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Place yourself this evening, between ten and eleven, at the door which leads into the neighbouring lane. Be quiet. All is ready, I have money. You are under my protection; you go with me; your duty is only to follow me. Between ten and eleven.

ANNA TO AXEL.

No, Axel! It is wrong, it is unwise. We sin against the laws of God and man in order to plunge ourselves in misery. I love you above every thing; but I need not, and will not, follow you when you do not remain upon the good and right path. And were there no other obstacle, this is sufficient for me. My aunt is sickly and old, she has only me. I will not leave her thus. Axel, come to reflection—I pray, I beseech you!

AXEL TO ANNA.

It is then you, you who will not—who refuse, who break—you, whom I believed mine! Anna, Anna, will you deceive me or yourself! That rich, that estimable man—is it not on his account that you despise me and my poverty! Is he not at this moment with you—he—this man—this detested Emil! Answer, Anna!

ANNA TO AXEL.

I cannot answer to such a question. Axel, I love, I pity you. Axel, be the man who is worthy to be every thing to a woman. Be strong for her sake, be pure in thoughts as in wishes. O Axel, my only, my beloved friend, be my support, be a model to me in this difficult hour. Set me an example of submission, not to a stern and blind fate, but to the ordination of an All-wise Father, under whose support we always wander, let things be calm or desperate as they may. Have patience; we are yet indeed so young; let us wait; let us be patient; every thing may yet turn to good.

AXEL TO ANNA.

You are very calm, very discreet, very patient, quite satisfied. I understand you—Anna, Anna!

ANNA TO AXEL.

What shall I say to calm you, to make you satisfied! I love you indescribably, Axel; but for that very reason will I be worthy of you. Does a woman, indeed, ever preserve the esteem of a lover, who submits blindly to his passion!

Imagine, Axel, that you are some years older than you are (that can appear natural enough when one is unhappy and in suffering, the minutes are then long, and bring experiences as if they were years); imagine that I am your daughter, what would you now say to me! Would you not speak to me admonishingly! Destroy not for the petty felicity of one moment the whole life's happiness of yourself and your friend. Be calm, wait for the time, that is often the only thing, and the most prudent thing, which a person can do. He whom you love so inwardly, so inexpressibly, will some time do justice to her who would rather suffer for him, through him, than pollute a heart which is consecrated to him and virtue, by an impure thought, an action—a crime against duty.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Not a word from you! My Axel! can you really be dissatisfied with me! Yes, Axel, I am calm—because I am resigned,—but happy! ah, that is so!

Will you not say one kind word to me! I need it so much.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Axel, Axel, what wild demons must now be raging in your soul! Axel, pray! Do you know at whose word the agitated waves of the sea became calm! "And it was still." Pray to Him!

ANNA TO AXEL.

O heavens! I am uneasy beyond all description! Axel, could I only see you for a few minutes! How unhappy you must be! Axel, how culpable you are if you despair, if you for one moment could forget, would forget, that Anna loves you.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Do you know, Axel, what a woman's love means? Do you know that which she says in the words—I love thee? Listen, Axel! Your life is mine; your virtue, my honour; your sorrow, your joy, are mine; your strength, my support; your courage, my hope,—but your fall, your disgrace—my death!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Axel—Axel—I know it, you have not come home for three nights. I have listened; your foot during these has never trodden that chamber. I saw you yesterday evening from the window; your look was wild; your whole being disturbed, your gait uncertain. Where do you go, Axel! O do not turn from me! Only upon the path of duty and of patience can you find Anna. Axel, Axel, turn back!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Axel, turn back! I cannot, I will not lose you! Listen to me! See, I weep, the tears wet the paper; see these tears—they dim my eyes,—my Axel, turn back!

ANNA TO AXEL.

I will cast no reproaches on you,—fear not one word, which you would not hear, not one look which you would not wish to see. I am really your friend, your bride—shall be perhaps some time your wife!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Never—never—never!

ANNA TO AXEL.

On your breast will I lean and pray—for my sake—forgive yourself! Let you have done whatever you may—my Axel—I still love you! Yours I am, yours I remain to be!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Never—never more! I am unworthy of you, Anna! I have forgotten—forgotten all,—you—myself—God! I have gambled!—Ha, the tempter, the treacherous friend! I have lost every thing which I possess,—still more than I possess—the property of others. I must fly my country. Do not lean on my breast—a hell is there,—do not seize my hand—it is bloody. Farewell! Die, poor maiden, if you can. I—cannot die!

AXEL TO ANNA.

I had hardened myself against all your love, against all your tenderness,—had left your letters unopened. Now I have opened them—in order to allow some fire-drops yet to run on the burning glow of my despair,—in order, if possible, to become insane. It became otherwise;—now the loving words throng beneficially about my soul, like the evening dew upon the hard parched earth.

Anna, you shall not despair on my account—I myself will not despair. I have erred grievously—I will suffer and be reconciled. What caused my error! I know not—despair—jealousy—hell!

AXEL TO ANNA.

You will not say a word to me! But, indeed, am I worthy of it! Can, indeed, the pure angel of heaven speak to the son of crime!

To-morrow evening I shall set off. A letter will inform my uncle of every thing. He will not refuse his forgiveness to his unhappy nephew who has fled his country. Forgiveness!—that is the highest for which I can now hope. Forgiveness! what a word; how blessed, to those who are forgiven! I beseech my uncle to disinherit me, and thereby to pay my debts. I fear that he will not do the latter. Anna—in my madness I borrowed a considerable sum from a friend, who is not rich, and has a wife and several little children. He loved me, he trusted me, he gave me all which he possessed; I deceived him—I gambled away his little children's clothes and food. Now, would that I could pay him with my blood! Remorse, thou who with tiger-claws rendest my heart, what good do'st thou do him —?

AXEL TO ANNA.

I have erred grievously—have deserved heavy punishment. I will accuse myself before you—I must do it. I knew that I sinned, and sinned nevertheless. It is past, peace is gone—the time is gone when I knew not remorse. In my rage for my losses, I challenged my fortunate opponent. I wounded him dangerously—almost mortally. He was carried home to his mother—to his old mother! He was her darling—her only child,—perhaps she may die,—well for her!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Axel, pray! Let us pray!

AXEL TO ANNA.

I cannot—cannot now. I see him—them—the hungry little ones—their deceived father.—O what am I become!

Now I am rather better. Pray for me, Anna! I believe in the power of intercession. I am not worthy to pray. You are pure and good.

This next night I shall set off! I shall go towards Germany—towards North Germany. I shall offer myself for a situation; something may turn up for me to do.

AXEL TO ANNA.

My eyes burn—sleep flies them—that is no wonder. If I could only weep! but that is too good for me. I have something upon my heart which burdens, which gnaws it—that is the pang of conscience. Anna, if you would lay your hand upon my breast—but am I really worthy to have this alleviation!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Here, Axel, take these opium-drops, they will give you rest and sleep. Anna prays for you; Anna weeps for you; Anna loves you.

AXEL TO ANNA.

I have also a little sister—a suffering child—my father prayed me, upon his deathbed, to take care of her. I add her address; when you can go to her—tell her, that her poor brother—tell her, that he is dead. The ring which I enclose will, if it be sold, suffice for some months to pay for her board. When I can, I will send her more, but through you. Thanks, affectionate, good angel, for that which you have sent up. To-night—in a few hours—I shall set off—away from you!

AXEL TO ANNA.

In two hours I shall set off. Clothes which I have sold have obtained money for my journey.

Anna, you have been my guardian-angel. I also have now been able to pray,—I am quiet, resigned—I will suffer and conciliate; I will again have hopes of myself. You have not given me up, God will forgive me. I will live, that I may become worthy of this.

I must now take leave of you—of you, that is to say, of happiness—and of every thing which makes life dear to me. But it is all my own fault. In this solemn moment, when I am about to take a long, perhaps an eternal farewell of you, I will lay open my whole soul before you. What I say to you is the truth, it will be a comfort to you, and will preserve your peace at a time when Axel will be so far removed from you.

I believe on God, the Merciful, All-wise, and Omnipresent. I am a Christian, according to my belief; that my future actions may testify to this belief, let us both pray—to Him who gives the power!

I believe that you, my Anna, love me,—and that, wherever my restless existence may be cast upon the earth, one heart will feel with me, one thought will follow me. The sweet consciousness of the steady presence of an angel!

This firm belief will sustainingly unite itself in my heart with the remembrance of my transgression—my crimes—will steel it against temptations, and will form out of me that improved person whom Anna could love.

AXEL TO ANNA.

[Half an hour later.]

I have not yet besought you to forgive me, and yet have done you so much wrong. Axel, weak and violent, was not worthy of you, Anna. Pardon him, however; in one thing he was strong—in his love—and this will endure in his breast to his last breath. Forgive him all your tears—see, mine flow,—welcome, you companions of misfortune, bathe her feet! Tears of repentance, of love, of pain, and of joy—flow, flow; that which ye can win is forgiveness!

Your lock of hair—may I keep it? I will bear it upon my heart; and a stranger, wandering solitarily about the world, I shall still have something with me that will speak to me of the angel who was mine.

Was mine—is mine no longer! I have still one word to say—my last word—ah, a heavy word! Anna, you are free! I have no longer a right over your hand.

Axel's honour is stained, Anna is free! I return your ring.

Now all is at an end!

[Eleven o'clock.]

The hour is come. I have stood at the window and contemplated the heavens. The stars sparkle brightly—brightly as on that evening,—you still remember it! when we exchanged rings, looked up to heaven, and were blessed as angels. The evening star shone then upon us mildly and clearly. Now and then, Anna, when mournful memories of departed hours may not be unwelcome to you, then glance upward to this star, and think on Axel. Often in lonely nights will his glance in joy and sorrow be riveted upon it.

The minutes speed on. God bless you, my Anna, may his angels defend thee!

Sweden shall, please God, one day see again a worthier son.

O my country! may I in the bosom of thy earth, which bore my cradle, find my grave, which Anna will wet with a tear.

My youth, my joy, my country, my Anna—ah! all, all—farewell!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Axel, best Axel, do not set off to-night! Do not set off to-night, upon my knees I pray this from you. Remain yet one day,—on the following night you may set off, if in the mean time things do not change—I—ah, I dare not give you hopes, which may be easily deceived; but perhaps, O Axel, perhaps we may find means to pay your debts. Delay only this one day, Anna prays you.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Why delay!—that for which you hope is an impossibility,—ah, you know not what it is to delay when every thing so—it is as if in the death-struggle one would defer the end. And why! for an impossibility! Yet once more these painful feelings—yet once more to take leave!! But you wish it!

ANNA TO ANNA.

Why do you not write! The hours creep on so slowly. I suffer grievously, but the thought that you have willed it does me good.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Not a word from you! What can it mean? It is already evening—a portentous and sto. my evening—Anna, in my heart it is still more portentous. Write a pacifying word to me.

AXEL TO ANNA.

My soul is so unhappy—so irritable,—I have suffered so much, I suffer still infinitely. All wild tormenting spirits are still so near to me; O fear to provoke them! Anna, say one word to me!

AXEL TO ANNA.

And yet I will, I must, seek for peace with you. You cannot deceive me. Yes, I feel it—you might murder me—I would kiss the dagger and still believe on you.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Lieutenant Papperto is with you! How can he go so often, when I find it impossible to obtain an entrance—and at the same time so late! Why is he with you? Is it he who will pay my debts; or, perhaps you and he together! I am really extremely affected!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Anna, I confide in you—yes, I confide in you,—although—but I am unhappy, in despair,—tell me what you do, what you wish!

AXEL TO ANNA.

I have been told, that Lieutenant Papperto has resigned in your favour a considerable property which had been left to you in common by a near relation—a relation, heaven knows who it was; for my part, God himself be with us! I have been told that you embraced Lieutenant Papperto—in his arms, on his bosom, have wept. I have been told that you are betrothed. A busy friend has hastened to gladden me with these tidings. Is it true, Anna? Death and the devil, is it true!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Anna, if you are thus—if you have thus forsaken me—yourself—what will become of me, Anna? In whom shall I still believe!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Your silence is an answer. Then it is true. Ha, woman, woman! Snake, monster! O where can I find the true expression? Where can I get words to describe my feelings? Detestable payment of my debts! Payment with the selling of a soul. Ha, ha, ha, ha! Do you understand me? I write down my laughter—ha, ha, ha! Thus I shall set off on my journey, rich in sad experience. It is now night—the hour is come—hurrah! Welcome storm-wind, which salutes my forehead as a brother, and dances upon my nocturnal way. Yes, nocturnal, nocturnal! Farewell, Anna, I leave you my cur—. I pity you!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Axel, Axel, stay! Ah, forgive! I could not write earlier. The brightest light suddenly in the deepest darkness—that would be too much—I could not bear it. Emil is a noble man—I have embraced him—but for your sake. I can now no more. I am thine, Axel, thine!

ANNA TO AXEL.

I am very ill. Oh, I never thought that happiness could be so oppressive—I am not able to bear it. Axel, we are rich! Lieutenant Papperto will unite us, will move our relations. L—, whom you wounded, will not die. Your debts will be paid,—all will be good. Poor Axel, how I have pined you! Forgive me all your disquiet, your despair. I was not in a state to give you an explanation, such as you ought to have had, and as you desired.

ANNA TO AXEL.

[A day later.

My illness increases, but I am perfectly conscious. I draw together my bed-curtains, say that I will sleep, but write to you. I fear, however, that it will be illegible. If I die, then I can and will leave my property to you. With one part of it, pay your debts; with the rest, seek to make yourself, and others, happy; but never play, Axel, never more!

ANNA TO AXEL.

[A day later.

Prepare yourself for all, my friend; I have, perhaps, only one day longer to live. Axel, do not give yourself up to despair. I will never leave you. You will not wander lonesome through the world, whether you meet with joy or sorrow; your Anna will invisibly attend you, true as when she yet wore your ring, as a child of heaven, still the bride of her Axel. Ought, indeed, two souls, which have once found each other, ever to become separated by anything! Should two flames, which have united, part and burn each for itself? O no! my spirit will float around you—be near to you—attend you ever. You will feel it near to you, delicious as a breath of spring, or as the fragrance of flowers—or as a caress, a kiss, pure and gentle as a moonbeam. When you feel yourself good, strong; or when you feel yourself happy, consoled, or full of hope, or only calm,—then think that your Anna is near you.

ANNA TO AXEL.

Now, for the first time, now I understand that glorious apparition which so affected me. The angels of faith, of love, and of hope, beside a grave, illumined by the glorious sun of God. It has reference to you, my Axel. From the quiet grave, where Anna will soon repose, will these three shew you the way home, where she awaits you.

ANNA TO AXEL.

My consciousness begins to be confused. Yet a few words to you, my Axel, although I do not know whether I have not already written them. My property I have left to you. I could do so according to law and right. With one part thereof, you must pay your debts —

My Axel, do not gamble again. With the remainder, you must make yourself and others happy. If you marry, be a good husband.

Not violent —

Not jealous —

Not a gambler —

A wife suffers much from these failings. It is wrong and cruel to distress her who looks for her entire happiness from you.

Be good to the poor.

Be unjust to no one. Fight no duel.

Blood demands blood. Fear God.

Think on Anna!

AXEL TO ANNA.

That which I shall now do I tell you beforehand, that you may be prepared for it, and not be shocked. I shall come down to you—knock down the drawing-room door—knock down all the doors, if they are locked—knock everybody down, or dead, who will keep me back—go in, and seat myself near you, that I may, with the strength of a despair which will compel fate to my side and conquer death itself, retain your angel soul in your angel body. I follow these lines.

AXEL TO ANNA.

[Three days later.

I came to you, Anna, wild, in nameless despair—saw you—was calm, and learned to pray. I saw you almost about to leave me, and to depart to a better home, which is so well known to you, but from which I was excluded,—and was able again to pray. You are again given to me—to earth and to me. And now, angel of heaven, teach me to pray—and to give thanks.

AXEL TO ANNA.

[A day later.

They will not allow me to be with you; you require rest, they say. Yes, my Anna, I confess that my nature has no resemblance to the west wind; but it shall ever more and more acquire it. Your last letter, my Anna, shall always rest on my heart; like a talisman, it shall there operate against all that is evil, and for all that is good. I have embraced Emil as my benefactor and friend. We have been together to-day, to L—, my opponent, and the sacrifice of my fury. He is out of all danger. I turned myself to his mother with the difficult word pardon (which, alas, is now become customary to me), and, with a shake of the hand, L— and I have promised never to play again.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Through the care of the noble-minded Emil are my debts already paid. Oh, I am not worthy of my happiness! It weighs upon me,—it almost weighs me down. If I for one year were a Trappist, were to wear a hair shirt, were to scourge myself a little every day, to lie upon nails, to go about silently and with eyes cast down, not to see the sun, and to dig my own grave,—then I fancy I should gain a little more courage to become happy.

I said this also in the fulness of my heart to Emil. He laughed, and asked whether, as the beginning of my designed penance, I would not impose upon myself the not seeing Anna again for a month's time. It would be just as good to bury me at once! Anna, you are my life, my all. The austerity of the Trappist life is nothing, all physical martyrdom is mere child's play; but not to see you—see, that is martyrdom, that is death!

AXEL TO ANNA.

I would that I could with my breath suck up the time, and thereby bring on the quicker the moment when I may again see you; and yet I enjoy drop by drop this time, of which every minute conveys to you more power of life, more strength. Fear not my presence, my dear Anna; I will be quiet, calm, immovable as your clock, if I might only reckon the hours by it near to you. I want to see what they give you, and how they nurse you. Do not take any more medicine; it does no good when people are getting better, excepting that it spoils one's teeth, and teaches one to make faces. Do not take anything but what is agreeable to you, let people say what they may!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Wait, and wait, and wait, for ever! You.

good people, who so calmly and so immoveably admonish to patience, and waiting, and quietness, Heaven must have made you, in its anger, out of so much earth, that you cannot conceive to yourselves an idea of fire and air. Your barometer, which perpetually stands at the monotonous height of steady and fine weather, has not the least thing in common with that which for ever falls and rises in sensitive hearts—from repose to storm—from sunshine to rain. God bless you, ye good folks! I am sorry for you with my whole heart.

AXEL TO ANNA.

It is you, Anna, whom I have to thank, that I no longer feel those oppressive pangs, those gnawings of conscience. Fear not, my Anna, that although the consequences of my transgressions—crimes they were—through the mercy of God, were so soon abrogated,—fear not that the remembrance will ever be extinguished in my soul. I shall never forget them!—I will remind myself every moment how fervently I must strive after making you forget what I once was. My gentle Anna, thou only shalt forget it.

ANNA TO AXEL.

can hold the pen once more!—can again write to Axel—my Axel! Yet you must not come down to me; I am still too weak. To see you again, with the full consciousness—with the full feeling of our happiness—for that I am still too weak.

ANNA TO AXEL.

My thanks, Axel, for the flowers, fruit, and all which you have sent to me. My chamber now resembles a beautiful garden. My aunt, to be sure, is not satisfied with this change; but she does not trust herself to say one word against it. Ever since the moment when you from the sill of my chamber-door set her up aloft on the bookcase, and besought her to be quiet, she has had such a panic fear of you that she never ventures to touch anything which comes from you. She seems to dread that an electrical spark may start forth from the thing which you have handled. As far as concerns myself, I find the flowers so beautiful, the fruit so good, that I see myself surrounded by them with the most heartfelt satisfaction, although they come from the wild, violent Axel.

Axel, we have been, however, unjust towards our relations. We wished to plunge into misery,—they wished to hinder our doing so. Were they wrong in doing so? They were perhaps too stern, but their intention was good.

AXEL TO ANNA.

You find yourself worse to-day, Rosina tells me—the too strong smell of the flowers. Oh! I, bird of ill luck! Pull them out, and fling all the pots out of the window, this very moment, otherwise I shall come and do it myself. Anna, may I! Anna, let me come!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Out of compassion for the heads of the poor passers by, and out of justice to the innocent flower-pots themselves, they are not thrown out of the window, but only carried out into another room; where I, for the first time, will again see my Axel, when I have strength enough for it. You may not come to me. In the mean time, be quite easy about me—I am now well again.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Now God be praised!—that is all I can say. Should not you, however, perhaps, take a strengthening medicine? Ask the doctor, dearest Anna. Or it is the best that I should speak with him when he comes from you—the happy fellow!

ANNA TO AXEL.

We shall see whether you recognise me, Axel, when you see me again. I am very much changed by my illness; thin, pale, with sunken eyes and cheeks; not any longer pretty, no longer like the Crown Princess in the least.

AXEL TO ANNA.

Look, Anna, I imagine to myself that you are become lame—that your eyes are little and squinting like your aunt's—that your nose is flat, your teeth black, your hand's green, your feet big. I imagine to myself that my Anna is become thus through my fault; my Anna, with her angel-heart, her heavenly goodness. And at the feet of this Anna, I long, I burn with impatience, to throw myself, and to say to her—“Anna, I am unworthy of you, but I love you indescribably. Deepise me not—thrust me not away—love me for my love's sake. Be again poor—but be mine; and as a begging-gipsy, I will nevertheless every day of my life thank heaven and you for a happiness whose excess I am unable to bear.

ANNA TO AXEL.

O fanatic! I fear your wings will not carry you far. Be calm in the mean time—you will not be so severely tried. Anna is no longer lovely—but thus she does not look. But Axel, when will you be less violent, less eccentric, when more reasonable!

AXEL TO ANNA.

When you are my wife; when I see you, hear you, am with you every day, every hour. Yet that which I lately wrote was no exaggeration, no fanaticism; it was my heart's most inward, truest feeling.

ANNA TO AXEL.

O the indescribably charming air of spring! I enjoy it through the open window, sitting among your flowers. The sun penetrates me with new life and new warmth. The birds twitter upon the budding trees of the terrace; all is beautiful, mild, and glorious! If there be a feeling on earth that is delicious and blessed, that calls forth sweet tears of joy and of peace, it is after a bed of sickness and pain, when one awakens again to life—to a life, where only spring airs, and only flowers, beckon to us. How quiet, how pure, is all within us! How accessible are we to joy, how inclined to all that is good! I have to-day, in beautiful, inestimable moments, saluted life, and have inwardly thanked the All-good Giver of it. To-morrow, Axel, I expect you; to-morrow, about noon.

AXEL TO ANNA.

To-morrow! I cannot say more; nay, all lies in the word—to-morrow!

ANNA TO AXEL.

We will be quiet and calm, Axel. We were children before,—now we are become old. We have suffered—do not let us forget that. Like tempests, which purify the air, are the passions to the soul. When they have ceased to rage, may they also have been so to us. Axel, we will be quiet, clear, pure, and full of peace, like this beautiful spring day.

To-day, about noon, Axel. I have selected the most beautiful oranges, that I may eat them with you. You must also see how well your flowers have been cared for. To water them, and attend to them, has been the first and dearest exercise of my returning strength.

AXEL TO ANNA.

I have seen you! For several hours I have not been able to write. Now it is evening—dark, silent, calm,—now I am stiller. But I know one thing only; I feel one thing; I have seen you!

AXEL TO ANNA.

Anna, you are divinely good—angelically beautiful! O you have nothing earthly about you! Your love, Anna! O that is every thing for me!

AXEL TO ANNA.

How charming were you in the white simple dress! Dress always thus, Anna! White does not become every one, but this colour seems made for you—you snow-white innocence. How you sat there in the bright flower world, so simple, so white, so inexpressibly lovely! you seemed to me a pure angel, whose lofty humility ought to receive the homage of all the greatness of the earth. For one moment it fell like a veil before my eyes; I took this for a cloud which floated around you, and I fancied for one inconsiderate minute, that you were being floated away to the land which is high above the clouds. At your knees, your hands in mine, my lips upon yours, I awoke—saw you—saw myself—saw the earth—No, heaven!

AXEL TO ANNA.

I can scarcely accustom myself to my happiness, so sudden, so great, so undeserved, as it is. Every morning it surprises me almost like an earthquake. And I must, indeed, speak Anna's sweet name fifty times before the stormy beating of my heart becomes calmer.

Now I must see Emil, and tell him that he is an angel. I will go to him. Ah, there he comes even to me.

AXEL TO ANNA.

A house bought—furniture; the domestic management brought into order—my business arranged; the banns published to-day—in eight days the marriage! "Emil, who art thou? Art thou an angel—a God?" "I am—Anna's lover!" "O the thou—you should leave that!" "I will be your common friend." "You may never come into my house!" "Thither shall I—not now—I will take a journey." "But you come again, however!" "As a married man. Farewell, Axel! be worthy of Anna, be happy!"

This Emil—and—and I! Anna, how does this Emil please you?

ANNA TO AXEL.

He is better, nobler than Axel; but I only love Axel; so unreasonable, so inexplicable is the human heart, so weak is mine. Do you reproach me, Axel?

AXEL TO ANNA.

Anna, reconcile me with myself. I am not worthy of you, I never can be!

ANNA TO AXEL.

I love you—and in a few days will be your wife—who from you expects her whole well-being—her whole happiness.

Your little sister shall come to us. I will be her mother.

AXEL TO ANNA.

If the angels of heaven would take in hand to make people wise and good by benefits, I would bet ten to one that they would succeed.

I write no more to you, Anna—I remain with you.

Notes remind me only of bolted doors, of jealousy, mistrusts and despair; and away with bolted doors, with black despair, black jealousy, and all black things,—yes, even with ink—away with it! May these between my wife and me never become necessary!

ANNA TO AXEL.

Amen!

JANNE TO HER SISTER ULLA.

Do you know, dear Ulla, the correspondence, as it was called, is now at an end. The whole spring-time have I been running up stairs and down stairs with little written bits of paper, called notes, between a young lady and a young gentleman. And I had always the while a pair of boots or shoes, which I was always cleaning in my hand, and I looked as innocent as a blacking-bottle. And do you know that for every note which I delivered in the stated place, I got one, or indeed two, three shillings, and several times a whole dollar in my pocket. Several times I received a few good sound boxes on my ear from the young gentleman, who was passionate beyond measure; and indeed for this reason, because I had not a note, whilst he declared that I must have one, namely, from the young lady. For which, however, I afterwards received as a plaster, a twelve-shilling note, so that I would willingly have had more of them.

How many notes there were altogether is more than my poor head can count. The sum and substance is, that I have scraped together thirty rix-dollars; that I shall leave the dear city of Stockholm, where a bit of bread and butter costs more than the whole stomach is worth; that I hasten home towards Smaland, buy our mother a little house, and after all my drudgery settle down with her in quiet. Here I am no longer of any use. The correspondence is at an end. The gentlefolks are married. God give them. His peace!

H O P E S.

I HAD a peculiar method of wandering without very much pain along the stormy path of life, although, in a physical as well as in a moral sense, I wandered almost barefoot,—I hoped, hoped from day to day; in the morning my hopes rested on evening, in the evening on the morning; in the autumn upon the spring, in spring upon the autumn; from this year to the next, and thus, amid mere hopes, I had passed through nearly thirty years of my life, without, of all my privations, painfully perceiving the want of anything but whole boots. Nevertheless, I consoled myself easily for this out of doors in the open air, but in a drawing-room it always gave me an uneasy manner to have to turn the heels, as being the part least torn, to the front. Much more oppressive was it to me, truly, that I could in the abodes of misery only console with kind words.

I comforted myself, like a thousand others, by a hopeful glance upon the rolling wheel of fortune, and with the philosophical remark, "when the time comes, comes the counsel."

As a poor assistant to a country clergyman with a narrow income and meagre table, morally becoming mouldy in the company of the scolding housekeeper, of the willingly fuddled clergyman, of a foolish young gentleman, and the daughters of the house, who, with high shoulders and turned-in-toes, went from morning to night paying visits, I felt a peculiarly strange emotion of tenderness and joy as one of my acquaintance informed me by writing, that my uncle, the Merchant P——, in Stockholm, to me personally unknown, now lay dying, and in a paroxysm of kindred affection had inquired after his good-for-nothing nephew.

With a flat, meagre little bundle and a million of rich hopes, the grateful nephew now allows himself to be shook up hill and down hill, upon an uncommonly uncomfortable and stiff-necked peasant-cart, and arrived head-over-heels in the capital.

In the inn where I alighted I ordered for myself a little—only a very little breakfast,—a trifle—a bit of bread and butter—a few eggs.

The landlord and a fat gentleman walked up and down the saloon and chatted. "Nay, that I must say," said the fat gentleman, "this Merchant P——, who died the day before yesterday, he was a fine fellow."

"Yes, yes," thought I; "aha, aha, a fine fellow, who had heaps of money! Hear you, my friend," (to the waiter), "could not you get me a bit of venison, or some other solid dish? Hear you, a cup of bouillon would not be amiss. Look after it, but quick!"

"Yes," said mine host now, "it is strong! Thirty thousand dollars, and they banko! Nobody in the whole world could have dreamed of it—thirty thousand!"

"Thirty thousand!" repeated I, in my exultant soul, "thirty thousand! Hear, youth, waiter! Make haste, give me here thirty thou—; no, give me here banko, no, give me here a glass of wine, I mean;" and from head to heart there sang in me, amid the trumpet-beat of every pulse in alternating echoes, "Thirty thousand! Thirty thousand!"

"Yes," continued the fat gentleman, "and would you believe that in the mass of debts there are nine hundred dollars for cutlets, and five thousand dollars for champagne. And now all his creditors stand there prettily, and open their mouths; all the things in the house are hardly worth two farthings; and out of the house they find as the only indemnification—a calaschi!"

"Aha, that is something quite different! Hear you, youth, waiter! Eh, come you here! take that meat, and the bouillon, and the wine away again; and hear you, observe well, that I have not eat a morsel of all this. How could I, indeed; I that ever since I opened my eyes this morning have done nothing else but eat (a horrible untruth!) and it just now occurs to me that it would therefore be unnecessary to pay money for such a superfluous feast."

"But you have actually ordered it," replied the waiter in a state of excitement.

"My friend," I replied, and seized myself behind the ear, a place whence people, who are in embarrassment, are accustomed in some sort of way to obtain the necessary help; "my friend, it was a mistake for which I must not be punished; for it was not my fault that a rich heir, for whom I ordered the breakfast, is all at once become poor,—yes, poorer than many a poor devil, because he has lost more than the half of his present means upon the future. If he, under these circumstances, as you may well imagine, cannot pay for a dear breakfast, yet it does not prevent my paying for the eggs which I have devoured, and giving you over and above something handsome for your trouble, as business compels me to move off from here immediately!"

By my excellent logic, and the "something handsome," I removed from my throat, with a bleeding heart and watering mouth, that dear breakfast, and wandered forth into the city, with my little bundle under my arm, to seek for a cheap room, whilst I considered where I was to get the money for it.

In consequence of the violent coming in contact of hope and reality I had a little headache. But when I saw upon my ramble a gentleman, ornamented with ribbons and stars, alight from a magnificent carriage, who had a pale yellow complexion, a deeply wrinkled brow, and above his eyebrows an intelligible trace of ill-humour; when I saw a young count, with whom I had become acquainted in the University of Upsala, walking along as if he were about to fall on his nose from age and weariness of life, I held up my head, inhaled the air, which accidentally (unfortunately) at this place was filled with the smell of smoked sausage, and extolled poverty and a pure heart.

I found at length, in a remote street, a little room, which was more suited to my gloomy prospects than to the bright hopes which I cherished two hours before.

I had obtained permission to spend the winter in Stockholm, and had thought of spending it in quite a different way to what now was to be expected. But what was to be done? To let the courage sink was the worst of all; to lay the hands in the lap and look up to heaven, not much better. "The sun breaks forth when one least expects it," thought I, as heavy autumn clouds descended upon the city. I determined to use all the means I could to obtain for myself a decent subsistence, with a somewhat pleasanter prospect for the future, than was opened to me under the miserable protection of Pastor G., and, in the mean time, to earn a daily bread by copying,—a sorrowful expedient in a sorrowful condition.

Thus I passed my days amid fruitless endeavors to find ears which might not be deaf, amid the heartwearing occupation of writing out fairly the empty productions of empty heads, with my dinners becoming more and more scanty, and with ascending hopes, until that evening against whose date I afterwards made a cross in my calendar.

My host had just left me with the friendly admonition to pay the first quarter's rent on the following day, if I did not prefer (the politeness is French) to march forth again with bag and baggage on a voyage of discovery through the streets of the city.

It was just eight o'clock, on an indescribably cold November evening, when I was revived with this affectionate salutation on my return from a visit to a sick person, for whom I, perhaps—really somewhat inconsiderately, had emptied my purse.

I snuffed my sleepy thin candle with my fingers, and glanced around the little dark chamber, for the further use of which I must soon see myself compelled to gold-making.

"Diogenes dwelt worse," sighed I, with a submissive mind, as I drew a lame table from the window where the wind and rain were not contented to stop outside. At that moment my eye fell upon a brilliantly blazing fire in a kitchen, which lay Tantalus-like directly opposite to my modest room, where the fire-place was as dark as possible. "Cooks, men and women, have the happiest lot of all serving mortals!" thought I, as with a secret desire to play that fire-tending game, I contemplated the well-fed dame, amid iron-pots and stewpans, standing there like an empress in the glory of the fire light, and with the firelongs-acceptre rummaging about majestically in the glowing realm.

A story higher, I had, through a window, which was concealed by no envious curtain, the view into a brightly lighted room, where a numerous family were assembled round a tea-table covered with cups and bread-baskets.

I was stiff in my whole body, from cold and damp. How empty it was in that part which may be called the magazine, I do not say; but, Ah, Lord God! thought I, if, however, that pretty girl, who over there takes a cup of tea-nectar and rich splendid rusk to that fat gentleman who, from satiety, can hardly raise himself from the sofa, would but reach out her lovely hand a little further, and could—she would with a thousand kisses—in vain!—ah, the satiated gentleman takes his cup; he sleeps and sleeps his rusk with such eternal slowness—it might be wine. Now the charming girl caresses him. I am curious whether it is the dear papa himself, or the uncle, or, perhaps— Ah, the enviable mortal! But no, it is quite impossible; he is at least forty years older than she. See, that indeed must be his wife—an elderly lady, who sits near him on the sofa, and who offers rusks to the young lady. The old lady seems very dignified; but to whom does she go now? I cannot see the person. An ear and a piece of a shoulder are all that peeps forth near the window. I cannot exactly take it amiss, that the respectable person turns his back to me; but that he keeps the young lady a quarter of an hour standing before him, lets her cursey and offer her good things, does thoroughly provoke me. It must be a lady—a man could not be so unpolite towards this angelic being. But—or—now she takes the cup; and now, O woe! a great man's hand grasps into the rusk-basket—the savage! and now he helps himself—the churl! I should like to know whether it is her brother,—he was perhaps hungry, poor fellow! Now come in one after the other, two lovely children, who are like the sister. I wonder now, whether the good man with one ear has left anything remaining. That most charming of girls, how she caresses the little ones, and kisses them, and gives to them all the rusks and the cakes that have escaped the fingers of Monsieur Gobble. Now she has had herself, the sweet child! of the whole entertainment, no more than me—the smell.

What a movement suddenly takes place in the room! The old gentleman heaves himself up from the sofa—the person with one ear starts forward, and in so doing, gives the young lady a blow (the dromedary!) which makes her knock against the tea-table, whereby the poor lady, who was just about springing up from the sofa, is pushed down again—the children hop about and clap their hands—the door flies open—a young officer enters—the young girl throws herself into his arms. So, indeed! Ah, now we have it! I put to my shutters so violently that they cracked, and seated myself on a chair, quite wet through with rain, and with my knees trembling.

What had I to do at the window? That is what one gets when one is inquisitive.

Eight days ago, this family had removed from the country into the handsome house opposite to me; and it had never yet occurred to me to ask who they were, or whence they came. What need was there for me to-night to make myself acquainted with their domestic concerns in an illicit manner? How could it interest me? I was in an ill-humour; perhaps, too, I felt some little headache. But for all that, true to my resolution, not to give myself up to anxious thoughts when they could do no good, I seized the pen with stiff fingers, and, in order to dissipate my vexation, wished to attempt a description of domestic happiness, of a happiness which I had never enjoyed. For the rest, I philosophised whilst I blew upon my stiffened hands. "Am I the first who, in the hot hour of fancy, has sought for a warmth which the stern world of reality has denied him? Six dollars for a measure of fir-wood. Yes, prosit, thou art not likely to get it before December! I write!"

Happy, threefold happy, the family, in whose narrow contracted circle no heart bleeds solitarily, or solitarily rejoices! No look, no smile, remains unanswered; and where the friends say daily, not with words but with deeds, to each other, 'Thy cares, thy joys, thy happiness, are mine also!'

"Lovely is the peaceful, the quiet home, which closes itself protectingly around the weary pilgrim through life—which, around its friendly blazing hearth, assembles for repose the old man leaning on his staff, the strong man, the affectionate wife, and happy children, who, shouting and exulting, hop about in their earthly heaven, and closing a day spent in the pastimes of innocence, repeat a thanksgiving prayer with smiling lips, and drop asleep on the bosom of their parents, whilst the gentle voice of the mother tells them, in whispered cradle-tones, how around their couch—

"The little angels in a ring,
Stand round about to keep
A watchful guard upon the bed
Where little children sleep."

Here I was obliged to leave off, because I felt something resembling a drop of rain come forth from my eye, and therefore could not any longer see clearly.

"How many," thought I, as my reflections, against my will, took a melancholy turn: "how many are there who must, to their sorrow, do without this highest happiness of earthly life—domestic happiness!"

For one moment I contemplated myself in the only whole glass which I had in my room—that of truth,—and then wrote again with gloomy feeling:—"Unhappy, indeed, may the forlorn one be called, who, in the anxious and cool moments of life (which, indeed, come so often), is pressed to no faithful heart, whose sigh nobody returns, whose quiet grief nobody alleviates with a 'I understand thee, I suffer with thee!'"

"He is cast down, nobody raises him up; he weeps, nobody sees it, nobody will see it; he goes, nobody follows him; he comes, nobody goes to meet him; he rests, nobody watches over him. He is lonely. O how unfortunate he is! Why dies he not? Ah, who would weep for him? How cold is a grave which no warm tears of love moisten!"

"He is lonesome in the winter night; for him the earth has no flowers, and dark burn the lights of heaven. Why wanders he, the lonesome one; why waits he; why flies he not, the shadow, to the land of shades? Ah, he still hopes, he is a mendicant who begs for joy, who yet waits in the eleventh hour, that a merciful hand may give him an alms."

"One only little blossom of earth will he gather, bear it upon his heart, in order henceforth not so lonesomely, not so entirely lonesome, to wander down the rest."

It was my own condition which I described. I deplored myself.

Early deprived of my parents, without brothers and sisters, friends and relations, I stood in the world yet so solitary and forlorn, that but for an inward confidence in heaven, and a naturally happy temper, I should often enough have wished to leave this contemptuous world; till now, however, I had almost constantly hoped from the future, and this more from an instinctive feeling that this might be the best, than to subdue by philosophy every too vivid wish for an agreeable present time, because it was altogether so opposed to possibility. For some time, however, alas! it had been otherwise with me; I felt, and especially this evening, more than ever an inexpressible desire to have somebody to love,—to have some one about me who would cleave to me—who would be a friend to me;—in short, to have (for me the highest felicity on earth) a wife—a beloved, devoted wife! O she would comfort me, she would cheer me! her affection, even in the poorest hut, would make of me a king. That the love-fire of my heart would not insure the faithful being at my side from being frozen was soon made clearly sensible to me by an involuntary shudder. More dejected than ever, I rose up and walked a few times about my room (that is to say, two steps right forward, and then turned back again). The sense of my condition followed me like the shadow on the wall, and for the first time in my life I felt myself cast down, and threw a gloomy look on my dark future. I had no patron, therefore could not reckon upon promotion for a long time, consequently also not upon my own bread—on a friend—a wife, I mean.

"But what in all the world," said I yet once more seriously to myself, "what helps bearing one's brains?" Yet once more I tried to get rid of all anxious thoughts. "If, however, a Christian soul could only come to me this evening! Let it be whoever it would—friend or foe—it would be better than this solitude. Yes, even if an inhabitant of the world of spirits opened the door, he would be welcome to me! What was that? Three blows on the door! I will not, however, believe it—again three!" I went and opened; there was nobody there; only the wind went howling up and down the stairs. I hastily shut the door again, thrust my hands into my pockets, and went up and down for a while humming aloud. Some moments afterwards, I fancied I heard a sigh!—I was silent, and listened,—again there was very evidently a sigh—and yet once again, so deep and so mournful that I exclaimed with secret terror, "Who is there?" No answer.

For a moment I stood still, and considered what this really could mean, when a horrible noise, as if cats were sent with yells lumbering down the whole flight of stairs, and ended with a mighty blow against my door, put an end to my indecision. I took up the candle, and a stick, and went out. At the moment when I opened the door my light was blown out. A gigantic white figure glimmered opposite to me, and I felt myself suddenly embraced by two strong arms. I cried for help, and struggled so actively to get loose, that both myself and my adversary fell to the ground, but so that I lay uppermost. Like an arrow I sprang again upright, and was about to fetch a light, when I stumbled over something—God knows what it was (I firmly believe that somebody held me fast by the feet), by which I fell a second time, struck my head on the corner of the table, and lost my consciousness, whilst a suspicious poise, which had great resemblance to laughter, rung in my ears.

When I again opened my eyes, they met a dazzling blaze of light. I closed them again, and listened to a confused noise around me—opened them again a very little, and endeavoured to distinguish the objects which surrounded me, which appeared to me so enigmatical and strange that I almost feared my mind had wandered. I lay upon a sofa, and—No, I really did not deceive myself,—that charming girl, who on this evening had so incessantly floated before my thoughts, stood actually beside me, and with a heavenly expression of sympathy bathed my head with vinegar. A young man whose countenance seemed known to me, held my hand between his. I perceived also the fat gentleman, another thin one, the lady, the children, and in distant twilight I saw the shimmer of the paradise of the tea-table; in short, I found myself by an incomprehensible whim of fate amidst the family which an hour before I had contemplated with such lively sympathy.

When I again had returned to full consciousness, the young man embraced me several times with military vehemence.

"Do you then no longer know me?" cried he indignantly as he saw me petrified body and soul. "Have you then forgotten August D——, whose life a short time since you saved at the peril of your own? whom you so handsomely fished up with danger to yourself, from having for ever to remain in the uninteresting company of fishes? See here, my father, my mother, my sister Wilhelmina!"

I pressed his hand; and now the parents embraced me. With a stout blow of the fist upon the table, August's father exclaimed, "And because you have saved my son's life, and because you are such a downright honest and good fellow, and have suffered hunger yourself—that you might give others to eat—you shall really have the parsonage at H——. Yes, you shall become clergyman! I say—I have jus patronatus, you understand?"

For a good while I was not at all in a condition to comprehend, to think, or to speak; and before all had been cleared up by a thousand explanations, I could understand nothing clearly excepting that Wilhelmina was not—that Wilhelmina was August's sister.

He had returned this evening from a journey of service, during which, in the preceding summer, chance had given to me the good fortune to rescue him from a danger, into which youthful heat and excess of spirit had thrown him. I had not seen him again since this occurrence; earlier, I had made a passing acquaintance with him, had drunk brotherhood with him at the university, and after that had forgotten my dear brother.

He had now related this occurrence to his family, with the easily kindled-up enthusiasm of youth, together with what he knew of me beside, and what he did not know. The father, who had a living in his gift, and who (as I afterwards found) had made from his window some compassionate remarks upon my meagre dinner-table, determined, assailed by the prayers of his son, to raise me from the lap of poverty to the summit of fortune. August would in his rapture announce to me my good luck instantly, and in order, at the same time, to gratify his passion for merry jokes, made himself known upon my stairs in a way which occasioned me a severe, although not dangerous, contusion on the temples, and the unexpected removal across the street, out of the deepest darkness into the brightest light. The good youth besought a thousand times forgiveness for his thoughtlessness; a thousand times I assured him that it was not worth the trouble to speak of such a trifling blow. And in fact, the living was a balsam, which would have made a greater wound than this imperceptible also.

Astonished, and somewhat embarrassed, I now perceived that the ear and the shoulder, whose possessor had seized so horribly upon the contents of the rusk-basket, and over whom I had poured out my gall, belonged to nobody else than to August's father and my patron. The fat gentleman who sat upon the sofa, was Wilhelmina's uncle.

The kindness and gaiety of my new friends made me soon feel at home and happy. The old people treated me like a child of the house, the young ones as a brother, and the two little ones seemed to anticipate a gingerbread-friend in me.

After I had received two cups of tea from Wilhelmina's pretty hand, to which I almost feared taking, in my abstraction of mind, more rusks than my excellent patron, I rose up to take my leave. They insisted absolutely upon my passing the night there; but I abode by my determination of spending the first happy night in my old habitation, amid thanksgiving to the lofty Ruler of my fate.

They all embraced me afresh; and I now also embraced all rightly, from the bottom of my heart, Wilhelmina also, although not without having gracious permission first. "I might as well have left that alone," thought I afterwards, "if it is to be the first and the last time!" August accompanied me back.

My host stood in my room amid the overturned chairs and tables, with a countenance which alternated between rain and sunshine; on one side his mouth drew itself with a reluctant smile up to his ear, on the other it crept for vexation down to his double chin; the eyes followed the same direction, and the whole had the look of a combat, till the tone in which August indicated to him that he should leave us alone, changed all into the most friendly, grinning mien, and the proprietor of the same vanished from the door with the most submissive bows.

August was in despair about my table, my chair, my bed, and so on. It was with difficulty that I withheld him from cudgeling the host who would take money for such a hole. I was obliged to satisfy him with the most holy assurances, that on the following day I would remove without delay. "But tell him," prayed August, "before you pay him, that he is a villain, a usurer, a cheat, a — or if you like, I will —."

"No, no, heaven defend us!" interrupted I, "be quiet, and let me only manage."

After my young friend had left me, I passed several happy hours in thinking on the change in my fate, and inwardly thanking God for it.

My thoughts then rambled to the parsonage; and heaven knows what fat oxen and cows, what pleasure-grounds, with flowers, fruits, and vegetables, I saw in spirit surrounding my new paradise, where my Eve walked by my side, and supported on my arm; and especially what an innumerable crowd of happy and edified people I saw streaming from the church when I had preached. I baptized, I confirmed, I comforted my beloved community in the zeal and warmth of my heart—and forgot only the funerals.

Every poor clergyman who has received a living, every mortal, especially to whom unexpectedly a long cherished wish has been accomplished, will easily picture to himself my state.

Later in the night it sunk at last like a veil before my eyes, and my thoughts fell by degrees into a bewilderment which exhibited on every hand strange images. I preached with a loud voice in my church, and the congregation slept. After the service the people came out of the church like oxen and cows, and bellowed against me when I would have admonished them. I wished to embrace my wife, but could not separate her from a great turnip, which increased every moment, and at last grew over both our heads. I endeavoured to climb up a ladder to heaven, whose stars beckoned kindly and brightly to me; but potatoes, grass, vetches, and peas, entangled my feet unmercifully, and hindered every step. At last I saw myself in the midst of my possessions walking upon my head, and whilst in my sleepy soul I greatly wondered how this was possible, I slept soundly in the remembrance of my dream. Yet then, however, I must unconsciously have continued the chain of my pastoral thoughts, for I woke in the morning with the sound of my own voice loudly exclaiming, "Amen!"

That the occurrences of the former evening were actual truth, and no dream, I could only convince myself with difficulty, till August paid me a visit, and invited me to dine with his parents.

The living, Wilhelmina, the dinner, the new chain of hopes for the future which beamed from the bright sun of the present, all surprised me anew with a joy which one can feel very well, but never can describe.

Out of the depths of a thankful heart, I saluted the new life which opened to me, with the firm determination, that let happen what might, yet always to do the right, and to hope for the best.

Two years after this, I sat on an autumn evening in my beloved parsonage by the fire. Near to me sat my dear little wife, my sweet Wilhelmina, and spun. I was just about to read to her a sermon which I intended to preach on the next Sunday, and from which I promised myself much edification, as well for her as for the assembled congregation. Whilst I was turning over the leaves, a loose paper fell out. It was the paper upon which, on that evening two years before, in a very different situation, I had written down my cheerful and my sad thoughts. I shewed it to my wife. She read, smiled with a tear in her eye, and with a roguish countenance which, as I fancy, is peculiar to her, took the pen and wrote on the other side of the paper:—

"The author can now, thank God, strike out a description which would stand in perfect contrast to that which he once, in a dark hour, sketched of an unfortunate person, as he himself was then.

"Now he is no more lonesome, no more deserted. His still sighs are answered, his secret griefs shared, by a wife tenderly devoted to him. He goes, her heart follows him; he comes back, she meets him with smiles; his tears flow not unobserved, they are dried by her hand, and his smiles beam again in hers; for him she gathers flowers, to wreath around his brow, to strew in his path. He has his own fireside, friends devoted to him, and counts as his relations all those who have none of their own. He loves, he is beloved; he can make people happy, he is himself happy."

Truly had my Wilhelmina described the present; and, animated by feelings which are gay and delicious as the beams of the spring sun, I will now, as hitherto, let my little troop of high hopes bound out into the future.

I hope too, that my sermon for the next Sunday may not be without benefit to my hearers; and even if the obdurate should sleep, I hope that neither this nor any other of the greater or the less unpleasantnesses which can happen to me, may go to my heart and disturb my rest. I know my Wilhelmina, and believe also that I know myself sufficiently, to hope with certainty that I may always make her happy. The sweet angel has given me hope that we may soon be able to add a little creature to our little happy family, I hope, in the future, to be yet multiplied. For my children I have all kinds of hopes in petto. If I have a son, I hope that he will be my successor; if I have a daughter, then—if August would wait—but I fancy that he is just about to be married.

I hope in time to find a publisher for my sermons. I hope to live yet a hundred years with my wife.

We—that is to say, my Wilhelmina and I—hope, during this time, to be able to dry a great many tears, and to shed as few ourselves as our lot, as children of the earth, may permit.

We hope not to survive each other.

Lastly, we hope always to be able to hope; and when the hour comes that the hopes of the green earth vanish before the clear light of eternal certainty, then we hope that the All-good Father may pass a mild sentence upon his grateful and in humility hoping children.

THE TWINS.

Two charming rosebuds (the last in my garden) are frozen in this October night. I had so heartily pleased myself with the thought of delighting my old mother, who is a great friend of flowers, and, especially at this season, calls them her jewels, with two beautiful roses. Now my two hopeful buds hang without life and colour on the stem; they are gone—and with them my little birthday pleasure.

I contemplated them long, and felt the while tears come to my eyes. They were consecrated to the memory of two rosebuds of a nobler kind, which, hopeful as these lovely flowers, like these also withered away early before the night-frost of life.

Edward and Ellna, my young friends, how often in lonely hours does your friendly image visit me! Like mild breezes of spring are the remembrances of you wafted to me from the time when I was so often with you,—heard you, saw you, and in you the loveliest things which God had created on earth.

When I now see splendid fruit which has fallen before its maturity, a blossom with a worm in the bud, any thing beautiful and good which soon vanishes, then I think on—Edward and Ellna!

Behold there, the beautiful country-seat surrounded by a magnificent park, where they dwelt with their happy mother! They were the youngest of many children which she had borne, the only ones for which she had not yet wept.

They were her darlings, her all.

They were so lovely that one could not contemplate them without emotion. The eye, wearied with the many unpleasantnesses and adversities which everywhere meet it, would repose with delight upon these charming beings, who in the pure glory of child-like innocence stood there, like promises of a fairer and better creation.

Their smile was particularly charming—oh, it was mirrored in their souls, that depth of innocence and joy! Two dew-drops, sent down from heaven in order to refresh the earth, reflect their image in their breast.

"Happy childhood!" have I heard thousands exclaim, who had already drank deeper from the cup of life, to whose edge children have only set their lips, and kissed away the fiery foam. "Happy childhood!" to thee is vouchsafed to drink amid pastimes the pure nectar of joy—whilst we, amid weariness and labour, seek in vain for a refreshing drop in the mournful draught which is extended to us.

And yet for all that, it appears to me that it is not with justice that childhood is called so happy. How many tears are shed by children! Tears of impatience, of desire, of anger; tears which shame and reproaches wring out; tears of envy, of indignation, and of despair,—in one word, all the passions which poison the draught of life to maturer hearts.

It is true that they need not shed these tears, if a wise commiserating hand always removed the thorns from the path which the little pilgrims of life tread. But often, quite too often, they are not removed—they are strown upon it. Constraint, unjust reproaches, grow up like poisonous nettles around the poor little ones. How often have I seen it; how often have I exclaimed, "You poor children, you poor little children! why did they give a life to you, whose few spring-flowers they do not permit you to pluck?"

Freedom—freedom, this west-wind of joy, whose pure spirit alone is able to bring forth to perfection every flower of creation—if they gave but freedom to you innocent little ones, to you born for immortality—who must wander through a stormy land! The breezes of freedom, not the simoom-wind of constraint, should attend your first steps, and the world then would not see so many feeble wanderers sink down powerless, and crawl wearily along their way.

The first years of Edward and Ellna's life passed on in innocent freedom. Beautiful, friendly nature was their cradle. In the fields, in the woods and groves, now they played, and now they rested. Often, as with their arms clasped round each other they lay upon the soft carpet of grass, had they been heard to talk of the angels, whose wings they saw in the clouds, which, parted by light gales, floated away in the blue heaven, high above the dark green summit of the wood. They have been seen to smile,—yes, sometimes to talk confidentially and child-like with them, praise their beauty, which (as they said) was far greater than their own. Often did they raise their small child voices to accompany the tones of heavenly harps, which they heard mingled with the voices of the wood. Their mother, who was always near them, believed in the reality of these appearances. And what, indeed, can one say against them?—that one has not oneself experienced anything of the kind. But how rarely was any one so angel-like and happy as Edward and Ellna!

Every one who knew them was obliged to acknowledge that they had never seen their like; and many a one questioned in pious rapture, whether these children were really like other mortals.

Around their white foreheads fell light-brown curls; like stars beamed forth their eyes below, in soft magical brightness. The charming smiles of childhood parted constantly their lovely lips, and formed in the rose-tinted cheeks little dimples, which people, I know not rightly why, so gladly kissed.

Their whole bodies were so beautifully formed, their hands in particular were so perfect, that I once saw how a sculptor fell into rapture over their contemplation; and how an old gardener, not otherwise distinguished for his politeness and fine breeding, borrowed a pair of gloves that he might be able to conduct the little Ellna about his garden, the most beautiful flowers of which soon lay in her muslin apron.

Accustomed therefore to be admired without knowing why, Edward and Ellna shewed themselves gladly to every one who wished to see them, and quietly smiling, allowed themselves to be praised and caressed.

"We are so beautiful," said they in their innocence, without knowing what beauty was, and that the world considered the possession of this a piece of good fortune. The agreeable impression which, as they knew, they made, seemed, however, to give them pleasure, but only because it was so agreeable to others.

"Look at us!" said they to an old man, who wept the loss of his only son, "look at us, and weep no more!"

Accustomed to call forth a smile upon all countenances, they betrayed astonishment that any one could see them and yet weep, and in their grief, not to be able to give satisfaction, they began also to weep with him. That which their smiles could not do, they now effected by their tears. The old man took them in his arms, and felt himself refreshed, as by the sympathy of angels. They were then heard to say to the mourner, "Look at us, we weep with you!"

Thus did these little Christians already in childhood follow the example of their Master.

People call children good. I declare that I have seen few which were not severe and cruel. Unthinking (therefore innocent) savages, they often torment in the most horrible manner creatures which are small and defenceless enough to become their victims. They curiously contemplate their convulsive movements amid torture, and rarely avoid causing them pain. O that so many people, who already know, who have already experienced themselves what pain is, should resemble these cruel little ones! They are not like them—innocent!

Often have I exclaimed with murmuring pain on the observation of their cruel pleasures, and the torments which their so-called necessary wants, their desire of knowledge, their inhumanity causes to millions of innocent creatures—"Man, this being that more than all suffers on the earth, and causes most suffering—O why was he created?"

Yet I know that all will be good one day,—no more tears will be shed—there will be no more pain. Humbling my head, I will quietly hope and wait for that higher light which is here denied to us. There is a God; therefore let the murmurs of man be silent!

Edward and Ellna were not cruel, as the children of earth are commonly. They knew not however what suffering, what pain were; but it was as if they had a presentiment of it, and their most earnest endeavours were used, when they saw its horrible expression, to render help, and to alleviate it. If a poor worm crawled in the dust, hunted forth by ants, it was immediately released by their hands, placed upon the soft grass in safety where there were no ants. Whenever they saw a little bird which, accustomed to the freedom of the woods, with ineffectual flutterings struck its little head against the iron wire of its cage, the tears came to their eyes, they besought for its release; and if their prayers were indeed in vain, they put together their hoarded pence and purchased it. Then it went out in the field with the happy little ones. The door of its cage was opened; and when the little released one, amid exultant twitterings described circle within circle above their heads, then did the children clap their hands, and their hearts beat loudly with delight.

Not a day passed, on which they did not operate against something which was bad, or for that which was good. To be sure the sphere of the children's activity was but small, and that which they could do but unimportant. They were young artists, who early accustomed themselves to the beautiful and noble parts which they were later to play upon the great theatre of the world.

As for the nests, in the robbing and plundering of which boys often find pleasure in the bold and cruel exercise of their strength, Edward and Ellna supplied provision. They laid this at the foot of the trees or hedges, where the little airy families had built their summer-dwellings. "The mother need not fly so far," said they, "and her little ones need not wait and be famished!" They approached the places carefully, where the mother had bedded her eggs in the grass, silently scattered corn, and were very careful not to terrify the timid bird, which often by degrees, accustomed to the visits of the little angels, only flew off twittering, set itself upon a bush near, and waited quietly the going-away of the children, who joyfully, and not a little thankful for this proof of confidence, stole away so softly and lightly that the grass rose again under their footsteps as if it had only been bowed by soft breezes.

In order that they might not tread upon ants, which always streamed across the path on journeys of business, or upon frogs which hopped before their feet, the children remained standing, or made a little circuit. They never intentionally killed an animal, nor a fly, nor even a gnat, those Paras of the air, which had no mercy from the educated part of the human race. "It is really so delightful to live!" said the amiable little ones. "I once even saw the little Ellna give up her white arms and hands as prey to these rapacious bloodsuckers. 'I give them their suppers,' said she smiling; 'and—it does not hurt me much,' added she for the sake of her brother, who now, for the first time, shewed the somewhat imperious temper of the man, and forbade his sister to do this again, if she did not wish that he should extirpate the whole race of gnats, which probably did not seem more difficult to him than the conquest of the world to Alexander."

Ellna was obliged to submit. The gnats were chased away, and then Edward endeavoured by kisses to prevent the bitten places from swelling. The fresh smiles of childhood beamed from their countenances as they thus sportively contended, Edward to give kisses, and Ellna to avoid them.

I said that they never intentionally killed an animal,—I was wrong. If they saw a little creature tortured by the pangs of death, a fly or a moth, which had burned themselves in the candle, a trodden, but yet living worm, then Edward, as the least tender-hearted, hastened with averted eyes and compassionate foot, the moment when pangs and pains would vanish.

"It is better to die than to suffer," said they, and turned away with pale faces.

"These children are too good for this earth," said those who knew them; "they certainly will not live long."

And yet, my God, it would be well amid so many pains, amid so much evil, if thou wouldst let these phenomena tarry longer here, which as it were reveal again to us the stars of which we have lost sight, which gently and refreshingly remind us of whence we are come, and whither we go.

You good and amiable mortals—when I wish that you should tarry here, I do so for our sakes.

and not yours! If the All-merciful call back again to his bosom these sparks of his spirit, which have illumined and warmed the unworthy earth for a moment—how well done is it of him, how good for you!

The May-day of childhood was passed for Edward and Ellna,—their youth dawned. They counted fifteen years.

Their child-like mind, however, was not much changed. The first violet which looked forth from under the snow, the first strawberry which was reddened by the beams of the sun, still called forth the purple of joy upon their cheeks; and the joy or the pain of their fellow-creatures drew from them now, as before, a smile or a tear. Only now they regarded more than formerly their fellow-beings as the worthiest objects of their care.

There was not within the compass of some miles a single cottage which they had not visited. The goodness of their mother gave them unceasing opportunities of enjoying the blessed pleasure of benefiting their fellows. "Tell us what you need," said they to the poor and sick, "if we can, we will help you." Now there was a softer bed; now more healthy food; now a little support in money; now a petition on behalf of the indigent, which, always accompanied by gentle, kind words, spoken by two of the sweetest voices, made as deep as beneficial an impression. When help was not necessary, they sought at least to prepare a little pleasure; little presents were given to the parents, confections to the children, who of all the benefits most highly prize those which are conferred upon their sugar-loving gums; all these young lovers of noise and sweetmeats always attended on and saluted Edward and Ellna with loud cries of joy.

People warned their mother of the manner in which so much goodness might be abused. She replied, "Do not let us be too anxious. One single opportunity to do good which is lost, as is often the case from mistrust, is an irreparable loss. I acknowledge that we are often deceived by others from want of prudence; but with too much prudence we deceive ourselves. And then—if you only knew that which I feel when I hear every mouth blessing my children!"

If people would rightly thank Edward and Ellna according to their wishes, it were thus that they must speak to them: "I am now better, my pains are alleviated;" or, "I am now more joyful, and happier;" or, "God is good, he will not allow us to despair;" then were their hearts filled with the purest joy, and they thanked God.

In the mean time their happy endeavours, their charitable cares, were not extended alone to the poor and the less educated classes of the people; they sought to assuage not merely the care which weeps, the suffering which expresses itself aloud, the silent sorrow, the consuming unrest, those small but insupportable afflictions which people do not willingly confess, but which are so painful,—all those adverse circumstances which hang like chains about the slaves of the polite and educated world, they imagined, and endeavoured with compassionate hands to lighten. One look, which in an unwatchful moment betokened a depressed heart,—one gesture, one movement, which betrayed embarrassment—a consequence mostly of uneasiness of mind,—seldom escaped their eyes; and they always discovered some means to make at least a few moments agreeable to those who seemed to be deprived of peace and satisfaction of heart.

When Ellna saw in society a sister-being to whom nature had dealt hardly, and who, in one way or another, seemed to betray the painful consciousness that she was displeasing, she sought immediately to become acquainted with her; she went towards her, caressed her, and endeavoured in all ways to convince her that she found her loveable, and that she was gladly in company with her. Edward also came immediately to her assistance; and the attentiveness with which he offered a thousand of those little favours which one can never demand, but which are received with so much pleasure,—his unconstrained lively politeness,—made, in connexion with the charming friendliness of the sister, an irresistible impression. If, on the other hand, Edward saw a youth who was neglected, or overlooked, or dejected, he always tried to get into conversation with him immediately. If they danced, he introduced his sister Ellna, who in the goodness of her heart preferred him to all the rich, handsome, and elegant young gentlemen who sought for one of her beaming glances.

How often have I seen countenances which betrayed minds depressed, displeased, or embittered, clear themselves up under the influence of the twins, and by degrees reflect back their gentle and beaming smiles. Plain features became thereby beautified, and one read long afterwards, in their more agreeable expression, "We can nevertheless be found to be amiable!"

One evening, at a dance in the open air, I perceived that Ellna had no longer a little bouquet, which her brother had made for her out of the loveliest flowers of the garden. I asked her whether she had lost it. "I have given it away," replied she, reddening, and left me to dance at the same moment. I looked curiously around me among the young and loveable persons of the ball; no one had Ellna's little bouquet. Afterwards I perceived, upon a bench which stood at some distance, a deformed, feeble being, whose limbs were all twisted; he held Ellna's flowers in his emaciated hand, and repeated softly, with an expression of devotion, "The angel!—the angel! she thought, she said, that flowers would do me good; yes, they do me good,—O what an angel!"

How happy they were, these young, so lovely and so good, brother and sister; how worthy of love they were, and how much beloved! People prided themselves on them in the whole country, just as they pride themselves on the gifts which nature has bestowed on the country or neighbourhood which we call our own, and of which we are so proud. People called them the angels; and, in fact, when one saw them, when one heard their melodious voices united in a simple song of praise in honour of the Creator, one could forget everything else, and for some moments fancy oneself in heaven.

The tenderness which twin-children commonly cherish for each other, was so deep, so inward, between Edward and Ellna, that I fancy they had scarcely a notion of an existence apart from each other. They thought, they acted together; they always said we; they felt only their I in each other; this I, which, when it is felt quite alone in oneself, is so heavy, so painful a burden.

The beautiful life of the twins had hitherto flowed on without a cloud. No sickness, no care, no disaster, had cast one shadow on their pure brows. Life which otherwise is so severe a teacher, seemed to hold her children in honour, and, for the first time, as if she could not be stern. Each new day brought with it something to beautify them. Their countenances became more oval, and took ever more and more the lovely Grecian form. Their figures increased in more beautiful pliability, like two young trees which have entwined their crowns together. Their smiles were fuller of expression, and the goodness of their hearts beamed ever clearer forth from their large blue eyes.

People approached these favourites of God and men almost with adoration; people could have offered sacrifices to them; and yet, if one would contribute anything to their happiness, one must receive something from them. It was to me as if I saw in them young priests at the altar of Mercy, who imparted with humility the gifts of the divinity.

Their mother,—so much has been said, perhaps all that can be said in words, of maternal love and maternal felicity, but the love and felicity of this mother cannot be described by words, can, perhaps, only be compared to the felicity of the mother who saw the most holy glory of God around the head of her son.

At the age of sixteen, they stood in the full bloom of earthly, and at the same time, of celestial beauty. The world opened itself to them full of joy, love, and happiness. Before them lay a light, flower-strewn, peaceful way, upon which they could wander together, beloved and loving in return, happy and making happy. They could be the benefactors and examples to their fellow-creatures; they could be so, and yet they could not,—at the age of sixteen they must die!

At the beginning of winter, Edward's Apollonian countenance began to burn with a hectic crimson, which kindled up and dyed his youthful cheeks with brighter red; but which, in the course of a few hours, faded like a feeble flame, and left behind the paleness of death. His strength began to fail, his beautiful slender figure bent forward like a tender young tree which has been bowed by the storm; his breath became short; his hitherto so ardent movements slow and languid, and his eyes had a clearness which promised the speedy lighting up of the whole being. The opinion of the physician was this—Consumption, and only yet a few months to live.

O now, how was every thing changed! As he approached the grave, Edward looked around him upon life, that seemed passed away from his eyes like his native shore from the sight of the seaman.

"I am so young," said he, amid deep sighs; "and must die already! I shall leave thee, Ellna—must part from thee and our mother! And this beautiful life, this charming earth, good people, all, all must I leave, and die! O the dark grave, wherein I shall be laid alone—how horrible!"

Every thing that Ellna said and did had alone for its object consolation and alleviation for her brother. And nevertheless she was so wholly unhappy; but she never thought of herself.

She said to Edward, "The sun has a wonderful power, my brother; come to the window, and let it shine on thee; see, here is a soft chair; here are lilies of the valley, which I have fetched for thee; enjoy their delightful odour; they send, especially in winter, presentiments of spring over all our feelings." Or she said, "Rest on me, my brother; thus thou wilt sit comfortably, and I will not stir." And with her brother's head on her breast she sat whole hours immovable there, taking pains to keep time with his breathing, and to repress the uneasy beating of her heart. Another time she said, "Dost thou see how the clouds divide, how the heavens clear themselves up? It opens, as it were, and beams so mildly and blue above us. It is the answer of the All-good to my prayer, which I just now fervently put up to Him. The heaven of our happiness has dimmed itself—it will clear up again—thou wilt not die!"

Sometimes she sought also to awaken hope in his and her own breast, by jest and sport. She danced before him, threw playfully around him the light scarf which her hands wreathed in a thousand graceful forms around her own ethereal figure. She sang to him those little ballads and songs which life so easily takes hold of, and makes it also easy to those who listen to their attractive tones. But when only a feeble smile, a melancholy reflection of the former blissful one, appeared on Edward's pale lips, then suddenly were extinguished all beams of hope in Ellna's eyes, and the twins wept together.

Often did she encourage him to make use of those means for the renewal of life's strength which, particularly in consumption, are resorted to, in order that the weak thread of life may not too suddenly be torn asunder. All these she prepared with her own hand. Who can number all that her inventive love discovered, to procure for him alleviation and amusement? Without the knowledge of her brother, she held her hands in ice-cold water, that she might afterwards cool his burning forehead as she laid them upon it. When she watched by his bed through sleepless nights, she read aloud to him, and told him such things as she thought would best please his then state of mind; for his state of mind was, as is the case with consumptive patients, unsteady and changeable. And in those gloomy moments in which Edward shuddered at the prospect of dying so young, and being alone; for he could not conceive to himself that he should not miss his sister in the grave. Then Ellna would promise to follow him. "How could I do otherwise," added she, "I really feel my life in thine!"

Yes, she could console;—and what woman, what true woman cannot? I ought, perhaps, seeing that I myself am a woman, to be more modest,—but if I believe it, if I express it, it is because I love,—and because, although I cannot turn aside the stroke of fate from the beings who are dear to me, I have set the hope of my whole life on alleviating it. Yes, I believe it is ~~we~~ alone who can solve the enigma of pain in its least parts; and that it is given alone to us in the inspiration of feeling and of love, to have a presentiment of the evil which pain occasions, of that which is concealed in the gnawing disease of the sick. I hope and believe, and let nobody gainsay me, that as in the beginning of time, the genius of evil sowed poisonous seed in the flower-garden of creation, still that a mitigating balsam was placed by the All-good in the hands of woman, which could make the power of these less operative.

Ellna had said to Edward, "I will follow thee!"—and she soon followed him. The same symptoms of disease showed themselves at the beginning of the spring in her, and the mischief made rapid progress in her tender frame, weakened by disquiet and night-watching.

To her the sentence of death was also announced by an honest and candid physician, who feared, above all things, to add new troubles to what was already incurable by fruitless attempts at recovery.

"We are so young, and yet we must, indeed, die!" said now Edward and Ellna, painfully. But this was that united them, was already a drop of comfort in the bitter cup.

They took leave together of the flowers of spring, took leave of every day which unmercifully dragged away with it a drop of their life's strength. People saw them often, as, supported on each other, they wandered about with feeble steps and sorrowful looks in the wood, in the fields, in the groves, where they had once played so happily; they took leave of every thing; of the earth, even of heaven, which seemed, however, only so glorious to them, because it arched itself above an earth which was a paradise to them.

"Farewell, every thing which we have loved!" said they, "we must leave all, we must soon die!"

When people spoke in their presence of future enjoyments, or of future good deeds, with intention to amuse them, or, as it were, to enlarge the view, which an approaching night shut in ever more narrowly—they said with tearful eyes, "We shall not be there; we must die!"

"Come to me in the autumn," said one of their neighbours, "when my grapes and peaches are ripe, and there shall be served-up to you an actual angel's entertainment."

"In autumn we cannot come," returned they,—"In autumn we shall be no more."

"Next month," said a lively old gentleman, who was their friend, "my grandchildren, Alfred and Signild, come to me. They are good and beautiful; not, indeed, like the angels, but, believe my spectacles and my heart, not far, not very far from it. Alfred shall be Ellna's husband; and the little Signild, who is the apple of my eye, Edward shall have for his wife. Quick and merry, like the chain in the quadrille, shall all go on in a twinkling,—falling in love, betrothal and marriage. And a little kingdom of heaven one shall then find here."

"Ah!" replied the angels, sorrowfully smiling, "we cannot be married, we must really die!"

And in all ways, and from all sides, came this death towards them sternly and severely, forbidding and disturbing all joy, and changing every thing into twilight and night.

And yet they must learn to love this death, which appeared to them so fearful.

Pain—the condition of life, and the terrible side of life—which hitherto had not ventured to approach these angelic beings, struck now its hymna-claws into their breast.

I had heard them say "we must die!" with an expression that bewailed "we must leave the festival!" Soon afterwards I heard them speak the same words, but in a tone which expressed, "we shall soon repose!"

Thank God, this time of suffering was of short duration; repose came before the grave, and only a slow, almost painless wasting away, led them unobservedly down to the shore of life, where they might still gather a few flowers.

In the mean time they had suffered, gained experience, and from before their eyes vanished the fading prism which had clothed the whole world with purple.

They looked around them, and the paradise had vanished,—they saw tears, crimes, sufferings, circumstances of terror, for the alleviation of which they stretched out their feeble hands in vain. Human misery, with whose significance they were now first acquainted, raised itself like a dark image of horror, and spread a veil of mourning over the whole beautiful earth.

"People suffer," said they, "animals suffer; all that breathe suffer, or must suffer—it is not good to be here—this is the home of suffering!" and they no longer wished to live—except, thought they, to be able to console a little and to help. "But that which we can do is really so very little!" and a melancholy glance of thought embraced the globe.

About this time a good, enlightened clergyman began to give them instructions in the religion to which they were baptized. In their angelically pure souls sprang up the heavenly seed, and bore a hundred fold, as if in the good earth of which the gospel speaks.

Their looks brightened by degrees with the increase of the light within them; they were often, it is true, cast down upon the earth, and they sighed, "this world is not good!" but they soon raised them beaming to heaven in the joyful feeling, "there is a better world!"

The night which had encompassed them for a time, became ever brighter and brighter, and glorious was the path which opened itself to them in the splendour of a celestial light. Thither they directed their looks, thither all their hopes all their desires. Presentiments of eternity penetrated them, and as they looked upon each other with a blessed smile, they whispered, "we are immortal."

When they, for the first time, had enjoyed the holy communion, peace alone was in their hearts, and the beam of their eyes was only a faint reflection of their inward brightness.

One anxiety, one only one, remained to them still, and this often expressed itself softly amid sweet tears, when they knelt adoringly before the eternal Fountain of Life; "O, our God," said they, "if thy love, thy power should sometime penetrate and surround us with brightness, like this glorious image of thee, how—how shall we be able to thank thee?"

So passed the summer, whilst the angels cheerfully and submissively, resigned day by day, flower by flower, the crown of life.

Autumn approached—with it, at the same time, the earthly transfiguration of the twins. The nights passed for them sleeplessly. When it was possible they passed them in the open air, where their oppressed lungs breathed more freely, and the moist coolness mitigated the fever that burned in their blood.

Whilst the August nights mildly and peacefully wrapped slumbering nature in mournful twilight, there burned in the souls of the dying brother and sister the clear torches of hope and of joy.

I have heard them, those words; I have seen them, those looks, full of immortality—for which there already existed no longer any night. And afterwards, for a long time, every thing in life seemed to me pale and colourless.

Autumn was come, feebly sank the lovely heads of the twins upon the cushions which were placed around them on the sofa, from which they were never more able to rise. Those who loved them, now counted the seconds.

Suffering themselves, Ellna and Edward sought, nevertheless, to comfort and to enliven the mourners whom they must leave. "We will watch over you," said they, "when we are angels,—we will entreat God for you."

They looked farewell upon all when they were no more able to speak; and when their weary eyelids closed, they blissfully smiled.

Towards the last, however, a troubling disquiet crept into their hearts. They feared that they might not die at the same time—might not pass away together to that home of light, of peace, and of joy, for which they alone longed.

Sitting near to each other, they watched with secret anguish in each other's countenance, the progress of the disease. "How brightly beam thy eyes," said Edward to Ellna. "Thy countenance has no longer anything earthly in it. It seems to me as if thou couldst spread forth glittering wings every morning, and float forth into the clear heaven, far, far from me!" And catching her round the waist, he pressed her to his heart with all the power of his feeble strength. Another time it was Ellna who said with a trembling voice, "Edward, how sunken are thy cheeks, how dim thy eyes! Oh, look at me! look at me! Thy breath becomes weaker—it ceases! Let me give to thee of mine—I have yet enough for us both." And seizing the head of her brother with her weak hand, she endeavoured, amid kisses, to communicate some of the feeble breath of life which she felt in her own breast.

Thus did the dying brother and sister endeavour to hold back, as it were, each other, whilst they felt how they were rapidly led forward by a mighty, invisible hand.

Friends, acquaintance, all who had known and loved the angels, assembled around them. As if to an altar, every thing which people thought pleasant and gladdening, was brought into their sick room. They did not give them, no, they offered to them, as it were, flowers, fruits, together with heartfelt wishes—honest tears—which were received by the twins with grateful smiles, and this promise—"we will soon pray for you!"

They placed harps in the room adjoining the sick chamber, and often played and sung them into quiet slumber. When people contemplated them in those moments when the soul had taken a freer flight into the spiritual land of dreams, wanting no longer time and space, but floating forth over wondrous lands, having a presentiment of their future free and beautiful existence—then they saw, in the indescribable expression of their calm features, that they were removed far, far from the earth, and that for them the eternity of bliss had already arrived.

In the evening, they sometimes said to each other, with gentle smiles, "Shall we wake to-morrow in heaven?"

During a tempestuous October night, sleep descended unusually quietly and mildly upon the loving angels. Counting every stroke of the clock, the mother and her friends watched in the quiet room.

"How well they sleep!" whispered they who ventured to speak. "It strikes twelve. See how they smile in delightful dreams! The morning dawns,—they yet sleep. The storm has ceased—heaven brightens—the day breaks beautifully,—yet they sleep. Hark! they sigh. Or was it the wind which passes the window?"

The sun ascended, carelessly shone the golden beams on the angel-faces of the twins. They sleep no longer. They were awake—but in heaven! Pure flames, kindled from the same spark, which had burned together; now also are they extinguished here upon earth at the same time!

They had been earthly angels, they are now heavenly; and when an unexpected consolation, an unexpected joy refreshes one who is troubled and cast down, he says, "They have prayed for me."

And their mother, their poor mother?

Do you see, by the wall of the churchyard, that female figure, which sits there upon a stone, as immovable as it? Negligently fall down upon her shoulders locks of grey hair—the wind plays with her tattered garments. She is old and stiff, but not merely through the influence of years. Do not pass coldly by—give her your sympathy—she will not much longer trouble you. Look at her crutches, at her dimmed eyes, at the pain of her silent mouth. Why does she sit here? Because she cannot be anywhere else. She is where her heart also tarries, by the grave of her children. Grief for them has troubled the light of her eyes and of her reason. She does not observe how the leaves of autumn fall around her—she feels not when the winds of spring melt the snow upon the grave,—but every day she goes there, and the summer's heat and the winter's cold find her alike unconscious. No one whom she knows speaks to her, and she speaks to no one. She has, nevertheless, an object; she waits—for what?—for death! Through the course of many years has she seen the graves around her open and receive weary wanderers to their quiet peaceful bosom—but she still sits a dead one among the dead, and waits.

Be ye saluted by me, mild breezes, which melt away the winter-snow; be thou saluted, bright spring-sun, which penetrates with warmth and life the dust of the grave! From the home of the dead, from the still churchyard, have I to-day saluted life. I love this peaceful place, where the unquiet, throbbing heart, where every thing, comes to repose. I also feel in a breast, which has not been able to wait the time, the unquiet captive, which now in pain, now in joy, throbs so restlessly and violently, and it does me good when I can think that a time will come, when mine also will be among the reposing hearts.

The larks sang in the clear air above the trees, on the grave of the twins. There sat, as before, the mother still and immovable upon a stone. A whistling wind passed over the churchyard, I saw a shudder thrill through her frame. I approached her, she bowed her head against one of the lime-trees on the grave, and still smiled. I saw with joy, that also her time of trial was at an end—that she waited no longer!

You beautiful flowers of the spring, now where the May sun calls you forth out of the renovated earth, cover and brilliantly adorn the grave which will no longer be moistened with bitter maternal tears!

Lovely lilies of the valley, soft periwinkle, grow upon the hillock—

"Even as the scar grows over the closed wound!"

THE SOLITARY.

We have many a time seen in a sterile wild spot, a lovely flower standing alone, surrounded and secluded there by unfriendly circumstances, ardently, but vainly seeking for the sun, in whose light thousands of her happier sisters rejoice themselves, but which the barren overhanging rocks will not allow to force its way to her. Becoming pale and powerless, the flower, by degrees, bows to the earth the head, which was created to be raised upwards, and at last conceals her evanescent being amid the gloomy circumstances which are guilty of her fate.

One eye, which has accidentally discovered the Solitary, rests upon her with a sort of pity, whilst thought inquires to what purpose, and why she stands there so without joy to herself, and joy to any one? These involuntary hermits of the world of flowers have their prototypes in a higher sphere, and something of these I expect to recognise in the one whose hand has penned down the following thoughts and features of a life not enlivened by many sunbeams.

It is no direct diary, no witty and interesting journal, that she has written,—ah, such are never written, except in the quiet hope, that a confidential friend will some time look through the lines which preserve the remembrance of our fate and our feelings, will sigh over our cares, rejoice over our joys, smile over our witty sallies, love and hate with us, in one word—feel with us, and thereby become more intimately united with us;—no, her unarranged thoughts were like withered leaves, which the autumn wind shakes from the trees and strews over the earth,—even as they are the offspring of feelings, which in no beloved breast on earth may hope to find echo more.

May 17th.

It is spring! From my window I see the clouds, chased by fresh gales, like glittering swans sailing away in the clear blue; yet above them I see the eagle soaring higher and higher forth into the path of light. Ah! that I could do as she!—would that I could feel warm life-dispensing spring air! How narrow and cold is it within here, how fresh and glorious there in the distance, where the crimson of morning stands! I would—ah, know I indeed rightly what I would?

"Secret and mysterious yearning,
From the soul's unfathomed depths,
Like a misty form ascending,
That is chased by quiet winds,
Floating in the farthest distance,
Thou dost draw me far off, far off,
Towards the undiscovered shores!

"Over life's rose-flowering gardens,
And her verdant groves of hope,
Thou dost lead me, and enfoldest
In dark grave-clothes, all the earth;
As the soul which, from home-sickness,
Wasteth in a foreign land,
Where it sees no single flower.

"On my mind with might thou seimest,
And dost call forth pensive tears
From a sweet and unknown sorrow;

And my heart, ah, how it beateth!
Will break forth from out its prison,
Will come forth to light and warmth,
Longing for another home!

"There, where from the flaming orient,
Gloriously ascends the morn;
There, where in the western cloud-land,
Sinks the golden torch of day,
Yearns my ardent soul to flee;
There, my urging spirit drives me,
Over land and over sea.

"Eagle, which so proudly soareth
To the golden sphere of light;
Fleecy cloud, which gentle breezes
Bear into the boundless space;
Tell me, in the far-off distance
Is it all so bright and glorious—
Reigneth freedom there and peace!

"Would I might, O bird, speed with thee,
On the fire-path of the sun!
Cloud, with thee that I might float forth
To the evening's purple shore,
And on gentle islands pillow'd,
Full of joy no tongue can speak,
Sing there my own cradle song!

"Thus I cried. Down to his cry,
From his sight the eagle flew:
In free space the cloud had vanished.
Lonesome stood I. And the wind played
With my wallings, as if sweeping
Over a sad Eolian-harp;
And in empty air they sounded,
Without echo, without answer!"

I have heard speak of ice-palaces, and I myself live in a moral ice-palace. The Count and the Countess, my gracious patrons, are statues of ice; and I, I am a poor flickering little flame lighted in one of the lamps of the saloon of the castle, which, by degrees, is going out, from frost and icy-breath.

O it must still be indescribably delightful to feel, to love, to live; in one word—to love.

I have, however, never loved anything else but my own fleeting ideal. Never shall I be able to see it realized upon earth!

I am to-day twenty years old. Who troubles themselves about it? Who offers to me a flower in my flowering-time! Ah, if nobody rejoices because one has been born, one might very well wish that it had never been so.

I would willingly purchase the caresses of a father and mother with my life. He who has never experienced their innocent delight, has been shut out from the Eden of childhood.

When I read in novels and plays, of children who, when arrived at mature years, have found again their parents whom they have long considered as lost, I sympathize with heartfelt emotion which carries me out of myself. I exclaim, "Father, mother!" open my arms and weep—and yet I know that mine sleep for ever.

All the people whom I know have something in the world about which they interest themselves, to which they attach themselves. They have parents, they have children, brothers and sisters, relatives, friends, or, in necessity, a dog, a cat, a bird; in short, some sort of creature for which they live, to which they are useful, and which requites, with devotion, the care and tenderness that is shown to them. Or they have an occupation, an object; in one word, a something which enlivens the present, and opens the future.

I wonder very much sometimes, for what purpose and wherefore I was born. If I were to question the Baroness about this, she would reply: "To sew for me, to be at hand when I ring my silver bell, to assist me at my toilet, to make of an evening the fourth at my card-table,—and besides this, to exercise my patience." Good heaven! am I too proud, if I think such an object mean and miserable?

Some people have an interest in life, which I do not envy them—namely, to quarrel with one another. That is the pleasure of the Count and the Countess, as soon as they meet for the day; or I fancy that they seek one another only to give each other this refreshment. In one thing only do they agree, and that is, to reprove me severely for the least error.

If I were placed by fate in a condition to rule over others—for example, in the place of the Countess—how would I carefully avoid severity and sternness in the reproofs and corrections which I found it necessary to give to my servants and dependents, especially to those who lived in my family! Their negligences would in the whole be so trifling to me, in comparison so wholly insignificant; because, even if they did occasion me a little inconvenience,—yet they could neither disturb the peace of my heart, nor cost me painful tears,—nor depress and molest my temper; whilst, on the contrary, my severity all too easily could make the faulty person feel all these evils. It is one of the great problems of life, not to occasion suffering to others, and even the most subtle syllogisms cannot find an excuse for those who have wounded the heart of a fellow-creature. For their own sakes also, those who have power should be kind and considerate towards their dependents. People may be often better served in trifles when they are more feared than loved; but how small is this gain in comparison with the loss, as is shown in all accidental important occasions. Then the devoted servant soon shows himself as a friend, and he who is obedient out of fear as an enemy.

To play at cards every evening from seven o'clock till ten with three persons, who like the Count, the Countess, and the old President M—, incessantly quarrel over their game and their counters (for we do not play for money), is a mortal pastime. The kings and the honours are to me actual murderers of pleasure. This evening occupation makes me feel still more intolerably how the whole day is for me like the—

Poor little bird with fettered wings! In vain thou attemptest to soar away—thou escapest not—thou feelest for what thou wast created—thou wouldst, like thy fellows, bathe thyself in the pure, sunny atmosphere; like them sing thy airy freedom—and thou art fettered to the dust. Painful, painful is thy condition. So also is the condition of him who, with the ideal of perfection and felicity in his breast, bound by the fetters of mediocrity, yearningly goes about, yearningly strives, combats, wearies himself, hopes and despairs, and at last sinks down beneath the immovably burdening hand of fate. With a thousand noble powers of activity within his soul, he sees every way to self-formation and usefulness closed against him—

Impatience is a painful feeling. In order to suffer less, let us be patient.

If I could only do good in some way I would not complain. But I can—do nothing, nothing. In order to be completely captive, in addition to the walls of a prison, one must be a woman, must, like me, be poor and dependent. I know that in this respect I have many sisters of destiny in the world. O my poor friends! how gladly would I be able to console you! But, ah, I also am a fainting pilgrim in the wilderness,—I would extend to you a refreshing draught—and have not one drop of fresh water for myself.

When a person has deeply felt one single affliction, he understands all other sufferings.

I see two pictures, two sides of life—as unlike to each other as day and night are. On the first, what life, what pomp of colouring! The altars of love and of domestic happiness stand there garlanded with eternally fresh flowers. Beneath the shadow of laurels and palms, the fine arts exercise their delightful play, and drink freely, from the glorious, richly changing world which surrounds them, the nectar of inspiration. The sciences take their pleasurable, peaceful way to sunny heights. Every thing lives, moves, mounts upwards, goes forwards, becomes clearer, purer, more significant. From order, beauty, and the dominion of the great whole, every lesser part unfolds itself in the fullness of life, of grace and freedom. Nothing is mean, powerless, and heavy. On the contrary, all is great, rich, and points to immortality. Even misfortune has glory; it has its honour, its song of victory. The lightnings of the tempest, and the quiet magnificence of a bright sun, light up alternately the scene, and lend to it constant majesty. The second picture—behold a gloomy, misty autumn day,—behold weary wanderers, who, upon a wild, stony heath, seek for a resting-place. They would make a fire to warm themselves by, but a still, icy penetrating drizzling rain extinguishes the flame, and at last, even every glimmering spark in the ashes. Behold wretchedness become so wretched that it loses compassion for itself; behold how misfortune hardens the unfortunate against others, who are as unfortunate as themselves. Behold disgust, life-weariness,—behold—ah no, rather behold it not! close, if it be possible to thee, thy eyes, thou whose life resembles this picture. Mist and clouds that whirl above us,—ah! sink deeper down, and conceal from us the horrors which surround us, and our desolate, awful path.

Year after year goes on slowly. To me they are all like gloomy autumn-days.

Reproofs? for what reason? I do not deserve them. I complain indeed not. No expression of discontent, no murmur escapes my lips. I am thankful for the maintenance which is given to me (out of charity they say). I am obedient, submissive, I endeavour to fulfil all which is required from me. But I am not cheerful, they say, not merry; I always let my head hang down. Ah, if I must look cheerful, let them give some joy to my heart! I have, however, in order to please those to whom I owe obedience, studied before the glass, that I might find out the look which would give to my countenance the most cheerful and contented expression. At last, I am obliged, in contemplating these mournful, compulsory smiles, to weep right bitterly.

I read lately in a book, a sort of treatise on moral health, full of good advice against the sickness of the soul: "if thy condition be too oppressive, and thou feelest thyself unhappy in it,—then change thy condition." Would he indeed be unfortunate if he could do this?

Ah, I am of genteel birth, and the proud, distant relatives who, after the death of my parents, took the orphan in the cradle, have the right of parents over me, although they have never shown to me their tenderness. Still, however, they have placed themselves as such. I must either submit to them, or be ungrateful,—I have no other choice. Besides this, where could I go?

Marry—and marry M——? Never! I am not romantic; but esteem and friendship I must be able to cherish towards my husband, if I would find a shadow of happiness in marriage. M—— is avaricious, has a hard heart, and is always in ill-humour,—qualities which are intolerable to a wife who has a heart. Besides this, he seeks not a friend in me, not a true companion in joy and suffering, not an affectionate wife—but only a housekeeper—and some one who will bear his ill-humours and his oddities without murmuring. And I should take such a husband, only to get married—never, never at all! I am too good for that,—I feel my womanly worth too well, and never can nor will (let others do what they may) regard myself as a piece of merchandise. Most cordially do I compassionate those who, in a condition like mine, only to change this, accept of offers which are good in the opinion of the world, but which in reality are wanting of what is most necessary to a happy marriage—namely, all that can ennoble the heart and make it happy. Sooner or later the blinded ones discover that they have only exchanged a less suffering for a greater one.

Ardent, warm souls must find in marriage the supremest happiness or misery.

I must hate all that is mean and contemptible. I feel that I should hate M., and know not how miserable and contemptible I myself might not in the end become as his wife. I recollect having read some verses of Haug, which, with a little alteration, may be turned to my thoughts.

HE.

Oh women, ye were angels to the lover,
And now are devils when the wedding's over!

SHE.

Why then it is, is not so hard to tell,
That which appeared a heaven we find a hell.

In the original, she is the complainant, and he gives the reply. But that which one sees every day is, that a bad, immoral man, ruins the character and the temper of his wife. People accuse many women of falsehood and craft, people deplore the same faults in certain oppressed nations. The answer to the one and to the other contain, at the same time, the explanation and the excuse:

"We have had tyrants for our masters."

Before I would be obliged to excuse myself in such a manner, I would rather preserve unchanged my joyless uniform life to the end of my days. Life is really not so long.

A year is passed since I wrote these words, "Life is really not so long." Ah, life, nevertheless, is long; its minutes seem eternities when one suffers, when one is pressed down with life-weariness. And must we not become so, when everything resembles an eternal no to all our wishes and our wants?

I feel it deeply. In order to endure life, an affectionate heart requires the love and tenderness of his fellow-creatures—even as necessarily as meat and drink for the sustaining of the body.

O the heart that is condemned to throb forever unresponded to! Hidden existence, which gave motion to it—in mercy let it cease to beat!

People should never contend about the misfortune, about the pain which others feel. We suffer in such different ways, and from so many different kinds of causes; we are so dissimilarly organized, and the relations of outward circumstances to our inward, our feelings, our capacities, are manifold and so various, that it is almost impossible for one person to judge of the condition of another. Where, also, we see suffering, we should reverence it, if we are not so happy as to be able to alleviate it.

Not long since, I heard one knowing female friend admonish another, less knowing, and yet less fortunate friend: "Thou hast, indeed, committed no crime; thou canst not feel remorse; thou hast, indeed, no cares; thou hast clothes and maintenance provided for thee. About what, in all the world, needest thou disquiet thyself? Thou fanciest thyself only to be unhappy; chase away thy diseased thoughts, and thou wilt become as cheerful as me. Everybody has their cares. Perfection is really not promised to us on earth. One must use one's reason, and drive fancies out of one's head, as other people do."

The friend who was comforted in this way was silent; but looked, spite of it, more dejected than before. In her place, I should have answered, "It is true, of all the evils which thou hast named, I know none; but my unhappiness, therefore, is not the less real—it lies here in this weak, diseased heart, which I did not give to myself, and which painful gift heaven has spared thee. But precisely for that reason thou canst not judge me; and it would be just as consequent to deny the possibility of my headache because thou dost not feel it, as the pang of my heart because thou dost not understand it. Thou—but to what purpose can a longer answer tend, where my knowing friend would only shrug her shoulders? I will rather undertake in thought the part of comforter, but perform it in a different way. I would go to the sufferer and say, 'Rest upon me, we will weep together.'"

M. has been married for some time. His wife is very unhappy. I hope, however, that her rapidly-increasing illness will soon release her from the horrible life which awaits her in an unhappy marriage.

I cannot devote one moment of the day to reading. The Countess cannot bear that I should read in her presence. For that reason I spend one or more hours of the night in so doing, and these are the only ones which afford me any enjoyment of soul.

Many a gentle word, rich in consolation, has in these hours been spoken to the solitary forlorn—one by pure spirits, who have understood in their sensitive hearts all the suffering of weak humanity. Especially rich in consolation are these words, because they say to the unfortunate, "I understand thee!" It is to one, as if bewildered in a horrible desert, one heard all at once the beloved tones of a friend's voice. Then I often stretch forth my hands to the home of the noble departed, and exclaim, "O friend, thou who hast felt with me—hast suffered with me—send down for my refreshment a breath of the eternal rest which is now become a part of thee." But, ah! no tranquillizing breath comes to us from the land of spirits—and perhaps also no eye sees from thence. I believe, too, that it is well it should be so. In order to be perfectly happy in another world, the glorified must be withdrawn from the view of misery.

"But, ah, if the same voices, which are silenced in death, yet so piercingly exclaimed, 'We suffer!' could once whisper to us from the opened clouds, 'We are comforted!'—how much fewer bitter tears of despair would flow.

Ye dead! it may be your business to console mortals.

Why are there in our country no religious communities like those, which in other countries offer to the unhappy, who need them so much, respectable, sacred places of refuge? They might, indeed, be so well instituted that they would in no way oppose the laws of our religion and of sound reason. They might be what they should be,—sacred asylums for the unhappy, the forlorn,—for the erring who, repentant, wished to turn back to goodness,—for all those who from one cause or another are isolated in the world, who live without a determined object, without activity and without joy, and who theretofore become every day more unhappy and less innocent.

All these should come together and form a great family, which, guided by wise laws, devoted itself exclusively to the purpose of honouring the Highest in the most agreeable manner—namely, by affectionate, active assistance to all necessitous persons, all such as are unjustly dealt by, all who are forlorn and unprotected;—which object of this great family, that for the most part would probably consist of indigent persons, would only be obtained by united and prudently directed powers.

Here, those without relatives and friends would knit among themselves the holy and affectionate bond of the heart, and would find, mother, sister, and friend,—would by their side, and in noble emulation with them, clothe and instruct the neglected child, tend the sick, comfort the mourners,—in one word, might so live each day, that in the evening they would be able to say, "It was not lost." Here might she who had gone astray turn back to virtue and to God, begin a new life and a new happiness, might feel the peace of innocence and the encouraging joy of virtue. Here might the unhappy one who is embittered by the world and man, find a home full of love and gentleness and good spirits, whose harmonious voices would soon pour peace and rest into the wounded heart. Here might the noble one, who in a brilliant sphere had felt her heart contracted by the nullity and the misery of the great world, descend, and, in the peaceful shades of a quiet, but useful life, become really great. The ardent, the passionate, to whom nature gave the soul of Alexander, and fate gave only fetters, whose eccentric power consumed themselves and others, would here let their flames burn upon the altars of devotion and benevolence, and feel in the joy of voluntary renunciation that the thorny garland of a saint is a lofter, a more beautiful object of endeavour, than worldly greatness, than the world's song of praise, and that renown which yet reaches not to the stars. Here might all those who by nature, by fortune, or by the world, have been treated with severity, be embraced as by a heavenly mother, who, full of mild seriousness and pure love, would lead her children by a quiet, happy, and virtuous life to the eternal home, where love, truth, and felicity first meet with their prototype. O beautiful and blessed life—noble institution—innocent charming dream—would that it could some time be realized!

I have sometimes a feeling of bitterness, which I seek to overcome—of envy, which I seek to destroy in its first shoots. But ah, how much does it not cost to preserve oneself good and gentle, when daily and hourly a thousand trifles, like pricking needle-points, irritate to displeasure and indignation. Neither should I have strength to be so, if many a time a single prayer for strength and patience did not lend it to my breast,—if many a time the reading of a good book did not call forth observations in my soul which elevate it above the nothingness of this world. But ah! it sinks again.

If I might, however, only breathe a little fresh air. The sun shines so magnificently—the air is so clear—the snow so white! O if I could for a few minutes be in the country—see the dark green woods, and hear their sighing—could speed across snow-covered plains—breathe of the clear light air;—in one word, could see free nature and feel myself free—how happy I should be!

Had not illusions, the enchanting, deceitful sirens, filled the ardent fancy of my ardent childhood—had I not desired so much from fate—then I could better have endured that cold life which is become my lot. That early novel-reading, how much poison it lays in young minds! What young girl of seven or ten, that is only gifted by nature with ordinary attractions—that has a warm heart—and what heart is indeed cold at seventeen!—and has read novels, plays, and romantic poems—does not see, with entire certainty in herself, the some-time heroine in a novel, a poem, nay, even in a tragedy? The death of a tragedy-heroine is so fearfully beautiful, so sublime, so admired, so wept over, that it appears quite enviable; and sometimes the young reader weeps with indescribably painful joy over herself and her sublimely moving future fate, in the girl murdered by the hand of her lover.

Now steps the young girl out into life, and expects, with strained impatience, to see it move around her full of love, full of great and beautiful actions, and rich in sentiments and events; and finds, often only what I have found, poverty in every thing; and could almost fancy that a hostile fairy had suddenly changed the enchanting magic palace into a horrible, fearful prison. Her brilliant, varnished morning dream, has embittered to her the whole day.

If I were an instructress, I would, above all things, endeavour to defend my young pupils from that which, in the beginning, could excite and heat the imagination. I would endeavour to prevent, in every way, their adorning life with flowers which it did not possess, that they might be able some time to gather the few which it actually has. Therefore, my little friends, you must labour early to exercise your young powers upon that which lies near to you, and is useful and good within your sphere. When you are become older, you must labour still more and truly with attention and zeal—must never dream over life, but must use it, and at the same time enjoy it. Many grown-up people resemble the child who wept because it could not have the moon,—these are they who have early begun to seek for their happiness in the clouds.

Often, when I hear tell how one or another has met with a joyful change or an unexpected piece of good fortune—when I see how spring follows winter, and makes it forgotten; how sunshine succeeds to rain, calm to tempest,—there awakes in me too a joyous feeling, and I think, "All things change; all things upon earth change, like the earth itself; also for me will there probably some time be a change too." Hope is a fountain, whose secret and hidden veins well forth eternally in the human breast.

But when I hear of disappointed hopes, of wishes never fulfilled, of prisoners for a lifetime, then my courage sinks, and I ask myself why should it go better with me than with others?

Sleep, ye feelings, wishes, hopes—sleep, and leave me at rest!

To lose interest in oneself, and in all that surrounds one, is to be sure sad, but yet at last it is always a kind of rest.

You say that the country is beautiful, that life there is pleasant, that you are happy, that you are beloved. I believe it—I believe it; so much the better for you, but what good is it to me?

No! and should I also feel my privations a thousand times more deeply, still I will not, I could not become cold or indifferent to the happiness of my neighbour. O love, enjoy, and rejoice yourselves! Let every thing, to the very smallest worm, pant with joy, and only I, I alone, possess nothing, I will praise thee, God of goodness!

He too, who seems to me so great and good; he, that worthy image of God upon earth—may he be happy! would that I could purchase for him, by my life full of renunciation, a life for him full of affluence and heavenly joy!

And how? should I then indeed be unhappy!

Since I see him, hear him, some changes have taken place in me. The air is clearer—lighter.

Why does my heart beat when I hear his step, his voice even at a distance? Why do I become so painfully embarrassed when he approaches me? Why do I feel my cheeks burn?

His countenance is proud but gentle; his whole being full of a noble consciousness; it shews itself in his bearing, in his gait, in his unconstrained and graceful movements; one sees, one feels, that he has the consciousness of making by his exterior an agreeable and respect-inspiring impression, and precisely on that account he never thinks about it—and on that account it operates so certainly. The forehead is lofty and free, the eyes flash with fire and brightness, the nose is easily and lightly arched,—in all his features, in his whole deportment, is revealed the development of a free, powerfully, beautiful nature, which has only sought through the outward a significant expression of the inward. Freshness and life pervade his conversation as well as his countenance, and when he speaks, one feels that the fires of truth and goodness which sparkle in his eyes, dwell also in his soul. His voice is sometimes, perhaps, too strong and loud for the tone of conversation, but it raises itself upon the fire-pinnions of thought and of feeling. It proceeds from a breast in which no single feeling is stifled or fettered. It is the voice of freedom, and seems made to speak for her. Thus nobly, thus beautifully gifted by nature and fortune, ought he not also to be good? Yes! he is good—good as I image to myself the angels. This eye which can so coldly and calmly see danger and death approach, that glances with such defiance and scorn on tyrants and voluntary slaves—this eye has also tears of sympathy for the sufferings of a child, for the quiet pain of a woman. And should he not be good when he is so superior, so admired, so beloved! Elected to be king, he might perhaps forget his crown!

By the side of this glorious image I have, for the sake of the remarkable contrast, placed another, and contemplated now the one, now the other. This image, which is related to the first, like the shadow to the light, is my own. My deportment is dejected, it betrays the condition of my soul. My movements are, especially in his presence, often constrained and childish; this proceeds in part from the consciousness of my few charms,—in part from silly shame, which infuses into me a stupid vanity on account of my dress, which is almost mean, in comparison with that of others in my condition of life. I venture to speak but little, and when I speak my voice is low, and my words are often certainly inarticulate, because they have been accustomed to be silenced so severely; perhaps also, because his eagle-glance rests so attentively upon me, and he bends himself forward to listen to me. My eyes—earlier they had fire, expression, and animation, were clear and blue as the heaven—now they are feeble, without colour and expression—they resemble extinguished flames. Earlier my countenance had life and freshness,—now that gray-yellow colour, which indicates my past life, has spread itself by degrees all over it, and has chased away every grace. I could formerly laugh—I have forgotten how. My smile is melancholy. It is a pale, autumn-like sunshine, which speedily hides itself in dark clouds. Worn by perpetual labour, and combating against the ever growing desires after a brighter and more friendly life, a certain indifference and coldness has by degrees overcome my soul—I have lost interest in myself and my own fate. I have by degrees carried my hopes to the grave, and every one has taken with it something of my life into the grave.

He is good—too good! Like the sun which rejoices with its light even the smallest flower, he wishes by his fire, his fresh spirit, his cheerfulness, to enliven even me. But ah! the most beautiful sun cannot bring again life to the flower which, already withered, has sunk its head to the earth.

He is very well read, has travelled much, has seen much, heard, perceived, and thought; it is, therefore, not to be wondered at that his words are rich in meaning. When I have quietly listened to him with rapture for whole hours, it is to me as if I heard beautiful music, whose pure changeful melodies open to me an inner world full of rich infinite feelings.

Besides this, every thing, as well what concerns things as ideas, becomes to me clearer and more distinct, as if in a dark gloomy picture gallery all at once the day burst in and lighted up the pictures, the subjects of which I before had only darkly imagined. And if he turn himself to me whilst he unfolds his rich noble ideas, and full of goodness inquires, "Is it not so? do not you think so too?"—then he reads, probably in my eyes, my quiet admiring answer.

He spoke yesterday of his childhood. He has been caressed by father and mother; he was carried about in their arms, upon their hearts; and I!—when I was a child, when I became older, now even, always—always was my caressing hand, my loving heart repelled. Well then, rejected and yet proud heart, cease to proffer thyself yet farther; and if thou must love nevertheless, break amid thy own throbblings rather than betray thyself, rather than place thyself in danger of being anew rejected, despised.

Quiet nights, why do ye no longer vouchsafe to me peaceful beneficial sleep? And thou, my heart, why dost thou throb so?

A certain agreeable consciousness awakens sometimes in me. I am then not so mean—not so altogether insignificant in the eyes of another! He shews me esteem, nay attention; he places value on my judgment; he encourages me to cultivate my talents: but that is done only out of goodness, out of heavenly compassionate goodness. God bless him!

It is too late, too late, merciful passer-by. Dost thou not see that the frost of many nights has lain upon the plant? Never again will it raise its head.

My daily prayer,—that which gives to me the greatest pleasure, is: "O God, give to him every thing, which thou hast found it good to withdraw from me!"

What joy, to pray for those whom one loves! What joy it is for me, to think, that my feeling for him should assume the form of a guardian angel, to turn from him a danger, to lead to him a blessing!

But never, never shall he suspect how much I have loved him! Never shall he direct to me a contemptuous, pitying glance! It would be to me a dagger-blow!

I will burn these papers, my only confidants; and my heart shall be the quiet grave of my feelings.

O death! merciful death, why comest thou not? How delightful to me would be the waiting of thy refreshment-bringing pinions!

I have had to-night a strange, but beautiful dream. It seemed to me that I walked in a garden full of flowers. It was spring; the birds sang, the heaven was clear, the air mild and pure, all was beautiful around me—but I did not feel myself happy. I wandered softly along and looked towards Alfred, who walked in the same direction with myself, but upon another path, separated from me by a little stream, whose silver waves sprang forward one over another, and whispered, "How charming, how charming, it is to rock upon cool waves!"

And I was obliged to repeat for myself, "How charming, how charming!" Alfred also looked incessantly towards me, and it seemed to me that our looks by degrees began to beam.

All at once he went down to the shore, and stepped into a little boat which floated across the stream, and suddenly paused at my feet. Alfred reached forth his hand to me to enter. I would not, and wept, I knew not rightly why. Then he took my hand, and drew me with gentle force near him in the boat. I wept still, but felt myself not unhappy.

Then began the boat, as if guided by invisible hands, to move itself, and rocked lightly and pleasantly down the stream, whilst the silver-waves splashing leapt around it and sang melodiously, "How charming it is, to rock together upon cool waves!" I wept no longer.

Alfred and I talked with each other, and that which we said enchanted us. We floated softly away under balsamic-breathing flower-arches of lilacs and roses. The flowers loosened themselves from their stems and fell down upon us, whilst voices from them whispered, "How blessed it is to love one another, and to be united!" and we repeated amid joyful feelings, "How blessed!" Then came the night, but a night without darkness, for all the flowers began to shine in their bright colours, and every wave looked upward with a little bright shining diamond in its point. Above our heads floated a light cloud, from which beamed millions of stars. All at once Alfred said, "See there the grave!" And before us I saw something dark, formless, horrible, into which we were hastily driven. I felt, however, no fear. Then something like the wafting of a wing touched our eyelids, and we slept. But our sleep had lovely dreams, and we ceased not to see one another. Then it was to me, as if a gentle kiss was pressed upon our lips, a kiss like that with which a mother awakens her sleeping child, and we awoke. A beaming morning-red surrounded us. We held one another by the hand, and ascended ever higher and higher into an atmosphere of rose-odour. I felt my being light and ethereal. Every particle of heaviness, of depression, of discomfort, was vanished; I felt it was for ever. In a sea of crystal clearness, which lay below us, our figures were reflected, and I saw myself so beautiful that it enchanted me; "Now, for the first time," thought I, "I am worthy of him!"

In the midst of the transporting feeling of a pure and increasing joy, stole suddenly the thought through my soul, "If all this should be only a dream, and I should wake no more in dream, but in reality!" Ah, truly, all was only a dream. I perceived all at once the cry of the night-watch. "The clock has struck one!" and the bell of the Countess which called me to her. The Countess fancied she heard a mouse in her sleeping room, and would allot to me the part of a cat, which I perform extremely unskillfully.

Great misfortune enhances the powers of the soul; she mounts up to heaven from the flames of combat. It is an apotheosis, although upon the wings of the tempest. But those hourly depressing, consuming cares and disagreeables, those vexations, the cancers of life and joy, O how do they not oppress the children of the dust—yet deeper into the dust!

I had just now a moment of quiet satisfaction. What was the cause of it I do not rightly know. I was alone; the sun shone into my little chamber; I felt its warmth with pleasure; the shadow of a budding lilac played in the sunshine upon the green wall. I thought upon him—on his goodness. I observed a little cloud, which at some distance from the sun floated lightly by, and said to myself, "Thus will my life creep on! Yes, ephemeral being, soon wilt thou be no more, and thy pain, thy love, will leave behind them upon earth just as little trace as this little cloud in the blue field of heaven. I shall be no more,—suffer no more. Peaceful thought!"

I am in the country! For the first time in many years, and that truly through his kind mediation, I find myself in a good, cheerful, and in every respect amiable family. Here constantly assemble themselves the people of the neighbouring residences. They play, sing, dance, talk, and laugh, the whole day long. I am dazzled, like one who comes out of the darkness and suddenly is met by a strong sun-light. Even as the eye then experiences pain, so does my heart now. I am not ungrateful,—but I feel myself solitary; I am not happy—and never shall be so!

I am a dissonant tone in the joyous harmony which rules here; that I feel in myself most of all.

Seldom have I seen so amiable, interesting a person as the twenty-years-old Camilla. She and her good sisters endeavour to cheer and enliven me in every possible way; but they are—ah, they are too joyous, too happy! they are innocent children of the light; they have not had a presentiment of the mystery of pain. I have endeavoured to fall in with their amiable labours; but my smile has perhaps not been right joyous, and one of the tears which I often feel to fill my eyes has perhaps, against my will, rolled down my cheek, and been seen; or my deportment, reserved, through habit, repels them; in short, I see that they are not at home near me, and feel themselves restrained in their innocent animation; and they would certainly leave me to my own mournful self, if they were not prevented doing so by their goodness and politeness.

'Ah, what has the owl to do among the larks? Terrify and silence their innocent songs? No; it is better that it return to its own dark nest.

My name's day. I had forgotten it. Camilla and her sisters surprised me with flowers and songs; they crowned me with flowers, embraced me, besought me to be gay,—said that they loved me. Amiable, merciful Samaritans, if indeed your anxious labours cannot heal the wounds of the sufferer, yet she will never forget to bless you for your goodness.

He reproached me with gentleness for my reserve. He wished I would seem joyful. I will attempt it.

Last evening Camilla sung. He stood behind her chair. When she had finished, she turned herself half round, looked up at him modestly blushing, and asked—"Was not this the piece which you wished for?" I did not hear his half-aloud spoken reply, but I saw his beaming eye meet hers which she cast down. Why did she cast it down? Beautiful, graceful Camilla! Look up gratefully to heaven, if thou perceive that feeling in his eyes which I read in thine.

His looks follow her. That is not to be wondered at. She is a rose in her full bloom, lovely, good, and joyous. He gave her a nosegay lately of heliotrope, and a bee crept out of the flowers and flew to me, who sat at a distance, and stung me in the hand. I repressed with difficulty an exclamation of pain, but yet I did it. I would not have disturbed the two at any price, they looked so amiable and happy. I can give no joy, but neither will I disturb any.

And for that reason I must very soon return to my gloomy home. That is now more suitable for me.

I have endeavoured to give him a pleasure. I have arranged and adorned Camilla's brown hair, which of all the attractions that she possesses, is the one upon which she bestows least pains. I have succeeded.

He is ill! and I cannot approach him—not watch over him!

He is better. Tears of anxious pain, tears of joy, which I was unable to keep back—ye have betrayed me! But thou, Camilla, dost thou think that thy paleness, thy red eyes, have remained unobserved?

He entered, we suspected it not; he seized our hands—thanked us for our anxiety, our sympathy. What I did I know not; but Camilla saw that I trembled.

Yes, I will hence—to hide myself from him, from the whole world, from myself!

I am again in my former home. It is better for me here,—I fancy that here I am stronger.

He must know it—he has seen that which he is to me. And then? Should he know it always. He would not boast of it in vanity—for that he is too great, too noble! He would mourn over me; his pity would not be heavy to me to bear, like the pity of the world. I should regard it like the compassion of a higher spirit, which looked down upon a weaker being.

Wherefore comes he to visit our joyless house, to enliven it with his presence? It is done from compassion for me;—does he think that I could not live without his glance? Oh, he deceives himself! Life can as it were nourish itself with renunciations.

Or perhaps he foresees that when he is separated from me, I shall find myself doubly solitary, and seeks now to strengthen my soul, that I may bear it? Therefore he comes again—therefore he speaks—in order to raise me to the strength of mind, to the repose which he himself possesses.

Therefore he exercises my voice, encourages me to cultivate my understanding, to seek for knowledge. But in my condition that is impossible; and besides this, how could it benefit me—will it make me happier?

Yes; I understand him and his angelic goodness. He has seen that he also was appointed by heaven to strike a wound into my heart; he knows it, and sought to prepare me for it; he would, if possible, alleviate it, make it imperceptible; he will divert my thoughts, will prepare pleasure for me—ah! he knows me not!

He is too good! It seems to me as if he pressed the dagger only deeper into my heart; but he knows what is best for me—and I kiss the hand which gives me death!

Ah, why so much kindness to-day, if he will set off to-morrow?

He has asked my hand—heavenly powers! He and—I!

I have refused his hand, with thankful words; but decidedly have I refused his hand! My heart beats with pain and proud delight! I have refused it, because I love him better than I love myself; his happiness I prefer to mine a thousand times, and could give him no greater proof of this, than that I would preserve him from a wife who is not in a condition to make him happy. Ah, I must weep!

Would not death by the side of life throw over this its dark shadow? I will be just towards myself. I am not in every thing unworthy of his choice. My life, my heart, are pure—and this heart loves him;—my soul glows for truth and virtue,—I am not conscious of one mean feeling—but ah, for the rest how little am I formed to beautify his noble life! My outward youth is vanished, still more so my inward. This spring of the soul, which sometimes however can recall the early withered flowers of the other. All my eager lively talents are chilled and dead. It is always to me as if there rested a heavy, stiff, iron hand upon my breast. I have felt too deeply the desolate emptiness, the gloomy melancholy of life. The bitterness of certain moments will never leave my memory. Never shall I regain that mood of mind, that freedom from care, which causes one to laugh so heartily—to be joyful,—in one word, to forget the future in the present hour. How bitterly should I have felt by his side—adoring him as I now do—my inability to give and to receive pleasure. I should, like Abbadona, feel my inward darkness, and thereby become still darker.

My health is weakened and I greatly err if my chest is not affected.

Besides, what should I be in those circles where rank, mind, and talents, as well as his own inclination, call him, with my small education, my wholly inward poverty, my want of agreeable properties;—a despised nullity, and a being whose audacious pretensions would there, where she is not in her place, make her appear with justice an object of ridicule. A wife without charms, sickly, melancholy, and who, because she felt all this, became thereby yet more dejected; that would be the sweet reward which fortune would have given for his magnanimity; that would be the only comfort for his pains, for the enlivening and joy of his life! Ah, he would hundreds of times have repented his choice in his own heart! And the kinder, the more considerate he might have been towards me, for that reason should I have been all the more unhappy. Yes; I feel that, pressed to his heart, out of the very despair of not being able to make him happy, I might have murdered myself. O that thou whom I so inwardly, so infinitely love, couldst but read my heart! Would that my constant, my warm prayer might call down upon thee that happiness which I cannot give thee!

He has never loved me; no spark of love conducted him to me; only for a moment could I deceive myself about it—the dream vanished—all became clear,—I saw what I had to do—and God and my love lent me strength to act properly.

It was only noble, heavenly compassion which led him to me—only goodness,—it deserved to be rewarded! A sweet, proud feeling overpowers my heart, when I think, “the noblest man would have raised me up to himself,” and I have treated him worthily! Yes; he has raised me!

I cherished in me the belief, that the charming Camilla will, at one time, vouchsafe to him all that which it was not in my power to give. Pale, trembling Camilla! perhaps very soon will the flowers of joy and love glow upon thy gentle cheeks. Thou never shalt learn for what thou hast to thank me. And thou, Alfred, when the joy of heaven swells in thy noble breast, thou wilt no longer think of me; but I—I will think on thee.

And when I have finished my laborious course through life, may I then be able to say, “I have made two human beings happy!”

I see him no longer. How dark is every thing around me here! but I have willed it,—and I am contented.

My thoughts accompany him with benedictory wishes,—day and night, in the morning as in the evening, accompany him.

My presentiment is about being fulfilled. Camilla is Alfred's happy bride. How will her lovely intellectual eyes beam! O may they be happy! Hear me, Giver of all felicity—no supplication for myself shall longer weary thy goodness,—but make them happy—take every thing which I might yet have—ah, take my soul—and give, give to them all!

Let Camilla love him, even as I love him.

The bells ring! the bells ring! the great day is arrived—Alfred leads Camilla to the altar. How noble, how handsome he is! How lovely, how charming she,—how happy they both appear to be! “A noble pair,” whispered the people,—did

I hear it—or have I read it somewhere? I do not know. The day is beautiful—the spring-sun warm and bright. All is bright and peaceful, my mind also,—I am happy and cheerful! No, it is not fever which colours my cheeks so crimson—it is joy—it excites my pulse—it makes my heart beat a hundred in a minute—hark! the bells ring. It is done; the clergyman has blessed them—and I too.

Now I am tranquil and alone, and quiet as the night, which reposes on all things; I pray in my heart for the happiness of those whom I so infinitely love. All that Providence does is good, is well—even pain has its repose, its end—my pain also will find this in his happiness; for which I in a courageous moment laid the foundation. O beloved of my heart, I believe, I know, that through thy happiness, I also shall be happy. When the sun of thy joy beams in its full splendid midsummer glory, its warmth will also reach to me, the one hidden in shade. I will be the distant echo of thy song of joy! Feel and call thyself happy—and I also will be happy—be joyful! and I also am—joyful; smile! and also I smile; thank God! and also I thank God; thank him inwardly.

(Poor fanatic! thy wings seem not long to have sustained thee. Under a later date, I find in the same hand which wrote this in joy and felicity, the following words, all the expressions of a quiet but broken spirit!)

January 2nd. My life is a feverish dream!

A better world—my most beautiful, my only hope!

(Years seem now to have passed on in which nothing is indicated; but from that which next follows, and with which a new epoch seems to have begun in the life of the Solitary, one may conclude that the angel of peace—whose palms, sooner or later, wave around the good, innocent sufferer—came nearer to her heart).

An infinitely sweet something has sunk into my heart. I know not what sentiment of peace, nay, of cheerfulness, attends me in my quiet wandering through the vale of life. And yet every thing around me here is unchanged, is cold; without joy, without love, as before. The change has taken place in myself. I expected my happiness from the world—and man; I was deceived, wounded and repelled; now I have alone turned myself to God, and begin to feel—that His peace is higher, greater than all the joy of the world.

A beautiful hyacinth, which blooms in my window, awoke in me cheerful feelings and thoughts. I see how it, unconsciously paying homage to the light and warmth, by degrees turns to the sun. The sun in return beams brightly upon it; opens, still operating, flower upon flower; lends to it colour, beauty, and fragrant odour. This to me is a clear image of the human and the divine. Eternal sun of love! I will, like the flower, humbly turn to thy light, in order to receive life and joy from thee, which thou alone canst give.

I come from church. I have wept much, and am yet become happier. The feeling of devotion is one of the most beautiful, most charming, which we can experience upon earth. It is not joy, not sorrow; but something that elevates us above both,—it is a momentary return of the soul to its true native home—a feeling which, more than every deep-thinking demonstration, convinces us that we are children of immortality.

The text was taken from the Woman of Canaan. The preacher took occasion therefore to represent how bread is often withheld from us that we may learn to satisfy ourselves with the crumbs,—and how a submissive and flexible spirit is productive of happiness to its possessor, and well-pleasing to God. It seemed to me, as if all this was emphatically spoken alone to me, and I acknowledged it as truth in my heart. Ah, this restless heart, that has desired with impatience so much from the world and from man, that wished so ardently to possess all the good things of life, how it has been obliged to give up its wishes! It has, by degrees, learned to please itself with the crumbs; but it is also humble, patient—and as I hope has become better,—and now first it enjoys the peace, the joy, after which it has striven so long, but in the wrong way. A flower, a bright day, an unexpected kind word—a lovely dream, a feeling of satisfaction, yes! a thousand little enjoyments, formerly not regarded by me, of which even the life most wanting in joy is not wholly deprived,—are now infinitely dear to me. I have by little and little learned to see how the true wisdom of human life consists in this, that it, like the bee, knows how to suck a drop of honey out of the smallest flower.

And if thou, lofty Director of my destiny, hast left me thus solitary upon earth for this purpose, that I may turn myself wholly to thee, and in thee find my all,—have I then, indeed, ground for complaint? If thou, All-merciful, wilt be to me father and mother, brother and sister, must not I then consider myself as blessed?

Why, ah why, have I not earlier sought my peace where I could alone find it? How many years of pain and depression might have been spared me, if I had earlier known how foolish it is to turn oneself for comfort and joy to the world and man.

Give, thou solitary forsaken one, thy heart to God; but with that deep serious will, which allows of no wavering, no return, no weakness. Learn to say, "Thy will be done, O Father!"—not merely with submission, but with love, with joy; and all despair, all depressing, hopeless pain, will for ever have vanished from thee!

When I in the evening lay myself down to rest, and the fatigues of the day and the unkind treatment of those for whom I have borne them have depressed my mind, I begin to pray "My Father!"—but scarcely have I said these words, scarcely has the feeling of their meaning penetrated my soul, than I weep the sweetest tears, and an infinite blessedness overcomes my whole being. My whole prayer then often consists of "My Father!" which I repeat many times; for they contain, as I feel them, every thing which I can express of childlike love, of inward confidence, of submissive hope, of devotional joy. Amid such feelings I fall calmly asleep,—and is it then indeed to be wondered at, if I believe myself cradled by the songs of angels?

Yes, I believe it—I must believe it—there is a comfort for every thing. There are beings more unfortunate than I have been, although the sensibility of my heart has increased suffering a thousand-fold for me. There is, for example, the neglected invalid, consumed by pain; the captive, without hope of deliverance, of whose only joy—a spider—an inhuman hand has deprived him. But could not they also look up to God, and say "Our Father!" And the criminal, who has deserved his sufferings—who is more unfortunate than he? But if he feel repentance he may be forgiven,—the prodigal son can arise and go to his Father. Can the child of an eternally good Father ever, indeed, feel despair? Ah! He who taught us to call God our Father, He alone knew the human heart, and knew how to give to it a never-failing consolation!

The dead have comforted the mortal; and the voices which have exclaimed, "We suffer!" have also exclaimed "We are comforted!" The Gospel is spread out to the human race, and has opened heaven to it; but a murmuring, dissatisfied heart knows it not.

But the vicious—the debased into animal rudeness—the millions who live in darkness, in the night of misery and of ignorance? Friendly stars! ye who shine so brightly—mystic lights of heaven, full of hope I glance up to you. Ye are worlds for hope—I regard ye as higher schools of education for the unhappy children of earth! Yes, confidently may one hope, God is indeed so all-good!

If our faith is firm, and our hope secured with a sure anchor, then is much won for our peace, and, in particular, heaven stands clear in our future; but, nevertheless, our hearts may still suffer much, and the burden of the day still appear intolerable, let human wisdom help it as it may. Defend us from discouragement—from the phantasmagoria of the imagination; and let us seek, every one for himself, the diversion of mind, the available little joys and springs of comfort, which lie so near to us, if we only look out for them. The great object is to preserve oneself good and pure, and then to suffer as little as possible. The means for that purpose are for all equally alike as different; but no one will miss them who has only his eyes open to see them.

Mercifully to direct the blind to them, ought to be the business of those whose lot it is on earth, so to say, to be eyes to the human race, to see for them and to teach them to see. O ye wise, ye noble and enlightened of the earth, be less of our schoolmasters, be more our comforters! Shew us the mysteries of consolation—give light to pain—teach every one how in his outward condition, and according to the nature of his inward, he may find alleviation for his sufferings! Noble physician of the soul, grow not weary in seeking out remedies for all her maladies! How many blessings then will follow your footsteps, your divine labours!

The years which I formerly found so long, now pass on rapidly as swallows, because the days no longer appear burdensome to me,—because no hour of the day passes over without affording to me a cheering, enlivening feeling. This hourly, this to me principal comfort, I have found in prayer, in a constant remembrance of the presence of the Highest of Beings. I live and act always under the eyes of a father; and as I feel that I live, I feel and know also that his eye follows me, that his spirit is near to me, surrounds me with his peace, and infuses a joy into me which I may indeed feel but cannot describe.

I regarded myself formerly, by virtue of my position, as wholly useless in the world. Experience, to me dear experience, has taught me—that if we work, in the small sphere which has been confided to us, only with truth and care, that we shall operate and labour according to the regulation which is the foundation of all good; and that pleasant consequences will sooner or later arise to us therefrom.

My health fails. The fulfilment of my duties in the family which has adopted me, becomes to me more difficult every day; but I endeavour to fulfil them according to the best of my powers. My heart has peace, is cheerful and quiet.

"Do not sit idly there, and do not look so happy, whilst I go about to seek for my snuff-box!" said just now the angry Countess to me. I recollect a time when I received reproaches on account of my downward devotional looks. Now my heart is so joyous that my countenance often receives the impression of it. Neither was the displeasure of the Countess at this time wholly without foundation; because, whilst one must take heed not to disturb the peace of others by an evidence of our own disquiet, one must not the less avoid shewing a satisfaction which may make a painful impression upon those to whom this feeling is a stranger.

I have again seen—him—her, have pressed their children to my heart! This family is an image of felicity. The happy husband and wife scarcely recognised me. That was not singular—I am so changed. I cherish in myself a wish—a fanciful hope—which I will not chase away—the hope of being able soon to float invisibly around them, and watch over their happiness.

How beautiful is the look of a man who labours with his full powers and in a sphere where his abilities freely exercise themselves, and still rise higher by the labour,—and where he is conscious that he lives for the benefit of his country, that he is esteemed by his fellow-citizens, loved by wife and friends, worshipped by his children,—that is the look of Alfred! How charming and touching is the expression in the countenance of a woman where all the requirements of her loving heart have been fulfilled, who lives in and for her beloved,—that is the expression of Camilla's face. And you happy little ones—you children, you darlings, one sees in your eyes full of innocence and joy of life, who brightly—the heaven of your childhood shines!

"In the autumn—when the leaves fall!" said a physician to-day, half aloud to the Countess, after he had observed me with thoughtful mien, and had inquired after my health. This termination of life sounds quite romantic,—but yet my life has had very little resemblance to a romance. Well then,—in autumn—in autumn. An aspen-leaf, which has trembled in the waving of so many winds—will tremble no longer!

I make use of a remedy for my chest,—may it or may it not be beneficial—I am calm; formerly I wished to die—now I wish it less, since I have learned better to support and employ life. I have learned to worship God in all his works. There is nothing, be it small as it may, to which a great thought does not in some way unite itself—and which thereby does not become important and interesting.

The leaves fall—and I still live—and still lift joyfully my eyes to the gloomy heavens.

I have great bodily pain and yet suffer so little—my soul is so happy!

“In spring—when the leaves shoot!”—says the physician now. And I should almost believe it, if I ventured to listen to the quiet presentiment which abides in me, and which whispers to me; in spring, when every thing awakens to life and to joy, when the flowers send forth from opened cups their fragrant odour to heaven,—then will my emancipated spirit float forth and feel the air of the eternal spring; then will my yearning have reached its dimly divined of goal.

He is come to me with his wife, yet once more to see me—that was noble and kind of him. I found him changed. A dark fire was in his eye, and wrinkles which resembled those of discontent shewed themselves sometimes on his brow, that formerly was so clear and smooth. Ah, ambition has crept into his heart!—this, together with his talents, has lifted him upon eagle-pinions to the height of worldly greatness. He is become a great man, but has ceased to be happy. His amiable wife looked dejected, and the most careful toilet could not conceal the change in her melancholy countenance. It grieved me to see her; ah, that they were but as happy and tranquil as I!

I am almost forty years of age. As solitary as I lay in my cradle, thus solitary stand I yet on the edge of the grave. I have gone through life like a shadow, and my life has been like a shade. More and more it vanishes from my eyes; but the Eternal Father, whose will I have obeyed, opened to me a new, a glorious life, to which I advance with indescribable joy! The beneficial prayers which I send forth, and which I feel will be heard,—the feeling of a presentiment of heaven, that feeling of angelic peace which has accompanied me,—the tranquillity which no pain is able to disturb,—the delicious emotions of joy, the pleasurable tears which I often shed,—oh, those dear holy messengers!—what do they announce to me other than that I soon shall behold the image of all love, of all perfection,—that the yearning spark will soon unite itself with the sacred fire from which it is sprung!

Here the feeble hand ceased to guide the pen,—the heart which had beaten so long with love and pain now reposes.

The Solitary is gone home to her Father—she is now happy!

THE COMFORTER.

Who that has suffered—that has, in moments of deep and dark pain, found in his heart a world of misery, and then felt the necessity, cherished the heartfelt wish, to be comforted by a being from a higher world—has not, at times, hoped in enthusiastic melancholy to see an angel come down, who with merciful healing hand would touch the wounded heart, and solve the dark riddle of life and suffering?

Oh, when nature smiles around us in her glorious garment of summer,—when she, like an enchanting beloved one—affectionate, beaming, warm, embraces with pure joy man, her bridegroom,—then, if the human heart remain cold and reserved, and solemn as the grave;—if it alone cannot mingle its voice in the jubilant chorus of the earth,—if man fancy himself to be the only repulsed one,—how good were it then if a voice from heaven whispered the assertion to the unhappy one, “Thou also art beloved! Son of suffering, endure with patience; thou also shalt one time drink from the cup of happiness!”

Ye bitter sufferings, inconsolable sorrow, despair—I have known ye! Heavenly voice, full of mercy and comfort, I have heard thee, and shall never forget thee. Yet to-day callest thou to me from the world of spirits. My soul hears thee, my heart understands thee! At this moment, in which memory has opened the leaves of my book of life, and my pen will recal the remembrance of long down times, the still night has laid all around me to rest. I am alone, awake, and with me it is suffering which dissipate repose. The pale light of my lamp makes me aware of the shadow of a fearful form upon the wall near me, which reminds me of that which legends ascribe to the gnomes, those children of dust and of darkness. This horrible shape is my own—is my body. And this, so deformed, so heavily afflicted body is united to a soul which adores the beautiful in the inward being, as well as in the outward form.

Alone with myself and my shadow, surrounded by night and silence, I yet feel the smile float upon my lips,—I listen with quiet joy to the harmonious voices which rise up from the depths of my soul in humble offerings of praise to heaven; and I can only compare the delightful, clear peace which encompasses my soul, with the gentle moonlight that at this moment spreads itself over the moss-roses in my window.

There was a time when every thing in me was quite otherwise, in which I hated the world and myself; in which I wished that I had never been born.

In the May of life, during those days of spring in which the whole of organized nature, every created existence, becomes partaker of some drops of joy; in which gentle pinions rock mankind, and heaven vaults itself so loftily and brightly above us,—at that time I became acquainted with misfortune, and bitter were then my complaints.

It was in my drooping soul, as in the outward world, when, in our northern climate, the days towards winter rapidly decrease, the nights become longer, and the sun, like a dying one, seems only to rise, to say farewell, and then to sink again. I cherished not the hope that a new year would alter for me the course of things; on the contrary, I saw behind the decreasing light a night becoming ever more and more dark, spreading itself over all.

Happy are the dead; they suffer no longer! Happier still are the unborn, who have never suffered! Happy also are you, ye pitied fools; ye who laugh at your misery; ye who plait for yourselves crowns from your straw couches; ye who dream that ye are great and happy. Ye are pitied unjustly! Ah, ye feel, indeed, nothing, and your misfortune is concealed by the flowers of your madness. Happy are ye!

Thus thought I, thus complained I, as one evening I dragged myself along with slow steps, in one of the darkest alleys of the park on the estate of my parents.

I was young and unhappy, and never—no, never—can one feel misfortune so bitterly as in youth. In maturer years the feelings become blunted—the blood flows more tranquilly; one is already accustomed to suffering—the way is not then so long to the terminating goal of all suffering. But when pain surprises us in youth, then that which is terrific in its novelty is increased by the yet uncurbed strength of the feelings by which that wild, fruitless struggle against fate is excited, whose consequences are hopelessness and despair.

Sickly and infirm at nineteen. I went through life timid and gloomy as an unblessed shade. I had been happy; therefore, I now suffered so much the more. I was full of life and health till my seventeenth year,—and so beloved—and so happy! Then I felt myself good, found the world so beautiful, regarded mankind as angels, and God as the Father of all. A tedious illness threw me about this time upon the couch of suffering, from which I arose again disfigured in the most fearful manner. People pitied me at first; but soon they turned away from me—my mother also, my brothers and sisters, did so. My heart became bitter; I felt the deterioration of my mind, and began to think myself abandoned by God and man. The careful education, the fine accomplishments, which, in my younger years, had been my share, served now only to sharpen the sense of my misfortune. Never beat a heart in a human breast with more glowing love for freedom, activity, and the heroic virtues, which history displays in splendid prototypes. Never flamed more enthusiastically the spirit of emulation in the soul of a youth. Cato, Brutus, Scipio, Regulus, they were my prototypes—I wished to resemble them, if not to excel them all,—and my name, like theirs, should be honoured by a noble posterity. Renown and joy, with a rich, virtuous, and useful —that was the quickly vanished dream of his first youth.

Miserable compassion, contempt, forgetfulness—with a useless, sickly, joyless life—were the horrible realities which locked me in their iron arms on my awaking, which drew me down from my heaven, and darkened to me the whole world,—and God, and his beautiful sun, and his mercy towards his creatures.

Doubt, with its murmuring never-answered questions, arose in my soul, and midnight darkness inclosed my uneasily throbbing heart. An unending pain agitated my breast, whilst the panting breath moved it up and down.

"And how have I sinned that I should be so severely, so fearfully punished—for what have I become so unhappy?" asked I, loudly murmuring, as with tearful eyes I looked around me on the blooming scenes which richly and beautifully surrounded me.

It was a gloriously fine evening. The sun was descending, all was tranquil—only a low murmur stole now and then, like a whispered declaration of love, between foliage and flowers through the wood. Every thing seemed to rejoice—I alone suffered! I wished to be the bird which thoughtfully twittered, swinging upon the green branches,—or the flower which beamed so splendidly, which gave forth such sweet odour,—or the butterfly which rested in its bosom,—nay, even the moss overgrown, happy, senseless rock against which I leaned;—only not man—only not the suffering, pitiable human being which I was!

I rested myself beside a lake which bounded the park, and which was encompassed by the most beautiful shores.

O how often had I formerly, with youthful pleasure and joy, guided my little boat over its dancing waves! How often had I, with my powerful arms, divided its gentle waters—kissed them with warm lips—and seen in the clear depths which mirrored back a cloudless heaven, the image of my pure heart, my fresh life! As formerly, still green, riant shores garlanded the quiet lake,—as formerly, the dark blue of the heavens reflected itself in its depths—my boat lay on the shore,—every thing had remained so unchanged, so kindly unchanged! I only was no longer like myself, was no longer the same. I found every thing here, excepting only myself.

I bowed myself down to touch the cool water with my glowing lips, but suddenly drew back at the sight of my own detestable image, which, like my demon of misfortune, raised itself towards me more terrific than ever from the dark depths. It was to me as if I had been stung by a snake.

With disordered and painful feelings, I fixed my stony gaze upon the opposite shore. Joyful human voices sounded thence; and I soon perceived how gay couples swung around in a merry midsummer dance. Songs and laughter echoed back from the rocks around. I arose, turned myself away, and went deeper into the wood.

Through the opening of an avenue shone opposite to me the brilliantly-illuminated windows of the castle of my parents. They held there that night a festival to celebrate the return of my eldest sister to the paternal house. She had left it in her childhood, in order to be brought up "near relations in the capital; and now returned back an amiable bride, and was received by festivities which I now escaped as earnestly as I formerly had sought them.

"Nobody will miss me, nobody will think about me," thought I, with bitter feelings, as I went away to seek for darkness and quiet. "Parents, brothers and sisters, make for yourselves pleasure—dance—sing! I shall never more sing, never more dance, never more laugh!"

Music now resounded from the castle, and brought to me the bewitching tones of my favourite waltz,—the joyous voices from the shore became louder and louder,—I went, and went, and went,—they pursued me. O all ye unfortunate friends, ye who like me have felt yourselves without joy, without hope in the world—was it not then, during the innocent joy of others, that envy and bitter chagrin crept into your hearts? If it be painful to suffer undeservedly, then it is doubly painful to be obliged to say that one has deserved it, when one, for the first time, detects in oneself an envious and disdainful state of mind. I cannot describe what a feeling of infinite pain overpowered for some moments my whole being. My whole power was concentrated upon one point—upon the consciousness of my suffering. It was intolerable to me. "O my God! comfort me, comfort me!" exclaimed I many times with a hollow voice, before which I myself shuddered. "If thou be the God of mercy, then pity thou thy suffering child! Give me again that which thou hast taken from me; or open thy heaven—send an angel to me, an angel which shall tell me why I suffer,—or annihilate me! I am a grain of dust before thee—mingle me with the dust—only cause that I cease to feel, to suffer!" This wild, incoherent prayer—ah, I felt it—was only an audacious, bitter murmur. I should have thrown from me at this moment every earthly consolation, I should not have received them. An angel's voice alone, an immediate revelation, would only, so I imagined, give me tranquillity,—could only give me back my extinguished hope, my faith on that which once had been so sacred, so certain, and so clear, and which now to my feeling, unstable, and wrapped in darkness, left me without any support.

Every one who, like me, has been suddenly and unexpectedly plunged into the depths of misfortune, will feel with me. People could not be so unhappy if, with the loss of all earthly hopes, they did not also often lose faith in a wise and merciful God. That gracious voice which exclaimed to us that not a sparrow, much less one of us, falls unobserved to the earth—that the hairs of our head are all numbered—this voice is not perceived in the tempest of passions—and if even it do find a way to our breast, it is not always able to silence the excited waves—for that wild, impatient heart desires then an instantaneous effect to prove its truth,—and if in our murmuring no consolatory feeling descends into our tumultuous heart—if our fate do not change, our sufferings remain the same,—then we despair—then—ah, how unhappy are we then!

With eyes fixed on the night I went onward, and seemed to myself like a child of the night.

All at once as it were a hundred weight fell upon my heart, that what I suffered, what I felt, might be only a repetition of that which others had felt and suffered before me. The bloody sweat of millions of human beings, the tears of millions, had moistened before me the path of pain upon which I wandered, and would moisten it after me; and shuddering, I saw in thought, like ugly ghosts, darker than the night which encompassed me, all the sufferings and afflictions of the human race pass before me—the sufferings of the body, of the heart, of feeling, those never wearied harpies, which leave not the unfortunate, until he has, brother-like, extended his hand as a skeleton to death,—and in my own name, and that of all sufferers, I lifted up a piercing, painful, murmuring cry, and directed my eyes lamentingly to the stars. In tranquil, undisturbed majesty, they stood clearly sparkling above my head, and this immovable order, this eternally unshaken repose of heaven, awoke in my breast, ice-cold despair. “Let us die!” exclaimed I in thought to my brethren in misfortune, “Let us die—then all is at an end,—we have no compassionate Father in heaven!”

I had seated myself, and felt with gloomy satisfaction how the dampness of the night penetrated my dress;—I hoped that it would undermine my enfeebled health,—and my only wish now was for death. Whether it would conduct me now to a more friendly fate, or only annihilate my afflicted being, it was welcome to me, dear to me, and inwardly longed for by me. Nobody would weep for me,—all my family would, like myself, regard my death as a gain. I knew it, knew it only too well!

Towards midnight the music was silent, and I heard how the dancers on the shore departed by degrees, amid cheerful sounds. All at length was still. It had become dark, and the stars, whose glittering pomp had seemed to mock my pain, were wrapped in clouds. The whole country lay hidden in deep night, and at a distance the thunder was heard to roll. All this accorded more with my inward feeling, and did me infinite good. I threw myself down upon the ground and wept bitterly. I wept long, and felt thereby a beneficial alleviation. Gentler feelings pressed into my heart, and combatted against the bitter ones. The thoughts so precious to me of a reward on the other side of life, for sufferings patiently endured, of a wise, all-compassionate Father came again and again. I was now able to pray to him with a submissive heart. I prayed,—prayed for consolation—for light and strength, with that fervent, nameless prayer, whose strength opens heavens, and seems able to press with the sighs of the heart, to the throne of the Eternal. I had, whilst I prayed, raised myself up, but soon sank down again to the earth, enfeebled by my feelings and by pain, deprived even as much of thought as of power, and dull tones of lamentation laboured forth from my panting breast.

The night was warm, and so tranquil that no breath of air was sent forth; yet it seemed to me at times as if a trembling passed through the leaves of the poplar, under which I lay with my face to the earth, and each time an involuntary shudder passed through me. Three times, it seemed to me as if a hand passed over my head lightly and caressingly, and with the pleasant sensation which I perceived therefrom, a delightful remembrance of my childhood livingly awoke within me. So had Maria, the little beloved one of my childish years, caressed me, when we, fatigued by sport and exercise, rested upon the soft grass together. I had perceived this sensation, when the little one raised her feeble hand from her death-bed and laid it, for then she could no longer speak, as it were in blessing on my head.

Was she near to me at this moment? Was she, the glorified angel of earth, sent by the All-merciful to comfort me? O how my heart beat as these thoughts arose in my soul!

I believed with certainty that something supernatural was near me, but, although the hair of my head rose upright, yet my heart felt no fear. What, indeed, does one fear when one is deeply wretched? Nay, even the most gloomy revelations of the spiritual world terrify no longer. The feelings of horror which they infuse are welcome; they refresh—they raise us above earthly pain; and seem less horrible than this. It is, however, a consolation which, as we believe, approaches us in a beloved shape from that unknown land at whose portals all lights of the human spirit are extinguished—therefore all becomes tranquil in the tumultuous breast, and all the pulses beat in adoring expectation. Thus operated in my soul the thought of Maria's presence. I called her softly by name—besought her to lay her hand upon my heart,—and amid feelings of peace and sweet repose, such as I had never felt before, I fell into a kind of dreaming stupefaction. During this, it appeared to me that I saw Maria clothed in white, and in describably beautiful, sit near me, in her hand a palm-branch with which she fanned me—whilst I, in no condition to speak or clearly to think, pleased myself for some moments only by the feeling, how well it was with me. All at once I perceived Maria seize me by the hand, and amid feelings of indescribable satisfaction I fancied myself floating away at her side over the earth towards heaven.

“I am dead!” thought I, and an unspeakable sensation of joy passed with the thought through my soul.

I wished to turn myself round, that I might yet once more behold this earth upon which I had suffered so much—but mists dimmed my view.

The clouds environed me ever more densely; I felt how the frosty damps chilled my breast, and dulled the glow which the restless beating of my heart had occasioned. “It is good!” thought I; “that is the enfolding of the grave, the embrace of death—how beautifully they cool! soon—soon shall I be transformed.” Again it became dark to me, as if I were not yet dead, only dying. My mind became every moment more benumbed; it became ever darker and darker before my eyes—a dull sighing, as of distant woods, was in my ears. Yet clearly and calmly remained to me the consciousness of a guiding hand, even in the moments in which I entirely seemed to lose the consciousness of my own existence.

A sudden feeling of pain, which thrilled through my heart like a dagger-stroke, recalled me to thought and consciousness. I found myself lying upon the earth as shortly before, and should have regarded all as merely a dream had I not still felt the soft, warm hand which inco-sed mine. I was feeble and powerless. Without raising my head, I exclaimed, "O Maria, why didst thou not take me up into thy bright home! Why am I yet upon earth, where people suffer so much and so hopelessly—why, ah, why must I still suffer!"

"God wills it," replied a voice, as charming and melodious as we represent to ourselves that of angels. Impatiently murmuring, I asked, "And to what purpose should I live and suffer!"

"In order to be better thyself—to be useful to others."

"How can I, miserable worm, be useful to others!"

"Through thy patience—through the example of thy submission."

"Ah, I have strength to feel my suffering, but not to bear it!"

"Pray!"

"God's image is darkened in my heart—I cannot pray! I have seen the abyss of pain—have understood the sufferings of men,—and I too—I understand God no more! O be not angry, pure, holy angel! Thou who livest in light—look mercifully upon the son of darkness—enlighten me—comfort me!"

"Yes, I will comfort thee!"

"Tell me, compassionate angel, has the Eternal sent thee to me?"

"He has sent me to thee."

"His eye then, then, sees the tormented worm creeping in the dust! The suffering creature of the earth are not unobserved by him!"

"He sees, he numbers them all."

"O Maria! say, if God be all-good and merciful, wherefore all the wretchedness, all the sufferings of men!"

"It is sufficient for thee to know that he will afford comfort to all, and will some time cause all suffering to cease."

"I cannot take hold on this comfort—I do not understand how happiness can ever outweigh pain. Happy angel—thou who wast already in childhood snatched away from the earth—thou hast never known its afflictions—thou understandest them not! Hear now one of its victims speak! Hear, and if thy incorporeal being can yet cherish human feelings—if this heart, familiar with the felicity of heaven, be not cold for foreign suffering—then shudder!" And from the depths of my agitated heart I exclaimed—"We suffer, we suffer! We call for help, and the earth opens her abysses, and heaven looks coldly down and despises us. The night of despair covers us—the vulture sits on our heart, and rends from it piece after piece—and gnaws and gnaws. We call on death, but death comes not. We curse our life—we blaspheme—" I paused, thrilled through with horror!

Every thing was still for a moment, and I endeavoured, with a convulsive effort, to stupify my mind; for I dreaded to hear that scornful laughter, to see those dark abysses, to feel those pangs of agony.

"Listen!" said the angel-voice, suddenly, strong and delicious as a harp-tone. "Listen to the song of victory from my lips, which the suffering children of earth will some time sing altogether in the bright heavens!" And I heard the angelic song, which sounded like a voice out of the clouds, and yet quite near to me.

O thou human anguish,
Thy abode was brief!
Heart, enfranchised captive,
What a blessed relief,
By suffering purified,
Now to God allied!

To the bright blue heaven,
From the vale of care,
Let thine eye be given,
Think not on despair!
See above, in brightness,
The dwelling of uprightness!

Though our life's track leads us
Through a foreign land,
Tis but the course that speeds us
To the bright world's strand,
And afar off, we
The Father's house can see.

There our hopes were tending,
Amid storm and fear;
Blissedness unending
Now surrounds us here.
The appointed goal is gained.

The victory is obtained!
Never more in sadness
Shall we look to heaven,
Spring's eternal gladness
To our hearts is given;
And like the saints above,
Henceforth our life is love!

The song ceased, but I fancied I still heard it. The pain also in my soul ceased. I felt how every bitter feeling within me dissolved itself by degrees, and gave place to gentle, consolatory ones. Sweet tears ran down my cheeks, and a feeling like that of the peace just now sung, overcame for a moment my being. Soon, however, the torment woke again, and doubt raised itself again from the depths of my soul. I folded my hands and prayed, "O pitying, gentle angel, forgive my weakness—leave me not—continue to give my soul light! Tell me, what indeed is that for which we here struggle and suffer!"

"The right, the true life, of which this earthly life is only the shadow. An eternal mounting upwards, an eternal approach to God, the fountain of truth and bliss. That light, that peace, that sanctification and pure joy, which we here seek for in vain, we shall there find."

"Ah," I replied gloomily, "night encompasses me—I cannot take hold on the light."

"Behold, the red of the morning breaks," cried the voice; "behold, how it diffuses light around us; how every object, which just now were yet veiled in nocturnal shadow, appears in brightness, beauty, and truth. Thus also on the morning of eternity will its sun diffuse light over all the perplexities of life,—then wilt thou understand wherefore thou hast suffered; only continue good, only continue submissive—and all will be right. Son of suffering! thou also wilt one day drink from the cup of felicity!"

"And the poor tempted ones, they whom misfortune leads to crime, whom misfortune degrades—what fate may they expect?"

"God is merciful and just—adore him!"

"And the wicked,—they whom a horrible destiny seems even from their cradle to have destined to be the scourge of their fellow-beings?"

The angel was silent a while, but at length said with a gentle, solemn seriousness, "Wherefore these questions, this disquiet, child of dust? There is a God—worship God!"

It became brighter in my soul. "O," said I softly, "I understand thee. God is God, and that says every thing,—my God also," added I, with deep and joyous feelings.

"And thy Father!" said the angelic voice.

"Yes—my Father,—and a Father who pardons! O Maria, tell me—if I, too weak to bear my burden, voluntarily laid down a life which I felt to be intolerable, would not this Father receive his unhappy child into his paternal bosom?"

"Do not mislead thyself," replied the voice;

"he who gives way before the trial, can never deserve the reward. O suffer with patience—hope with confidence! Deprive not thyself of the reward which awaits thee—of the well-pleasing of God, of the good pure witness of thine own conscience, of the blessings of those to whom thou canst be upon earth a support and a comfort."

"But if I see that I am a burden to others as to myself, if——"

"Do right and worship God," replied the voice, in a severe tone. I felt pain. At length I said, dejectedly, "Life is long, infinitely long, for the unhappy, who have on earth no other, better lot to expect; and the terminating goal of suffering appears to him too distant for it to operate as a constant alleviation of ever-returning pain. Thou, thou, in the enjoyment of ever-ascending happiness, measurest not, remarkest not, the course of the years; thou canst not think what an infinitude of duration the days, the hours, nay, even the minutes, have for the unfortunate, who counts his pangs by the beating of his pulse! If thou, heavenly comforter, wert ever near me, I would not complain; but when thou returnest to the bright home from which thou out of mercy hast descended, what will become of me! How shall I be able to bear those long, long hours, which the united pains of the soul and the body make so insufferable!"

"I will not leave thee," replied the angel, whose voice was again infinitely soft and gentle; "I will assist thee to endure those hours, and to feel those pains less. God has strewn everywhere the seeds of consolation and joy; we will seek for them together. We will be submissive,—and all will become good; we will be submissive—and peace will descend into our hearts. We will worship God together,—together seek for the mitigation of thy pain; and if thou must weep, thou shalt no longer weep alone." At these words the voice of the angel became as it were stifled by emotion.

"Do the immortals also shed tears?" thought I; and, amazed beyond all description, as well by the words as by the emotion that followed them, I raised myself up, and ventured for the first time to contemplate the white figure which sat at my side. Trembling I sought for the dear, well-known features of Maria; I found them not. A lovely, to me, strange countenance, veiled with compassionate tears, and brightened by the dawning crimson of the morning, bent over me, and a warm, soft, rosy mouth impressed upon my brow an affectionate kiss.

"O my brother, my beloved brother!" whispered the same angelic voice which went so to my heart, "recognize thy sister, whom God has sent to thee to comfort and to love thee,—who will never more leave thee!" and she threw her arms around me.

My bewilderment was so great, for a moment, that I fancied I had lost the use of my mind.

My sister endeavoured, in the most heartfelt affectionate manner, to overcome the excitement of my mind. She locked me in her arms, let my head rest upon her breast, and with sweet loving words she busied to rest as it were my agitated feelings. I became by degrees calmer, but for a long time could not persuade myself that it was only my imagination, excited in the highest degree, which had made me fancy that an angel—yet what do I say—was it not an angel, although in a human form?—had been sent by God for my consolation! Yes, it was she, in the most beautiful signification of the word, and I felt it every moment deeper. In order to give my mind the most perfect clearness, she told me in a few words the accident which had conducted her to me. Informed of my illness, of its consequences, and the unhappy state of my mind, which my gay and fortunate brothers had described as bordering upon insanity, she had, immediately on her arrival at the paternal house, inquired after me, and learnt that I, more gloomy than common, had betaken myself into the park. As she, tolerably late at night, again inquired after me, and heard that I had not yet returned, this amiable sister, under the pretence of going to rest, stole away from the hall, and into the park, to seek out her afflicted brother. She was about to call my name, when my lamenting voice reached her ear, and guided her to the spot where I had sunk down overpowered by suffering, and almost insensible. She softly approached me, lingered quietly beside me, and heard how I called on the name of Maria, and besought her to comfort me; and her prudence and goodness suggested to her the thought of availing herself of this mistake, which my violently excited state of mind and my heated fancy had made, in order to afford me consolation in a manner which would make the greatest impression on my overstrained mind. Towards the conclusion of our conversation she thought that the human loving sister, deeply affected by my sufferings, would be more able to contribute to my comfort than one belonging to the world of spirits, and she let her feelings speak for me. "My brother"—thus she ended her explanation,—"be not displeased because I was thy angel! Maria would, however, have left thee; and I will never, never more leave thee!"

I could not overcome my amazement. "And those oracular answers which thou gavest to me!"

"Thou wilt find their foundation in the Gospel—there is the fountain of comfort and of wisdom; we will together learn to gain them therefrom."

"And that charming consolatory hymn," I said, with tearful eye, "was it, then, only thy composition!"

"It was truth, which, although feebly composed, by me was put into the form in which thou now hast heard it. When we shall some time hear, in a better world, the victorious songs of the suffering children of the earth, and shall even mingle our own voices in them,—how different, my brother!—how altogether another thing will these harmonies of eternity appear in comparison with feeble earthly tones! Ye heavenly felicities, which no human eye has seen, no ear has perceived, which no human understanding can comprehend,—how, indeed, could a mortal voice be worthy to sing ye! Ye patient sufferers, it will some time be your lot to do so!"

"Yes," replied I, with emotion, "I may perhaps some time unite my voice with these; but thou, sister, will sing yet more beautiful among the happy ones arisen from the grave,—happy on this and on the other side,—thou angel of God!" My sister made no reply, but looked up to heaven with a glance, in which patient submission was so expressively depicted, as if she saw beforehand that severe fate would also strike her, and she offered up her own will as a sacrifice.

She took my arm within hers, and conducted me slowly back to the house. The ever-increasing daylight drove away the shadows from around; morning breezes played in the foliage, and the most delicious twittering of birds raised itself in the fresh odoriferous air. All this appeared to me an image of that which occurred in my own soul. In my night-enwrapped mind light had also arisen; I felt the gentle zephyrs of consolation, I heard the song of hope. Silently went on my sister and myself beside each other; but her beaming glance, which now was riveted upon me, now passed over the enchanting objects which surrounded us, and then raised itself to heaven, seemed to invite my feelings to follow in its holy flight.

The first beams of the sun gilded the windows of the Castle as we approached it—the same windows whose glittering illumination some hours before had made so painful an impression upon me. Now I contemplated them with quite different feelings; and as I turned to the beaming torch of day, I repeated softly, with deep and delightful emotion, Thomson's glorious prayer:

"Father of light and life! thou Good Supreme!
O teach me what is good! teach me thyself!
Save me from folly, vanity, and vice,
From every low pursuit! and feed my soul
With knowledge, conscious peace, and virtue pure;
Sacred, substantial, never-fading bliss!"

I perceived the change within myself with rapture. The nocturnal scene had made a deep impression upon me; and however natural every thing which had occurred might be, I still could not help ascribing it to a supernatural guidance. In the moment of pain and of despair I had called upon an angel, and an angel had descended to me with kind, long-wished-for words of consolation and hope. The voice of my glorified Maria could scarcely have produced a greater change in me than the voice of my gentle sister did.

She was one of those beings who only seem to linger upon the earth to alleviate its misery, and in whose pure soul heaven has stamped, as it were, its image. Gentle, lovely, wise, serious—she went through the world like a loftier spirit, who only takes part in life that it may sweeten the lives of others. She found her happiness only in the happiness of others; and if she now felt the sufferings of others bitterly, it was because she kept her gaze too firmly fixed upon the terminal goal of the journey through life for her to permit the brightness of her mind to be gloomed by the difficulties of the way. And precisely this repose in her own soul enabled her, wisely and considerately, to select and apply the right method for the alleviation of every sorrow.

I soon perceived the beneficial influence of her gentle and prudent guidance. She did not permit the temporary flight which had elevated my soul to sink back into cowardice, but maintained it upright, and sought to bring it round to tranquil, deliberate, and independent strength.

She soon discovered that ambition was my chief passion, and that the loss of all that could promise success to this passion was the principal cause of my deep melancholy. She judged wisely, that this passion, like all strong passions of the soul, could scarcely be speedily brought into subjection; and endeavoured only to give it another direction, to set to it a better, nobler, less selfish, and to me a yet attainable object.

"Thou canst not," said she once, in our confidential conversations, "become a Scipio, a Camillus, a Leonidas; but thou mayest be a Socrates, a Plato, or, which is still better, one of those Apostles of Christianity, whose sacred and heroic virtues have deserved immortality on earth. Believe me, my brother, the world needs for its happiness more wise men than heroes; and the happy, noble man, who has given to humanity one comfort, one refreshment, may die with a more beautiful consciousness than that which sweetened the last hours of an Epaminondas. Thou hast received from nature remarkable gifts of mind, memory, acuteness; exercise and cultivate these. Thou hast knowledge—strive to acquire more and better-grounded knowledge. The field of mental cultivation is immeasurable, and the flowers which it bears are noble everlastings. The richer thy harvest becomes, the more (to continue the simile) thou garnereest of that which is mature and solid, all the more wilt thou be able to extend of the fruit of thy labour to the greatly-needing hungry many, and wilt deserve the blessings of the present and future generations. Let us never forget, that what we undertake and accomplish, if it be actually good and beneficial, must be for the use of the kingdom of God."

Thus spoke my good sister, less, as I believe, in the conviction of my ability to reach the prototypes which she presented to me, than to animate and inspire my sunken spirit.

In proportion as my earthly fortune opened itself again to me, my courage and my powers reawoke. The horizon extended itself, as it were, before my gaze. Full of hope, I extended my arms towards the ascending sun, in which I now saw, as formerly, the image of light which would beam upon my earthly life.

I began to labour for my new object with all the zeal which my weak health allowed, and might perhaps have exerted myself beyond my powers, if my gentle and prudent sister had not here also stood by my side, watchfully and warningly.

She induced me to seek for diversion of mind, and by agreeable light occupations or pastimes to cheer my spirits and to strengthen my powers. I had talent for drawing. She encouraged me to practise this beautiful, serious art, which enables us to perpetuate beloved memories, and at the same time to forget the oppressive hours of the present. How often, when I endeavoured to preserve her gentle features on paper, have I forgotten myself; the whole world, time, and every thing which could be important and fatiguing, whilst my whole soul lived with delight in my beloved work. How often, whilst I have been representing the attractive and fresh objects of the country, the leafy trees, the calm lake, the bold heights, the shady valleys, the grazing herds, the clean turf-covered cottages, and the heavens veiled with transparent clouds, how often has the feeling of peace and quiet satisfaction penetrated my soul!

The great condition for that pure enjoyment is this, that the heart is free from every root of bitterness, every sentiment of ill-temper and envy; and in a short time these disturbers of peace were entirely driven out of mine.

I had formerly read history with the same mind with which children see a magnificent spectacle, with admiration for the splendid and the great, without in any way as a whole connecting and embracing it. I read it again, after years, and still more, misfortune, had matured and formed my understanding, and found a totally different impression from this reading.

In contemplating the fate of the world, my own vanished from before my eyes. When my thoughts roamed through centuries, my lifetime seemed to lose itself in these, like a drop in the ocean,—and when the misfortunes of millions lay open before my sight, I was ashamed of thinking on my own. I learned, in one word, to forget myself. And when my weak vision could perceive in these pictures of history only a confused swarming mass, when I lost there the traces of a wise and good Providence, when I saw upon earth only a disorderly succession of errors, confusion and misery, then my sister turned my glance to heaven.

I looked up to heaven, listened to the voices of the good and holy upon earth, who—in combat, in pain, in death—have been raised with confidence, joy, and celestial power, to announce to us a higher aim than earthly happiness, another home, a higher light;—listened to the promises of immortality, and to the presentiments of it in my own breast, and learned to embrace in my heart the consolatory belief which already here in life diffused brightness over the darkest night.

I looked up to heaven. Light came from above. It beamed down into my soul. I comprehended that here below all things are only in the beginning, and full of hope; I cheerfully seized again my pilgrim-staff, composed as regarded my fate, and certain of my object. From this time my heart had continually peace; and it was not difficult for me to seek out many materials for happiness and joy, wherewith I was enabled to build upon earth the cottage of my content. Among these, I have mentioned pleasant and diverting occupations, and I must yet add—society,—not that on a great scale, to which I was still always opposed, and which, on account of my exterior, could only awaken unpleasant feelings, but that composed of my own family and my own friends, who did not alone endure me, but who endeavoured with kindness that I should, by degrees, find pleasure in their joy, and even learn to contribute to it,—truly often enough, like a blind musician contributing to the pleasures of the dance.

My sister and myself took all possible pains to make my temper, violent by nature, mild and cheerful. She, by warnings, friendly counsels, but principally by her tenderness, her care to surround me with little pleasures, which nobody knew better how to arrange and to make piquant than she did; I, by watchfulness over myself, by repressing all irritability and sensitiveness, and for the rest, by perfect submission to her guidance.

"Whoever," said she, "is deprived of outward charms, and perpetually requires the attention and cherishing care of others, must labour still more than others to acquire that mild, kind, amiable temper and behaviour, which is alone sufficient to win the devotion of others,—and which make all little attentions which are shewn to them become so agreeable, all greater ones so light."

I followed her counsel. I endeavoured to be amiable,—I became beloved, and I deeply felt the happiness of being so.

The first great pain which befel me after my return to life and joy, was occasioned to me by her, who had formerly so affectionately consoled me. Ah! my angelically good sister was doomed, as she herself had divined, to experience herself on earth the bitterness of grief. He—who was worthy of her in every respect, and with whom she led an angel's life—died suddenly, and her tender, only child followed him soon afterwards. As tranquilly and mildly as she had, formerly said to me—"Let us be submissive," she now repeated to herself these words,—and was perfectly resigned. Kind and considerate for others as formerly, her bright peaceful eye was ever attentive to the wishes and necessities of others; but they remarked that something in her was changed—her joy was gone—she was in heaven. Her life on earth was now only a slow descent; not that of an extinguished flame, but of a descending sun, which, whilst with bright, although dying beams, he lets his farewell illumine this world, stands about to be re-illuminated with new-born strength and purity in another.

She was no more!—and alone—and deserted by her—I feared for a long time to lose myself,—but I soon felt that she and her consolations continued still in my heart my guardian angels. I collected my powers, and remained resigned to the will of heaven.

From the Eternal home, where she lives blessed and again united to her own, she casts sometimes, perhaps, a glance upon the grateful brother whose good angel she was on earth. O that this glance might never find me unworthy!—that this glance might not look down without pleasure into a purified and sanctified heart. My life has not come up to the splendid image which we beforehand conceived: I have become no Socrates nor Plato, but still am wise enough not to weep over it. We had—I in particular—had had quite too much confidence in the powers of my mind and my understanding. I soon observed that my ability to comprehend on a great scale, and to think, was very much confined. Something—I know not what it was—it seemed to me as if it were my own skill—presented to my thoughts, when they had arrived at a certain point, a wall which was to them as insurmountable as the walls of my room were to my feet; and my spirit was, alas! so constituted, that its flight rather led me into than out of the clouds. Thus I was also here obliged to give up my ambitious hopes, and found myself, when I, at length, had accustomed myself to fruitless combats and endeavours, only the better for it.

My sister had, above all things, turned my mind to religion; and this, which overcomes all human passions, poured her tranquillizing balsam also over the waves of my ambition and worldly vanity. And, in truth, if we acknowledge ourselves as work-tools in the hand of Providence, who has created us, how foolish it is, then, to wish to be anything different to that for which He has destined us!

When, therefore, I saw my inability to raise myself above mediocrity in the path of knowledge and of science, I ceased to strive after it, and calmly renounced a renown which was not destined for me. I employed, therefore, all the greater pains to enable that portion of myself, the perfection of which is impeded by no wall, by no "so far and no farther," but to which, on the contrary, infinitude stands open. Every one who has earnestly begun this work will find that he creates his own happiness.

In the sphere which my inward eye can command, I endeavour so perfectly to comprehend all, so to profit by it and to employ it, that it actually may be advantageous to others and to myself. I am, according to my ability, active in outward life; and never do I alleviate a torment of the body or of the soul of a fellow-being without experiencing an increase in my happiness. When the infirmity of my body compels me to inactivity, I am quiet, and occupy my thoughts more exclusively with the beautiful future which religion has opened to us on the other side of the land of care. By my patience under suffering, and my, if not always merry, yet always friendly state of mind, I endeavour not to make unpleasant the attentions and care which people shew to me, and, in particular, make my brothers and sisters aware how easily a temper, cheerful and resigned through God, can bear outward adversity. They are kind and amiable, and—I know it, and say it with tears of joy—there is no one amongst them who would not willingly give up some of the days of his life to beautify mine. And yet I can give nothing more to them, than—my sincere friendship.—do little more for them, than many a time to think for them,—and always to feel with them. My sick-room is now their confessional, now their council-room, and often also their temple of joy; and when they are happy, they will just as willingly gladden me with the view of their happiness, as I will gladly see it, and take part in it.

The love of my parents is again given to me since I no longer embitter their days by impatient murmuring over my fate. Ah, have I now, indeed, reason to complain of my fate. The heaven of my future stands brightly open there, and my present life is agreeable. I love still more virtuous and amiable people, sympathise in their fate, and am loved by them in return. I can do some good—my heart has peace,—but all that I now am, all that I now say, that have I from thee, my good sister. Thou awokest me from the depths of despair, didst press me to thy loving breast—gave my soul comfort, my life courage—my powers a new object—my temper gentleness! When I cried to heaven to send to me an angel, how mercifully was I heard! Thou didst come, my sister! O delightful comforter, gentle instructor!—although vanished from my sight, thou livest eternally in my heart; and every blessing which I have from thee, I bring again to thee in humble gratitude!

A LETTER ABOUT SUPPERS.

Stockholm, November 20th, 1828.

BEST AMALIA!

Thou inquierest what I do in the great city of Stockholm, whilst the Parliament waves its strife-proclaiming banners, and whilst the wise and the unwise heads of the capital knock one against the other, and all the uninitiated expect to see the public good start forth from the mighty blow in a new-created Minerva-shape. Thou askest what I do during all this?—Ah, my love—I eat suppers, and yawn! The day before yesterday I was at a supper; yesterday, I was at a supper; to-night also shall be at a supper, and if I am still alive to-morrow, I shall, alas, also to-morrow eat a supper. "A supper!" I hear thee ask—"is there then anything so horrible in it?"

My Amalia, thou happy daughter of the country, remain with thy sewing and thy flowers,—let the pure air kiss thy cheeks, sing thy simple songs, close thy day in peace and joy, eat thy frugal evening meal, go to bed at nine o'clock, thank God, and pray to Him that He may preserve thee from city life and suppers!

But if thou wilt become acquainted at a distance with these pleasures of the great and elegant world, then accompany me in spirit for a few minutes, and thou shalt be initiated into the mysteries of suppers.

We must adorn ourselves with flowers! Having been invited eight days ago to take part at the festival of pleasure, we must, in order to salute it, call up our freshest smiles!

The clock strikes eight. We leave the glass with a parting glance to ascend into the carriage which is standing ready, which rattling will convey us through the streets of the city to where the beaming blaze of light beckons to us from a long row of windows.

Not a word about disarranged curls, rumpled dresses, and the thousand other little travelling discomforts. One must forget something. One gets all one's array again into the speediest order, and reassumes that becoming smile which one had left upon the steps.

The doors of the saloon are opened, and we float in. Is it the simoom or the sirocco which is wafted towards us from the throng of people and lights? One of the two it certainly is, and thou feelest already a universal drowsiness and disabling diffuse themselves over thy intellectual powers.

The greetings are over, we seat ourselves. God be thanked for good rest! If no earthquake happen, we shall not soon rise again. Closely seated together, the ladies mutually review each other,—pay compliments, and say polite things to each other—drawing up their mouths as while as if they were sucking in Sugarland. The eyes twinkle, the heads are in motion, the feathers sway here and there, the silken dresses rustle; there is a greeting, a questioning and an answering; there is a murmuring and a bustling, becoming by degrees ever fainter and fainter, like a dying-away storm. The murmur ceases —it begins again—it dies out—and all becomes still.

They get the card-tables ready, carry tea about, exhibit engravings. People play and are silent—people blow and drink—people examine and yawn.

It is hot and sultry. Slowly creeps on the time. The heat of the rooms increases, curls become straight, certain noses become red, the ears burn, the eyes fill with tears;—one gets uneasy, one turns oneself hither and thither, one puffs and plagues oneself.

People try to begin a conversation. Bubbling ideas might enliven one's languishing feelings like fresh springs of water; but ah! ideas have gone out of our heads like the pomatum out of the hair, and we find ourselves badly witty and clever enough to talk rationally about the weather. And if thou dost exert thyself sufficiently to say something particular, thou wilt receive for thy answer a polite "Yes," or "No," or "Hum" or "Indeed!" which will as much as say, "My good one, do not give yourself any trouble!"

See, there now approaches thee a gentleman with his hat in his hand, in order to make some diversion in the entertainment. What does he say to thee? Thou smilest really so gently. Was it something civil? "No." Something witty? "No." Something stupid? "No." Well, was it something, then? "Yes, but something which was absolutely nothing. The poor fellow, he was rather sleepy, had lost at the card-table; and was, moreover, under the influence of the supper-sirocco. What then, indeed, could he say other than—it is terribly warm here!"

In order to awaken thy own sense, which is slumberous against thy will, thou lookest about in the numerous company to find some amusement in the remarks which thou canst make. In vain! every thing is so uniform. Good ton and refined education have so polished and trimmed, have so far removed all marked form, all originality, that one is aware of no other difference in these individuals than the trifles which shew themselves in dress, and those which mereiful nature, that enemy of melancholy uniformity, always knows how to preserve between nose, mouth, eyes, etc.,—but this is all.

They carry about ices and confectionary. Some refreshment is perceptible in the room and the senses. People stick their teaspoons into their mouths, and enjoy, and are silent.

In the side-rooms one perceives the noise of the trumps which are struck by the players on the table. The company in the saloon sets itself now in motion—people turn themselves round—people rise up—they set down the little plates—they draw breath.

The piano is opened. Good. The magic tones of music will probably put to flight the demons of ennui. They thrust in a half-timid, half-bold lover of music, that he may play. He asserts that he cannot, but still seats himself at the instrument. He reddens, he turns pale, he trembles, but strikes forcibly upon the patient keys, and accords them to a song. Now, thank God that it is ended, and has not gone off worse.

Real talent after this makes itself heard, unpretending but calm in the consciousness of its power. They are songs from Friihof which are sung. Music, poetry, both are beautiful. The voice of the singer is certain and agreeable, although the heat and the crowd of people in the little room take away from its tone. The last accord has sounded,—why this silence in the company, this immovableness,—is it delight, rapture, inspiration? Repressed yawns and sleepy eyes make answer. The singer has sung to the walls. The supper-sirocco had disabled all feeling.

Dimmer and dimmer burn the lights, the heat becomes more oppressive, the air more sultry. People feel that they are just about to sink into dull unconsciousness; people compel themselves to be merry; they talk about fashions, dinners, members of parliament, and so on; one tries to squeeze it out of oneself; one overdoes it; one tells lies; one speaks slander, compelled by necessity, and in anxiety to say something however—and wishes oneself afar off.

But slowly wear away the hours, the minutes stretch and expand themselves in the same way. One feels the need of doing so oneself.

Yet once more one contemplates the engravings, but takes them in one's hand upside down. One still talks, but says yes instead of no, and no instead of yes; one suppresses yawns at the risk of being choked; one feels oneself weariful, other people intolerable; but one still keeps on simpering and smiling kindly.

From eight to nine—from nine to ten—from ten to eleven—from eleven to twelve, have we sat quietly and patiently in this little hell of heat and courtesy.

Our strength is at an end, midnight has struck, and now certainly people would either fall into a fainting fit or die; but the doors of the eating-room are opened, odours of eatables operate like eau de Cologne upon our nerves,—a voice proclaims, "it is served!"—and people are saved!

The company rise hastily, and in a mass. They go out in couples, or one after the other, into the eating-hall, where an immeasurable table, a new land of Canaan, offers all dainty gifts of plenty and of luxury to the fainting wanderers coming out of the wilderness.

People troop about the table; people throng together; each chooses a place for himself; this one will not sit by that; that one will not sit by this. At last they are seated.

Now goes on the eating with the greatest and most earnest zeal. People eat and eat and eat. People feel a desperate desire by anything of activity to indemnify themselves for the long inactivity and tedium to which they have been subjected, and they seize upon the only one which offers itself. One eats till one is satisfied; but one still eats on with unalterable zeal. At length the dessert is brought in. The mammas, satisfied themselves, cleverly empty the plates into their reticules and pocket-handkerchiefs—probably for the children who are left at home,—whilst the daughters read with great interest the devices upon the sugar work, which upon its summit contains unexampled stupidity, and exercise their wit in guessing charades.

The meal time, thank God, has an end like every thing else. The money of the host changed into veal-cutlets, tarts, and wine, rests in our stomachs. With this burden we withdraw again into the saloon, stand there yet a while pour l'honneur, and talk of nothing; take leave at length, and wearied body and soul drive home, that we may lie down in bed at one or half-past, with overlaid stomachs, with empty heads and hearts, which have preserved from the lately passed hours no other remembrances than such as have for their consequences on the following day, weariness and indisposition.

In the mean time the host and hostess of the supper go about amid extinguished lights, and congratulate one another that the history is come to an end, and comfort themselves for the expense of the supper by its having been splendid, and that people have had a deal of pleasure with them. Deceived, short-sighted mortals!—wait soon will your grateful guests thank you with new suppers, and the bill for ennui, which you now owe them, will be perfectly balanced.

There hast thou, my Amalia, a sketch of a great city supper, and, with few exceptions, the suppers of the capital. They are a mass of sleepy sisters, whose mother, called Laziness, and whose foster-mother, Custom, continue to conduct them about with low curtsies from house to house. People have called them a thousand unbearable names, but people still delay to prescribe them, because Laziness and Custom are stiff ladies who have known how to gain respect, and against whom people cannot offend unpunished.

If people ridicule their hoop petticoats, they run the risk of being called foolish and self-willed.

If thou fancy that a touch of November spleen have thrown a dark shadow over this supper-description, I will not exactly say no to it; but in the principal features it is true, and not caricatured.

It is incomprehensible to me how so many clever people can come together in order to fatigue themselves so.

If the genius of Pleasure were to publish a proclamation to its worshippers, with the invitation to enjoy themselves, I fancy to myself that its contents would probably be as follow:—

"Friends of pleasure, of cheerfulness and joy, old and young,—ye who would enjoy life, its short hours of rest, its fleeting minutes,—fly, fly suppers!

"If ye would, during the long winter evenings, drive away the spirits of ennui, then listen to my recipe:

"Assemble connexions, acquaintance, and friends, but not too many. The supper-sirocco arises from the crush and heat.

"Be ye only a few; be however cheerful! Kindle the lights in your rooms, but still more the lights of understanding and of refined jest in your heads. Let the easy fire of joy be lighted for each other. Yet, once more, be cheerful, be kind, and if you can, be witty! Dance, play, sing,—but do it all so that it may give you pleasure! Let nothing begin heavily, nothing end heavily! Entwine with light hands the garland of innocent joy; and for that purpose extend to every one, unpretendingly, his little flower!

"Is the pleasure of conversation dear to you, let the fire of ideas circulate among you; throw one to another the sparks of jest, which shine, but do not burn. Let thought reply to thought, feeling to feeling, smile to smile, like melodious echoes, or rather like those gentle and charming tones which the lightest touch calls forth from the attuned harp.

"The well-cared-for mind must not, however, forget the physical—the soul must not forget the body. Give to this a refreshment; but let this also be light, be given without formality, be as it were a pleasure. If people sit down to table with serious, important faces, with knife and fork and napkin, to eat—then it is a labour.

"People eat to live; people do not live to eat," says a wise man. Would you give yourselves pleasure, then eat and drink only to be able afterwards to laugh the more cordially."

When the all-wise Creator commanded that day and night should for twelve hours govern alternately our little globe, it certainly was by this his intention that man, his noble but weak child, should repose in the lap of the night, that he might be able to work and to enjoy himself amid the light of day. Therefore, let the end of the evening be the end of your day, and your pleasures. Let midnight find you quiet, and taking your rest; and closing the day in peace at the right time, sing with the noble and amiable poet Franzén—

After an evening
By calm joy attended,
And cordially ended,

Sleep we so calmly, and waken well pleased.

O heaven! the clock strikes eight—the horrible supper-hour! The carriage is already drawn up, my husband stands ready, and I have not one single flower in my hair. Good-night, happy Amalia, thou wilt soon go to bed, and I must yet arm myself for a campaign. To-morrow, if I am in a condition, I will sing—

After an evening
In eating expended,
Yawningly ended,

Sleep we so badly, and wake out of sorts.

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

A FEW words may be requisite to explain why the name of Mary Howitt does not stand on the title-page of this, as of all the preceding volumes of this series of translations from Miss Bremer. It is simply the effect of unavoidable circumstances. The new volume arrived by post from the authoress at a time when Mrs. Howitt's engagements made it impossible for her to execute the translation within the necessary period, that of simultaneous appearance with the original in Sweden. Under these circumstances, I have thrown aside my own engagements for the time to effect this object. It would have given me pleasure to have still placed the name of Mrs. Howitt on the title-page if it could have been fairly done. As it was her own original and zealous wish to introduce these charming works to the British public, it has given me the greatest pleasure to promote this object by every means in my power, not merely by risking the first publication of them when declined by the most eminent publishers, but by carefully collating the translations with the originals, putting them through the press, and, when circumstances made it necessary, even translating too. With the exception, however, of "The Neighbours," the second volume of which I was under the necessity of translating while the first was going through the press, no whole volume has been translated by me till this. The bulk of this rapid and excellent execution, of what the Quarterly Review calls "an infusion of a new and better life into our literature," is the meritorious work of Mary Howitt; and I can only express my regret, that present circumstances have made this temporary exception and explanation necessary. As the works of a lady, the translation seems to belong more properly to a lady, and the names of Fredrika Bremer and Mary Howitt harmonize morally and intellectually in a beautiful and affectionate unity, which I trust may not soon again be broken.

LIFE IN DALECARLIA.

MAY-DAY EVE.

"God and the people! how long you are, my girls!" exclaimed Mrs. Ingeborg Nordevall, as, dressed to go out, she appeared at the door of a room where two young ladies seemed to be in haste preparing themselves for an excursion. She held a branch of newly budded birch in her hand; and, as she made a menacing gesture with it, she added jocularly, "I will teach you, you butter-imps, to lag behind in the Valborgsmass* pilgrimage! Don't you see how it flames already on the hill-tops? Siri is already in the court, with Olof and Lasse, and Godelius is fallen asleep in waiting of you. If you don't make haste I'll—"

"We are ready—we come!" answered two young, glad voices; and Valborg and Brigitta hastened to accompany the caller, a handsome and stately lady, of some thirty years of age, with a very melodious voice. She resembled one of Ruben's handsome women, if you imagine these dressed in northern furs.

On the stairs was heard, from the garden, a childish, tittering laughter, and something which was between a grumbling and a grunting.

"Now, there is some mischief on foot," said Brigitta. "Heaven help my poor curate! I hear his sweet voice, and I hear Siri's laughter. She has certainly played him some prank: I must really think how I am to protect his back from her."

And it was actually the back of the curate Godelius that now seemed to be in danger, for it twisted itself into the most extraordinary curves, while he growled all the time in wonder at what was amiss with him. The fifteen-year old Siri shook with laughter, and two young gentlemen seemed to have great difficulty to prevent themselves bearing her company.

"What in all the world is the matter with thee, dear Godelius?" inquired Brigitta, in agitation; while she seized her lover by the arm, and shook it.

"That I do not rightly know," said he, with a troubled air; "but, as I sat there on the spring-board and ruminated, I felt all at once a sensation as if a snake were running along my backbone. I dread a paralytic stroke—some injury in the spinal marrow—uh-u-u! I feel it yet. It was too abominable!"

One of the young gentlemen, whom Mrs. Ingeborg called by the name of Olof, gave her, smiling, an explanation of the affair; which was, that Siri, as the curate sat on the spring-board, with his head stretched stiffly forward, and that on a tolerably long neck, stole softly behind him, and let a little smooth stone drop between his back and his clothes, at which the curate sprung up in terror.

"Such childishness!" said Mrs. Ingeborg, shaking her head at Siri. "But let us now go to Ostnorsberg, I see that the neighbours have already assembled there."

"Yes, let us go," said Brigitta; "and if thou only keep thyself warm, Godelius, thou wilt find that there is not the least danger to thy spinal marrow, and that thou merely dreamed."

"Dreamed! Nonsense, people don't dream like that—I felt it distinctly."

"To Ostnorsberg!" interrupted Brigitta, "and we will dispute about Latin on the way."

"Hast thou made such rapid progress in the ancient languages since we last met, my cousin?" demanded Olof, smiling.

"Ah," replied Brigitta, modestly, "it is only in the Latin that my knowledge is a little uncommon."

"To Ostnorsberg! we must not linger!" again exclaimed Mrs. Ingeborg; and towards Ostnorsberg now directed itself the little troop which issued from Mora Parsonage, followed by a Dalkarl and a Kulla,* who carried baskets of wine and provisions.

"But you must promise me," said Mrs. Ingeborg to her young companions, "not to look round before we have arrived on the height. I wish you at once to see the eye of Dalarna† in all its glory. He that looks round before I give permission, I doom—not to become a pillar of salt—but to—"

"No penal dooms, my sweet mother!" interrupted the young Mr. Olof, taking his mother's hand and kissing it; "we obey you so gladly, and threats may provoke opposition or the like evil spirits. Are not all goblins, and ghosts, and witches abroad this evening? Is it not against them that people, ever since the day of paganism, have kindled fires this evening? Or how? I have been so long away hence, that I have almost forgotten our old sagas."

"Let us attack the curate," said Mrs. Ingeborg, "for he knows every thing from the time of the pagans; and will tell us the origin of this custom, one of the few which still universally prevail in our dales, and, as I believe, in most of the provinces of Sweden."

Modestly lecturing, in a deep bass voice, thus pronounced the curate:—

"This custom is so old that we have neither a perfect account of its origin nor of its significance. But it is supposed that it originated in a sacrificial pagan festival, and that has given occasion to the belief that at this feast even living children were sacrificed; and that, in order to exorcise or propitiate the evil natures, who, the people believed, at the opening of spring, commenced their rambles over wood and field—partly flying, partly riding; and whom we now call by the names of goblins, witches, fairies, etc. It was believed, also, that at this season giants issued from the earth and the mountains, to seek intercourse with the children of men. Fires were frequently kindled upon the sepulchral mounds, and before them offerings made even to the good powers, especially to those who dispense fruitful seasons. Probably, scarcely any one now believes seriously in such superstition, yet still, as formerly, they kindle fires on the hills on this evening; and it is still regarded as a bad omen if any extraordinary or foul shape of man or beast shows itself at the fire."

* A peasant and peasantess of Dalarna, literally the Dales, but well known to us as Dalecarlia.

"And now, as formerly, resound the shepherd's horns and pipes* from the mountains," exclaimed Mrs. Ingeborg. "God and the people! how charmingly they sound! Now they blow from the hill of Elfsdal—but no one must look round him yet, recollect that."

"Does the curate, then, not believe at all in goblins and demony?" asked the mischievous Siri, with assumed gravity.

"No, not at all; but on Frej and Freya, who, above all other divinities, are worshipped in Dalarna, I believe, because the god of the year's growth and the goddess of love remain always powerful here. On them I believe, but not on goblins, for—ey! ey! ey!"

"What now, Godelius?" demanded Brigitta; "art thou bewitched? Why, wilt thou thus go and pay homage to the heathen deities?"

"Yes, they are much better than Christian imps!" exclaimed the irritated curate; who when he would have taken his handkerchief out of his coat-pocket, found a rose-bush (N. B. without roses) planted there, and pricked himself sharply on the thorns. Brigitta was obliged to release him from the hush, and then pursued with it the "Christian imp," which, by its half-smothered laugh, was discovered to be Siri; but, light as a hind, she sprang out of the reach of the avenger's rose-bush.

In the meantime Olof walked by his step-mother's side. It was a chill evening, this last of April, and snow-flakes flew at intervals down out of the thin clouds; which nevertheless, did not prevent the stars from glancing forth all the more clearly. The loud, but mellowed tones of the shepherd's horn, that resounded through the country both far and near, the uncertain, strange, red-flaming fire, which began to light up heaven and earth, the marvellous sagas of the olden time which arose in the memory, all contributed to awake a certain romantic sensation, as well in the young man as in the older woman, and both seemed to find a pleasure in enjoying this moment in silence together.

On Ostnor's hill a multitude of people was collected; mostly peasantry belonging to the parish of Mora, in their sober but picturesque costume. A group of several persons, whose dress distinguished them as belonging to the gentry, stood also on the hill, not far from a great, but yet unkindled pile of sagots. This group turned their eyes towards the road which leads to the Mora parsonage, and the little joyous Prostinna* of Sollerön exclaimed:—

"See! there have we at length the Great Mother in Dalon,† with her suite! She gives her arm to a young man—no doubt, her stepson, young Mr. Olof, who is since returned from his foreign tour with the young Count U—. He is said to be an excellent young man. I am quite delighted that I shall see him. And what a happiness it must be to him to see father and mother again, after an absence of four or five years! What a pity that the father is not at home!"

"But he is expected home from the Diet every day," said the captain from Noreberg, "and so we shall probably hear him preach soon, and that is something to hear."

"If we only do not hear also that he will soon leave us," said the great prost from Sollerön. I have heard that he is to be made bishop of the diocese; and then——"

"I can well believe that they want to have him," said an old Dalman, who overheard the conversation; "but I cannot believe that Gustaff Nordevall will leave us here in Mora, where we love him, ay, as if he were our own father. No, that I cannot believe."

"And if I know our Great Mother in Dalon, truly," said the prostinna from Sollerön, "she will rather be prostinna in Mora, than arch-bishopess in Upsala itself, grand as she then would be."

"Yes, she is a rare lady," said the Dalman; "she farms the glebe like a first-rate man, and, towards the sick and unhappy, she is a real mother. When the disturber took my cow in autumn, she gave me another in its place, out of her own farm-yard, that my children might not be without milk, as she said. God bless her!"

"And not enough that she manages the husbandry of the pastoral lands, that the professor may wholly devote himself to the duties of his congregation, and to his learned labours," continued the prostinna; "she plants trees, she cultivates flowers, she superintends the spinning and weaving; she has time for everything; and everything goes on with her like play. This comes from her knowing how to estimate able people, and to make them so devoted to her that they would go through fire for her."

* Prost and Prostinna will be retained in this translation. The Prost is a sort of rural dean, but as we have no such title as rural deaness, the frequent use of it would be doubly awkward from its strangeness and its length. The words have been translated by Mrs. Howitt provost and provostess, but that is not strictly correct, as the provost is a civil officer.

† So was called in former times a stately prostinna, in Leksand, called also Zebrozyntia, married to the rector Uno Trollus, and the mother of the line of the Trollus. She died, says the Biography of the Clergy of Westera, in the year 1657, lamented by the whole Dal country, which honoured her, for her noble person and good heart, with the title of "Stormoder i Dalon," the great mother in Dalon. The officiating minister commenced her funeral sermon with a lament which he heard on the way from a countryman in Gagnef: "Shall I not weep for the great mother in Dalon is dead?" Her memory still lives in honour in the district, and the title of respect is usually inherited by the most stately and genteel prostinna there.

‡ The Bear, which the Dal people do not like of name.

* Lurar, a peculiar kind of very long, straight, wooden pipes.

"It is now said," added the captain, "that she will also have a wedding in the house."

"Wedding!" exclaimed the prostinna. "For the curate Godelius and his Brigitta perhaps, who have been betrothed these seven years?"

"Oh, no! they may possibly be betrothed for seven years more, before he gets anything; and she has nothing. No, a wedding between the young Mr. Olof, and the professor's niece, the lovely Valborg, who has been for sometime in the house, and who is said to possess a neat little fortune."

"Olof is yet so very young," said diffidently the prostinna Martina; "he cannot be more than three-and-twenty, and I fancy Valborg is about as old. No, it were better that he wait for the prostinna's niece, little Siri, who is not either without property——"

"Siri!" exclaimed the prostinna from Solle-ron; "that wood-sprite! Wait for her! Yes, wait may one. She is now rather a wild cat than a human creature; and if she ever turn out a good housewife, then . . . . She has now been near upon a year with the Nordevalls, and they have not yet been able to bring her into any order. No; give me Valborg. That is the crown of young ladies: handsome as a princess, and domestic, and still as . . . . all young maidens should be."

"Yes; you think a great deal of Valborg," said the prostinna Martina, half displeased; "and handsome she certainly is, and excellent, too—that I believe. I have only this against her, that she is so perfect and so unapproachable. I have thrown away at least half a score of courtesies upon her. She never says any thing to me. Little Siri is . . . an imp, if you will; but she has something extraordinary—something captivating about her. She can be sweet as one of God's angels sometimes, that I have seen. And you should hear her play on the flute, when she believes herself alone. And a brave spirit is she too, not afraid of any thing. You should have seen her last winter, when she was sledging down a hill, with half-a-dozen little peasant children upon it; and a great girl who stood behind sprang off, and thereby gave the sledge a push which sent it in an oblique direction, and in full speed exactly towards a pond. You should have seen with what presence of mind the courageous girl rolled off the children to the right and left, into the snow, only to speed on towards the pond herself, where she indeed plunged headlong in, but quickly helped herself again upon the ice, and then shouted to the alarmed children, 'Here I am, hurrah!' Another time she was not the less brave and adroit, when a furious bull had tossed on his horns a little seven-year-old girl, and stooped his horns to toss her again. Siri, who saw it, sprang forward, though she was alone, and with a stout stake struck the bull, between the horns, at the same time crying to the child, 'Run, girl, run!' The little girl did not require that said twice. She sprang away, while the bull, stupefied by the blow, stood motionless. When Siri saw that the child was rescued, she cast away the stake, and ran too, and came safe off. You must admit that these things testify to no ordinary degree of magnanimity and courage. But you always talk of Valborg and Valborg. Well, well! They say young Mr. Olof is a right handsome young man; I may, perhaps, come to talk as much of young Olof, too."

At this threat, to which the husband listened smiling, there arose a movement amongst the people. The prostinna of Mora appeared on the hill, amid greetings from right and left.

"Up on the height!" shouted she to her companions. "Now, children, look around you;" and a universal "oh!" of admiration followed her words; for there lay now before them Silja—the Eye of Dalarna—with Sollerön for its pupil, clear as a mirror between the dark heights, lit up by a hundred fires from the hills in Leksand to the hills in Elfdal. It was a glorious scene. Mora church, with its copper roof, and its lofty spire, shone in the fire-light on its green point of land between the river and the lake; and the pyramids of the north, the ever-verdant pines, which clothe the hills of Dalarna and now stood in full bloom, reared their red-gleaming tops amid the deep blue heaven. But blacker than ever fell the night into the clefts and abysses beneath them.

Young Olof's eyes also sparkled as he contemplated the spectacle, and listened to his step-mother, who named to him the most remarkable hills, while she pointed them out with her staff. "There," said she, "hast thou Wäsa-hill, Hyckje-fell, and Gopshus mountain, where a great giant is said to dwell—all in Elfdal. There thou seest the fires in Orsa. Here, over against us, have we Lekberg, where music is heard, and where peal mysterious bells; and here, here obliquely across the lake . . . ."

"Middagsberg! is that not?" interposed Olof; "I know it again by its pyramidal form and its height. I have heard one of my friends talk of it who once strove for many hours to reach its summit, The mountain in shape is not unlike Vesuvius."

"But instead of a burning crater it has on its top a silver-clear spring," continued Mrs. Ingeborg. "There hast thou Sollerön, with its white church, and there beyond hast thou Björk-hill and the other mountains in Leksand. See, now, they kindle more fires in Rättvik, and the lurar resound thence. Is it not glorious here in Dalarna, Olof! and hast thou ever in other lands seen its equal?"

"Nowhere in the whole world," answered Olof; "especially when we call to mind the great reminiscences which here have their home! Glorious must it have been here in former days when the bells of Mora pealed defiance to the foe, and the people streamed from the surrounding parishes over the hills, over the lake, in their long wooden skates, with bows and spears, and gathered here, and drove back or took captive their enemies."

"Yes, that was indeed glorious, but better is it now," said Mrs. Ingeborg, "for now dwell Peace and Freedom together in our dales. But see! there thou hast a memorial from those times of contest!—yon little white building on the other side of the lake. It is the cellar of Utmedland, where the great Gustavus was concealed. To-morrow we will visit it."

"Oh, that will be charming!" said Olof. "But what fire is that which burns down below there by the river's bank? It has chosen a most modest position amongst its comrades, the other Valborgsmass fires."

"That is a wretched jest," said Mrs. Ingeborg. "That fire is kindled upon the headland, where, formerly, witches were burnt, and where three piles stood over against the church, so that all the people from Mora and the surrounding parishes could see the 'hideous spectacle,' as the Rev. J. Moreus calls it, in his account of them."

"Oh, it is there or thereabouts where the species of willow, salix daphnoides, grows. How I long to see it! To-morrow I must seek for it."

"Yes, I have heard that it grows there on the shore and the island," said Mrs. Ingeborg; "but we must now go to our neighbours." And with hearty apologies for the delay, Mrs. Ingeborg now betook herself to her friends from Sollerön and Noreberg, and introduced to them her newly-arrived stepson, whose handsome person, and easy, somewhat proud bearing, but most polite manners, made an agreeable and lively impression, especially on the prostinna Martina, who declared to her prost that her heart stood in great jeopardy.

Lieutenant Lasse, Brigitta's brother, who had come with his sister a fortnight before to Mora, was also introduced. The young people collected around Mrs. Ingeborg, for she loved the young, and it was her delight to endeavour to entertain them.

They now brought to her a torch of pine-wood, with the request that she would kindle the fire upon Ostnorsberg, and the "Great Mother in Dalom" complied with the desire; and there quickly arose a lofty and roaring flame from a pile of fagots and pitch-casks, and shouts and cries in manifold tones rose with it high into the welkin. The men, and especially the young ones, dragged great boughs and limbs of trees out of the wood, and flung them upon the fire; the snow-flakes accompanied them, and hissed in the flame, which seemed rather enlivened than damped by them.

Scarcely had the fire on the Ostnorsberg blazed up, when, on the top of Middagsberg a flame was seen, which at first seemed to dance to and fro fantastically, but at length grew into a great fire, and mounted higher and shone more brilliantly than all the fires in the neighbourhood.

"God and the people!" exclaimed Mrs. Ingeborg, "who kindles such a fire on Middagsberg! Such a thing I never recollect to have seen. It must be the king of the mountain himself."

"Yes, it is he—it is he!" exclaimed Siri, clapping her hands, and looking quite wildly in the light of the flaming fire.

"Siri—Siri!" said Mrs. Ingeborg softly, and in an admonitory tone. Brigitta and Valborg gave each other a glance. Siri withdrew, mixed among the peasantry, offered snuff to old men and old women, took snuff with them out of a little box of birch bark, and danced about with the little children.

Mrs. Ingeborg also now turned to the peasantry, greeted them, and shook hands with them.

"Now comes the Dalkari travelling," said she, with a glance at the river, and using the customary expression of the country for the arrival of the spring flood.

Much was said of the excavations made by the river in the sand, of danger to the Mora church, which the channel of the flood continually encroached upon. They talked, too, of the prospects of the year's crops, and old husbandmen shook their heads doubtfully, and pointed to the fires on the mountains, which directed themselves towards the north, an omen of a cold spring.

But Mrs. Ingeborg never credited unfavourable forebodings, and consoled them even now with her favourite quotation in suchlike troubles,—

"Yet lives the ancient Froy!"

And Dal people, who knew that the "Great Mother in Dalom" intimated something good, felt themselves consoled, for her word was a king's word with the people of Mora.

When she returned to her company, the people continued to converse amongst themselves in that singular dialect peculiar to the Dal people, which is not understood by other Swedes, but which is asserted by late philologists to be Icelandic, the language in which the most primitive northern tongue yet lives.

People now began to dive into the provision baskets, and to think of refreshments. The prostinnas from Mora and Sollerön treated the people liberally with a splendid ale brewed from the corn of Rättvik, for the corn of Rättvik is the best in Dalarna. When the routine of entertainment came to the young people, several voices called for Siri, but Siri was not there. "She had gone into the wood," said some of the people, and Olof and Brigitta instantly set off to seek her. They had called several times, but without receiving any answer, when they suddenly perceived a strong rustling amongst the boughs of the trees, and saw hastening away a tall man, who plunged into the concealment of the wood. A moment afterwards, Siri, laughing, came springing out of a close thicket, where she seemed to have been hiding herself from them.

"Don't leap and laugh so, Siri," said Brigitta, half angry; "it makes you look so like a magpie; and witches, it is said, can change themselves into magpies. And you ought not to go so alone into the wood. We have just now seen a great fellow, who slunk away, and who came from the very direction where you were, you little leapfrog."

"That was most likely one of the giants that the curate talked of—perhaps the king of the mountain, himself," said Siri, lightly, and hastened on before them to the fire, which burnt between the ruddy-gleaming birches.

Brigitta shook her head and said, "There is something wrong about her. Ever since the time that I was a fish, and she was mountain-kidnapped,* she is strangely—"

"Thou a fish, and she mountain-kidnapped!" exclaimed Olof, smiling; "that sounds right merry and odd."

"Yes; but it is far less merry and more strange than it sounds," replied Brigitta. "But I shall tell thee of that another time, for now they call us to come yonder."

Refreshments and gaiety were now in full play around the Valborgsmass fire. With great stakes and poles the Mora peasants roused up the fire, while, all the time more fuel was thrown on, songs were sung and fiddles screamed; and, at Mrs. Ingeborg's motion, all formed themselves into a great circle, and slowly moved round the fire, singing,—

"Heigh, to dance it merrily!
As our neighbours so do we;
All we take into the ring,
All around shall gaily spring;
The barrel it is tilted."

That was the crowning scene of the evening. Mrs. Ingeborg with her own and the family from Sollerön, left the fire immediately after, and set out on the way towards Mora. The peasants grew fewer and fewer, and trooped off in different flocks, each home to his family. But scarcely had their fires grown dim, when another light illuminated the tops of the mountains, and chased away the night. All now became silent in the Dales; sleep spread his wings over weary men; and the frost-frog flung his cold mantle over the earth, and quenched the glowing coals in the ashes of the Valborgsmass fires.

THE FIRST OF MAY.

It was morning, and the sun, warm and bright, kissed away night and frost from the forehead of the earth; and the earth, the ancient, holy earth, as the Edda-song calls her, lay there in glory, with her silent strength rising out of the deep: her ruddy, verdurous woods, her plains of deepening green, her resounding waters, her swelling spring-full life. A pair of beautiful, thoughtful human eyes, contemplated the spectacle of the morning. Mrs. Ingeborg stood at the window of her chamber, in the parsonage of Mora, and inhaled the fresh morning air, and let her glance now rest upon the young rye, which stood trembling in the morning wind; now upon the clear waters of the Dalelf* and the Silja, which embraced the peninsula where the church and the parsonage lay; now upon the dark pine-woods, with their delicate, red, fresh bursting flowers; now on the far blue hills,—a constant line of beauty in the landscape of Dalarna. There lay much in this glance. Enjoyment of the beauty of earth, thankful joy in it; and yet a pensive yearning after something still more distant, something "beyond the mountains," some fullness and glory, which is never found but in the visions of the future, or in the lost. She was lovely, was Mrs. Ingeborg, as she stood with her dark-brown hair braided over her lightly-arched brow, and simply fastened up behind, in her fresh, light dress, which in wide folds surrounded her somewhat full but noble form. She was beautiful, especially from the expression of soulful goodness, which was the grand feature of her ace.

"To-night he will be here!" said she, half aloud to herself, and pressed a letter to her lips. She looked again through the window. Her looks grew suddenly radiant, as at some delightful object, then followed a short but passionate sigh, a movement of the hand to the heart, as if a pang were felt there; a rapid paleness chased the colour from her cheek; Mrs. Ingeborg closed the window, and went into another room. A moment afterwards her musical voice was heard giving orders in the house; servant men and maids were put in motion, and all was life and fresh activity in consequence.

Turn we to the object which called up these varying emotions of pleasure and disquiet, and behold a young girl with a white kroka on her head (that is, a sort of head-dress between a bonnet and a cap, which resembles the "Flax" of the Dal women, and which is universally worn by the young girls in Dalarna. She has a quantity of plants in her apron, and comes with a light step along the road from the river past the church, and up towards the parsonage. It is Siri. Just now she rowed alone in a little boat over the river, and seems to be returning home from an early morning ramble.

In a room of the Mora parsonage we find Brigitta, and with her the young Mr. Olof, who is in great activity unpacking a couple of boxes of books, but all the while evidently absorbed by the conversation that was going on between him and his friend and relative Brigitta, who was at the same time arranging a large coffee-tray, and talking with Olof about all the world, and now lastly of his home and family.

"Is not aunt quite divine?" asked she.

"My mother! Yes, she is as charming now as she was ten years ago, when she became my mother; and I made a resolve not to endure her. Oh, how well do I recollect that! I was then a stubborn boy of thirteen, and had made a compact with myself never to obey any woman, and above all, she who was to become my stepmother; and whom I had yet not seen. I determined to be most thoroughly refractory and haughty towards her. And so I actually was when she came into the house; but, behold, she had not been a week there before, to be short, I adored her, obeyed her slightest beck, sought to guess her wishes, and was half distracted when I imagined that I saw in her eye a severe glance. Yes, she acquired the most absolute power over me,—I cannot tell rightly how. But so did she over my father, and over the whole house. My father had been a widower many years; and his temper at that time was not good. I had always been rather afraid of him; for our dispositions did not seem to accord. Home was gloomy and heavy; but with my stepmother came the sun and gladness into it. My father became happy, all became joyous; and my happiest time began. My parents then lived at Westeras. When they, five years ago, removed to Mora, I was obliged to part from them, and proceed to Upsala to study, and then followed my foreign travel, which was very interesting. But oh, it is most beautiful to be at home again!"

"Yes, and to find in the storehouse at home both old and new," said Brigitta. "What do you think of Walborg?"

"What can I yet think of her! She is a very handsome statue."

"And of Siri?"

"Oh, why, she is really very wild,—a regular madcap. And it becomes her a great deal worse now than it did five years ago when I saw her last with the generalska, her mother, at Silfverdal. She was then a spoiled, wild young creature, but had a peculiarly captivating manner. I shall never forget how, one evening late, after her mother was gone to bed, she stole out into the court, and played and danced there with a kitten quite alone. I see still how the small white feet flew, like beams of light on the dark, damp ground, while she threw up small stones and caught them again, or let the kitten make evolutions over her head. She made me think of the elfin queen, who, the sagas say, dances on summer nights, small, delicate, white, with golden locks. I played, nevertheless, the part of a stern Mentor, for I went out into the court, and compelled the little dancer to betake herself to the house, and to her bed again. She was then very angry with me; but we afterwards became very good friends, and called each other brother and sister. She was then ten years old, and was brought up in the most extraordinary manner. The general had allowed her to grow up like a boy, and amused himself with teaching her to ride on horseback, swim, etc., as becomes boys; and her own inclination favoured this. After his death, the generalska sought at once to change the maiden's habits; but she was obliged to desist from the vain endeavour, which exasperated her temper. I have heard that she was locked in, and kept without food for whole days, to bring her to submission and quietness; but as this did not succeed, she was let out, and became more free and wild than ever. This sort of life ought not, however, now to continue any longer. She will soon be sixteen years of age, and has been already nearly a year here in the house. How can my father bear with this her wild disposition?"

"He shakes his head at it," said Brigitta; "but at the bottom, I believe, that he likes the girl, and is amused by her. When she came into the house, he remained at home but for a few months, and was then obliged to proceed to the Diet."

"And my mother, what does she think—what does she say?"

"Ah, that is the worst of it. That is something that I cannot understand. My aunt has power over all people; but over Siri she has it not. What do you think of this, that she has never yet been able to persuade her to accompany her to church! That is something very strange between them, but good it is not. She does not obey my aunt; and indeed she obeys nobody. She follows her own will, and that is not exactly bad neither, when she does not take it into her head to play Godelius tricks; for, next to roaming about in wood and field, her dearest joy is to play with little children, dress them, to relate legends to them; and to tame and tend animals. All the servants love her as the very apple of their eye; and she is much more with them than with any of us. Valborg cannot endure her at all; my curate regards her as little short of a witch, who would almost deserve to be just a trifle burnt, but I —"

"Well, and you, Brigitta?"

"I like her; and if I were a man, why, I should most likely be in love with her."

"With her! Are you mad! She is not, perhaps, without a certain wild grace; but then she is not the least handsome; rather plain; no striking feature; a potato nose; no colour; a pale weather-beaten complexion."

"Ah! the men with their beauty first and last! I tell thee, Olof, that Siri, without a feature, and without colour or complexion, has a beauty, which is more beautiful than the Grecian loveliness. She has expression, and mien, which are not simply enchanting, but something more. And then there is over the maiden, over both her body and her soul, a freshness, a fragrance, a dew, if I may say so, that is more delicious than all the most beautiful of forms and colours. Yes, yes, thou mark me! if some fine day thou dost not become smitten with the madcap with the potato nose."

Olof laughed aloud; the door flew open in the same moment, and Siri walked in with torn clothes, her light hair in great disorder, but fresh and smiling as the morning, as with beaming eyes she extended to Olof a shrubby plant with misty-blue stems, and fine golden catkins on the naked twigs.

No sooner did the young botanist cast his eyes on it, than he started up, seized it hastily, and kissed it, exclaiming, "Salix Daphnoides!"

Siri flung herself on a trunk, and laughed heartily.

"Now, I think you are all mad together!" exclaimed Brigitta; "and it is not very pleasant for a reasonable mortal to live with mad folks; for, although I was a fish once, I have always behaved myself like a human creature, and never given myself up to eat or to kiss weeds."

"Weeds! is this a weed?" exclaimed the enraptured botanist. "It is the rarest plant in the whole world; for in the whole world it is found nowhere but here at Mora; and with its beautiful dewy-blue stem, and its flowers on the bare twigs, grows only in the sand here by Mora! I should have already sought after it this morning, if I had not first overslept, and then over-gossiped myself. Where have you found this lovely branch, Siri! But you have hurt yourself! You have struck yourself in the eye!"

"Ah! that is nothing. The twig struck me when I was trying to break it off. Perhaps, it was to revenge itself; or, perhaps, it is the doing of one of the witches; for it is from the headland by the river, where they were burnt."

And as Olof went into another and lighter apartment, in order to contemplate and examine his willow branch and its blossoms, Siri continued half lying upon the trunk, and with her cheek resting on her crossed arms, to talk to Brigitta. "Only think! as I broke off the branch I saw one of the black-burnt stakes of the pile protrude out of the sand! Only think, if the witches had crept out of the earth with it! Hu!" and Siri laughed. "It was indeed horrible," continued she, more seriously, "that there, by the lovely river, stood formerly three piles, and on them, once on a St. Bartholomew's Day, they burnt seventeen human beings. But nearly the whole witch troop went bravely to their death, only two lamented and bewailed themselves."

"Thou great God! Why were they burnt?" exclaimed Brigitta, with horror, but little acquainted with the history of the place.

"Because they rode to Blakulla," answered Siri, again, with her ringing laugh; "and," continued she, in a half whisper, "because they had been with Satan! When the witches entered into his service, they each received a horn, a rake, and a needle. When they stuck the needle into a wall, it opened, so that they could drive through with horse and carriage, and, though it cracked loudly, no one in the house could hear it; and when the witch was gone away the wall closed again so closely that no one could discern that it had ever been open. But when the witches came into a room, they said to the children in it, 'Come now, ye devil's brats, and follow me to the banquet.' And the children could not withstand, for out of the horn came a splendour that nearly blinded them. Then the witch took the children and proceeded to other dwellings, where she collected more, for, if she had not a sufficient number with her when she came to Satan, she was received with curses, and often with blows too, and was commanded to take herself off quickly, and bring more children. When now the witch had collected a multitude of children, she set herself upon the bag-steed, which was usually a cow, and so rode backwards through the air with them, and turned herself the back foremost. And as they went, she cried, 'So we ride up, and so we ride down, on to the devil.' Is not that funny?" and Siri laughed merrily, especially as Brigitta answered,—

"I cannot exactly say. Well, and how did it go on then?"

"Oh," continued Siri, "then they went farther, and on the journey they entered barns, and the witch held her bag under the sheaves, saying, 'Ear draw ear! and straw draw straw!' and then the ears came flying by heaps into the bag, but the straw was left lying behind. On the way the witch rested on the church roof sometimes, to wait for her companions, and when they came then they bragged one against another of the number of children they brought with them, and they placed the children on the roof, where they looked like little jackdaws. In the meantime the witches went into the steeple, and scraped the metal from the bells. When they again set out, they rode through a blue cloud, and scattered out into it the metal scraped from the bells, saying, 'Let my soul never come nearer to God than these particles of metal to the bell!' When they arrived at Blakulla, the children saw a house that shone like clear gold. And then the witches entered, and each bowed the knee before Satan, and called him, 'Lord and Great Prince!' Then the witch conducted the children before Satan, one at once, and said, 'Behold, Great Father, what handsome devil's children I have with me!' Satan demanded of the children, whether they would serve him, and most of them answered 'Yes.' For though Satan was always bound with a great chain, yet he looked so magnificent, and all around him looked so grand, that it was almost impossible for them to say anything but 'Yes.' Then Satan promised to stand by them, and that they should have joy and pleasure so long as they lived. He then marked them, by biting them on the forehead at the root of the hair, or in the little finger, and a pin was dipped in the blood, with which the child's name was written in a great book, and the child received from Satan a silver rix-dollar. If, however, the child should talk of it, or should confess where it had been, then the rix-dollar changed itself into a wooden spoon, or a chip, or a splinter of wood. When the child got this fastening-penny, the witch was glad, and said to the child, 'Hereafter thou shalt always be mine, and if thou dost hold thy tongue, thou shalt always accompany me to the feast.' On that the witches began to dress food, to roast, to bake, and to brew, to make sausages, to distil brandy, and to set out a splendid banquet, where all went merrily, and Satan played under the table with his tail, which he struck upon the floor. When the feast and dance were ended the master of the ceremonies announced, at the command of Satan, where they next should assemble, or hold their conventicle—for so the feast was called. And so the witches brought the children home again, each to its own place. The children also got fine horns, in Blakulla, and learned to curse memory and sense, heaven and earth, all crops in the field, and all birds, except the magpie. New names also they received in Blakulla, as, 'Ugly Slut,' 'God's death,' 'Murrain-take-thee!' Is that not beautiful?" And Siri lifted up her head, and laughed again heartily.*

"Beautiful! no, that can I not find it!" said Brigitta. "A more hideous history I scarcely remember to have heard. Dear Siri! where did you get it?"

"From . . . a magpie!" answered Siri, nodding archly. "And the magpie has promised also, some fine day, to take me to Blakulla. For I would fain fly through the air, amongst the blue clouds, and see how it is up there."

"Heaven preserve thee, girl, how thou talkest! Olof!" continued Brigitta, addressing the * What Siri here relates is found, for the most part, in an imperfect manuscript which has been printed by C. G. Kröningsvärd, with "Proceedings in the Matter of Witchcraft in Dalarna, in the years 1668 and 1673." The senator Lorentz Creutz, and other much-respected men, sat in a commission, which held a court of inquiry over this "Disturbance," and a bloody one it was, for not less than forty-seven persons were put to death within the district of Fahlun, between the year 1668 and the 15th of April, 1671. In 1673, this singular disease broke out again in Dalarna, and with it the absurd treatment which seemed to augment its contagion. But the Countess Catharina Charlotta de la Gardie, born Taube, espoused the cause of the unhappy, bewildered people, and succeeded in putting an end to the persecution; and with that the disease itself, by degrees, ceased. Yet in our own day is observed, now and then, a slight return of it; for when the imagination of the Dal people is kindled, it readily becomes gloomy, and teems with monsters. But different means are now resorted to against it than fire and stake. Some time ago there was at Sollerön a young girl, who said that she was every night conveyed to Blakulla. The parents, honest but simple people, were extremely troubled at this. They watched over their daughter; they bound her with cords on her bed, but all in vain. Weeping, she related in the morning that she had been again in Blakulla. The distressed parents finally went with her to the priest on the island, and implored him, with tears in their eyes, to rescue their daughter out of the claws of Satan. After the priest had several times conversed with the girl, he said to her one day, "I know a means, and a certain means, to help thee, but it will cost me much. Yet, as no other means seems availing, we must make use of that." With much solemnity he caused the girl to seat herself on a very comfortable chair in the middle of the room, took Cornelius Nepos from the book-shelf, and began to read a chapter. Before this was finished, the girl slept soundly. When she awoke, the priest announced to her that she was cured, and—she was!

young man who was now re-entering, "what are these histories of witches and rides to Blakulla, here in Dalarna, that Siri talks of? Does she invent them, or have they some foundation?"

"Foundation have they so far, that such histories and a bloody tribunal to annihilate them raged here in Dalarna, especially in the parishes around the Silja," said Olof. "Many people, both old and young, were accused of dealings with the Evil One."

"Yes," interposed Siri, "and amongst them was a young woman who protested that she was innocent, but said she 'did not desire to live.' And she was handed over to the 'Doom of God.' 'Doom of God!' How wild and awful that sounds!" And Siri slightly shuddered, and turned pale, while, as if for herself, she softly ejaculated, "God's doom!"

"Look at her now!" whispered Brigitta; but the admonition was not needed, for Olof never turned his observant glances from the charming self-willed young maiden, who seemed affected by a deep emotion.

"There is much that is mysterious in this world," said Siri, thoughtfully; "and it seems to me that all that is mysterious is entertaining, and I would fain see and make trial of all."

"Even to journey to Blakulla!" said Olof.

"Yes, that above all things!" exclaimed Siri: "I would right gladly see Satan!"

"By no means a recommendable acquaintanceship, my little sister," said Olof, laughing.

"Think, if he should bite thee in the forehead!" said Brigitta.

"Ah," replied Siri, "I should take good care of myself; I should not go so near him. Besides, he is bound with a chain. The witches saw stoutly at it to get it off, but so soon as the link is nearly asunder, and ready to open, there come angels and solder it together again; so that it becomes as thick as before. But I must now feed my animals and then I will ride out. Will you go with me? I will lead you all round the world."

"Only not to Blakulla!" said Brigitta, "for thither I certainly will not accompany thee."

With a hearty laugh, Siri left the room, but dropped, in going, certain moss-branches, which Olof gathered up.

"That is Siri's trash, as Valborg and others in the house call it," said Brigitta. "She goes continually out, collects mosses, and stones, and birds' eggs, and dead butterflies, and flies too, I believe, and other curious things, which she finds out in the woods and fields, and stows them in her room, till it looks like a regular lumber room."

"Hum! that lumber room I shall make free to look into," said Olof.

A minute after he heard a clear and sonorous whistle in the court, and saw Siri standing on the steps of one of the wings of the buildings, surrounded by a crowd of beautiful creatures, which partly fluttered round her head and partly thronged around her feet in order to receive from her corn, bread, and caresses. Amongst the wingless creatures Olof observed a handsome elk-calf, with little bells attached to its growing horns, and he learned that its mother had been shot at a bear-hunt in the winter, and that the young one, instead of attempting to fly, would follow the men, its mother's murderers. The elk-calf was brought to Mora, where Siri became its protectress, and the animal soon followed her with the fidelity and affection of a dog. And Durathor, as the elk-calf was called, after one of the stags that, according to the Edda, pasture on the top of Ydrasil, was secured from annoyance in the court, but followed no one but Siri. Now he licked her hand, and gazed at her with a strange affection in his clear brown eyes.

While Olof helps Siri to feed her animals we will, for a moment, follow Brigitta. We may do this with all confidence. Her forehead is to us a guarantee for her prudence, and in the whole of her little, round, lively figure, there is so thorough an expression of good-humour and cheerfulness, that we do not wonder that her friends consider it to be quite unnatural if they find her enraged for ten minutes together. Her small, arch eyes, her good-natured, gladsome countenance, promise, moreover, to put us into good humour. And that which still more captivates us with Brigitta, and what we have ascertained from good authority, is that, with the most joyous disposition, she has yet an actual enthusiasm for the tragic sublime, and a great susceptibility to every thing poetical, but never writes verses.

We stop with her now before a tall, thin gentleman, who, with a very abstracted air, sits sunk in a Greek text. Up to him marches Brigitta with a stage step, and says, solemnly,

"Salutem doctoribus venerabilibus! Comment vous portez vous diesen morgen?"

At which the abstracted figure awakens up, looks at her, smiles, and says,—

"What language, pray, may that be?"

"Does not your high-learnedness understand Babelish—a language as old as the world? How do you do, mio caro? Comment! Cross looks! Backibus non comfortable?"

"Speak Swedish, and give me a kiss!" burst out the curate with his deepest bass voice, and the mildest look in his light blue eyes. But Brigitta answered with a flood of Babelish so confounded, that the curate began to protest vehemently against such a hodge-podge, and the mingling of the noble Latin therein. A hearty laugh dispersed the Babylonish jargon, and conciliation was made in Swedish, and in that silent language which is customary amongst the betrothed, and which must be a primal language, for it is understood and spoken throughout all nature. After this Brigitta left her curate, obviously enlivened, in order to request of Valborg, who was conducting the inner daily economy of the house, his favourite dish at dinner, namely, pancakes.

The curate Gudelius was a learned man, especially in the ancient languages and in the life of the olden time, but rather prone to fall, as it were, out of time and place in the present daily life; wherefore, by way of counterpoise, he held fast by a female fellow-traveller, who in this region was quite at home, and who, moreover, was much attached to him. It was impossible to be otherwise when you knew him intimately. Friends and superiors had given him indeed much friendship, but had passed him over in promotions, so that, at nearly forty years of age, he was still a poor assistant schoolmaster. During the summer he lived at Mora. to accusto himself to the office of preaching, but had no near prospect of getting into a house of his own. He was too gentle and philanthropic to let bitterness spring up in his heart on this account, but the phantoms of ill health had instead sprung up in his frame, or in his imagination, and these haunted him to a degree that gave way only to Brigitta's Latin, or her sportive schemes and merry grimaces.

Brigitta went in the meantime and sought out Valborg, and found her brother Lasse, who was tacking about and making reconnoitings around the handsome but cold woman, who, still and grave, went to and fro with her bunch of keys followed by the cook, and delivered out articles of house-keeping. When Lieutenant Lasse's offers of little services were declined, and his little endeavours at conversation terminated abortively, he hummed to himself a favourite air out of an old opera,—

"How short and sad is this life's dull day!
Let us sweeten it, then, with pleasure."

"Good morning, brother Lasse," interposed Brigitta. "Already in full activity, I see. Handsome girl, Valborg. How go matters?"

"Handsome, handsome as Venus, but haughty as Juno! Well, well, there's no harm done in making a trial. But are you quite sure that she is an actual human being, that she has flesh and blood like the rest of us?"

"That I should imagine, but cannot assert it. I am trying to find her just now to beg her to give us pancakes for dinner."

"Pancakes! charming! Valborg and pancakes to dinner! what a prospect! I will go with thee to help thee to soften her hard heart,

"How short and sad were this life's dull day
Were it not brightened with pleasure!

I then, for my part, will sport it away

In friendship and love, and of folly a measure!"

Mrs. Ingeborg had, for the afternoon of this first of May, invited her neighbours from Sollerön and Noreberg, and proposed to make an excursion with the young people into the neighbourhood, in order to permit Olof to see some of its most remarkable beauties, and then to lead him to Tomtegård by Utmedland, where the well-known cellar should be visited.

There was no little pleasure, and no little chat, in the capacious Mora car,* as the "Great Mother in Dalom" sat there in the midst of all the young people, heartily rejoicing in their joy. Olof and Siri rode alongside or before, and thus they sallied forth into the neighbourhood.

Hill above hill, and dale within dale, are what have given to the province of Dalarna in its name; and to Dalarna we must go if we would see a nature still in noble innocence, a people still in that patriarchal state which ever more and more disappears from the earth, and which possesses features of so great and touching a beauty.

As the Dalelf runs through Dalarna, a great and bright thought through a solemn and troublous life, so runs the life-pulse of religion through the laborious existence of the Dal people, and centuries have passed over them without leaving any rust. They are still in manners, in appearance, in costume, and constitution of mind, the same as they were in the days of Engelbrecht and Wasa. Labour and prayer have preserved their health and youthful vigor. Lowly are the dwellings of the people. They stoop their necks at the doors of their huts, but never have they bowed them to the yoke of the oppressor. Great historical transactions have consecrated this ground, the native ground of Swedish liberty, yet you behold no monuments, no memorial inscriptions. Here, also, is simplicity. They show you a cellar, a barn, a verdant and knolly eminence, on the banks of the Dalelf, and tell you, "Here Gustavus Wasa concealed himself from his pursuers, here he thrashed for his day's wages, here he addressed the people of Mora for the deliverance of Sweden." And before your thoughts there stands forth the most magnificent romance that history possesses; and the glorious recollections which no monuments preserve, no boastful officerone proclaims, seem to whisper to you from the woods, from the mountains and dales, from the vigorous forms of the people, from the river, which itself, from its cradle on the rocky ridge of Idre and to the East sea, with the hundred brooks that stream into its bosom, with its splendid cataracts, its deep, beautiful, and placid water, its windings and its branches, its growing strength, its final lordly expanse at Elfkärleby, before it pours its life into the ocean, is a living image of this heroic poem.

Such were the thoughts which arose in Olof's soul during his ride to-day. We describe it no further, but halt at the near village of Utmedland, where the party descended from the vehicle, and betook themselves on foot to the cellar of Tomtegård, which lies in a meadow on the shore of the Silja Lake.

The hut which once arched it over has long ago fallen down; but there is now erected over it a saloon of wood, simple, and totally unadorned. Within this had now some good spirit—the Tomte* of the place, said Mrs. Ingeborg—decked a table with a diversity of refreshments, which were bailed with a universal acclamation of pleasure. But Olof would descend immediately into the cellar, and Siri, who had expected it, and had brought tinder with her, instantly lit a candle, and, lifting up a trap-door in the floor, went nimbly before down the small, steep, and broken stone steps which led down into the cellar. The walls of the saloon are totally covered over with names, which visitors have written, scratched, yes, even carved out with great care and labour; names highly remarkable to—their owners. In the little room under the earth you can read no names on the black walls, it is empty, silent, and solitary as the grave; but there lives in it a great memory, the memory of a hero, who was concealed in its dark vault, with his misfortunes, his great plans, with Sweden's future welfare in his heart. What feelings, what thoughts had there not lived within these subterranean walls! Not the smallest ray of daylight can penetrate into it; but, each holding a light, stood there now Olof and Siri, and when they had looked round them on the black walls, the roof, the floor, they looked at each other, and their eyes sparkled, and they smiled at each other, inspired by the same thoughts.

When they had returned again up into the saloon, they heard Mrs. Ingeborg relating how the Danes sought after Gustavus during his abode here, in Tomtegard, and how he was compelled to hide himself in the cellar, and how Tomt-Matts Larsson's wife turned a great brewing tub over the cellar hole, so that it was not discovered by the enemy. It was with a little pride that Mrs. Ingeborg observed, that Gustavus Wasa had three times to thank, for the saving of his life, the address and patriotism of the Dal woman. As they thus conversed and refreshed themselves, the peasant women of Mora came hastening over the meadow, and collected around the cellar with a childish curiosity, which you often see in the Dal people. Amongst these were young girls with their hair bound with red riband, and wreathed round the head according to the custom of the country, so that they seemed to be adorned with garlands of flowers. All these Mrs. Ingeborg invited to a dance at the Mora parsonage; and in boats which she had caused to come from Mora, they now rowed back over the chrystal clear Silja, while the sun in its descent cast golden mantles over the giant shapes of the mountains. Middagsberg, from this circumstance, stood forth in transcendent magnificence, for they saw from the lake one of its sides bright with the full splendour of the sun, while the other stood dark and solemn. Siri had become perfectly solemn also, and turned not her eyes from the majestic mountain.

They rowed up the river, and landed at the so-called Klockgropen, a verdant mound on the banks of the river. The party stood upon it for a brief space, and recalled to their minds what had taken place here in past times. Here it was that "on a holiday during Christmas, just as the men of Mora came out of Church, Lord Gustavus ascended to address the assembled multitude. The low noon sun stood right over the directly south-lying Esanda, or Middagsberg, and spread a dazzling light over the snowy region. A fresh north wind was blowing, which the Mora men regarded as a good omen. They gathered around Gustavus, contemplating attentively the young and manly gentleman of whose unmerited persecutions they had already heard so much. With his strong and sonorous voice he began thus to address them: 'I see with much joy your great assembly, but with equally great sorrow do I contemplate the situation of us all.' Here he continued to describe to the people the unhappy situation of Sweden under the oppression of Denmark, and concluded with these words: 'The Dalmen have in all times been brave and undaunted when the weal of your country was concerned, and therefore are you renowned in our chronicles, and all the inhabitants of Sweden turn now their eyes upon you, for they are accustomed to look on you as the firm defence and protection of our native land. I will willingly accompany you, and will for you spare neither my hand nor my blood, for more the tyrant has not left me. And then shall he understand that Swedish men are faithful and brave, and that they may be governed by law, but not by the yoke.'" here now, more than three hundred years afterwards, celebrated the memory of the hero, drank a skål to him and to the liberty which his valiant deeds achieved, and then in gladness and lightness of heart they took the way up towards the parsonage.

This little patriotically minded party, who

Already the Nyckell harp* hummed in the court of Mora when the party arrived there. It was the melancholy but dance-inspiring Oraspolska, which went on "to the unintermitting bass," and soon whirled pair after pair humming round after its certain tact. There was a time, but that is long ago, when Charles XI. danced in the court of Mora, and whirled in the polska with the maids of Mora. That would we gladly have beheld. Now whirled here Lieutenant Lasse, already in full and vehement suit for his cousin, the lovely but insensible Valborg.

Siri danced chiefly with the children, played and romped with them. At once Olof seemed again to see the girl of ten years old, as she delighted him with her dance in the summer night. She was now, indeed, palpably taller, but the fine, elastic form was still childlike, and undeveloped; the hair had its former golden lustre, which, like a sunbeam, was woven into it; her eyes shone with the same lively deep blue, her feet flew as lightly and swiftly from the ground. Olof could not avoid again thinking of the elf-queen whom the sagas describe as "slender and small, graceful as a lily, and with a voice alluring and delicious." He gazed on Siri with sincere pleasure. Yet again he looked on Valborg, and gave her far the preference over Siri in point of beauty and maidenly bearing. This comparison grew stronger later in the evening, and especially to the advantage of Valborg, as he saw her assisting actively with the supper, which was served in the hall with open doors, and observing her caring for all, while, at the same time, he beheld Siri in the balcony of the portico, with the greatest nonchalance smoking a cigar in a flaming style, and drinking punch with the prost of Solleröa and the curate, and all the time talking and laughing loudly with them. Scarcely could he believe that it was the same Siri whose eyes gleamed so brightly towards him in the cellar at Utmedland, who just now in the dance brought to his imagination spirits of light and the elf-queen. She seemed to him now, in the whirling tobacco-smoke, and with the cigar in her mouth, metamorphosed into an imp of darkness, and he felt an irresistible impulse to tell her how ugly he now found her. Nordin resisted it, but stood close behind Siri, and whispered to her his humble opinion. He got for answer a puff of tobacco smoke, and the assurance that she did not trouble herself at all as to what he thought or liked.

"Oh yes, indeed, that is just the right one to fall in love with!" thought Olof; "she is hideous! Ugh! my sensible Brigitta must have been a little crazy." And he turned with an admitting glance towards the white-dressed Valborg, who offered him a plate of Dalarna's most constant and delicious luxury, groats and milk.

The dance held on till ten o'clock, and immediately after that hour all dispersed. Mrs. Ingeborg seemed to be particularly anxious that all should go early to rest, and assiduously urged them to do so. Olof made some little opposition, for gladly, he assured her, would he sit up and talk with her the whole night. Nevertheless he fell asleep the moment he got into bed, and all the house was speedily at rest, like himself, in the arms of slumber. One alone waked, and that was Mrs. Ingeborg.

In the light May night she stood by the window, and read again the billet which she had read in the morning, and the contents of which were these:—

"Beloved wife,

"To-morrow evening, but probably not before it is quite late, shall I again be with thee! Say nothing of my coming to the young people, let all in the house go early to rest. I have a childish desire, thus coming, to see thee only, to be welcomed alone by thee. I would not have the secret communicated to any one or any thing. If I be late in the night, I would not see light in any window but thine. The little light from thy room, how it will beam upon me! nay, into me, into my soul, into my heart! My wife! Weary, disgusted, embittered by the petty-mindedness and selfishness of man, torn to pieces by fruitless contention and abortive endeavours, where the most honest desires are stranded on coldness and indifference, vexed with the world and vexed with myself, thus, my Ingeborg, do I return to thee, to lay my head on thy bosom, and let thee breathe away the cloud from my soul, to pray thee to lay thy warm hand upon my breast. Oh, I have such a haven, and yet I dare to complain! My little woman must chastise me. But if thou rightly knew in what a state of mind I am at the thought of being soon with thee, and of staying with thee, assuredly thou wouldst not then be displeased with thy

"P. S. I think it will never be evening today."

It breathed warm out of these lines on the heart of Mrs. Ingeborg, and it was probably the cause that she breathed warmly upon them again, for she raised them to her lips, while her eyes sparkled with a dewy brilliancy.

She seemed already to have arranged every thing for her husband's reception, and called to her aid all kindly household gods to enable her to embrace him like a heaven full of love. Once more she cast around her an anxious, searching glance in the fresh and pleasant room; she gave a look at the little repast which she had set out in the next room, and which should refresh the tired one. She disposed afresh the new night-gown and slippers which, during his absence, she had prepared for him; and, finally, she gave a glance in the mirror at herself, at the light, fresh muslin gown, at the little lace cap that, like a white cloud, rested on her brown hair. Mrs. Ingeborg was one of those ladies who still, after a ten years' marriage, always seek by a fine and noble manner to charm their husbands, and, therefore, never have broken the spell of their fancy: that flower or that spice of all the unions between human beings. But Gustaf Nordevall was also one of those men who make this a precious obligation or rather a pleasure. And thus waited and listened Mrs. Ingeborg, with a feeling that made the heart beat, and the blood alternately tinge and forsake the cheek. At every little sound without she sprang up. What is not expressed in the manner, the aspect with which a wife awaits her husband, with which she hears his step on the threshold of the house, his hand on the latch of the door! A whole history may be read in that moment.

We knew a young peasant-wife who had lost her husband, and who spoke of their married life with tears, saying, "Certainly there might be between us, as there will be occasionally between married people, a jarring word; but see! never had I to be afraid when I heard him 'lift the latch of the door!'"

How many wives are there who cannot say that! Ah! in such moments we have seen cheeks grow pale, eyes grow confused, and as it were, yellow! Yet we know wives, who, at this electric shock, tremble—but with joy.

The clock was on the stroke of eleven at night when, unmistakeably, there was heard the approach of a carriage, and it stopped at the gate of the parsonage of Mora. Mrs. Ingeborg sprang forth into the portico, and embraced—her husband.

THE MARRIED PAIR.

TIME had sped on, and still the married pair sat on the easy sofa. His head was rested against her shoulder, and that lofty but bitter expression which gave to his countenance a peculiar keenness and a singular interest, was now softened and brightened into a still and love-overflowing smile.

A legend in the national poem of Finland, Kalevala, speaks of a mother who had lost her son, and who found him again, but torn into a thousand pieces, at the bottom of the river of death. But she collected the scattered fragments, she gathered the dismembered son into her bosom, and rocked him there, and sang him whole again. Who that has suffered and striven upon earth, and does not recognise the meaning and the truth of this saga! Ah!

"Rock, thou cradle of love, rock on!

Sound, O song! with the words of healing;
Quiet the hearts that for strife beat alone;
Sleep, O earth! with thy restless feeling;
Rock, thou cradle of love, rock on!
Sleep ye, dark Memory's rancorous train;
Awake, all ye lovely and glorious dreams,
Heralds of truth, in the slumberer's brain;
Float ye his future down love's sweet streams,
By hope all immortal steer'd on to the main.
Climb, thou thought! seek the noon-tide sun;
Battle, O strength! to thy dear north appealing,
For freedom and light unto every one.
But, above all, o'er earth's troublous feeling,
Sound, O song! with thy words of healing:
Rock, thou cradle of love, rock on!"

And thus had Mrs. Ingeborg rocked care to rest, thus had her sensible, sweet words sung serenity and peace into her husband's soul. He had related to her his endeavours, his exertions, the right he had sought to win, the injustice he had endured; and she had listened with heart and soul, had comprehended, sympathised, grown indignant at his opposers, rejoiced at his propositions, at his labours—yes, even at the apparently fruitless ones; for who knows not that “what is sown in the snow comes up in the thaw!” and, by degrees, she had turned his mind to the vernal side of life. She had talked of the peaceful, and, to him, beloved labour which he could now calmly prosecute in the spiritual vineyard of his congregation, of the important scientific work to which he could in tranquillity return, and of the conquests which his good intentions must ultimately achieve through this means. She understood how to inspire courage and hope; and thus she had succeeded in laying to rest every bitter sentiment in her husband's soul, and in chasing every cloud from his brow. And he rested, and listened to all that she told him of her regrets, her joys, of the spring, of Mora, of home, and of that life which they should now enjoy together. One only object in this picture stood as a temporary cloud. When the professor inquired of his wife about Siri, and how she went on, Mrs. Ingeborg, deeply sighing, answered,—

“Ah, Gustaf! I fear that we shall never make any thing of the girl. I fear either that she is irremediably made wild by her unfortunate bringing up, or that I do not know how to guide and educate her.”

“Patience, patience only, my little woman!” now, in his turn, said the professor, consolingly. “You calculate too little on the family influence in the long run. If this discipline of love be what it ought to be, it will exert a silent power which no member of it will be able ultimately to resist. Yes, it reduces even hostile powers to its service, and converts the hand, with which hell endeavours to set on fire the house, into a cheering flame upon the hearth of home. I am not at all uneasy about Siri; she will become tamed without knowing it herself, and no very severe bridle will be necessary for this purpose. I am fond of life and fire in the young, and if a girl be good for any thing, she will be able to melt ice six yards around her. And such a girl is, or will be, our little Siri. Valborg's coldness and closeness are really far more dangerous. We must endeavour to melt this ice by a suitable fire. But that is not so easy a matter. Much rather would I have to do with that wild fire. Can we but manage to give that its proper direction and proper fuel, then it will become a blessing. Now is the time that Siri should be prepared for confirmation, and I shall find it a pleasure this summer to instruct her myself!”

“Ah, that would be certainly good, if the girl were not so self-willed, and thou—thou, my own Gustaf—wert not so easily irritated.”

“I know it; but I know also that thy voice—yes, thy very presence—can tranquilize my mind when it is ready to boil up. Be present during my reading hours with Siri, if thou wilt; or give me an amulet, a lock of thy hair; or some word written by thy hand, which I will carry in my bosom, in order to counteract the outbursts of temper. But, now that I am at home again, I believe that I shall be gentle as a lamb. I cannot conceive of anything that can strongly irritate me; and, least of all, a young maiden of a nature as rich as Siri's really is, and whom I am, moreover, fond of. Thou shalt see that we shall some time have joy in the girl. That shall we, too, as I hope, in my son. I am heartily glad to have him here at home. He has for many years lived more for the head than for the heart, and I fear that the education of the latter has been made but of secondary consideration. But with that thou shalt assist both him and me. I am of that author's opinion who says, ‘There is but one high school, and it is that in which the heart is educated.’”

Nordevall had raised himself up as he spoke, and now it was his wife who leaned her head against him, listening in silence, and then said:

“Ah, how dear it is to me again to hear thy voice, again to feel the wing of thy protecting and strengthening spirit over me! Ah, how full and beautiful life now feels! He who could die now . . . thus here . . . to pass over from earth into heaven! that were too much; that were a life, a death without a night; . . . and the night which comes . . . will come one day.”

She uttered the last words with a dreamy but half-prophetic tone.

“But now it is morning,” exclaimed Nordevall; “see, the sun rises! My little woman, we have gossiped the night away.”

“Yes, now it is morning,” said Mrs. Ingeborg, and raised herself; “and now that my sun is again here I will be hopeful and courageous: I shall be young again, at least in soul, for the body . . . Gustaf, I have become old during thy absence. Longing for thee has laid its additional heavy weight on my five-and-thirty years; I have got a great wrinkle by the eye . . .”

“Is that possible?” said Nordevall: “just let me see it: ay, actually a wrinkle!” and he kissed it: so tenderly had he never kissed, as lover, the polished eye-lids.

“Thanks; thou,” said she, affectionately smiling, thou hast consecrated my old age.”

“To a still lovelier youth! I love the wrinkle!” And he kissed it again.

A golden vernal sun now broke into the room and cast his quivering beams upon the pair, as if to bless them.

Oh, how beautiful to love purely and deeply! how divine is this true love! even the solitary mortal who, turned towards the quiet sun of thought, congratulates himself on being withdrawn from all the tempests of the heart, and on having found in his tranquil world a peace, a sufficiency, from which men can take nothing away, and to which they can add little—even he, at the sight of beings who live, enjoy, and suffer in each other, involuntarily feels his heart grow warm, and, perhaps, with a tear in his eye, exclaims, “Oh, how beautiful to love! how divine is true love!” Consorts, brothers and sisters, friends, loving as God loves, beautiful and blessed is your lot! the only one which enjoys on earth the promise of “everlasting dwellings” in the land, where love itself is the sun—the sun that never goes down.

HOME AT MORA.

THE members of a family ought occasionally to be separated for a time. It produces in many cases a salutary renovation, and the meetings again are, when affection lies at the bottom, so rich, so joyous, a new spring. We do not go so far as the song, when it says—

• V. Unga: “Walks in the Fetherland.”

* With the same and the same we grow crabbed and dull,
"Tis change that our nature makes beautiful;
With the fairest of maid I should wrangle and fly,
And should weary of living, forgot she to die."

But to the half-way, that is, as far as the two first lines, there we go entirely.

Under the May-life which arose in the home of Mora, in the first days after the return of the house-father, every sense bloomed; even the shut-up Valborg seemed to awaken to life and sympathy. Olof was happy in the feeling of now being nearer to his father than ever; and Brigitta was quite confused in the head with joy, and danced about with her uncle, her aunt, her curate, and with any one she could lay hands on. Siri alone partook not in the general joy. She seemed to become more shy than ever, fled the happy family, lived out in wood and field—they seldom knew where; and a species of wild melancholy frequently threw its shade over her young countenance, and gave a dark expression to her glance. She was rarely seen at home, except at meal-times, and this distressed Mrs. Ingeborg, for she saw how often the professor's eyes sought for the young girl, although he said nothing; and the exhortations of others to be more at home produced no effect. Two evenings in the week, however, usually brought the whole family together into a familiar circle, and these were they which Mrs. Ingeborg had called the spinning-room evenings. Here collected all the female members of the family, each with her wheel, in the great hall, where the fire was kindled on the hearth; and around this fire placed themselves the women, and span and span. And soon did they spin unto them the gentlemen, for it went merrily with the spinning-wheels; songs were sung, stories were told, riddles were propounded and guessed. Mrs. Ingeborg had an inexhaustible treasury of such things, and amused herself as she sat in the midst of the spinners, or walked to and fro in the hall, with puzzling their brains with all the wonders and things that she "saw at the king's court," a form of riddle that she often employed. Mrs. Ingeborg was herself commonly very joyous on these evenings, and enlivened every body, and would not willingly allow any one to keep back their contribution to the general good, whether of story, song, or enigma. Siri generally sung some little sprightly air, and distinguished herself besides by her zeal in the solving of riddles, which much amused her. This also amused Olof, and reminded him of the olden times in the north, when riddles and the most subtle questions were the dearest pleasure of the wise; when even the gods descended from their luminous abodes, in order to contend in such trials with the giants of earth; and Odin gave himself no rest till he had in such content measured himself against, and triumphed over, the cunning giant Vafthrudner. Olof had now, in his recollections of travel, invaluable contributions of pleasure to confer on the spinning-room. He and Lieutenant Lasse were always present; they attempted also to spin in company, but the threads were so often broken, or they made the wheels spin round so unmercifully, that the ladies begged to be permitted to dispense with this species of contribution from the gentlemen.

Later in the evening came commonly also the professor. His arrival amongst them at all times inspired a higher vivacity, a more living interest; and even in the spinning-room it was the same; whether he was there merely in the capacity of spectator and listener, or, as was often the case, he himself paid his tribute to the general good in the shape of a story.

A few days after Olof's return, it was the spinning-meeting at home, and all were assembled in the great hall of the house. Mrs. Ingeborg had propounded some difficult enigmas, which Olof and Siri had vied in guessing; Valborg had sung a song; the curate had mimicked hautboys and speaking-trumpets; Lieutenant Lasse had represented a steam-vessel getting into motion, by which sundry spinning-wheels were thrown into great jeopardy; and Brigitta had related various anecdotes about the Old Woman, a personage who does and says a multitude of things in Sweden; as for example:—

"I will see that," said the old woman, and bought a raven to see whether it would live two hundred years.

"Thanks to our Lord, now I help myself," said the old woman, when she alighted on her feet again.

"Yes," said the old woman, "it was something with a 'ral,' and if it were not an admiral, why then it must have been a corporal."

"If no if had come between, then had the old woman bitten the bear," &c.

All had given their mite towards the evening's entertainment, and the professor had laughed, and to the bottom of his heart enjoyed his home-life. Warmed and exhilarated, he responded to the importunities of the young, that he should tell something, with the following characteristic incidents from the life of the Dalepeasantry.

"A father went one winter's evening with his two daughters, over the ice on Lake Silja. In the twilight they lost their way and came upon a weak ice, which broke under their feet. It continued to break with their endeavours to hold themselves fast, and to get upon it again. One only of the daughters was fortunate enough to support herself by a somewhat firmer piece of ice; and on her shoulder the other sister seized, in the agonies of death, and drew herself up by her.

"'Leave go, Margaret,' said the first, 'or I must sink; it is with the greatest difficulty that I can maintain my own hold.'

"But the young girl, in her death agony, did not leave go, but held fast as before.

"Then heard the sinking one the sinking father's solemn voice—

"'Hear'st thou not, Margaret, what Anna says?'

"And on the instant as the girl heard the word she quitted her hold on her sister, and suffered herself to sink into the deep with her father.

"The sister succeeded in rescuing herself; but often did she afterwards come to me, in search of consolation for the pangs of her conscience, for she ascribed to herself the death of Margaret.

"A father rowed with his young son upon the Silja; there arose a storm; their little boat was upset, and cast far from them; but a board floated near them, and father and son took hold on it, but it was not able to bear up both, and when the son saw that, he said, 'God bless thee, my father, live for my mother and my brothers and sisters;' and so let himself sink to the bottom.

"In the dreadful year of famine here, 1838, there came one day to me a Dalman from another parish, and said to me—

"Sell me a few tons of straw."

"The man was one of those great, stalwart figures, which you seldom see, except here; yet he had evidently suffered from want of food. He had drawn his hat with its broad brim deep over his face.

"I cannot sell thee straw," said I, at his entreaty; 'I have not more than I shall need for myself, and the poor of my own parish.

"Sell but one ton," implored he.

"Not even that can I," I replied; 'that which I have left I must carefully preserve for myself and my people.'

"Half a ton, then," persisted the Dalman, pressingly.

"It grieves me," I said, 'but not even a single half ton can I spare thee.'

"The huge fellow took a step nearer to me, said not a word, but lifted his hat above his brow, and gazed fixedly upon me; he let me see that he wept.

"The sight of this anguish I could not sustain. 'Come with me,' said I, 'thou shalt have what thou wilt.'

"He followed me, and got the straw that he wanted.

"If this were for myself," said he, 'I should not probably have been here; for, if we men suffer and endure want, it is no more than our sins deserve, and we can and ought to bear; but the poor animals—what can they have done amiss!'

"And now for a little love-story!

"A young farmer loved, at the same time, two young women, and, though strange enough, loved both with as nearly as possible the same affection, and they both of them warmly returned his passion. But one of them showed for him an almost boundless devotion: and, perhaps, this might be the cause, that at once, with a more determined sentiment, he turned towards the other; but she answered him, 'I will not be married amid the sighs of any unhappy one, and it is now thy duty to wed Kerstin. To me thou wilt ever remain dear, but now must we part.'

"What a field would there have been here for the French romantic! What agony, ravings, explosions, and explications without end! Here had been sacrifices and poisonings, and, at last, three corpses. But how simply did the genius of the Dal people resolve this knotty point!

"The young man obeyed the exhortations of the serious damsel—obeyed that of duty—he married Kerstin; and, as they were both truly good and excellent people, they were happy together. They had lived happily together for four years, and had three children, when the wife died. But as she lay on her death-bed she said to her husband, 'I would ask one thing of thee, and that is, that thou, after my death, wilt marry Anna, who was once, and is still, dear to thee, and who, I know, still loves thee, and that thou makest no other the mother of my children.'

"The husband mourned sincerely for his wife; but, when the customary period of mourning had expired, it was not difficult for him to endeavour to fulfil her last prayer. He went to the still unmarried, the still-beloved Anna, and told her the wish of his late wife, and his own. And she answered, 'Thou art still as dear to me as formerly, and willingly would I be thy wife, but I fear for thy children. I fear that I could not be to them such a mother that I could answer it to my conscience and to the dead, and that would make thee dissatisfied with me.'

"And by that reply Anna stood fast, spite of all the arguments of love and reason that were employed to move her.

"Quite distracted came the young man one day to me, and implored my counsel, and begged me to talk with the girl, and to endeavour to persuade her to become his wife.

"To seek to persuade her I cannot promise thee," I said, 'for in so solemn an affair a woman should make her resolve in freedom; but speak with her I will, and tell her what I think and advise in the matter.' I went to the young woman, talked with her of her future duties, and succeeded in pacifying her all too sensitive conscience. Soon afterwards I had the pleasure of uniting the two lovers.

"A few years afterwards I came on an official journey into the district where they resided. It was a dark autumn evening, and cold and dull without. But when I entered their room, the fire blazed cheerily, and in its light on the floor played four children, full of pleasure. Husband and wife arose to meet the enterer, but, when they recognised me again, they became deeply moved, and began to weep. 'Ask her, ask her,' said the husband, and pointed to the wife, 'whether she be not satisfied with me!' But I did not ask her; I saw warm and happy tears already speaking."

"That was a charming story, that last," exclaimed Brigitta, when the professor had finished.

"And thou, Siri," asked he, "which dost thou like the best?"

Blushing and shy answered Siri, "That about the Dalma and his cattle."

"That was right, my own girl," exclaimed the professor, and kissed her forehead.

"I wonder how you like groats and milk?" said Mrs. Ingeborg, as she entered, followed by her maid, who brought in dishes and bowls.

"Best of every thing in the world, next to thee," said her husband joyfully, and Olof was ready to chime in, for the spinning-room suppers were also groat suppers in the hotse, and concluded by all assembling round a large, steaming groat-dish, which, in Olof's opinion, put the crown on the charms of the evening. To Olof it seemed that his home was the best home in the world.

For the rest, there was much in his home which called into thoughtful exercise his penetrating and observant spirit; and enigmas here met him, more difficult to solve than all those marvels which Mrs. Ingeborg saw "at the King's Court." She herself was amongst them, for Olof observed often in her, moments of sadness, that came and passed away again without any apparent cause, and expressions fell from her at times which seemed to indicate some hidden cause of disquiet. But the perfect happiness she enjoyed in her domestic life with her husband, her open disposition, her daily fresh spirit and activity, her sincere benevolence towards all who surrounded her, and which made both people and creatures thrive under her care, her enjoyment of life and nature, appeared to make such a secret impossible. Olof hesitated to seek explanations of her gloomy moods of mind, which she, in fact, carefully concealed from her husband, and which never cast a severe shade over her temper, further than that she had an organic affection of the heart, which she had had many years, but which only at times was troublesome, but never, so it was said, dangerous.

The father was a soul open as the day; his merits and his failings were obvious to all. Warm, striving, and sagacious, strong in will and power, it was impossible for him to live without restless exertion and onward aspiration. His impetuosity sometimes led him into error; but his Christian goodness led him always to acknowledge and pray forgiveness of the wrong. He was one of those men with whom life is never perfectly free from clouds, but whose absence leaves an immeasurable void.

Olof's best friend in the house for society and conversation was Brigitta. With her he gladly talked of his stepmother, Brigitta's "charming aunt;" with her he wondered whether Siri would ever become a rational creature; whether Valborg could become a real human being; whether she could fall in love, and so on. With her he spoke of his own future, his approaching sojourn in Fahlun, where, in the school of mining, he should study fundamentally the science of mining, in the hope some day of becoming a great master of mines in the country. Before her he liked also to let the light of his knowledge shine on various subjects, and to relate to her his success in various ways. Olof was one of those young men, who, favoured by fortune and mankind, and who had something of that pleasant confidence in himself which people not seldom have at three-and-twenty, but, with greater wisdom, do not often possess at three-and-forty.

The family at Mora had many friends, but none more intimate, and none dearer than the prost and prostinna of Sollerön and their children. Few weeks seldom went by without the two households passing a day together, either at Mora or at Sollerön. Some few weeks only in autumn and spring was this intercourse interrupted, during the time that the Silja neither bears nor breaks up.

One day the great prost and the little prostinna were at Mora. It was evening, and the young people danced in the saloon, while the older ones conversed in the drawing-room. Two gentlemen, friends of the professor, travelling from Stockholm, increased the party. The conversation fell on marriage, and one of the travellers praised the single state for its tranquillity and undisturbed quiet. The professor, again, was zealous for marriage, and rather liberally, since he insisted that only in marriage, he always assumed it to be happy, could human beings attain their full development, their highest ennoblement. He grew quite warm upon it, and concluded with these words: "People suppose commonly that the first period of married life is the happiest, but that is not the case, that I know, and so does my wife too. I am a thousand times happier with her now, and am a thousand times more attached to her now, than I was ten years ago, when we were first married; and I am certain that ten years hence I shall like her still better, for true affection goes on always increasing. It has, like our Lord's grace, no bounds and no grave. Yes, if it were now said to me, 'Thou art free; go freely over the whole world, and choose thee a wife,' I should go instantly to her, and say, 'Wilt thou have me?'"

"Dalarna," said the advocate of celibacy, warmed by the professor's zeal, "Dalarna must be a good soil for marriage. Even amongst the peasantry, even in the low huts, I seem to have observed a more happy relationship between married people than is common in the world. It is animating to think that so great a happiness as that which you describe married life to be can be enjoyed alike by high and low, by the educated, and, in an intellectual point of view, the uneducated."

"Yes,—hum,—" said the professor; "but a perfect equality can I not, however, admit in this respect. Education creates a distinction, and to the advantage of those who possess it. An expanded view of life and its objects, multiplied subjects for thought, for interest, for conversation, make life richer, and give nourishment to attachment. That cannot be helped; as a great burning-glass collects a richer amount of rays into its focus than a lesser one, produces a greater heat, kindles a greater fire. For my own part I should not be half so happy with my wife, if I could not talk with her on all subjects which possess an interest for me, and if she did not as well, through her education as through her natural endowments, help me to thoughts and views which I should not, of myself, arrive at. And often when I have pored and pondered, with a single word she has hit the nail on the head, and made all light before me. Therefore it is that she is also my dearest, my most indispensable society, an actual half of my life. And in that you may see why the education I allude to is of so high a value, especially for persons whose life is not occupied by much material labour, and for married people in good external circumstances. That through this, indeed, they may spiritually live for each other; may become continually more necessary to each other, and the change from the lover into the friend, which all married people must pass through, may be an ascending and not descending metamorphosis. For the love which cannot be converted into friendship is of very little worth."

While the professor was thus speaking, Mrs. Ingeborg had gone out into an adjoining room, and stood by a window, with a view of the adjacent church. The beautiful spire glowed in the evening sun, the melodious bells of Mora rung out six. Silent tears rolled down Mrs. Ingeborg's cheeks, while her eyes rested on the broad-spreading trees of the churchyard. Two of her children, dead in their early childhood, rested there, and her still tears seemed to call in question the fervent words of her husband on the happiness of their married life. Yet it was not so; but the maternal feeling at this moment asserted its right, and when awhile after the professor stood by her side, and said, in tender uneasiness, "What, now, my Ingeborg?" she merely whispered, with a glance at the churchyard, "The children!"

Nordevall stood silent, respecting her feelings, but said soon after, as he laid his hand upon hers, "But He who gave, and He who took away, can give again."

"Nay, nay," said Mrs. Ingeborg, almost vehemently, "I do not deserve it."

Mrs. Ingeborg let fall occasionally such an expression, and it invariably annoyed her husband, for he seemed to see in it a morbid imagination; and he now answered somewhat impatiently:

"No one deserves God's goodness: but that thou shouldst deserve it less than any one else I will not hear of; that is a spectre of the brain, self-inflicted pain, which ought not——"

"I do not complain!" mildly interrupted Mrs. Ingeborg; "if I have no child, yet I have thee and thy affection, which are more to me than all the world, and make every thing else superfluous."

An expression like this delighted Nordevall, and he said gladly:

"And, if we have no mutual child, yet we have foster children, which shall be to us as our own. Come, and let us see them dance. Siri dances, as I imagined to myself, an elf queen. The girl has altogether a peculiar charm, which——"

"But where is Siri?"

"Siri was nowhere amongst the young people; Siri was nowhere to be found in the bouse; Siri had not, people said, been seen since directly after mid-day. For the first time the professor expressed displeasure with her. "She is, in fact, never at home!" said he.

"I will become a fish again," said Brigitta, "if some fine day Siri be not mountain-smitten, so that we never see her any more. It is a misery with Siri."

SIRI.

"I wonder where she can be!" said Olof to Brigitta, as their enquiring glances met in the court.

"Yes, that may the wind know!" answered Brigitta; "that she is never where she ought to be, that I know. Now is my uncle angry, and in that humour he is by no means gentle, I can assure you, and my poor aunt is so anxious. . . . I say, my girl, has thou seen Siri?" said Brigitta to a farm-servant maid in the court, who answered:—

"I saw her a few hours ago riding towards Morkarby side."

"Let us go towards the side, perhaps we shall meet her," said Olof to Brigitta. And they went; and while they contemplated the beautiful waters of the Silja and the Dalelf, and the wood-clothed mountains on the shore, Olof fell again into his thoughts and plans for the future. Foremost amongst these stood his desire to become in time possessor of iron-works in Dalarna. "What a life might we not live there!" exclaimed he, "and what subjects should we not have for activity and fortune! The fabrication of iron—Sweden's greatest wealth; the work of its refinement; the care of the labourers in the works; whose condition it would be a happiness to make happy; intercourse with nature, which alone is a world sufficient to live in; and then family life which in its enchanting dales——"

"Family life!" exclaimed Brigitta waggishly, "nay, only hear the sweet lad; he thinks of his papa and his mamma, and perhaps on his little cousins, too. That is actually quite touching!"

"What's the matter? Ah! yes, yes! But I did not think only on that family life," said Olof laughing and blushing.

"On what family life, then?" asked Brigitta, with an innocent tone, but mischievously twinkling eyes.

"Oh! . . . for example on my own . . . when I . . . shall get married!"

"For example! Well the wife, for example, seems already in view. Is that it?"

"Not at all!" said Olof, laughing, "but I think she may possibly come. Ah! see, there we have Siri!"

And it was Siri who came riding towards them, with the fiery Brunhilda, quite warm, and herself with an expression of wild exultation in her countenance. The lappets of her kroka flapped, like a pair of wings about her shoulders, in the wind. As soon as she saw Olof and Brigitta, she stopped, sprang from the horse, which she allowed to go loose, and bounded towards them, where they sat not far from the road, on a verdant hill.

"That was a glorious ride!" she exclaimed, as she flung herself down on the ground, near them. "Olof, you must ride on Brunhilda; one flies as on the wings of the wind on her."

"Ah!" said Brigitta, "and if thou hadst a little less passion for wind and blowing weather, and a little more for sitting still, it would not be amiss. But don't lie there now upon the cold ground, whilst thou art so heated, Siri!"

"The ground is not cold!" said Siri, "it has a warm heart, warmer than mankind has; I wish that I lay there!" added she, and kissed the earth, and pressed it to her burning cheeks.

"The earth's heart!" said Brigitta; "dear Siri, what nonsense is that!"

"Not such nonsense, either!" said Olof; "the earth may actually be said to have a warm heart, for, according to all probability, its interior is red hot. The deeper we penetrate into the earth, the higher rises the temperature. In Fahlum copper-mines, for instance, at about two hundred fathoms deep, it is so warm that the people work there without upper garments in the coldest weather in winter. But what does my little sister know of the earth's warm heart!"

"Ah, I know a great deal, I!" said Siri nodding archly.

"Yes, since thou wert mountain-kidnapped," said Brigitta, "thou hast been abominably knowing about the earth and the mountains, and their interiors, and hast got such ideas about how glorious it would be there too—it is positively frightful. But now, Siri, don't continue lying there, my little, sweet, naughty, most precious silly girl! Come hither to me, and let me wrap my shawl about thee, or I shall be both angry and—"

But before Brigitta had finished the sentence Siri was already by her, and nestled with the grace of a dove, and a childlike affection at her side, and laid her head against her shoulder.

While Olof went in his botanical researches to some distance from them, Brigitta, began in a sisterly, or rather motherly manner, to impress upon Siri how wrong it was of her to be so much away, now that she was so much wanted at home, and her uncle would so gladly see them all assembled there around him.

"Ah," replied Siri, "just because you are assembled and happy together, just for that reason must I be away! It stifles me there at home, amongst all the others....and where yet I am so lonesome; have no one who is fond of me. Nor can I either like them; I feel myself among them so ill at ease, so unhappy. People have always told me that I am odd, that I shall never become rational, and that, perhaps, I am a changeling, which they called me, as a child. But what wouldst thou? I cannot be different." And hot tears started from Siri's eyes.

"Perhaps, my sweet girl," said Brigitta, mildly, "perhaps mightest thou yet be a little different, if thou wouldst; and perhaps thou wouldst indeed become so, if thou wast—"

"Where, where!" demanded Siri, excited, and looking up.

"More with us, with my aunt!"

"Oh! no, Brigitta!" said Siri, shaking thoughtfully her head, "with her and me it does not go on well; that I know in myself, though I cannot tell why. No, no, it will never go on well."

"Oh, yes, but it certainly will go on well!" asserted Brigitta; "it cannot be otherwise; don't be irrational, Siri! Who must not be proud of my aunt, if they come rightly to know her, and live more with her? She is an angel of goodness. And that thou wilt come also one day to understand, and that thou wouldst have done already, if thou wert but as thou ought to be, at home, and not like a wild bird, always flying about in the woods. And my uncle if thou knew what a man that is, how wouldst thou like him, too! And that thou wilt soon come to do, for thou wilt soon begin to read with him for confirmation."

"Ah," exclaimed Siri, with terror, "that is the worst of all, that is terrible!"

"What sayest thou, Siri? To read before uncle Nordevall, to hear him explain the word of God, would be, indeed, both the greatest honour and joy that I could imagine for myself."

"Yes, thou!" said Siri, and hid her face in the folds of Brigitta's shawl, "but I....I am afraid of him. His glance, his voice, all confound me. And, then, how will it be when I am alone with him; when he shall stand before me as a teacher and high-priest, and perhaps, demand of me that I shall believe things which I cannot at all understand....as I know many of them would be....and that appear so dark and strange. But, mind that I cannot do, and I will not allow it to happen, nor will bind myself to any thing. Free, free will I be, as a bird in the wood, and if they capture me, then—! Dost thou remember the little ox-eye,* which thou spoke of, which was so tame and glad when he could hop and fly about in the room; but which when they shut him up in the cage, struggled and dashed himself against the wires, till he fell dead!....so would it be with me; for I would rather die than....ah! it is a sad time that is coming!"

"Mercy on us! Don't do so, dear Siri. Thou art no little ox-eye, that I know, but a human creature. And be thou a human creature, and no irrational bird of the woods; and what thou now sayest has neither rhyme nor reason in it. Thou wilt see that it is a good, a most excellent time that is coming!"

Yet Brigitta could not help feeling a secret anxiety, when she called to mind her uncle's impetuous disposition, and the strange, irrational mood of the young maiden, who now, almost trembling, clung to her.

"I seem," said Siri, "as if I should become mad, with all that. Only think, if I should run away altogether; think if I should ride off to Blakulla!" And Siri looked at Brigitta and laughed heartily.

"That wilt thou not do!" said Brigitta, seriously. "Thou wouldst not wish to give us such a sorrow."

"Sorrow!" cried Siri, "could any one lament for me! Nay, that I cannot believe! And if you should be for a little while uneasy, you would, at the same time, be glad to be rid of me. No one cares for me. None but one," she added softly, and turned her eyes full of tears, with a dark fire in her glance, towards Middagsberg, whose summit was now diademed with a golden garland of clouds.

Brunhilda now neighed, and Siri sprang up. "Shall we go on, my fleet Bruna?" said she, caressing the horse, and before Olof, who now sprang forward, could come to her assistance, she had swung herself up into the saddle, waved her hand gracefully to them, and galloped off towards the Mora parsonage.

"That is a strange girl!" said Olof, following her with his eyes: "riding becomes her right bravely; but tell me now at once, Brigitta, what is the meaning of all the singular and mysterious expressions which I hear thrown out respecting Middagsberg, and the King of the Mountain, and Siri's mountain adventure, and your sea adventure, or your fish-state, as you call it. May I at once be permitted to know what all this is for an affair?"

"Yes, it is a marvellous affair, thou may'st believe me," said Brigitta; "an affair which I myself have not yet rightly got to the bottom of, and which, I still fear, is not yet played out. Hu! I really feel a shudder upon me when I think of it. It is not so agreeable, you may believe, to have become a fish, when one had been born a human creature, and to have lain and struggled in a net! And what Siri became at the same time, that our Lord alone knows ; but——” And Brigitta compressed her lips, and shook her head.

“But tell it, tell it, then !” exclaimed Olof.

“Thou knowest,” Brigitta proceeded, speaking, however, in a softer voice, and looking a little paler than usual : “thou knowest, that last year, in September, I came here for the first time on a visit, for a few weeks. Siri had then been at Mora about a month, where she came on the death of her mother, the generalska. During these weeks, we paid a visit at the parsonage of Sollerön. Middagsberg lay right opposite to it, perhaps a quarter of a mile off,* on the other side of the lake, and sundry small islands lay between. The mountain we had much to do with, and much to talk about, for it was a weather-signal for us, and looked very different in different kinds of weather, and at different periods of the day, but always magnificent. We called it the Giant, and Siri, especially, had her fancies about it, and her amusement in it. On evenings, Siri and I were accustomed to row out when the weather was calm ; and when we got out upon the lake Siri played on her flute, and her playing is the most delicious that I ever heard. She has tones that go right through the heart. One evening we rowed to the Mora side with our little boat. I pulled the oars, and Siri played on her flute, till I downright wept. Air, and lake, and shore—all was so calm ; so still, as if nature herself listened to her. It became, in the meantime, late in the evening ; and as the lake mist began to arise, we put round to row homewards. At once we heard a rushing noise in the lake, and perceived distinctly the sound of something which breathed loudly, swimming after our boat ! What it was, it was impossible to discern through the twilight and the fog ; but something dark and uncouth there was, which I saw emerge from the water, and draw ever nearer to us. Siri dropped the flute, took an oar, and we began to row with all our power. But nearer and nearer we seemed to hear the rush of the swimming lake-monster which pursued us : We were now not far from one of the islands, and hoped to make our escape, when, all at once, the boat refused to move on. We rowed, and rowed, but it would not stir from the spot. I will not positively attempt to determine whether it was the water-grass, or one of the lake-goblins, which wound itself around our oars, and drew them fast down to our boat, and held us fast ;—it is possible that it was the water-grass, but at the moment I believed fully and firmly that it was a spirit, and that it was Neck himself who, in the shape of a black horse, pursued us to carry us away.†

“In my agony I cried for help, and I heard instantly a voice, or a tone answer me from the Middagsberg side. But now was the black fiend quite upon us, and the boat fixed as aground. Siri stood courageously with an oar in her hand, ready for combat. Then saw I a horse’s foot, or a devil’s claw, raise itself from the water, and lay itself upon the edge of our boat. At the same instant, it upset, and I saw nothing more, but heard Siri’s voice shouting ‘Brigitta !’ in a tone that went through my soul, at the moment that I sunk down into the water.”

Brigitta was silent for awhile, like one paralysed by the recollection.

“And thou lost consciousness ?” asked Olof.

“It was as if I slept,” continued Brigitta, “I cannot remember the least pain that I had ; but when I came to myself again I felt quite ill, and found myself lying in a little fisherman’s hut, on one of the islands near Solerön ; whence the fisherman, who heard my cry, had rowed out to our assistance. The moment that I recovered the least portion of my consciousness, I called out for Siri, and asked after her. But Siri was away, and no one knew any thing of her.”

“But the people who had rescued thee !”

“They had seen not the slightest glimpse of her. When they reached our boat, there it lay overturned ; and when they righted it they found just under it a wicker fish trap, and in it they saw lying a huge, huge fish, and that fish—was I, who, God knows how, had got my head into it ; and was now drawn up in it, and then upon the land, and then into the fisherman’s hut, altogether exactly like a poor wretch of a fish.”

“And Siri !”

“Yes, Siri was away, and could not be found that evening, nor in the night, nor on the following day either, although every possible exertion was made to discover her. My uncle himself was out the whole night with people and torches, seeking and calling to her ; for Siri can swim bravely, and is thus apparently more of a fish than I ; and it was, therefore, probable that she would swim to land somewhere. But nowhere could she be found. It was a dreadful night. My aunt was beside herself. Never have I seen her so pale ! I can still see her the whole night ; she ran and hurried along the strand, with a torch in her hand, and regardless of the storm which blew, and crying only, ‘Siri ! Siri !’ so heartrendingly, and seeming as if she could rush into the very lake, and seek her in the depth of the waves.

“Thus the night went over. By day they dragged the lake, but in vain, as thou mayest now well believe. She was, as it were, vanished out of the world. But in the afternoon they found in the region of Middagsberg one of her small shoes. Ah ! the beautiful object ! How my aunt did kiss it ! For it was, indeed, a token that Siri lived. But I could not help thinking of a story that I had lately read in the newspapers, of a young girl, in Smoland, I think, who one day was absent from her home ; and when they had long sought for her they found in the mountains, first one of her shoes, and then the other, and then her handkerchief, and, finally, herself, in a mountain cave, lying quite still, with her head upon a stone, and seeming to sleep softly. But when they drew near her they saw that she slept the sleep of death. Yes, she was dead ! but never could they discover by what means this had come to pass. And now I thought incessantly how they would find Siri in a mountain cave, with her sweet flaxen locks, resting her head on a stone, and sleeping the sleep of death; and it seemed to me so sad—so sad! Yes, ever since that time, my eyes have been a third less than they were before, so much were they swollen up with downright weeping.

"Well, amid this hunting and anxiety, it had struck ten o'clock at night. We were now altogether in the hall, and my uncle talked to my aunt, and sought to calm her, for she was as if she had not the right use of her reason, but exclaimed continually, 'Siri! Siri! my child!' when behold, at once Siri stood at the door, quite pale, in the moonlight, with her light locks, and said, 'Here am I!' We believed at first that we saw a spirit, but it was actually the living Siri, and no apparition. And what a joy it was! See then, now the tale is ended."

"How! ended! Just now should the most important part appear. How had Siri been rescued? Where had she—"

"If thou shouldst ask the whole night, thou wouldst still get no other answer than, I don't know. Siri never could or would give any satisfactory explanation of this extraordinary disappearance. All that she said was that, as the boat capsized, she struck her temple against the edge of the boat, and lost all consciousness, and that when she regained her senses she found herself lying at the foot of Middagsberg; and as soon as she felt herself strong enough she had betaken herself to some huts on the shore, and thence, by the assistance of the people, had come home to us. By this unsatisfactory relation she stood, and no other could be got from her, although my uncle interrogated her most closely. On the temple she had, indeed, a large contusion, so that her fall against the edge of the boat was sufficiently probable; but, for the rest, it was clearly enough seen that the whole of the account did not hang well together. But never has she given any other, and when the rest of us have asked her about the affair, she has only talked nonsense about it, or has told us legends of the giant in the Middagsberg, and of his palace, and all its splendour there which she saw, and more of the like sort, which sound like tales of enchantment."

"Hum! that is very strange!"

"Yes, is it not? Can one not seriously begin to have faith in the old sagas of mountain spells and sorcery?"

"Hum! I am rather disposed to believe that my little sister is somewhat artful, and I have a good mind to examine her in the matter a trifle. And that supposed monster which followed you on the lake, have you got no clue to it? that was, probably, a horse; I can imagine that."

"Yes, so people said; a horse which grazed on some one of the islands, and had got a passion for leaping into boats—a very odd taste for a horse, I take it. And, besides, the whole of this transaction is so extraordinary, that I really know not what to believe about it; and the worst of it all is, that Siri, spite of her jests about the matter, is yet seriously changed since that time. She is often restless, sad, as she never was before, and speaks sometimes seriously in a very extraordinary way. It is, moreover, as if she had taken a kind of longing after death, a love for the dwellers of the interior of the earth and the mountains, which is to me incomprehensible; for although I was a fish, I never fell in love with the bottom of the lake, God be praised! and long not at all after it. Siri has always had a little of the night-moth about her, and is fond of getting into reveries with the moon and the stars, and, I fancy, with bats; but since this occurrence she has been more addicted to it than ever. God knows how it will ultimately terminate with her. In the meantime I am most anxious, and feel sad forebodings; and I cannot help liking the wild young thing."

"Yes," said Olof, after a silence, "I know not whether they be good or evil spirits that exercise their spell upon her, but I confess that she interests even me, and I would gladly become of some service to her—become to her—"

"Only not a lover," said Brigitta, with her arch look; "for a union between you, I believe, is not written in heaven."

"Ah! what!" said Olof, somewhat vexed; "why should we always be thinking of love and weddings? It would be just as likely that I should fall in love with a cloudshape, or with some fantastic legendary heroine, as with Siri. I would merely be to her a brotherly friend, and if she were to take a little liking to me, I do not believe that it would do her any harm."

Olof looked a little proud and a little wounded, and Brigitta coughed a little. And now they were before the parsonage, in the court of which they observed the game of the widower to be in full action, but the curate sitting solitary upon a spring-board, and looking melancholy as he felt his own pulse.

"I must go and grimace a little to him," said Brigitta, "and wake him up with a little Latin." And she gazed tenderly on her curate, and addressed him with much pathos,—

"O amicus meus carissimus! Tornera dinum nasus versus dinum serva humilissima, och såg om dinum tankibus cara colera kringum hennibus!"

"What gibberish! that is horrible to hear!" exclaimed the curate, and shuddered.

"Prosit!" said Brigitta; "can I not speak Latin then?"

"The whole difference which any clever man can perceive between thy Latin and mine is, that few people understand mine and every body understands mine. It is clear, then, that mine is the most intelligible, and that I speak plainer and better than thou. Is not that a logical sentence? or what!—thou art silent. Thou acknowledgedst thyself, then, excelled in Latin and in logic.—Good. Expect me next in mathematics, thou."

The curate laughed shortly and hoarsely, but looked like the mildest sunshine, and became thereafter quite blithe—yes, so much so that he even participated in the play of the widower, where his long legs gave him a great advantage, so that he never failed to catch his bride, which much amused him. Siri was in her element, and wanted always to run as widow, taking good care not to catch any one, in order that she might be able to run all the more. Even Valborg ran: and, excited and warmed by it, looked extremely handsome. Lieutenant Lasse took up, and had hid, with sighs, in his bosom a little silk handkerchief, which she lost in the play.

Mrs. Ingeborg sat by her husband's side in the portico, and watched the sport of the young people. She saw a happy smile on his countenance, and it reflected itself in hers.

The scene was a glad one, but a few days afterwards there was seen another, which we might term

DIVISIONS.

ARE they, indeed, uncommon in the homes of earth, these divisions which separate heart and mind, and allow a species of spiritual draught to spring up in home, a winterwind which penetrates through every loosened joining, drives comfort out of every corner of the house, and makes the Penates tremble! Ah! few are the homes which they do not visit for a longer or shorter time; and the feelings which most embitter the mind, the impressions which most take from life all colour, are found nowhere so much as there. But frequently these disensions are not so perilous as they seem. There passes through the world an invisible cement, which is constantly effectual in healing injuries and fractures. It works in us, it works in others—it works in circumstances great and small; and when we most certainly expect that all will go to pieces, behold! it is healed, and often better and sounder than before. Therefore, to love and to wait are an excellent philosophy of life in house and home. The good, but silent example belongs also to the same.

In the house at Mora a fresh and serious attempt had been made to mould Siri to more quietness, as well as to industry and womanly occupations, and this had put her into a wretched temper, and called forth a spirit of opposition, which showed itself particularly towards Mrs. Ingeborg.

One day Siri met her motherly counsel in such a manner as made her turn pale, and lay her hand on her heart, as Siri left the room in ill humour. A moment afterwards Olof opened the door of Siri's room, and went in. He found her busied with her mosses and stones, which she arranged into grottoes and groves, and filled them with figures of men and animals, which here lived in golden peace in a paradise, where Siri, in her imagination, loved to place herself. When Olof entered, she went towards him, extended to him a little box of birch-bark, saying,— "Wilt thou have a pinch of snuff? Life is sometimes so wearisome that one must endeavour to cheer oneself as well as one can."

"No, I thank you, no snuff for me," said Olof, smiling; "I am come here not to receive, but to bestow a pinch myself."

Siri, laughing, asked, "of what kind?" and Olof answered, "Spanish." But when he now abandoned the tone of raillery, and began with all seriousness to represent to Siri the impropriety of her conduct, she was about hastily to quit the room, but Olof was at the door before her, locked it, and put the key in his pocket. Siri was now compelled to remain and listen to him, whether she would or not. And long she listened in gloomy silence, and with drawn-together eyebrows. But under Olof's brotherly admonition, at once severe and tender, by degrees her knotted-up temper gave way, and she began passionately to weep. Olof did not allow himself to be softened by this, but proceeded all the more seriously—the more earnestly—to talk to her of her duties, the object of her life as human being and as woman, and of her relationship as a child in this house where she was received with affection. Olof was himself quite moved by his own eloquence; and at once Siri arose, and extended towards him her clasped hands, exclaiming, "Oh, say no more! I see it all—I have been wrong. Oh, if some one had but talked with me thus! But I have been a neglected child, often treated more like a wild creature than a human being, and I have become so. But do not abandon—do not cast me off! have patience with me, and I will endeavour to improve. Be my friend, and do not let them demand too much of me. I am—I am—not happy!"

And with these words, Siri's head rested on Olof's bosom. He pressed her with brotherly affection to his heart, wiped away her tears, and spoke to her gentle and encouraging words. He felt himself so delightfully elevated, felt such a fraternal warmth towards the young maiden, who now, as it were, surrendered herself to his guidance, his protection, and firmly in his heart he resolved to be a friend and protector to her. Glad enough, however, was he in his soul that Brigitta was not the witness in this scene, and made her commentaries upon it.

For some days after this, was Siri most amiable in her appearance. Friendly and gentle, she did whatever she was requested; she sewed with Brigitta; attended Valborg in household affairs; she was at home during the time that the family were together, but at the same time glad, she was not. She was paler than usual; and her eyes stood often full of tears. One evening—but to this we will appropriate a separate chapter.

TONES.—FOREBODINGS

WHITSUNTIDE approached, which this year fell in the beginning of June. Now was the time when the peasantry say, that God's angels fly up and down between heaven and earth; now approached the morning,—the morning of Whitsuntide, when they believe, as on Easter morning, that the sun dances in the heaven, and the children watch it through smoked glass, and cry to one another, "See! now it begins to dance!" The time when countless flowers glance, like beaming eyes towards the clouds; when

"Each thing living
Seems to see God,
And in His light rejoices."

Olof wandered in the beautiful May evening, along the river strand towards Orasäide; and enjoyed in full draught, not less spiritually than physically, the glorious life of nature. Small pasture-lands gleamed emerald-green between the dark pinewoods lengthwise up the mountain sides; for the mountains, which in this district consist mostly of a soft sand-stone, are frequently cultivated by spots up to the very tops, and the Dal harvest's destroying angel, frost, commits less ravage on the heights than in the bosom of the valleys. The river ran so clearly blue between the green fields, and the pride of the Dal meadows, the campanula patula, began already on its long stalks to open its beautifully tinted flowers. Olof gazed on the river's playful windings, on the distant mountain veiled in an azure mystic shadow, and he thought on Siri; for that landscape, with its changing physiognomy, was to him as an image of the charming, enigmatical maiden, who continued more and more to occupy his mind. His heart was now softened towards her, for he called to mind her late acquiescence and her tears. As he thus went on and thought, he began to hear delicious notes of a flute. They played one of those northern melodies, in which a sad seriousness is pervaded by, I know not what, touching, innocent joy, and every close has a moriendo, in which the tone does not seem to terminate, but to disappear like a spirit in space, which goes to continue its song upon another shore. Deeply was Olof's soul now smitten by these notes, and by this holy still life—the life of Dalarna—which he seemed to drink in from them. The young man became warmed and elevated in spirit; and it seemed to him as if some deep and beautiful secret of existence was about in this moment to be revealed to him.

He knew well that the siren who called forth these tones was no other than Siri; and he followed them in order to discover her. He soon descried her, where she lay in the soft grass, by a verdant sepulchral mount near the river bank. Wild rosebushes, which in certain districts so richly adorn the margin of the Dalelf, budded around her, and the elk Durathor shook, as he lay at her feet, his little bells, as he already at a distance heard some one approaching. Siri, too, looked up; she blushed a little at Olof's presence, and greeted him in a friendly manner. She looked gentle, but not joyous.

"That was beautiful which you just now played!" said Olof.

"Did you think so?" said she; "then I will play more for you." She played again some melodious measures, and then said, "Do you know what these are?"

"No."

"That is the song that the river-sprite by Husby sings at night, as he sits on the rock in the water-fall, above the mill. The words are:

"And I hope, and I hope, that my Redeemer liveth!"

"Ah! how gladly would I hear him when he sings this!"

"And he actually sits there at night and sings?" said Olof, smiling, while he seated himself on a little hillock opposite to Siri.

"Yes, so they say," answered Siri, hesitatingly. "I know well that others say that it is all superstition; but then, much must be superstition which is right beautiful, and which sounds like truth."

"For example! Tell me something more about these things," said Olof, familiarly.

D

"For example; about the cairn-people," continued Siri. "Do you know what dwells in the cairn here? They are the cairn-people, for the sepulchral mount is a spirit-house. And when we, on a summer evening, lay ourselves down beside such a mount, we hear the music within. They are the cairn-people who play on their harps, and sing laments over their captivity; and call on men for salvation. If you promise it them, then they play blithely the whole night through. But if you answer them, 'You have no Redeemer!' then do they dash their harps to pieces, amid lamentations, and remain silent in the cairn. And, do you know, that in the springs live maidens, who are very beautiful, but who are captives; and beneath their silver roof long for the day of judgment, for then shall they be free. They are dumb, and look very sorrowful, and roll slowly their eyes, and shed large tears. Yes, in all streams and lakes, in mountain and wood, are these beings found, who are captive, and who seek after release. Ah, Olof! how do I pity all these; and gladly would I liberate them. I have often felt, and feel it again at the present time, how hard it is to be in thralldom; and only think, to be so all life long!" And Siri stooped her face into her hands and wept.

"But, my sweet child," represented Olof, "all these beings over whom you grieve are the offspring of phantasy. They do not exist!"

"Yes, so many people say," answered Siri; "but I know, nevertheless, that in some way or other, they do exist, although I cannot explain how. Often when I am out alone, by day or by night, I think that I will talk to all around me, and that all shall talk to me, and that I will get to understand about it. . . . Yes, I cannot tell what hinders, but it seems to me often as if I am bound, and need a deliverance; then should I understand every thing, and be good and happy. Ah, Olof! my mind is often very strangely affected; and when I see, then, anything in nature which suffers, or which is ruined, which dies, then do I long to be able to help it; and it distresses me that I cannot."

"God knows, my little sister, whence you have got all these melancholy phantasies of nature. I think that all in nature is glorious and perfect."

"Yes, sometimes it does seem so! But I have seen deeper into it, and there is much that is evil and repulsive. I have seen how all is devoured,—all destroys itself in rotation; how the beasts persecute each other; and what barbarities men hourly and daily practise upon them. Ah, Olof! all is not good in nature! But, can you tell me, Olof whether the beast has a soul,—I mean a soul that outlives the body?"

"How! No! that I cannot; but I wish you would talk with my father about it, for he is a learned man, and has thought deeply on many subjects. And, now that I think of it, to-morrow is Sunday, and my father preaches; shall we go to church and hear him?"

"To church!" said Siri, her countenance clouding. "Into that old, gloomy house, and amongst so many people! Why not rather be under God's free heaven, now that it is so beautiful! The church fills me with awe."

"But go there, however, to-morrow,—do it for my sake!" implored Olof, warmly.

"For thy sake! Well, then—yes! But, Olof, promise to speak with them at home, that they do not imprison me at the embroidery-frame and with books. I am so young yet. Let me have my freedom yet a little while."

Both look and tone with which Siri spoke were so sincere.

But Olof made answer:—"Promise me, that you will as much as possible endeavour to oblige them at home, and I will manage so that you shall get as much freedom as possible. We will in the summer roam the country together, and you shall be my guide, Siri; and we will make longer excursions by land and water, and be very happy together."

"Ah! that would be charming!" exclaimed Siri, beaming with delight. "Ah! how happy that would be! And thou, Durathor!" continued she playfully to the elk which laid its head upon her knee. "thou shalt accompany us, thou little fool. Won't that be delightful, then! Hast thou a soul, Durathor! Canst thou tell me whether thou hast a soul that does not die! Yes, thou hast; I see it in thy beautiful eyes. Thou shalt one day enter paradise, and feed on the tree of life by the living water. And thou shalt have little gold bells on thy horns."*

"Promise no more that you can make good, sister mine!" said Olof, smiling.

Siri was now glad as a child, and playful again; and as she went homeward with Olof, she showed him flowers and grasses that he had wished for, and he told her their botanical names. Once she held him back, saying, "Take care, tread not on that grass; there the elves have danced!" And she showed him a ring of azure-green grass, which was strongly distinguished from the rest of the grassy sward. Olof showed her that this grass was called Secleria cœrulea; and had also in Sweden the botanical name of elf-dance-grass.

"In paradise," said Siri, "I always fancy that the elves who dance on summer nights in the grass, and all animals, and all men are happy, and live in peace together. Does it not stand so in the Bible, Olof! that it was thus in the world before the serpent beguiled Eve to taste the apple! Ah! that she should have suffered herself to be so beguiled, and that it should have done so much mischief!"

"Yes," said Olof, "it was a most unfortunate transaction!" and both the young people laughed, in innocent levity, as people indeed do, when they at the very moment have no actual experience at all of the "unfortunate transaction."

In the best understanding with each other, came Olof and Siri home with Durathor.

Olof thought much of Siri this evening; and his thoughts were after this fashion.

"What an extraordinary blending is there in this maiden of childlike simplicity and deep thought; what singular presentiments and questions in the heart of this childlike being, of this half-wild life! Will Siri ever become like other ladies, sedate, domestic! And if not—what will she be! But Siri is yet so young. Young girls have often romantic sentiments and cogitations, which vanish as they grow older, and are married. Yes, love will, perhaps, be the agent which shall develop the woman in her; which shall collect the flickering, scattered sparks, into a beautiful flame, for—for him who shall win her heart; for him who can lead her by tenderness and prudence. This wild Undine may one day be changed into the truest and most lovable woman, and—when the right husband comes!" Olof smiled in self-complacent thoughts. Siri's recent compliance and cordiality towards him had given him occasion to trust much in his influence upon her. She had not even smoked a single cigar since the evening that he had told her that it made her ugly. She desired to be handsome in his eyes,—that was clear as the sun!

"But our good Olof is, indeed, a somewhat self-complacent and conceited gentleman," may some reader or readeress here think; and may, therefore, feel disposed to withdraw from him the whole of her or his favour.

But this they could not do if they knew as we do, how many both great and little follies men grow out of while they go on deeper into life, or up into its better individuality; yes, how even one and another folly may be found in a person without injury to his worth—at least in a more liberal survey. But if they know that, or will believe us, and have not all too superficially fixed their attention on certain indications of the young man's disposition, they will, notwithstanding these, yet follow with pleasure its further development. But we return to our story, and betake ourselves to church.

THE CHURCH.

THE bells of Mora rung. Its bells are widely celebrated, for they are all three tuned in harmony, and their sound has a singular beauty and fullness. They chimed now for divine service.

It is a noble spectacle which the Silja presents on its shores on Sundays. Leksand, Rättvik, and Mora are three parishes, which, in a circle of forest-clad mountains, enclose the "Eye of Dalarna," and which, with the parish of Orsa, with a population of between 30,000 and 40,000 souls, constitute the quintessence of Dalarna. But Mora is itself the mother parish. Churches, large white towers and spires, rise from the shores of the lake, and gleam in the far distance amid the blue waves and green meadows.

On Sundays, you see fleets of long and narrow boats, with from nine to ten pairs of oars each, and filled with from forty to fifty persons, glide rapidly over the lake, from the populous villages to the churches. Frequently you may see some twenty boats at once approach the shore. The costumes of the people are ornamental and fine, and evidence an almost pedantic care in make and arrangement. In Leksand, yellow colours predominate, in Rättvik red, in Mora black and white. But the head-dresses of the women, and the linen on their arms and around their necks, are universally of the most dazzling whiteness. Their round faces please pre-eminently by their freshness, fair complexion.

* Siri's sportive talk reminds us of Luther's saying to his dog, as it once was growling, "Knurre nicht Häschen; auch da wirst in der Auferstehung ein goldenes Schwänzlein bekommen!"—Don't grumble, little Hans, for in the resurrection thou, too, shalt get a little golden tail!"

son, blue, glad eyes, white teeth, and an expression of unruffled good humour. Amongst the men, you behold muscular forms, and not unfrequently noble heads adorned with a rich growth of hair, which, parted on the forehead and crown of the head, falls down over the neck in those rich, natural locks, with which romance so proudly embellishes its heroes, but which we can recollect to have really seen nowhere but amongst the peasants of Dalarna. For the rest, the people of different parishes in Dalarna are not merely distinguished from each other by their costume, but also by their physiognomies, dispositions, and occupations, which, in each parish, have their characterising peculiarities.

They assemble themselves publicly for the celebration of Sunday; and the poorest receive loans of clothes in which to go decently to the house of God. Thither you see whole households betaking themselves, from the old man on his crutches to the very infant at the breast, whom the mother or the father carries on the arm, in the softest, whitest little cloak of lamb-skin.

Wife and child, great and small, you frequently behold with large bouquets of a species of garlic, called butter garlic, in their hands, which is greatly liked in these districts, and with which the children in particular are entertained during divine service.

It is fine to see the throng of these thousands of people on the shore, in whose gay and diversified costumes yet prevails a keeping agreeable to the eye, in whose forms you behold health and vigour; and it is delightful to observe how, in this crowd, amongst such swarms of people stepping in and out of boats, you hear no oath, not a cross word, do not see a single unfriendly glance. Imagine not, however, that you have here a people cut out for idyls, a troop of shepherds and shepherdesses. You see at once that you have before you a strong and brave people, worthy to be the descendants of the ancient Scythians. The plough and the battle-axe, which, according to the saga "of burning gold," fell from heaven into the land of their ancestors, are still at the present day the symbols of their life and character. More gifted with understanding than phantasy, and fanatic only for freedom, the Dal people are, above all, ever ready to exchange the plough for the sword, and distinguish themselves by a strength and hardihood which, in combat, easily advance into severity and even into fury.

But their life is hard. For them ripen no melting fruits; none of the comforts of improvement sweeten and ameliorate their lives. In contest with a severe climate, with a thankless soil, they secure with difficulty their crops, and mix not seldom their bread with the bark of the pine-tree. Cut off from the rest of the world, except by travels abroad, during which, however, they congregate together, and on which they incessantly long after their homes. Closely shut up in their valleys, they would stiffen in soul and sense if they had not families and religion. With sincere affection they bend themselves down to their children, and with deep faith they look up to heaven. Even into the dogmatism of religion they love to penetrate; and many a subtle dogma, which to the educated, but so multifariously dissipated men of the world, appears incomprehensible, is grasped by their simple and profoundly penetrating minds with equal ease and clearness. To their pastors they are devoted with child-like affection, when these do not show themselves unworthy of such attachment; and they are proud of their churches, and contribute freely to their support and embellishment. "You expend a great deal on your churches; I wonder that you find the means for it," said a traveller to a Dalman, as he contemplated the church of Mora, and its new and glittering copper roof. "We expend all the less on our own houses," replied the Dalman, gravely. And so it is. The huts which shelter this vigorous and large-limbed people are, perhaps, smaller and more insignificant than any others in Sweden.

The people of Mora are distinguished in appearance from the peasantry of the other parishes by a grave bearing, a darker, more determined physiognomy, and keener eyes. You hesitate, perhaps, at times, to address a solemn-looking Mora-man; but, when he answers, you are enraptured by the pensive, musical melody of his speech. A certain child-like innocence makes itself felt in his tones, and the familiar thou, with which he commonly addresses you, does the heart good, and transports it into more pious and simple times. Every parish in Dalarna prosecutes its own distinct branch of industry, independent of its agriculture. In Mora, the people are well known for their mathematic and arithmetical capacity, and they manufacture clocks which are dispersed over the whole kingdom. On the eastern shore of the parish, lying along the Silja, there is a little watchmaker's shop in every second peasant's hut; on the western, joiner's work is made. The women, as indeed throughout all Dalarna, have distinguished themselves even by their skill in handicraft arts. The most ingenious fabrics of horsehair, the finest and most beautiful watchchains and necklaces of hair, come out of their large and coarse hands. But I fear we shall never get to church!

The family of the parsonage of Mora had watched from the strand the approaching boats loaded with church-going people, which were a great multitude; for not less than ten bridal couples are to be united this Sunday in the church of Mora. Amongst the people who were assembled on the strand, Mrs. Ingeborg observed a young peasant woman, who wept bitterly, and she hastened to her, and inquired what was the occasion of her sorrow. The young woman related, with silent grief, that she had been a widow some months, and had now, as the rowers at Bytesholmarna exchanged oars, let fall into the lake her wedding-ring, the sole memorial that she possessed of her husband, and of their short but happy marriage, and that she had no hope whatever of ever getting it again, for the part of the lake into which it had fallen was "a bottomless deep."

Mrs. Ingeborg consoled the young widow by her cordial sympathy, and by inviting her to din-

* Regarding the excessive depth of the Silja, there are many traditions amongst the peasantry of Dalarna. One of these relates, that the spirit of the lake was once heard crying, "If you will know my depth, you must measure my length!"

ner at the parsonage, where every Sunday some farmers and their wives were invited to the professor's hospitable board.

But now the harmonious bells of Mora pealed out in full concert, and the great bridal-procession, which had already arranged itself before the parsonage, now began its march towards the church, headed by our long curate. Immediately after him walked the married men, two and two, all in blue dresses. Then came the bridegrooms, one after the other, in blue coats, yellow buckskin lower garments, and white stockings, with a fine white handkerchief hanging down, with tassels at the corners, fastened on the sleeve of the right arm. After the bridegrooms came the bridesmaids, great and small, all in green dresses, and their heads encircled with beads and ribands. After them, the assistants of the brides, that is, married women who were nearly related to them, and who were to attend on the brides. Then came the brides walking one after the other. Of these, there were two crown-brides, or "grannbrudar," and the other eight were green-brides, "gronbrojdi," in the language of Dalarna. The two first-named were two dowried daughters of farmers; had black bombasin gowns, with short sleeves and white cuffs. Their dresses were, as usual, adorned with a variety of finery; coloured scarfs and fine depending ribands. The neck and bosom were covered with a necklace of many-coloured glass-beads, silver chains, with attached silver rix-dollars or medals. On their heads, they bore each her gilt silver tiara, with a garland, and a perpendicular wand of half-a-yard high, covered with patches of bright-coloured and variegated cloth, so disposed as to represent flowers. Farther, they wore fine, yellow, embroidered gloves, and a muff, whence hung down a number of neckerchiefs of different colours. Red stockings and ordinary shoes, with high heels, completed the costume.

The costume of the "green-brides,"—equally honourable but less showy than that of the "crown-brides"—consisted of a light-green jacket of the ordinary cut, a petticoat of brilliant chalon, and a coloured apron. On the neck they wore, like the crown-brides, many silver chains, and on the head, the usual cap for the married woman, of fine Dutch linen, and upon that the unmarried woman's triangular head-dress. According to a primitive custom, which is yet retained, although without a tinge of superstition, every bride and bridegroom carried a silver penny in the left stocking. Some soldiers in full uniform closed the procession.

At the church-gate they were met by the beadle of the church, who cleared the way into it for the entering procession, and gave the sign for the commencement of the singing. All the people standing sung the psalm 339 of the Swedish psalm-book:

"Blest is the man who feareth God," &c.

The congregation on this day consisted of several thousand persons. The seats and aisles of the church were all full, and a great multitude of great and little children were tripping along the aisles, or were fed by their mothers to keep them quiet, or slept soundly on their knees. And ever as the service proceeded, went the old verger with slow steps and a fierce look through the aisles, sending long peering glances on all sides, and poking his wand under the nose of first one and then another sleeping old woman; whereupon it—that is the nose—started in terror aloft into the air, giving to one or another suspiciously drooping heads a little knock. But the young and stout men who slept, he permitted to—sleep in peace.

Olof, who sat so that he could see Siri, looked at her from time to time, and observed with pleasure that she appeared cheerful and attentive.

The powerful and beautiful singing for which these congregations are so well known, and which resounds with a force that renders the organ superfluous, and perfectly drowns it where it is to be found, made an obvious impression upon her. And when she heard these words read from the altar:—

"For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us.

"For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God.

"For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope,

"Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God.

"For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now."

Then glanced Siri, involuntarily, at Olof, with flashing, inquiring eyes, full of anticipation.

But when the professor's expressive and energetic discourse, issuing from the very depths of his soul, sounded from the pulpit, when he thanked God, who had sent His sun and His gospel equally to light up and warm the most secluded valleys, as well as the most cultivated heights, then it grew warm in the youth's as well as in the maiden's heart, and their beaming, tearful glances sought not each other but the Invisible One.

The bridal couples, who sat in the choir, near the altar, had each a psalm-book in rich bindings, from which the bride and bridegroom read in common. During prayers they advanced and knelt by the altar. The blessing was pronounced over them all at once, as they knelt each under their bridal canopy. It was a beautiful and solemn sight. After divine service the bridal pairs returned in the same order to the parsonage, and there rested awhile, and were hospitably entertained by Mrs. Ingeborg.

The rest of the people dispersed themselves along the shore, and refreshed themselves from the provisions they had brought with them. Little boys went round, carrying baskets of little brown cakes, which they offered with the concise exclamation, "Buy!" The sun shone; the scene was lively and glad, though of a quiet fashion.

Siri went to Olof, and asked him the meaning of the epistle read before the altar; and Olof referred her to his father. It had, indeed, been the intention of Olof, through to-day's service, and through the impression which his father's talent for preaching seldom failed to create, to turn the heart of Siri towards him, and warm it towards the relation of teacher and pupil which was now soon to take place between them, and which she so much dreaded. Now, however, when Olof bade her speak with his father, she shook her head, and withdrew.

In the afternoon Siri accompanied the young farmer's widow, who had lost her wedding-ring, across the lake, and made her show her the place where it fell in. In the meantime, Olof had a long conversation with his mother and Brigitta, concerning Siri, in which they discussed the plan which it was necessary to pursue, in order effectually to promote her development. They concluded on adopting mild and prudent measures, and Olof calculated more and more certainly on his influence over her, than he would venture to avow.

Some time after this the professor began with Siri their reading and conversation hours, which she anticipated with so much terror; and it was with a mixture of trembling and defiance that she now submitted herself to a course of teaching which she regarded as a compulsion and a fetter to her free spirit. But this feeling speedily vanished and gave place to one of a totally different kind. Nordevall was not one of those Watchers of Zion, whom you could call a "Watcher of the Tomb," who forbade questions and inquiries; he was a man of the resurrection, who kept pace with the development of his time, and when he found men possessed of wrong opinions, he was only concerned to bring them to better and juster ones. But while he set no bounds to the freedom of the understanding, he demanded rigorously the purity of mind, the seriousness of purpose, which alone open the innermost realms of life to their glance. He knew that human reason—this inquirer of divine origin—can trace out, if it cannot invent eternal ideas, immortal conceptions, and he was disposed to consider, with a celebrated father of the church, that the words, "Seek and ye shall find," were pre-eminently addressed to those who in the paths of thought seek eternal truth.

"Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free;" were the gospel, the words of the Master, which he often pronounced to young inquirers, inspiringly; "if," added he, "you continue his genuine disciples."

And now he permitted without fear the inquiring and thirsty spirit of his young disciple, freely to sweep soaringly round through all the regions of life, and there stir up a whole ocean of questions and doubts. Certain of his power to administer to her that light which for her should restore to harmony this yet chaotic world; he himself experienced, through the life-overflowing maiden, a salutary, quickening, and invigorating impulse.

Siri again, who felt her mind rather enfranchised than bound by her instruction and instructor, who discovered new traits and objects of interest open before her, penetrated with avidity into this new life, and, as it were, plunged herself into this world.

But true is the proverb that "a fool can ask more questions than ten wise men can answer;" and that "the castle of truth is not taken by storm;" and Siri's self-willed and impatient disposition became often as trying to herself as to her teacher. The mode in which truth grows clear in the human mind; the graduation which belongs to all development; the unequal progress which is inseparable therefrom; these became all too consuming for the young maiden's slight stock of patience. That which she did not get immediately, she believed that she should never get; and when a beam of light which she once saw was again hidden by a cloud, then she despaired, and became rebellious against her instructor and against the whole world.

It was under an attack of this state of mind that Valborg one day found her weeping on the turf under a lime-tree in the garden. Valborg inquired why she wept, and Siri answered, "Because it seems to me that it is wearisome to live. Much better were it to die, then should one be away from all vexation. It is not pleasant to live, and I do not see the use of it."

"But we must still live though," said Valborg, with the somewhat bitter resignation that certain poor mortals betray whose life, by long stagnation, has grown, as it were, ossified.

"Oh! that is intolerable!" said Siri, beside herself; wrung her hands, and bit into them. Valborg cast upon her a proud and contemptuous glance, and went away.

But Siri's instructor was calm under all the changes of mood in her soul, and this calm combined with his tenderness and continuous guidance, operated by degrees beneficially upon her. She acquired a sort of silent enthusiastic desire for the holy sacrament, which should complete her initiation into a profounder life. She imagined that clearness and peace must then enter her soul, and she prayed secretly in childish ignorance to receive it, and then die.

Olof's society, and the long excursions they made together, were to her a salutary dissipation, and the instructions in natural history that he gave her interested her greatly; but then she questioned and questioned, always driving to the origin of things; and when her young teacher gave her the uttermost reply which science is yet able to give, she was astonished that here in the most familiar forms of nature she was met, or stopped by—a mystery. Hence arose fresh queries, new forebodings and disquiet, which Siri could not then anticipate, only carried within them the seeds of a higher, deeper repose.

In the meantime her life was rich, and beneath the alternations of storm and sunshine through which she continually passed, her heart was drawn by degrees nearer to her paternal teacher, the professor, and that was a great delight to him, for the young maiden became continually more dear and precious to him, and her gloom and coldness had been an actual affliction to him.

Singular, however, was it that the young damsel never seemed to find herself quite at ease in that home where so much esteem and tenderness were shown her; and notwithstanding her recent greater approximation towards the professor, there appeared to be an invisible, inscrutable obstacle, which stood separately between her and the parental hearts which desired nothing better than to clasp her to themselves as a beloved child.

Olof in vain pondered upon this, upon what it could be: and the same did he also regarding the gloomy moods of mind which often fell upon Siri in the midst of her most joyous moments, and the enigmatical words which fell from her. She continued to him, as to all others, close shut up, in this respect, and Olof began with and ended in riddles.

FOLLIES AND ENIGMAS.

BRIGITTA had remarked, that ever since a certain time, Siri was in the habit of rowing out every morning early upon the Silja, accompanied by a peasant girl of the village, of twelve years old; and when she one morning asked Siri "Whither she rowed out so early!" she answered, "To Bytesholmarnæ, to fish."

"And what fish dost thou catch there?" demanded Brigitta; "I never remember to have eaten any fish that thou hast caught."

"I angle for gold fish!" said Siri, smiling; "and they are difficult to catch."

"Gold fish! Those I must see!" exclaimed Brigitta. "I will accompany thee out."

"Oh, no!" said Siri, blushing; "that is not worth the while; it is not amusing to witness, and besides thou art frightened on the lake."

"Yes, but now I will, at all events, see what gold fish is found in the Silja, and how thou pullest them up; and I shall go with thee."

It was of little use opposing what Brigitta set herself determinedly about. She went.

But the voyage was not particularly attractive to Brigitta, for it blew a little on the lake, and the mischievous Siri could not omit secretly helping the waves to rock the boat, to Brigitta's great terror, who on this held herself fast by the edge of the boat, and exclaimed,

"See there, in Heaven's name, shall we now become fishes again! Sit thee still, then, Siri! Wilt thou make the boat inevitably upset! Little, naughty, sweet, good-for-nothing Siri, sit still, I tell thee, or—I say nothing, but this will I say, that when I am silent and turn pale, then I am very angry."

But when Siri now saw Brigitta get very angry, she flung herself down upon her knees, kissed, and embraced her; but then the little boat only rocked the more, and Brigitta shrieked and scolded Siri, till Siri cried from excessive laughter. It became still worse when they reached the nearest Bytesholm, and then, instead of lying to at the little fishing-village there, the young peasant-girl stopped at a distance from the shore at a deep place, and Siri began quite calmly and seriously to undress in the boat. Brigitta at this stared in wild astonishment. At length she said,

"It is certain that thou hast a most extraordinary way of fishing. What wilt thou do now? what is to come of this! Dost thou really think that I shall sit here and see thee drown thyself! Don't move from the spot where thou now art, if thou dost not mean me to shriek so that all the parish of Mora shall be in uproar."

Siri during this monologue had nearly died with laughter, but at once she grew serious, and said, "Silence now!" with so determined a tone, and stood at the same time so still, that Brigitta was quite astonished; but, in the next instant, Siri plunged head-foremost into the depth of the billows. Brigitta did not shriek, but made a movement as if she would follow her, but the young peasant-girl said quite calmly, "Ah! then, she will come up again immediately. She has done this now three weeks; it is after the wedding-ring of Martin's Stina that she goes down."

"How, my heavenly God! that, then, is the gold-fishing! Ah, the girl!" burst forth from Brigitta, at once joyful and terrified. And now a white arm emerged from the waves, and, immediately afterwards, Siri's flaxen head. She smiled at Brigitta, drew a deep breath, and laid in the boat her gathering from the bottom of the lake, a handful of mud with some shining stones amongst them, but—no ring. Spite of Brigitta's prayers, Siri plunged down twice more, and when she came up the third time, behold! there gleamed clear gold out of the black mud, and Brigitta and Siri exclaimed at once,

"The gold-fish! the gold-fish!"

The wedding-ring which Siri had, with indefatigable perseverance, dived after now for the space of three weeks, was at length found.

"God be praised!" exclaimed Brigitta—"now one can breathe again. Get thee dressed now, Siri! Thou art quite blue with cold and with holding thy breath. Thou goest on the most hideous undertakings, and ought never to be left to thyself. Thou wilt never rest till, by one means or another, thou hast made an end of thyself."

But Brigitta was so kind to Siri all the time that she was scolding her, and Siri was so glad at the recovery of the ring, and at the delight which it would give poor Martin's Stina, that the voyage back was as calm and happy as the row out had been uneasy. And Siri now betook herself onward to the young widow.

In the meantime Brigitta went to her brother to relate to him the morning's occurrence, and when she saw his eyes flash at the intelligence, she exclaimed,

"Lasse, thou art my own brother—thou hast thy heart in the right place, although it hangs a little loosely sometimes. Now only don't go and fall in love with Siri, that I enjoin thee, for then would really too many follies be the result of it; that may fairly be dispensed with. See! thy waistcoat is torn; I will take and mend it. But what is this! Whence hast thou got this little silk handkerchief! I believe—yes, really, is it not Valborg's!"

"She dropped it in the widow-play the other evening," said Lasse, somewhat blushing and apologising.

"Lasse! Lasse!" said Brigitta, shaking her head, "thou wilt never be wise. Three months ago it was Josephine Silversko's scarf, which you carried like a blue riband under your waistcoat, and now it is—"

"Ah!" said Lieutenant Lasse, "this is something so very different."

"So very different! yes, for this is a handkerchief and not a scarf—that I see well enough; and such a nice little handkerchief into the bargain—such good chequered lustring! Valborg certainly would not lose it for a good deal, and I shall, therefore, honestly restore it to her. She is an orderly person, is Valborg."

"Person! Brigitta, thou talkest very little—"

"Why, yes, is she not a person! what is she, then! You think, most likely, that I ought to call her a goddess; but as I know that she is a poor sinful mortal like us all, but a very orderly girl, she shall, the very first opportunity, get her handkerchief again."

"Brigitta, thou art quite savage! Hast thou then actually no feeling for me, thy own brother!"

"No, not the least, when it comes to the restoration of goods that my dear brother has stolen, but a great deal for thy having whole waistcoats. Now I take it with me to repair it, and Valborg's handkerchief to give it to her again."

"Well, she will get to know, however, that I wore it upon my heart."

"Under thy waistcoat, thou shouldst say; yes, but she shall likewise know, that just before there rested there a certain scarf."

"No, Brigitta, no!"

"Yes, Lasse, yes! Don't imagine that thou shalt make young girls believe that it is more an affair of the heart with thee than it is. I am much too fond of thee to allow thee to have sundry heavy sins concerning scarfs and shawls which rest, and yet shall come to rest there. Thank thy good fortune, my dear brother, that thou hast a sister who manages better for thee than thou dost for thyself. The waistcoat thou shalt have back in a quarter of an hour. Now I will go and cast an eye on my curate, and see whether he is to be found within time and space. It is horrible what a deal I have to see after. I wonder that I don't become confused;" and Brigitta laughed and nodded at her brother as she left the room, and the lieutenant sighed, and consoled himself, and hummed—

"How sad and short were this life of ours,
Were it not brightened with pleasure."

Lieutenant Lasse was one of those people of whom a joyous levity makes agreeable men of society, later, alas! often converts into rakes, and sometimes into betrayers. Pity, eternal pity, that any thing so agreeable and gay should often terminate so wearisomely! And Lieutenant Lasse had so good a heart, that it would have been greatly to be regretted if it had gone so with him; and, therefore, Heaven had given him a wise sister, to whom he was sincerely attached, and whom he would not willingly do any thing to offend. For the rest, he resembled her in appearance, but was plainer, was pitted with small-pox, had light hair, the whitest teeth, and a good-tempered, jovial expression, which made an agreeable impression.

Not without a little confusion did he see Valborg later in the day; but as Valborg was just as coldly polite and just as tranquil as before, Lieutenant Lasse soon recovered from his embarrassment, and, uncertain whether Brigitta had betrayed his little secret or not, he quickly joked, sighed, and laughed as lightly as before.

The professor, perfectly enchanted with Siri's fishing up of the widow's ring, said warmly to his wife, "The girl is nothing common! A glorious nature! Thou wilt see that one day we shall have joy in her. My little woman, she must have her freedom. All people should not be cast in one mould. It is a good spirit which directs the maiden."

"Mayest thou be right," said Mrs. Ingeborg, with glistening, tearful eyes.

"If we could but," continued Nordevall, "make her a little less shy, a little more sociable with us. She has something for me infinitely refreshing, and it grieves me deeply that I cannot win her confidence, as I could wish. But with time and patience that may yet succeed."

In the evening of this day raged a fierce north wind, and masses of grey, rugged clouds swept over the heavens, and concealed the mountain-tops. To counteract the unfriendliness of the weather, Mrs. Ingeborg called the young people together to tea, patchwork, and games, and as the young people of Sollerön were just now at Mora, the invitation was responded to with much delight.

While the patchwork went on, riddles were told and guessed. Mrs. Ingeborg asked, "Who is the great one who careers over the earth, who swallows up mountain and wood, and makes the sun dim, who is afraid of the blast, but not of man?"

And it was quickly answered that the "great one" was the mist.

Again Mrs. Ingeborg asked,

"What is that which is better than God and worse than Satan, and which the dead eat, and which if the living were to eat, they would die?"

This riddle demanded long consideration, but was ultimately answered triumphantly,* and there was a general cry for "more riddles."

"You are quite too acute this evening," said Mrs. Ingeborg; "I must hit upon some more difficult ones for you. Listen to this: what wonderful thing was that which I saw at the king's court, which turned its feet up towards the sun, and its head . . . ." But here Mrs. Ingeborg stopped short, while she seemed struck with astonishment at something that passed outside of the house, and which she saw from the window by which she stood. She gasped for breath, put her hand to her heart, and hastily left the room. Siri gazed also eagerly out of the window. Olof followed with his eyes her looks, but saw nothing distinctly except a tall stranger who passed slowly along the highway in front of the parsonage, and disappeared behind the adjoining buildings. But scarcely had Olof caught sight of the darkly clad stranger, when, with a cry of surprise, he sprung rapidly out of the room, so that the silken shreds flew in confusion around.

"Heaven bless us! heaven bless us!" exclaimed the workers, and, "What marvellous thing was that which Olof caught sight of?" and they also gazed curiously out of the window, and saw—nothing.

"It might have been Neck himself," exclaimed Olof, as, ten minutes later, he entered quite out of breath. "I fancied that I recognised most perfectly an acquaintance passing by, and I sprung out in order to detain him; but he had vanished, and I cannot conceive where he is gone so speedily."

"What he? what acquaintance?" was demanded on all sides.

"Oh!" said Olof, "merely a wonder that I saw at the king's court, or, more properly, by * The answer, of course, is "Nothing."—Ta.

Stygg Force.* But I ought already to have related that adventure to you, for it is nearly the only one of interest that I met with on my three years' tour."

"An adventure! an adventure! Oh relate! relate!" exclaimed the young people.

"Let me look at thee, Olof," said Brigitta, "thou must be an actual lion, ay, a tiger, or something more extraordinary, since thou hast had interesting adventures on thy travels. King Solomon was certainly wrong when he said that there is nothing new under the sun. And thy adventure! take care now that it shall be perfectly memorable. We listen with all our ears."

And Olof commenced:

"About six weeks ago, on my journey hither, I was at Osmundsberg, near Boda Chapel, in Rättvik, and stopped there awhile to botanise, and seek petrifications, which I knew to be found there. I was desirous also to see the so-called 'Flog,' or 'dragon-fire,' which shews itself there on certain nights. I made also an excursion to the Stygg Force: I hope you all know what the Stygg Force is!"

"Why yes, pretty well."

"Well, that is good, for it is not easy to describe. First and foremost, it is no force at all, for the water is in quantity inconsiderable; but it is still a thoroughly dreadful place, in a wild wood, whither you arrive only by most dangerous paths and ways; and a more desolate savage scenery, more perpendicular precipices and cliffs, you rarely meet with. In the centre of the widest chasm there projects a small and steep rock, like a crooked back, and terminates abruptly in the midst of the abyss; and it is related that a steward of the country there, who was tired of his life, rode one evening full speed out upon this rock, with the intention of going headlong over it; but just as the horse came upon the extreme verge of the gulf, thirty fathom deep, it wheeled suddenly round and galloped back, bearing with it its astonished rider."

"To the left of the fall is a kind of grotto, as if it were burnt into or hewn out of the mountain, which is called the Witch Cave; and it is said that formerly it was the resort of witches or robbers."

"Bravo! bravo!" cried Brigitta; "it begins to sound famously. I am all anticipation of splendid and horrible things: I get quite warm."

"There is also," continued Olof, smiling at Brigitta's enthusiasm, "a lofty sharp sand-ridge, called the Goat's Back."

"Goat's Back! that does not sound so well," interposed Brigitta; "don't go and tumble from the Goat's Back. That sounds unromantic."

"And on the sides of the Goat's Back there grows a plant of the class Gynandria, of which I was determined to have a specimen."

"O sad! there we have it: our hero tumbles from the Goat's Back."

"No, he did not tumble; he went carefully, or, more properly, crept carefully down, and then crept carefully up again with an Epipactis atrorubens, as the banner of victory in his hand."

"Well, God be praised!"

"I then wandered towards the side where the witch-cavern was."

"That sounds nobly!"

"There aloft shoots forth a small crag, which is called Red-tail."

"Red-tail! admirable! If thou hangeest thyself on Red-tail, well, I will never again—"

"And when I had gained the summit, I descried a little uncommon species of fern, which grew a few fathoms below me, on the end—"

"Of the Red-tail, perhaps."

"Precisely: of the Red-tail. This I could not let alone, and so began clambering down the steep on hands and knees."

"Eh! Eh! Eh! that will never do."

"No, it did not do remarkably well: stones gave way under my feet, and small bushes that I laid hold on tore up by the roots. Thus I steered my way some yards downwards, and began to see the moment when I should hang myself aloft on the Red-tail, and for ever forfeit Brigitta's favour, or at full speed plunge headlong into the abyss. But just as I felt myself on the way thither, an arm was extended from the mountain, a hand grasped my neck, or rather my coat-collar; and almost in the same instant I found myself transported into a kind of grotto in the mountain, and standing full opposite to a figure, which might well have been the genius of Stygg Force, so strange and fantastic did he look."

"Ah, charming! quite charming! That could not be better."

"When the astonishment of the first moment was over, I could not refrain from contemplating my deliverer, thinking of Walter Scott's Balfour of Burley, and other gloomy figures in his romances. He was tall and slender, thin, and wore a black, coarse, but tasteful dress; his hair, dark and sprinkled with grey, lay in disorder on his brow; his countenance was of a sallow brown, and plain, if you will, yet interesting, through a trace of suffering which seemed there to have committed its ravages, and to have made it old before its time, for he could not be much above forty years of age. There was something dejected, a desolation in that countenance, and you seemed to see in him the ruin of some great creation. The eyes were strange, and I hardly knew whether handsome or ugly, but their glance was wild; and above all there was something about this man which did not inspire you with confidence. I should not exactly have chosen him for a travelling companion, although the meeting with him in the mountain was to me thoroughly welcome. He addressed me, not in Swedish, but in German, and with a voice which was at once melodious and gloomy. He was a traveller, by birth a Tyrolean, was familiar with mineralogy, and was here, like myself, from curiosity. When he had conducted me out of the Witch Cavern by a more convenient path than that by which I had descended, we botanised awhile together, while he asked me sundry questions regarding my home and my circumstances in life. In the meantime I obtained no knowledge of him, except * Catanotus, as still used in Cumberland, &c.

* But we strongly suspect that Olof, for Brigitta's sake, has improvised a Red-tail. We have indeed seen the Goat's Back, but no Red-tail, by Stygg Force.

that his name was Angermann, and that he was now on a journey to Norway. I invited him to Mora, and he promised to call upon me if his time would permit. He was a singularly interesting man, also, to talk with, and I regretted very much to be obliged to part from him; but our paths lay in diverse directions, he said, and did not seem to be solicitous for my company.

"See then, dear Brigitta, just so much and so little was there of this adventure; and a moment ago I fancied that I saw this very man, the Tyrolese, my rescuer at Stygg Force, go past here; and I cannot at this instant believe that it was not he, nor conceive how he vanished. Fancy if he were really the spirit of the Stygg Force, and no Tyrolese, after all! What do you think?"

"He may be just what he pleases," said Brigitta, "so that he only comes here, and that I may get to see him; for curious he must be, and I am very fond of the curious."

"Could my mother be ill?" asked Olof of Brigitta; "she left us so hastily."

"I fancy she is not very well," answered Brigitta, "and that occurs sometimes: it is her spasm of the heart that seizes her, and then she requires to be awhile quite alone. When the attack is over, she comes back, and is best pleased that no one should notice it or inquire about it."

They talked yet awhile longer of Olof's adventure, and of the mysterious wanderer, and then Lasse and Brigitta set the games a-going. Later in the evening came also Mrs. Ingeborg, and enlivened them by her participation; and the spirit of the Stygg Force was forgotten altogether in "weaving homespun" and "boring fire."

In the night raged a furious storm: the casements in the parsonage rattled unceasingly; the Silja roared wildly; but in the midst of the night and the tempest were heard the delicious tones of a flute, as if they floated on the wings of the wind. Siri, the singular maiden, was out in the stormy night; but that was not unusual with her, and they now suffered it to pass.

EXCURSIONS.

We begin these excursions ourselves, by flying over several weeks, during which the family life at the parsonage of Mora flowed on calm and fresh, as the river along its shore. Midsummer was past—July was come. This is the time of relaxation for the clergy of this district, for at this season the peasant with his household proceeds to the cattle or Säter booths, frequently six or seven Swedish miles from their villages, in the deep forests, where they find fresh pastures for their beasts, where they churn their butter, make their cheese, and commonly remain till the termination of the month of August. From the commencement of the month of July, you meet on the roads the fitting families, with cattle and house utensils. The father of the family drives the wagon, upon which blooming children peep forth from amid pails and work-tools. The wife generally goes alongside, keeping an eye on the cow or cows. Occasionally you meet a solitary, but ly knitting old woman, wandering along lig. and briskly, as if age were to her no burden, surrounded by sundry goats, which follow her like faithful dogs: she, too, is nomadic—she, too, wanders forth to the cattle-booths. If she stop and talk friendly with you for awhile, the goats gather caressingly around her. And soon do you observe, out of the dark and vast pine-woods which clothe the heights, light azure columns of smoke here and there ascending: there is the fitting family, there is the solitary old woman with her goats; they have arrived at the Säter hut, and have kindled fire on its hearth; and the travellers from the great world, who from a distance behold these peaceful indications of those, often to them, inaccessible dwellings, heave perhaps a sigh of longing for such secluded home, for this nomadic life, where the pure air which the body continually breathes streams also into the soul—where the daily, simple, and fresh cares shut out the sorrow "which devours the heart."

But, while the peasantry ride and roam abroad, the gentry do not sit still. The clergy, and the few gentlemen who besides them have small crown locations,† here and there in Dalarna, generally visit each other during this season, or travel to make themselves acquainted with districts still new to them in their beautiful province. And now it is in its full beauty, with its waters, its mountains, its valleys, at once consonant and varying, like Rousseau's tricordium. The sward is interwoven with Linnéa, and winter-green, the star-wort, and the pine-flower, all white flowers, which love the shade of the pine-woods, fill them with fragrance, and bloom in modest beauty at the feet of the ancient giants of the forest. Nowhere are found more flowery meadows, nowhere are gathered finer strawberries; and along the warmest valleys winds the Dalelf, cool and clear, in countless meanderings, now with stooping pines on lofty Mjellgar,‡ now with wild roses and Spirea Ulmaria in the low grassy lands on its banks.

The family at Mora had long projected a pleasure excursion to Elfdal, which none of its members had yet seen, but of whose wild beauty they had often heard. And as in the middle of July the weather began to be very steady and beautiful, they now resolved to devote a few days to the little expedition. The young people felicitated themselves indescribably on the prospect of seeing this beautiful wild region, its porphyry quarry, its porphyry works; and on coming to the spot "where the highway terminates," and the wild, pathless woods commence, which stretch away to the very frontiers of Norway. Siri was enchanted at the idea of making the journey with Olof on horseback, and therefore the more freely to be able to traverse the country. The professor rejoiced in the gladness of the young people, and † Estates belonging to the crown, and in possession of the functionaries for the time being.

‡ Mjellgar are sand-banks which are produced by falls of earth, which annually occur on the banks of the river, and which carry with them great pieces of land and trees into its depths. On these there arise sometimes, as at Lek-sand, the most picturesque shapes of ruins, broken arches, columns, walls, pyramids, caves, &c.

Mrs. Ingeborg, besides this, to have the pleasure of greeting Miss Lotta, one of the acquaintances of her youth, who had a little estate in Elfsdal, where she dwelt, and whither she had invited the whole Mora family, because in all this district there was not a single inn. But Miss Lotta was hospitality itself, and rivalled in this respect another house in Elfsdal, which we do not here name, but most gratefully remember. Brigitta also congratulated herself that she should see Miss Lotta.

"But who is this Miss Lotta!" demanded Olof, somewhat impatiently, who seemed for several days to hear nothing talked of but Miss Lotta, "and what is there so extraordinary about her; and why do people rejoice so much in the prospect of seeing her!"

It was the evening preceding their setting out, that Olof thus inquired, as the family was assembled in the porch, to enjoy the cool and delicious evening air. Mrs. Ingeborg, who, after having well packed the provision basket, was pleasantly reposing in the midst of her domestic group, answered gladly:

"Who is Miss Lotta? a perfectly simple human being, who had the courage to go her own way through life, and by her own vigour has shaped her own destiny. I will relate to you shortly

MISS LOTTA'S HISTORY.

"Miss Lotta was of an old noble line. She had lost her father; but she had a mother, a sister, seven uncles, and seven aunts. The whole of the family lived in the town of W—.

"She had also had a brother, who, according to the law of inheritance still in force in Sweden, had, after the father's death, taken twice as much out of the estate as his sisters, which he afterward squandered away, and more too, for having made away with all his own, he began to live on the little property of his mother and sisters—he was guardian to the latter—and would have concluded by ruining them entirely, if death had not prevented him. Out of the fragments of the former property the mother built a fresh little abode for herself and her two daughters.

"Miss Lotta's sister was handsome, and possessed talents which she continually used. She played on the guitar, cultivated her talent of singing, and painted flowers; was called amongst the relations 'the talented,' and was looked upon as one that must make a great fortune in the world. Miss Lotta, again, had received from nature a strong body, a tolerably ugly countenance, a warm heart, and mustaches, whence amongst the relations she was jestingly called the major, but still more frequently in earnest, 'poor Lotta;' Lotta had neither talents nor attraction, and it was thought there was no sort of fortune that she could make in the world. But Lotta herself did not view the matter in so melancholy a light. Already in her very early years she said to herself, 'I can never become a fine or agreeable lady, but I will be an able manager of the house.' But this was not so easy, for Lotta's mother lived on a small income, which just, and no more, enabled her to make a shift to exist with her two daughters, and Lotta found at home no scope for her spirit of activity. Besides, as the mother was much thought of in society, and her sister was a handsome and accomplished girl, they were much invited to the coffee and tea parties amongst the relations, and our poor Major must then accompany them, and have to sit overlooked in the dance, and silently swallow her cups of coffee and tea, and her sighs with them. Our poor Major was ready to fall into a fixed idea about herself, and sat perfectly melancholy and dejected, while sister Emily sung and painted flowers, and exerted her talents the day through.

"One fine morning, Miss Lotta went to her mother and said:

"Mother, I will no longer sit and consume thy already too scanty bread. I can no longer remain unoccupied without danger of falling into stupidity or follies. I am great and strong; I am above twenty years of age. I will now out and work, I will serve others till I have earned enough thereby to rent or purchase a little farm, which I will cultivate myself, and on which I will support myself."

"Her mother thought at first that her daughter was gone mad; but she thought upon the matter, talked further with her daughter, and then found that she was in her senses, and she said—soft she was a good and sensible lady: 'I have always wished that my children should decide their own course in life when they had arrived at sufficient discretion. Do as thou wilt, Lotta; poverty, not of your own occasioning, is no disgrace; but if one can work oneself out of it, that is an honour. I am only afraid of our connexions; what will they say!'

"And amongst the connexions there arose an uproar. The seven aunts rapped on their snuff-boxes and said, 'What scheme is this! can she not sit still and live humbly, as so many others, and spin or embroider, and manage her mother's little housekeeping, and occasionally amuse herself at our coffee-parties! People ought not to go out of their family connexions and their allotted position in life; people ought to abide with their own kindred. When a person can live so comfortably and so tranquilly as she does, why should they go and cast themselves upon the world! Others sit in their stillness and live humbly; why cannot she do as others do!'

"And the seven uncles shook their heads and said, 'She would rent a farm and herself manage it and its concerns! There will come nothing but folly, and embarrassment, and ruin out of it, we must by all the means in our power dissuade her from it.'

"But Miss Lotta became every day only the more determined in her mind. She made inquiries for a situation as housekeeper in some great household in the country.

"And amongst the relations was a poor invalid youth, whom no one of the family would willingly receive into their houses, because he was afflicted with a severe, incurable, and yet at the same time not fatal complaint; and one day as Miss Lotta found the boy bitterly weeping over his fate, that he should be such a burden to people, and suffer so much, and yet could not die, she said to him:

"Don't weep, Theodore! I am now going out into the world into service, that I may earn me money; but in some few years I shall pur chase me with it a cottage and a garden on the banks of the Dalelf, and then thou shalt come and live with me, and thou shalt bathe in the clear, fresh river water, and be strengthened by it. And thou shalt help me to cultivate my garden, and we will live happily together. Be of good courage, Theodore, and wait only; I shall not disappoint thee.'

"And our young lady went out into the world, and served as housekeeper in a great house where there was much to do, but where the salary was large. At the same time she purchased flax, and had it spun and woven, and then sold the webs, and by this means, in a few years accumulated a handsome little capital. Our young lady had, what is called the 'getting-on genius'; and of the various geniuses in the world, that is not the worst, especially when it is directed by a good and honest heart.

"Eight years had gone over, when Miss Lotta saw again her native town; yet everything there continued exactly the same. The mother went about as before to coffee and tea parties. 'The talented' exerted her talents constantly—practised music, painted flowers, and waited for the great good fortune that was to come. The seven aunts took snuff, and the seven uncles all shook their wise heads, and took on strangely about Lotta's 'absurd undertaking.' And still lived the invalid Theodore, and thought on the clear waters of the Dalelf, and upon Aunt Lotta's promise. And Lotta was now in the town, and greeted her mother and the relatives, and announced to them that she had purchased a farm in Elfdal, where she meant to carry on a little business, and that she would take the invalid Theodore to her.

"There was some amazement amongst the relatives, but yet they went magnanimously to work in the matter, and subscribed amongst them a sum of money for a sort of provision for the boy, whom they would now have no further trouble with.

"The next year Miss Lotta sent to her mother an extraordinarily fine cheese and a gigantic salmon, from the Domnare Force on the Dalelf, and wrote that all went well with her, that she found a deal of work to do, but for that she thanked God. Theodore bathed in the river, and was thereby signally strengthened in his bodily power, and felt himself so happy in his mind that he no longer complained of his ailment, which no longer hindered him from being a useful and a happy man. While Miss Lotta looked after the farm and the housekeeping, he carried on almost entirely the little business, which greatly interested him, and which was very successful. Miss Lotta concluded her letter with imploring her mother, sister, and the whole of the family to come and see their happy 'major.'

"The mother let a tear of joy fall over the good fortune of her daughter and her disposition, and congratulated herself on her wisdom in never having set herself against her daughter's reasonable wishes, and invited the whole of the relations to a participation of the cheese, the salmon, and the letter.

"The aunts took snuff, and said, 'Only to think that it should have succeeded so bravely with Lotta! our warnings were not, then, without effect. Delicious cheese!'

"And the seven uncles nodded altogether, and said, 'See! that is the way that all ladies should do. They ought to be such, and it then would be much better here in the world. A matchless salmon!'

"It is now five or six years since Miss Lotta located herself on her farm in Elfdal, and—but we shall see her to-morrow evening, and we can then judge better how she flourishes in her undertaking."

"Ah! I am enchanted with Miss Lotta!" exclaimed Olof; "I long to see her, and to express to her my respect and admiration."

"God grant that I remain faithful to my curate!" said Brigitta; "for I find myself on the highway to fall in love with the major. I like vigorous people, and always assert that it is only the want of real strength that occasions the greatest part of the misery in the world."

"Ah, gracious heaven!" said Lieutenant Lasse, "if she only had not moustaches, I would immediately pay my addresses to her—but I must confess that I am a little afraid of them."

"I tell you what; you only see in them a reflection of your own—you see your double!" said Brigitta, laughing. "I should have no objection to Miss Lotta as a sister-in-law."

"God and the people!" said Mrs. Ingeborg, "think, if we should make up a wedding on our little journey! But as in the morning we must rise before the cock puts his shoes on, had we not better now betake ourselves to the feather islands?"

The motion was adopted without putting it to the vote.

But it did not stand written in the stars that Lieutenant Lasse should see Miss Lotta. By a slip on the steps this same evening he sprained his foot extremely, and was obliged to bathe and nurse it, and give up the journey, and bear the curate company, who stayed at home at Mora—not because he took no interest in the excursion, but, on the contrary, the greatest in fishing, and thought that now, during the absence of his betrothed, most thoroughly to satisfy this passion both night and day; and he promised to take Lieutenant Lasse in his boat, but Lieutenant Lasse looked on this to be a very meagre satisfaction, and sang, with deep sighs—

"How short and sad is this life of ours!"

Siri, on the morning of the journey, was much occupied with Durathor, who would insist on accompanying her; and being restrained from it, struggled with a maiden of the farm till they both rolled over in the grass, at which the spectators were obliged to laugh outright. Lieutenant Lasse promised to write an elegy on this event, which he would have set to music, and published under the title of "Les adieux de Siri et de Durathor, Élégie harmonique par Lasse Doloroso."

The way from Mora to Elfdal was first by a ferry over the river to the point of land where formerly the witch-fires stood, and where now the "Salix Daphnoides" had shed its golden yellow catkins, but had clothed itself with tender, green, and beautifully polished leaves; then beyond it a few miles through deep sand and an ugly forest tract. But they soon entered the picturesquely-beautiful Elfdal, and pursued almost unvaryingly the banks of the Dalfelf—now ascending, now descending between lofty, wood-crowned hills, which, like shaggy giants, approached the travellers with threatening looks and gestures, but stood or passed by in the proud tranquillity of superior power. Thus was it with Suttur-skär, with Gopshus, Hyckje, and Wäsa-berg, &c. The thunder-charged clouds which rolled themselves up over the heights, the rapidly closing, rapidly opening views into the infinite distance, the play of brilliant lights and shades in the great but closely congregated scenery, the alternately idyllican amenity, and the wildness, even to savageness, of these regions, all combined to make a great—a vivid impression upon the travellers. On this road you see forests which appear to have stood from the foundation of the world. Trees fall in them, lie, and rot, because no hand troubles itself to make use of them; nay, the Dalmen often fell the most magnificent ones merely to procure a little fresh bark to mix with the fodder of their cattle, and then leave them recklessly to decay. So vast is here the wealth of, so great the indifference to, that which other provinces purchase with solid gold. But this gold does not penetrate into the primeval parts of Dalarna.

The cataracts of Dalarna, which may be said to ensure the innocence of the country, prevent, also, its connexion with the world of commerce, and seem to say, "Retain thy poverty and thy wealth, and with both thy peace." Fires often ravage vast tracts of these forests, even to the mountain-tops, and they let them burn till they go out of themselves—they can do nothing to quench them; and thus you see whole tracts converted to ashes, or, rather, to dead woods. The trees remain standing with bole and branches, but not a single green leaf is left upon them, not the slightest tint of grass protrudes from the ash-strewn earth, no bird, no insect, moves its wing amongst the burnt trees; all ground, wood, mountain, is blank and ash-grey as far as the eye can reach—all is dead: it is as if a curse had passed over it. Sometimes you have on the right of the road one of these dead forests, while on the left all flourishes in verdant beauty: and between the pines of giant altitude, standing on fresh green slopes, you look down on the river in its deep channel, which becomes in this valley a sportive stream, alternately foaming over the stony bottom, where the water sprite is said to sit and watch for mischief, alternately embracing in its bosom small light green umbrageous islands, while forest brooks, white with spray, descend roaring from the rocks, like gamesome boys, and fling themselves into its arms.

Olof rode by the side of Siri, and much occupied with her, and Siri sometimes turned towards Olof with an expression like this: "The most glorious morning! how freshly it sighs in the forest!" and the dark eyelashes, the fresh lips, glittered as with dew. Sometimes she sung a little snatch of a song. It seemed to Olof as if the morning, in its living freshness, sat on the horse with her. He could not but think of Brigitta's words, "There is over the girl a freshness and a dew."

Upon the whole, the charm which Siri possessed and imparted resulted much from the fact, that every utterance of her emotions was destitute of art and study: she had much of that direct impulse which, in the objects of nature, breathes so freshly on our senses. Her early education, free from all restraint, or rather her want of education, had, with its disadvantages, also had the great benefit of exempting her from the mental stays which press together the rest of us poor children of chamber-discipline and coercion, and render our breathing short and our motions constrained. Yet, probably, this education of nature could not have led to any thing very attractive, had not Siri been a character endowed with a native grace. We have seen other young girls brought up in golden freedom, and they have horrified us by the swing of their arms and their long strides. It is a difficult affair, this education! we thank God that we have no daughters, but do not love the young girls the less, as the noblest soil that the earth possesses. Ah! if the best of seed were only scattered into it!

Upon a verdant declivity, by a silver clear, murmuring brook of delicious water, the mid-day meal was spread from the provision baskets brought with them. No one who has not tried it can conceive how delightful it is to eat in the free air, and on the earth's green mat. But for this you must have glad hearts and good appetites; and these the Mora family had, and therefore they had a joyous and excellent noon-day meal; and this was not at all disturbed by a little unbidden sprinkling of thunder-rain. For, first and foremost, this caused a lively springing up and flying to the shade of some great pines; and then it presented a splendid spectacle of clouds, which displayed itself in the heavens, and gave Olof opportunity to deliver a little lecture, which interested every one, on the classification of clouds, which, first observed and named by the learned Quaker, Howard, was then universally adopted in science. This could not be effected without a little Latin; and Brigitta, who, as we already knew, was a genius in languages, talked soon quite fluently of "stratus, cumulus, and cirrus," and the rest were delighted to learn, to know, and to name in Swedish, the bank-cloud, also the night-cloud, because this form of cloud is common at night; the "high-cloud" and the "feather-cloud." They began, too, during the rain, and the succeeding clearing up, to notice how these cloud-shapes merged one into the other; and Olof must explain to them the laws which regulated these phenomena, and the names which the cloud-shapes acquired during their transfiguration. Mrs. Ingeborg was extremely interested by this, for the clouds and their phantasmagoria, their richly pictorial and changing life had always had a great attraction for her, often of a prophetic nature. She was fond of reading them, as people formerly read the stars, and was not free from a degree of superstition regarding them: she had now got names for their forms, and with well-sounding, that is, expressive names for things, much is achieved.

The whole day, during the journey, they gazed up at the clouds, and made observations on "stratus, cumulus, and cirrus." Brigitta complained that she got by this an altogether wrong bearing of the head and neck, the consequences of which no one could tell; and in order to counteract this, Olof directed her attention to the species of lichen which with its crimson covering make the stones by the high-ways of Dalarna so splendid, and the powder of which is so sweet, and like violet-root, when it is rubbed with the hand. And Brigitta admitted, that the head and the eye of man seemed to be purposely constructed to discover all the wonders in heaven and in the earth.

Towards evening, yet at an early hour, the travellers arrived at Miss Lotta's little farm. She stood in the porch to receive her guests; and on her countenance was such a beaming of intellectual peace and good-will, that no one saw or thought of her moustaches. N.B. Lieutenant Lasse was not there. Olof almost thought that Miss Lotta was handsome.

Miss Lotta received and entertained her guests in the Dalman and Dalwoman fashion; that is to say, heartily and richly. Siri attached herself immediately to the invalid and talked and laughed quickly with him, so that Miss Lotta opened large but joyful eyes, for the boy or youth was usually shy with strangers. He awakened an interest in them all by his soulful eyes, his suffering, patient expression, which now readily lit-up into a cheerful smile.

When they had powerfully refreshed and strengthened themselves with the best that the Dal could produce, they wandered forth to see Miss Lotta's little property, and all her arrangements on it; while she afterwards, sitting in her porch, looking towards the river, talked to the professor and his wife, about her life in this valley; her labours and her enjoyments, her joy in Theodore; told her plans for the future, which were, to receive a number of young people in the condition of Theodore, whom she could care for, employ, and conduct to the enjoyment of life. The younger guests wandered up a lofty, adjacent porphyry hill, from thence to observe the sunset. Here on the summit they found stones, in which Olof's practised eye discovered crystals, agates, red and brown jaspers, which are not unfrequently found in the mountains of Elfdal, which have all of them porphyry in their interior. Here Brigitta called on her friends to sing something, and Olof responded to her wish by the old Dal song so beautiful in tone,

"In the beautiful summer when earth is glad,
By the two broad rivers of Dala," &c.

Valborg sung then a song about the moon which a Dalwoman had composed; and which young girls sing so willingly and so well. But as Brigitta complained that they sung "such melancholy airs," and asked for "merrier ones," Siri sung out fresh and clear, so that the wood resounded:

"Thorough cave and mine
I seek the ore's deep fountain;
Ancient splendours shine
In the heart o' th' mountain;
Round my thoughts thy twine,
Deep my soul compelling.
There then shall my bed be;
What there is will I see—
There shall be my dwelling!"

A slight shudder passed through Olof when Siri sung the last lines with the force of inspiration, and, at the same time, stamped on the hill with her little foot, and he looked with a feeling of admiration on the young maiden as she stood there on the mountain, so light and yet vigorous, with a glance of fire in the dark blue eyes, and her light locks glistening in the evening sun.

"Siri," said he, "thou art born to be the wife of a miner!"

Siri shook her head, and answered, "Not a miner's, but a mine-king's, who shall lead me into the depths of the mountain, and cause me to reign there with him. Then shall I do nothing for whole days but sing, talk with the dwarfs, guess their riddles, pluck diamonds out of the rocks, and wander through magnificent halls. Ay, that would be glorious!"

"If it were but possible," replied Olof, smiling; "but I prophesy that if thou once go down into the heart of a mountain, that is, into one of our mines, thou wilt quickly long to be out of it, and upon the earth again."

Siri was silent, shook her head, and an expression of sadness rapidly cast a shade over her countenance.

The next day Miss Lotta's little bath-house in the river was enjoyed, and then they strolled about on foot in the valley. Olof and Siri were joyous, and almost as frolicsome as children. It happened that Olof felt at one moment a sudden pain in his hand, and said in jest, that he was bitten by Neck. This is what the peasantry are wont to say of any sudden pain felt in a limb, of the cause of which they are ignorant.

Siri said immediately, "I know a spell against a Neck-bite, so that it shall do no harm."

"Oh, indeed!" said Olof, "I become more and more convinced that at the bottom thou hast something of the witch about thee. It is fortunate that thou didst not live in the sixteenth century. Well, wilt thou try thy art upon me?"

"Yes," said Siri, "but thou must promise not to accuse me to the consistorium, and not to laugh, but to look me steadfastly in the eyes."

"These are difficult conditions to fulfil, but I promise to try."

Siri then took Olof's hand between hers, looked him awhile fixedly and seriously in the eyes, stooped then over his hand, and said:

"Neck and Tofve, how long wilt thou fly!
I bind thee under land, under strand!
Thou shalt stand in God's hand!"

With this the conjuration was at an end, but Olof stood a good while after in deep thought, and as it were bewitched.

In the meantime, unobserved of him and Siri, a pair of eyes, with night-black, threatening glance, watched them secretly from the wood. These eyes were those of Valborg.

In the evening Olof said to Brigitta—

"It is certain that Siri has a strange power in her eyes. There is something in them which reminds one of what the people in the country here call 'hugas' or 'häxa.'"

"And what is that?" asked Brigitta.

"Why, they assert that there are persons who, through the power of the eyes, can so enchant a thing or person, that it goes beside itself, becomes rigid, or falls into a swoon.

* The Miner, by E. G. Geirer.

Thus they can enchant, or 'hugsa' people, beasts, or lifeless things; for instance, a clock or a mill, so that they shall stand; a brook, that it shall cease to run. Pliny relates, that such female enchanters existed amongst the tribes from whom we are descended, the Scythians, and were called 'Bithyæ.' I could not help thinking of this to-day as Siri pronounced over me her charm against the Neck-bite, not that the repetition of the words did so very much good, but it is extraordinary, almost awful, to see how beautiful her eyes are sometimes."

"My dear friend," said Brigitta, "take care that those eyes do not cast a spell upon thee in earnest; Siri is a dangerous girl, ay, more dangerous than—"

"Ah! be quite easy on my account, my best Brigitta," interposed Olof, somewhat offended; "she may be as dangerous as she will, yet she is not dangerous to me, that I assure you. I merely study Siri—I study her as I examine a curiosity, a natural phenomenon."

"Yes, for example, a new species of granite, or some stratus or cumulus?" said Brigitta, by way of joke.

"Yes, just so," replied Olof, smiling, but yet a little offended that Brigitta could suppose Siri dangerous to him, the most widely-travelled and world-experienced young man, and who, moreover, was her chosen Mentor, who ought to be supposed rather dangerous to her, and to whom she ought to look up with both love and respect. Olof would not at all listen to a secret voice in his heart, which, like Brigitta, whispered that even for him there might be danger on foot.

And night came and threw her veil over the thoughts and impressions of the day.

The next day the journey was continued leisurely to Osbyn, where the road terminated. They went on foot through long stretches of the wild, picturesque way, and made acquaintance with the inhabitants of the valley. The people of Elfdal are no longer Dal people; they resemble in appearance rather gipsies: their eyes are brown and sparkling, their complexion dark, their features ignoble. Here you see beggars and rags; in their wretched abodes dirt and slovenliness abound. But their speech is, notwithstanding, melodious and sweet; and the character of nature around them is beautiful, although stern. Hills and pine-woods prevail. The deciduous trees are small and scrubby.

• The travellers visited the porphyry works, where patience seems to be polished equally with the brittle, hard stone; and where the workmen grow prematurely old, from the sharp dust of the splendid masterpieces of their art, which they prepare.

In the afternoon they arrived at Osbyn. Here the river sweeps in a wide crescent round the beautifully situated village with its fertile fields, and on the other side rises a noble amphitheatre of pine forests; here and there divided by a foaming mountain cataract which precipitates itself into the river.

Farther than this place the carriage could not advance. Our travellers proceeded on foot through the tolerably large village, and beyond it, to where in a meadow, lies a little chapel of wood, wild and solitary, where some few times in the year divine service is performed: simple and almost rude is it within: reindeer's horns serve for candlesticks and candelabras.

Mrs. Ingeborg, who was weary, desired to remain at the chapel, while the young people wandered farther onwards to seek the road's "utter termination;" and her husband staid with her. They sat down on the steps of the chapel, and they had speedily a group of people from the village assembled around them, guessing and wondering about the stately priest and his handsome wife, for very rarely do travellers come so far up into Dalarna.

The professor amused himself with talking to the people about past times, when Gustavus Wasa, having failed in his attempt to arouse the parishes round the Silja, with a half-despairing heart, fled up into this district over the mountains, and through the solitary forests which separate East and West Dalarna; by night sleeping in the lonely sheds which the people here and there erect for the shelter of the wayfarer, and so followed the western Dalfeld up to its very course, through the boundless and snow-filled woods. Still more and more desolate became the country; still wilder rushed the river, roaring over its rocky bed; still more thinly scattered, and more wretched, became the dwellings of men on its banks. Already stood Gustavus at the foot of the northern ridge, which should presently separate him from his unhappy native land. Then did he turn himself round, and saw coming through the woods of Lima the swift snow-skaters, who were sent after him from Mora, to persuade him to return, and to put himself at the head of the peasantry, who since they received intelligence of the Blood-bath of Stockholm, breathed only war and revenge. Here the fate of Gustavus also took its turn. The professor talked also with the husbandmen who assembled in crowds around him, of the learned and brave Commister* and Daniel Buscovius of Elfdal, who, in the year 1644, at the head of the men of Elfdal and Mora, surrounded the enemy at Serna, and conquered in a peaceful manner the whole of this parish for Sweden; and how "Our Daniel," as the people then called him, the day after the victory, celebrated divine service in the chapel at Serna, and christened a great number of children, of whom some of them were so old, that they snatched at the ritual and tore some of its leaves; and the professor found with pleasure, that the memory of the learned and gallant minister still lived amongst the Elfdal people. He then put to them sundry questions regarding their knowledge of religion, and was in return examined also by them, and was asked whether he were not the "president of the clergy," that is, the "grand-papa,† himself in Upsala!"

In the meantime, the young people strolled around the peninsula, and on towards Serna-side, where the river flows still wider, and where the sun descended towards the far blue chain of hills. This July evening was one of peculiar and wonderful beauty. A secret, suffering-fraught life seemed to tremble through nature. It was still, calm, yet huge thunder-clouds lay gloomily over the country, and between them the sun threw long and burning glances over the earth, and into the river's softly trembling waters; strange lights and shadows arose amongst the hills; beams of light broke gleaming paths through the dark masses of vapour; the veil lifted itself, and abysses opened themselves, beautiful, glittering . . . thus does it move, thus does it live in the mystic regions whither love conducts, the earthly as well as the heavenly, in its fairy hours.

Olof and Siri, who were rapid walkers, had quickly left Brigitta and Valborg far behind. They went on, attracted by the extraordinary beauty of the way and the scenery, without thinking any further of the road's termination. At length, however, they were obliged to think of turning again, but concluded first to wait for Valborg and Brigitta on the banks of the river. Here they stood, gazing on the magnificent spectacle of the sunset, when Siri suddenly exclaimed, "Olof!" and with the speed of lightning, sprang forward and pushed him aside. Olof felt himself at the same moment involved in a cloud of dust, he knew not how; he heard a crashing and a rushing down, and turning, he saw Siri flung prostrate beneath a pine-tree, which had given way and plunged down the steep sand-bank, above the shore, and whose fall she had diverted from Olof to herself by her interposition. A part only of its boughs had now whizzed over Olof's head; but Siri lay beneath the boughs and bled freely from a deep cut in the neck.

But she lay there only for a moment; in the next instant she had liberated herself and stood now before Olof, at once joyous and anxious, exclaiming, "Olof! are you unhurt? yes, you are; God be praised."

"But you, Siri, you bleed! and that for my sake!" exclaimed Olof, and caught her in his arms, terrified and greatly agitated.

"Oh, it is merely a scratch!" said Siri, putting her hand to her neck, "I will bathe it in the river, and it will be quickly well. Don't be anxious—I am so glad."

But this was a dangerous moment for Olof, for as he now held the smiling, bleeding, beaming girl in his arms, there breathed upon him, he knew not what fragrance of young, loving, fascinating life, which penetrated his heart, his mind, and diffused itself through all the blood in his veins.

The hallowing, strange fire which the northern sagas tell us surrounded the lovely daughters of the giants, flamed up within him, and enveloped his soul. Affected, enchanted, agitated, he stood and stooped over his young deliverer, as if to suck up the blood which ran for his sake, and he drew her still closer and closer to his bosom. But like as a serpent, Siri escaped from his embrace, sprang down to the water, dipped therein a handkerchief, and washed and bathed with it her neck.

Olof followed, and contemplated her in silence. He could not speak, scarcely think. An ocean of feelings tempest in his heart. Siri seemed to him enchanting; he would fain be the water which streamed in pearly drops between her fingers; the handkerchief which she wrapped round her neck. He did not know himself what was passing within him. He stood on the verge of one of these passions which are all the more violent and dangerous, because they are based only on a blind fascination. And as he now thought that the charming girl bled for him, had ventured her life for him, his heart beat more violently; and proud as a god—ah no!—as a weak man—he exclaimed to himself, "She loves me! she loves me!"

"Thou studiest some phenomenon of nature; I suppose some cumulus or stratus? hum?" he now heard Brigitta say, who, softly and unobserved, had approached, while Valborg, still and pale, paused at some paces farther back.

"But heavens!" continued Brigitta, terrified as she observed Siri, "what is this for a spectacle again! what is this! what has happened?" have you fought, or been torn by bears? or—"

Siri at this began to laugh so gaily and heartily, and then related the little transaction so simply and easily, that Olof became both astonished and almost vexed. For him the world had become wholly changed within ten minutes.

"But goodness preserve me!" continued Brigitta, "one cannot lose sight of Siri without her falling into breakneck adventures and deadly dangers: some time ago thou wert drawn down into the depths of the earth, so that we believed thou wert both dead and buried; then thou descended to the bottom of the lake, so that I believed thou wouldst never come up again; and now thou pullest the wood down upon thee: what will be the end of it? If thou art not carried off to Blakulla, it will be more by chance than grace. And if certain people would think less of studying the curious and natural phenomena, and more of taking care of a poor, silly girl, it would certainly be much more to the purpose."

Brigitta's talent for scolding and rallying had always a very refreshing effect on Olof, and at this crisis came over him like a dash of cold water, and brought him again to full consciousness, especially when she proceeded still more gaily, "I wanted just to introduce to you a phenomenon myself, which I discovered, altogether sui generis; a phenomenon which boiled chocolate seven years on the Kattrygg, in the southern suburb of Stockholm. Now, where are you stopping, mother?"

A gipsy-like woman, with burning, brown eyes, on this advanced from the bushes, and was presented by Brigitta as this same phenomenon. Her remarkableness, however, on further inquiry, reduced itself to this; that during a longer wandering than ordinary from Dalarna, she had entered the service of a lady in the southern suburb of Stockholm, in the Kattrygg quarter, and there for seven years had helped her to prepare chocolate; and she had now offered herself to the travellers to make inquiries after her former mistress.

Followed by the talkative old woman, the young people now turned back to join the rest of the travelling party. They found the professor somewhat out of patience with their long delay, and urgent for their setting out on their return.

Speedily were they once more on horseback and in the carriages; and then Brigitta quickly gave her aunt somewhat to guess. "What is that, for a wonder, which she had seen in the king's court, which for seven years boiled chocolate in the Kattryg in Stockholm, and now cooks groats in Elfdal? And, also, what was that for a wonder above all wonders, which goes down into mountain and lake, and pulls the woods down upon it, and after that travels gaily on the highway?" And when it was discovered that the latter enigma's word was Siri, and the professor learned what she had done for Olof, he was so enraptured that he caused the carriage to stop, called Siri thither, lifted her from her horse, and upon his knee, and embraced and blessed her with fatherly affection. Mrs. Ingeborg gazed on the scene with tears of joy in her eyes. Olof felt a strong temptation to embrace his father; but Siri, almost frightened and somewhat annoyed, seemed only anxious to get out of the carriage and upon her horse again.

"That is a glorious girl!" then exclaimed the professor warmly; "she can melt ice, not six, but twelve yards round her. If she were my own child I could hardly be more fond of her."

"It is strange," said the professor, after a while, "how chance plays its vagaries in the world, and connects things and persons together, who yet have no connexion at all with each other. Siri, for instance, reminds me involuntarily sometimes of a person, a man of whom I saw much in my youth, for we studied at the same university, and who interested me much, a certain Julius Wolff, who has now been dead these many years. There is something in her eyes, in her glance, so like his; and, what is extraordinary, the little birthmark by her left eye, which she has, he had too."

"This man," continued the professor, sunk in his recollections, "was a singular character, or rather nature, for character was just what he wanted. He was a richly gifted, interesting, yet fantastic fellow, demoniac, captivating, but dangerous, for he had violent passions, which lacked order and consistency. 'The gods, that is to say the orderers,' says the ancient Herodotus; but this man had made disorder and irregularity his god, and valued life only in its moments of passion and excitement. At bottom he had a warm heart, and exerted a powerful influence over men, and often over animals, which he was much attached to, just as Siri also is, through a sort of magnetic attraction, which is peculiar to certain natures. Pride and ambition brought him to ruin; he allied himself with a miserable, but daring adventurer, committed a heinous crime against society, and evacuated the kingdom, and died a fugitive. It was a thousand pities of the man; and, when I think of him and his many splendid endowments, and of the want of principle which plunged him into destruction, I am ready to say with Brigitta, 'It is want of real strength which causes most of the evils in the world.'"

It was so silent in the carriage, as the professor closed this monologue, that you might have fancied that his hearers slept. If so it was, they were soon awakened most unpleasantly, for, in a smart descent that the carriage made down a hill, both of the back springs broke, and the body of the carriage sat itself down comfortably on the hinder wheels.

But for the travellers that was by no means comfortable, but now all the more annoying, as they were here far from any place whence they could procure help, and on this hilly road they could not continue the journey in the carriage, though the springs were bound up with ropes. Besides it was past ten at night, and the cloudy sky made it unusually dark. After some consultation, it was determined that the professor's servant should take on the carriage to the porphyry works, about three quarters of a Swedish mile from the spot where they were, and that a peasant lad that was with them, and who was quite at home in the country, should conduct the travellers to a hut in the forest near a porphyry quarry not far off, where they would pass the night. In the morning the carriage, after being repaired at the porphyry works, should come for them.

With this they were all satisfied, and, carrying with them what was necessary for the night, the party began their progress into the forest. They had not proceeded more than half an hour before they came to a sort of barn, which lay solitarily amongst stupendous mountain-precipices and stone-quarries. Here they entered, and, as most of the party were tired, they quickly spread out their cloaks and prepared their couches for the night as comfortably as they could, but not without a deal of lively talk and laughter.

When Siri had laid herself down, the professor went softly up to her and spread his cloak over her, to protect her from the night-chill; Siri perceived it, seized the fatherly hand, and imprinted a warm kiss upon it. This first caress that he had received from the beloved but shy maid, affected him tenderly, and with a warm and happy heart he went to share his son's hard bed. Soon all became silent in the shed, and the pine-trees of the forest seemed to murmur only over sleepers.

But there was one there who did not sleep, and that was Mrs. Ingeborg. Painful feelings, and perhaps some bodily suffering, kept her awake. Silently she sat up and listened to the calm breathing of the sleepers, to the gentle murmur of the forest over and around her. But they did not soothe her to rest; all the more feverishly burnt her blood, all the more violently beat her heart. No longer able to remain within, she softly arose and went out.

Before her lay an open vale, and she went gently forwards, glancing around her on the porphyry quarry, where lay huge blocks scattered about, and which in the obscurity of the night assumed fantastic and threatening shapes of the northern saga's misshapen giants and dragons. It was an electrical summer night, and thunder rolled dully amongst the black clouds. The moon was up, and the almanack may say what it pleases, but it shines quite visibly in the nights of July, especially in the latter half of the month, and did so especially this night, gleaming valiantly from between the dark clouds.

The forest was silent as before the creation of man, and sent forth an aroma such as only the northern pine-forests do. The fragrance of the south is faint compared to this fresh, delicious, wild breath of the northern forest.

Still night shudders passed over Mrs. Ingeborg; the freshness of the wood breathed strongly on her senses. Life arose before her with its nocturnal shadows, its sorrows, and its dead, in a lofty, melancholy beauty; the care of her own heart, as it were, dissolved into it, and as the moonbeams through the night, passed through her soul faith in the power, the goodness which can see all, hear and reconcile all. Still lighter and freer advanced she onward; but at once she stopped, struck by the ghastly spectacle which met her eye. Before her, at the distance of about thirty paces, lay one of the dead woods of which we have spoken. The moon, which now shone brightly, lit up the dark grey, burnt shapes, and sighs of death seemed to murmur therefrom. It was like a ghost scene from the desert, and Mrs. Ingeborg was strangely impressed by it, but still more strangely and sadly when she saw distinctly a black shadow glide onward amongst the dead trees. She recognised the form of a man, and this form—she seemed also to recognise it; and a thousand memories—terrible memories—arose herewith as arising from their grave. The figure stood, seemed to gaze towards the place where she stood; it went like cold steel through her heart—its pulse ceased. Again the dark form moved; it withdrew, and vanished, like a shadow in the dead forest.

"Was it only a shadow, a creation of my fever-infected fantasy?" demanded of herself Mrs. Ingeborg, as she turned towards the lodging for the night, her brow and bosom bathed with a cold dew, which was neither that of the cloud nor the ground.

Morning came, and with it the carriage, and all became life and activity; but the life was not truly glad. Mrs. Ingeborg was evidently not well, although she sought to conceal it, and her husband was uneasy about her. This depressed the spirits of all, and the return was by far not so pleasant as the journey out. Siri rode constantly near the carriage, and Olof got little opportunity of talking with her. Brigitta's observations and the forms of the clouds above awoke some degree of cheerfulness in the party. All appeared to be very glad to find themselves again at Mora, especially Brigitta, who greeted her curate with a cordiality which excluded all confusion of tongues. But when she expected to hear him complain of her absence, she had only to listen to praises of the fishery; and she lamented her unhappiness—unheard-of fate!—in being compelled to be jealous of pikes and perches.

But a great sorrow awaited Siri; for her clerk, Durathor, was dead at her return to Mora, and, as it seemed, entirely from grief for her. From the moment of her departure he had refused to eat, and to-day at noon they had found him dead; and Siri wept so bitterly over him that Lieutenant Lasse altogether forgot to speak of his "Elegie harmonique."

Towards Olof was Siri now quite changed. He found her, ever since the lonely and strange evening in Elfdal, distant, and, as it were, shy before him; she evidently avoided him, and this mysterious conduct wounded him cruelly, and fanned the darkly flaming fire in his heart. He lost his sleep and serenity of mind, and burned with desire of an explanation with her. A few evenings after the return to Mora, awhile after the sun had gone down and the shadows of night had already begun to stretch themselves over the earth, the wind carried to the parsonage at Mora well-known and soft tones of the flute.

Impelled by an irresistible feeling, Olof went towards the place whence they seemed to come. It was from the other side of Mora Church, and thither Olof proceeded with hasty steps; but the notes had ceased long before he arrived upon the headland, where the church stands between tall trees. Olof went up towards the churchyard. The iron gate on that side stood ajar, and Olof was just about to enter, when an ice-cold hand was laid on his; and like the angel of death, as pale and as solemn, advanced Valborg from the other side of the wall, and pointed in silence towards the church. In the screen of its shadow sat on a tombstone a man, and on her knees before him, in his arms, and reposing on his bosom, lay in the full devotedness of love a young maiden. Her face was not visible, but the light hair, the whole shape, the dress, all betrayed, what Valborg also whispered—"Siri!"

For a moment Olof started, in the next he would rush forward, but was withheld by Lieutenant Lasse, and was led away by him almost by force, and in a state of mind closely bordering on madness.

THE TRIBUNAL.

THE light burnt dimly in the professor's room, when the family found itself assembled there late at night. It might be seen in its members that some important consultation had been on foot; but now all were silent. Mrs. Ingeborg sat beside her husband, and her countenance had an almost deathly paleness, while her glance, full of anguish, was fixed on the door. Nordevall seemed to have wrestled with himself for self-possession: his voice was calm, a resolute expression lay in his manner, but the bitter expression of his features had now a trace of deep pain, which a consoling hope strove in vain to chase away.

Poor Brigitta's little eyes were red and swollen, as if with much weeping. Valborg's were dry; she sat pale and apparently indifferent. Olof stood by a window, with his head leaned on, and his face shaded by, his hand; there passed through his soul a deeper bitterness than he was willing to betray to any one. The rest had their eyes directed towards the door.

And now there were heard before it light and quick steps. The door opened, and Siri entered with an aspect which testified a state of mind which, if disquiet, was still defiant.

"My uncle has requested that I should come hither," said she, and gazed round her; and added, with a constrained smile, "but it looks within here so strange and solemn—quite like a tribunal."

"It is even so," said the professor; "but," continued he—and the warm and open heart ascended into his look and tone—"but I would not have had thee called before it, if I did not hope—yes, if I were not convinced in my soul, that thou, my child, canst not merely explain thyself, but also justify thyself against the charges that are brought against thee.”

“What charges?” asked Siri, with an effort to appear untroubled, which at the same time her seeking for a support contradicted.

“Thou hast,” continued the professor, with the same soft, mild, but deeply penetrating tone, “thou hast this evening, late, been seen in the churchyard with a stranger, a man; thou hast been seen in his arms, and that tells that it is not the first time that thou hast secretly given him meeting. Is it so?”

“Who is it that says this?” demanded Siri, and looking menacingly around.

“It matters not who,” answered Nordevall; “I tell thee what is said, and I demand of thee at once, is it true?”

After a moment’s reflection, Siri replied with an effort, but resolutely, “Yes!”

A sensation, like a shudder of the soul, went through the company.

“Who is this man?” demanded Nordevall.

“I cannot tell that,” said Siri.

“Why dost thou go clandestinely to meet this man?” demanded the professor; and his voice now grew stern, and his questions became continually more rapid and vehement.

Siri said, “Neither to this question can I give any answer.”

“Why dost thou make a mystery of this matter?”

“Because—I must do it!”

“And why?”

Siri was silent.

“And wherefore must thou? Answer, girl!”

“I can, I will not!”

“Siri!” (menacingly)—“Siri!” (tenderly) “that I had not expected of my sacrament child!”

Siri was silent, but passed her hand over her brow.

“Siri,” said the professor, “wouldst thou be alone with me?”

“No, no! I could say nothing but what I have now said.”

“Thou confessest thyself, then, guilty!”

“No—I am innocent!”

“Innocent! Tell us something that can attest it.”

“I cannot.”

“Innocent!” continued the professor, with angry voice; “innocence which meets a strange man clandestinely, which hides itself from connexions and friends, and obstinately refuses to explain itself to them, such innocence I make very little account of.”

“And yet, yet I am innocent—God knows that I am!” exclaimed Siri, with an expression of truth, which caused a ray of hope to shine into the hearts of those who loved her.

“Dost thou love this man?” demanded again Nordevall.

With a tone gentle, but springing from the bottom of her heart, Siri answered, “Yes!”

“And he loves thee?”

“Yes, but not—not as . . .”

“Can he then not come honourably to thy connexions, and avow it?” burst forth the professor. “Has he done something disgraceful, that he thus conceals himself? That insidiously and in darkness he wishes to allure to himself her whom he loves, and does not fear for her reputation, for her good?”

“I cannot and I will not answer!” said Siri, wringing her hands and looking miserable; “but,” added she, “do not believe evil of him, and do not think evil of me! He is unhappy, and—I am so likewise.”

“Girl! girl!” said the professor, “this looks very ill for thee.” He was silent awhile, and all the rest were silent also. At length he resumed:

“Wilt thou promise never again to see this man—at least never to see him in hiding-places and in secret?”

Siri was silent. The professor was obliged to repeat his question. At length Siri answered,

“No, I cannot promise that.”

“Not?”

“No!”

“And if I command thee on this point?”

“No, not if all the kings in the world commanded me! In storm, in rain, in cold, in night, in the depth of the earth, in hell itself, or wherever he calls me, I will meet him, though disgrace and death itself should be my lot!”

“Oh my God!” said Mrs. Ingeborg, and pressed her hands against her heart.

“Unhappy child!” thundered the professor, springing up, “dost thou know what thou sayest! Art thou so fallen, so irrecoverably fallen? Wilt thou defy God, since thou profanest the resting-place of the dead? And knowest thou not, therefore, that thou art unworthy to continue in this house; that thou must be cast out of this home, which received thee; that thou art unworthy to remain one night beneath the same roof with those whom thou so cruelly hast deceived?”

“I will go—away,” said Siri, with a low voice, but with a look, an expression so touching and full of desolation, that it cut her judge to the heart.

“Yes, thou mayest go!” exclaimed vehemently the professor, “if thou wilt persist in thy defiance; thou mayest go out of my house, but in the porch shalt thou trample upon me as thou now tramplest on me at this moment as father and instructor. In the porch of my house I will cast myself at thy feet, and conjure thee to take pity on thy own soul and on mine, which will never find rest, here or hereafter, if thou art lost. Go, yes, go! But thou shalt go no whither where I will not follow thee. If thou art not afraid of night or tempest, in order to reach hell, neither am I either to snatch thee thence. From me shalt thou never have rest till thou givest me back the peace which thou hast ravished from my heart and my house. Ungrateful one, go! and return curses for the blessings thou hast received.”

He pushed her from him, and turned to go out; but Siri sunk hastily at his knees, and embracing them, exclaimed, as she bathed them with tears,

“Oh do not cast me off! I am not going; I will not go. Cast me not off! Think me not ungrateful; think me not criminal: I am neither. Look at me, my foster-father, my teacher! Do I then look like so worthless, so abandoned a creature? Believe me, I am only unhappy, and one day thou shalt understand it, and if not here upon earth, yet hereafter in God's light! Wilt thou not believe me, and you all who have been so kind to me!" And Siri arose and extended her hands beseechingly towards those in the room.

Again turning to the professor, she continued: "Hast thou not seen, my instructor, during our hours of being together, that I am attached to truth; that thy doctrine was dear to me; and that something dwelt in me which was not reprobate! Canst thou believe that this was false! Thou wert fond of me then, and now—it is impossible that I can all at once have become unworthy to be 'thy little Siri, thy own girl!'"

These names of endearment, which the professor had often in tenderness given Siri, now affected him: he turned himself away. In a while he said more mildly, but with a voice which betrayed the excitement of his feelings, "Siri! I will believe that thou art innocent, at least that thou dost not voluntarily deceive us. But thou art deceived; of that I am certain. And that thou obstinately persistest in taking thy own fate into thy hands, in spite of the affliction and prayers of those whom God has given thee for parents, in spite of all that is right and decorous—that is criminal, and deserving of punishment."

Siri bowed her head, and was silent.

"Dost thou persist in what thou hast declared to be thy resolution!" asked once more the professor.

"Yes, I must do it," she replied.

"Then I must tell thee," continued he, "that I cannot permit thee to go to the Lord's table before thou hast cleared thyself from the darkness that rests upon thee, or through confession and repentance hast rendered thyself worthy of forgiveness."

This seemed painful to Siri. Silent, but imploringly, she stretched her clasped-together hands towards her stern teacher, and then hid in them her countenance.

"And if thou forfeitest our confidence," continued the professor, sternly, "and as I am before God and man answerable for thee, so—I tell thee beforehand, that thou shalt hereafter be—watched."

Siri arose hastily: "And who shall watch me? who shall be my gaoler?" demanded she, bitterly, and the spirit of defiance again seemed to swell her bosom.

"I," said Olof, stepping forward, "I, if my father will allow it."

"Be it so," said the professor: "thou shalt be responsible to me for her."

Siri turned slowly her eyes upon Olof, but he met steadily her dark glance.

"Olof is then my keeper," she resumed, "and I am his captive! But my judge is none but God alone! Mark now," added she, with a smile whose wildness approached the bounds of madness—"now is it with me as with the maiden whom they placed under 'God's judgment.' Like her, I am innocent, but I desire to live no longer!"

And with this word she sprang hastily out of the room. Olof followed her.

At about a hundred paces from the parsonage of Mora lies the Silja. A green field, thinly planted with young trees, stretches down to the shore; and over this green field now hastened Siri, with flying locks, on towards the lake; she ran as if she would fling herself into the cool deep, but on its margin she was caught in the arms of some one who held her back: she looked round—it was Olof.

"Is it thou—my keeper?" said she, bitterly; "thou art watchful over thy thrall. Let me go—I hate thee!"

"I know it—I know now that thou dost not love me; but that thou hatest me is hard."

There was something in Olof's tone so noble, and so deep a sorrow, that even at this moment it made an impression on Siri. More mildly, but petulantly, she demanded,

"Why dost thou constitute thyself my gaoler?"

"Because," he answered, "that thou mayest always know that thou hast near thee—a friend; some one who will always love thee, though thou lovest another."

"Thou wilt be my friend and my watcher at the same time," said Siri; "and if I deceive thee?"

"That thou shalt not," said Olof, with firm and open gaze upon her; "I do not know how it is, Siri, but I cannot believe evil of thee. There is an innocence upon thy brow, and in thy look, which cannot deceive. What cause may induce thee to act as thou dost, I cannot understand; but one thing I know, and that is that I will protect thee, and therefore have I desired to keep watch over thee."

"Therefore! Olof, thou art a noble man! I will not deceive thee."

"Yet thou hast already done it," thought Olof, "or, rather, I have deceived myself when I believed—Ah, folly, folly!" And Olof repressed in his eyes a tear. His first love, his glad dream, his youthful imagination, were indeed crushed; but the stars of heaven never beamed above a purer youthful soul than was Olof's at this moment.

"My head burns, beats so!" said Siri, as she knelt down on the shore: "take water in thy hand, Olof, and throw it on my forehead."

He did so.

"Ah, that is beautiful!" said Siri; "it is as if thou threw moonlight, mild, tranquillising moonlight over me. It is thy friendship, Olof, which makes the water so soothing and delicious. Thanks, good Olof!"

"Yes, my friendship is moonshine, but another's love is sunshine," thought Olof, still somewhat bitterly.

"Olof," said Siri, solemnly, when she had recovered herself, and as she arose, "to-morrow night—hearest thou?—to-morrow night I must see him again!"

Olof felt as if stung by a serpent.

"Must!" exclaimed Siri, "mark thou that: the happiness of my life and another's depend upon it. I must see and speak with him, but for the last time for a long while. On Ting-gnäs* I will meet him: I have promised it. You may prevent it, if you keep me confined, but then—I shall go mad!"

"I will accompany thee," said Olof, stoutly.

"But thou—thou must not—"

* A headland overgrown with pine-trees, where the Dalelf discharges itself into the Silja.

"I understand," interrupted Olof, "I must not come near, not hear—good! I promise for this time to stand at a distance, so long as I . . . have thee in sight, but if I lose sight of thee, then—"

"Thou shalt see me. I will neither fly nor hide myself from thee. Would to God that I could but tell thee all, shew thee all that is in my heart!"

There was an expression of truth and innocence in these words of Siri, which at this moment took away all doubt and all uncertainty out of Olof's heart. He threw his arm, in brotherly affection, about Siri's waist, she leaned her head on his shoulder. He who had seen them thus wander gently up towards the parsonage, so young, so handsome, so united, could little have augured that they now felt themselves separated for ever.

Olof accompanied Siri up to her room, and was on the point of leaving her, when the door flew hastily open, and Mrs. Ingeborg entered, evidently in a most agitated state of mind. She went to Siri and clasped her almost violently in her arms, saying—

"Girl, girl, for God's sake, for thine and for ~~my~~ sake, reflect, reflect! Thy mother—thy mother once acted as frowardly as this; believed herself innocent and strong as thou dost, and did—what she had cause bitterly to repent of her whole life! Thy mother—God forgive me! I hardly know what I say, but if thou wilt not kill me, then, do not make thyself wretched!"

Siri tore herself out of the arms which convulsively enclosed her, and stood still some paces distant from Mrs. Ingeborg, pale and rigid, fixing upon her a dark, inquiring glance.

"Haast thou not one word—not one kind word—not one single, single word of comfort to give me!" asked Mrs. Ingeborg, with a heart-breaking expression.

Siri was silent; she was as if transformed to marble.

"Oh, my God!" said Mrs. Ingeborg, gazed awhile imploringly in agonised inquiry at the dumb and rigid girl, wrung her hands in silence, and—went.

"Siri! thou art dreadful!" said Olof, as with amazement and almost terror he regarded her. "I stand before the judgment-seat of God," said Siri, slowly, "and no one besides Him has a right to judge me. Leave me now, Olof. To-morrow night, at this hour, I will await thee on the shore."

And with this she turned away. Olof, too, departed with his soul in the wildest uproar, with a secret rage at the power which he felt that the strange girl exerted over him. As he descended the stairs, and passed the door of his step-mother, he felt powerfully drawn to go in; to see her and to speak a few words with her. He opened the door softly. She sat there alone, still with the deepest pain visible on her countenance, and her hands pressed against her bosom.

Olof went forward, fell on his knees before her, and said—

"My mother, speak—speak with me! I cannot see thee thus!"

Mrs. Ingeborg took his head between her hands, looked him long in the full, warm eyes, and said finally, "O! if Heaven has denied me a daughter, yet it has given me a son!" She kissed the youth's forehead, looked again long into his eyes penetratingly, as if she looked into his very soul. Thereupon she clasped his head silently to her, and said, "We must have patience, my son, we must bear it! It cannot be otherwise. Thou shalt help me."

And by his mother's heart there came a stillness over the youth's soul. He became at once patient and strengthened in his mind. He felt that he was understood by her. They said no more, but beautiful and consoling was the moment for both.

The next night there glid a little boat over the waves of the Silja from Mora, and in the direction of Tinggnäs headland, which, with its dark pine-trees, shot darkly out into the transparent, moonlit lake. Silent were the strokes of the oars which clove its calm mirror; silent and pale were the two young people who sat in the boat, opposite to each other, with down-cast, dark glances.

An hour afterwards glid the same boat over the lake back towards Mora; and the two young people who sat therein, were, as before, silent and pale, like shadows in the ancient Hades, when they were conveyed over the silent surface of the Styx to their judgment.

SUNDRIES.

THE day after Siri lay in a burning fever. She fell into a short but violent sickness, which made her friends alarmed for her life, but assembled them in affection around her bed. During a few days she was delirious, and frequently during that time exclaimed, "I stand beneath God's judgment!" But there was sometimes a calm and touching joy in her expression which more than any thing called forth a persuasion of her innocence, and flung an auspicious veil over what had recently passed. To this was added, that Siri, during this illness, and when the danger of it was gone by, was altered in mind. She was now mild, affectionate, and grateful for the smallest service, the slightest evidence of tenderness. Never had she been more amiable; and, in consequence, all excitement involuntarily subsided; all gentle sympathies were quickened; but gladness was gone from the house.

"I cannot comprehend how it is with me," said Brigitta, one day. "I feel so odd, so dejected. My soul lies actually topsy-turvy. I must raise my spirits with a little wrangling with my curate. But the mischief of it is, that when he looks at me with his honourable, innocent eyes, I fall out of all my conceits. Whence shall we get a little steel and pepper into one, in this miserable world? And thou too, Lasse, lookest quite tender, like boiled stock-fish,* or like over-soaked salmon."

But now came the curate, hastening with an unusually excited and lively smile, and approaching Brigitta, she said—

"Well, it is rather à propos to look like a fresh winter, when the whole house is in trouble and care! I can no longer endure this world, Godelius! I am thinking of quitting it. I have come to the conclusion to go into a nunnery. I will be Saint Brigitta the second!"

* A peculiar dish in Sweden, where the fish is buried some time in ashes before it is boiled.

"Then thou must have eight children first, my little Brittgen!" said the curate, smiling humorously.

"No, that is unworthy," burst out Brigitta, "thus to ridicule the feelings of a human being! And who bade thee call me Brittgen! Brittgen is not my name at all; I do not choose to be called Brittgen, and least of all will I be thy Brittgen! Dost thou hear! I break off with thee, Godelius. I will be a nun; I will go into a convent. Yes, positively!"

"Nay, what sort of a humour is my little old woman in to-day!"

"Old woman! Am I an old woman? If thou talkest nonsense to me thus—yes, there will occur something dreadful. But I will not quarrel with thee now. I will go into a nunnery!"

"That shalt thou do, my heart's child," said the curate, with the greatest composure, "if thou wilt only first read me this letter, and tell me what I ought to do."

And he put into Brigitta's hand a letter, the contents of which were, that he was appointed to the situation of lecturer on Greek and Hebrew in the Gymnasium at Westeras,* and a request was added that he would this autumn enter upon it.

When Brigitta had read the letter, she raised her hands, and cried—

"And thou askest me what thou shalt do? God grant that thou be quite right in thy senses! Is that a thing to question about! Accept it, say I; lay hold of it with hand and foot; lay hold of it with all the might thou hast; I will help thee. Thou, a lector in Westeras! And I, I will be thy assistant, thy deputy teacher; I shall be quite as clever and as versed in Greek and Hebrew as I am in Latin. Ah! we shall be a professorship together!" And Brigitta danced round in rapture with her tall curate, who, struggling to release himself, observed—

"But thou wilt really go into a nunnery!"

"Ah, but I shall consider about it awhile. Just now I have no time to think of it. Now I must think of thy lectureship, thy removal, and settling, and—"

"And of our wedding!" added the curate, smiling very roguishly.

"Yes, and of our wedding—next spring; for before I shall not marry. Now don't look so dissatisfied, my little old man; I will tell thee all my reasons; but now I am so glad, that I'm not very clear either about them or myself. Just now I was as sad as a raven, and now I am as merry as a lark. And so oughtest thou to be too. Good graces, what a long face! Is it a lark that looks in this fashion? Defend me from such a lark physiognomy! Well, now, God be praised! it clears up! Ah, Godelius, how good is our Lord!"

"That He is, that He is! But thou, Brigitta, thou art abominable. Why wilt thou not marry this autumn, and go with me?"

"Oh, that I will tell thee, my little, dear old fellow. It is because I—thou seest that I cast down my eyes—because I am wanted here in the house. Aunt wants me, Siri wants me, and I don't want to leave them now that—"

"But I—I want thee, too, Brigitta; and thou art my faithfully betrothed wife, and it stands in the Bible; a woman shall leave all and be near her husband."

"Ah! that the learned should quote Scripture wrong way first. In this manner which thou sayest it does not stand in the Bible, but it stands that 'a man shall leave father and mother, and cleave to his wife.' That is how it stands. Be so kind as to open at the second chapter of the first book of Moses. But listen to me, Godelius, and be kind and reasonable. It does not stand well here in the house, that thou canst see as well as I; and I have a feeling that, sooner or later, there will be here some great unhappiness. I cannot leave my charming aunt and my little Siri—the naughty girl!—in the gloom and the disorder in which they now are. I must first see that it becomes clear for them, and help towards it all that I can. But in the meantime I will sew and put in order a heap of things for our establishment, and at spring—yes, by then I feel persuaded that in one way or another, it will have become clear and tranquil in this house, and then I can quit it with a good conscience. In the meantime I will accompany thee to Westeras this autumn, for I am fain to see how it goes with thee there, and I think of haranguing the bishop and consistorium, and perhaps the whole corpus of the Gymnasium, if the spirit falls upon me, because they have chosen thee, and that they may properly understand what a man thou art, and what a jewel of a wife thou hast got. And then I must see about thy lodgings for the winter, and then we will look out rooms for us at spring. Ah, Godelius! only a little dwelling of three rooms—for thy old mother shall have one of them, or otherwise we should have sufficient with two—three rooms and a kitchen, on the sunny side, and a little garden, be it ever so little, where thou canst sit and smoke thy pipe in the fresh air, under green trees, and where I can have a few flowers and a few green herbs for our house-keeping."

"Listen, Brigitta!" exclaimed the curate, with sudden inspiration; "listen to what I say! We wed this autumn, and—we take Siri with us to our new abode. She needs to go hence, and when she is away, all will become calm again in the house. So that is best for all."

Brigitta stood quite astonished. "It is certain," said she, at length, "that thou sometimes hast ideas, which I fancy thou gettest from the moon, or rather from the sun, for they are perfectly luminous. And the more I think upon this plan, the brighter does it beam into me, as the very best and wisest that we can hit upon. And because thou hast thus thought of Siri, I must really kiss thee! Certainly it will be tight work to get every thing so soon into order; and if all be not in order, why something may remain in disorder, and yet it shall be done, for the matter is and shall be excellent. Agreed, my dear old fellow—if thou consent, then it may be as thou wilt."

The curate made a great leap, and looked—not exactly like a lark, but like the happiest man under the sun. In the meantime, it was settled between him and Brigitta, that as soon as Siri should be perfectly well, the proposition should be communicated to her and the family.

When Siri was on the path of convalescence, joy began again to lift his wings in the home at Mora, stimulated thereto by Brigitta and her brother, who of late, during Siri's illness, and as Valborg scarcely ever left her room, had altogether lost his good spirits, so that he even had ceased to sing his favourite air in pleasure and trouble. But scarcely was the danger over, and Valborg again visible amongst the others, when Lieutenant Lasse put on his sister's shawl and nightcap, reclined himself in the corner of the sofa, and said whiningly :

"I don't know how it is with me; I feel so strange. Most gracious Valborg! attend a little to me; I am certainly dangerously ill—have got either a galloping consumption, or—an ague!" And here the feigned invalid was seized with an explosion of laughter, which he again protested was a very dangerous symptom, might proceed from the laughing-sickness, and implored that Valborg would devote to him great attention and good nursing. But Valborg smiled, prescribed some medicines, which Lieutenant Lasse declared altogether inappropriate, and left him without the least sympathy.

And true it is, that nothing in Lieutenant Lasse called forth this feeling, and least of all his love, which was a sort of spectacle with which he entertained himself and others. He proclaimed it with puns, with fiddle, and dance, and the most pathetic pas de Basques, and you could not avoid laughing heartily; and Valborg was probably somewhat amused by this, but not at all touched by a sentiment which had evidently nothing very serious in it.

Whilst Lieutenant Lasse danced and sighed, and the rest laughed, Olof went about silent and gloomy, roved up and down through fields and woods, sought petrefactions, and read Plutarch to strengthen and steel his soul. And if he found himself too sad, and too bitter at heart, he sought for peace by his mother's heart, pressed her hand to his brow and to his bosom. Never had she been to him so dear and precious as now.

But Mrs. Ingeborg was herself now no longer what she had been before. Her fresh, living activity was gone. Either she seemed driven as by a goading disquiet, or lost herself in heavy and gloomy reveries.

One afternoon she stood by the window of the drawing-room, looking towards the Silja, and noticed a large, black cloud, which came up over it, and seemed to stretch towards Mora a pair of gigantic arms, and dark forebodings rose still more powerfully in her soul. At this moment she felt herself gently embraced by her husband, who asked tenderly :

"What is it which makes my little woman look so melancholy, and which takes away her fresh tranquillity! The girl! is it not so! but my Ingeborg ought not to allow her spirits to be depressed in this manner. Have we not agreed in what manner to treat this matter, and that we will no longer dwell anxiously upon the past! and does not Siri's state of mind now promise us all good for the future!"

"Ah, Gustaf!" replied Mrs. Ingeborg, "I know not how it is, but now I cannot hope; since that terrible day it seems as though a heavy stone lay upon my heart. Dost thou see the cloud which advances towards us so menacingly! Since a certain time, I see always such a cloud above us, and a foreboding of misfortune never quits me."

"And if a cloud ascends above us, yes, and descends too, what is there so terrible in it! Have we not passed through much together; many a heavy day, many a bitter sorrow, and do we not stand here, heart to heart, as on our wedding-day! Cloud! my courageous, free-spirited woman ought not now, more than formerly, to allow herself to be terrified at a cloud. Let us only be glad and cheerful-hearted, and trouble not ourselves about a threatening cloud, and we shall see it will pass over."

Mrs. Ingeborg was silent. There was a violent conflict within her bosom; but her husband remarked it not, for neither in his was it calm. In a while he said :

"It has grieved me, grieved me deeply about the girl, I must confess. I was fond of her—and I had confidence in her, and she has deceived me; she like so many others. This experience was painful. I have so frequently put faith in people, and so often been deceived, that, had it not been for our Lord's grace, my mind would, perhaps, have become embittered; but, in His goodness, He gave me a friend, a human soul on which I can rest; in whose purity and love I bathe my spirit into freshness again, when it has been wounded by life and the world. O, Ingeborg, my wife, my beloved one, if thou knew what it is with a temper like mine, with an experience like mine, to know and feel itself to possess a friend in whom nothing false, no deception, is to be found; to be able to go to her, and lay his soul in her hand, his heart in her heart, and to know that he commits them to his better self; a friend in whom he reposes as securely as in the bosom of God! O! it is a heaven, to be able to say to some one, 'Let the whole world deceive me, thou wilt not deceive me.'"

With infinite warmth and affection, Nordevall pressed his wife to his bosom. A burning tear fell upon his hand. There was something in this tear which caused him to look into her face, and with terror he saw there an expression of devouring anguish.

"Ingeborg!" said he, hastily, "thou art ill!"

"Yes," said she, "my spasm of the heart!"

"Come and let us go out into the fresh air," said Nordevall; "thou hast sat too long in the house, with thy unquiet thoughts, I ought to have thought of it. Come now, my little woman, and let us look at the harvest together, and you told me some time ago, that you would shew me a new piece of ploughing, which you had begun; let me see that to-day."

Mrs. Ingeborg smiled faintly, and, more to give her husband pleasure, than in the hope of any diversion of mind to herself, she accompanied him to the tillage-field.

On the way, the professor talked of Olof's approaching journey to Fahlun, where he was to remain the winter over; and proposed to his wife, that they should all accompany him thither, and stay there a few weeks, in order to see Olof comfortably settled down, and to pay their respects to their friends there, and in the country around.

This proposal gave Mrs. Ingeborg much pleasure, for she saw in it a beneficial dissipation for all; and this journey, which was to take place at the end of October, became a vivid topic of conversation to them.

In the meantime they passed the fields where the golden rye was piled up into ricks by the active harvest men. Gladly and in a friendly manner did these salute their beloved pastor and his wife, and Mrs. Ingeborg felt a pleasure in seeing the vigorous, good people, and the unusually good harvest.

At length they arrived at the new piece of cultivation. Here the ploughshare tore up the grassy sward in long furrows, and turned up its earth side, which smelt as sweet and fresh, as only the fresh moist mould can do; and when Mrs. Ingeborg pointed out, and more exactly stalked out the noble potato-field, which should shortly bloom here, she became quite animated in her countenance, and scarcely noticed the light summer rain which fell smartly on the field, while she and the professor stood under a thick pine-tree. The rain speedily was over.

"Where now is the threatening cloud which so lately frightened thee!" asked Nordevall.

Mrs. Ingeborg looked towards the lake, but the cloud had disappeared, and a glittering rainbow arched itself over the hills, and mirrored itself in the waters of the Silja. The sun shone out and warmed the damp, fragrant soil at the feet of the pair.

And for this time the cloud was gone by.

We will now glance into Siri's sick room, and we find there late and early, night and day, Valborg, who has made herself her nurse, and has shewn herself to be an excellent one.

In all circumstances, where human beings come into closer intercourse with each other, there arises a private romance, in which changes spring up for good or for evil, tending to closer union or to alienation, and all according as life's spirits of light, or spirits of darkness, have acquired a mastery over the senses. Between Siri and Valborg took place what we will here relate.

Immediately on Siri's falling ill, Valborg drew herself nearer to her, and watched with secret distress the advance of the sickness. One night, when the crisis had already passed, and the danger was over, Valborg watched by Siri's bed without being conscious that she herself was the object of her observation.

"Thou art very handsome, Valborg!" said Siri, at once, when Valborg thought she slept, "it is a pleasure to look at thee! and thou art so very good, who art so careful of a poor rejected creature, like me."

Valborg blushed, but said nothing. A little time after, Siri felt a kiss and a hot tear on the hand which hung languidly over the side of the bed, and she heard Valborg say:

"Siri, forgive me!"

And this from the proud Valborg! Siri raised herself in amazement in the bed, saying, "What! what, indeed, have I to forgive thee!"

"It was I who first witnessed thy meetings with the strange man; I who gave information; I who accused thee."

Siri was silent for a while, and then said, quietly,

"Thou thought thou didst right! Thou believed me to be wicked!"

"Yes; but now—now, I do not believe it any longer. Canst thou, canst thou pardon me!"

"Ah, with my whole heart!"

Valborg sunk into Siri's extended arms; and a silent union was cemented; and two hearts hitherto closed to each other, now opened to each other their life-springs.

"Sparks flew out of the home of fire, and fell into the home of cold; then warmth gave life to frost," says the most ancient of all the northern mythes of the origin of life, and as the sea lives in the drops of water, so stood forth in the life of the two young maidens, the truth of the ancient saga of the giants.

During Siri's convalescence, it was Valborg who read aloud to her, who prepared for her the dishes which are at this time so delicious to taste, so pleasant to present. For any tint of health on Siri's cheeks, there sprung up a joy in Valborg's heart, and gave to her manner a life, and expression of feeling and grace, which all, and even Olof remarked, when he talked with her of the object of both their cares.

When Siri was just able to go out, she was supported on Valborg's arm; their growing intimacy was noticed by all in the house. Lieutenant Lasse called them "the inseparables." Brigitta said she was jealous of Valborg, and on the highway to grow melancholy about it, if she had only had time for it. But, in part, her brother was now constantly about her, singing,

How sad and short is this life of ours,
Let us sweeten it then with pleasure;

and in part, she had now taken up Valborg's usual avocations within the house; and it gave her much to think upon, and much to do. She now discovered that it was by no means easy to fill Valborg's place; and that Valborg, beneath her quiet, almost unobserved activity, had an extraordinary capacity for embracing, and ordering every thing—and that as wisely, as carefully. The strong habit of observation of others had developed in her an actual talent for setting every thing right. She was like the concealed wheel in the clock. But people think very little of this—they look at the hands. Yet Mrs. Ingeborg had long done justice to Valborg's still merit, and now Brigitta said, "This Valborg, depend upon it, will very soon eclipse us all. Some fine day she will come flying as a butterfly out of the chrysalis. I see now that she has wings, though they lie still folded up."

But in Siri, too, there took place at this period a great change. It was as if the woman at once had awakened in her. The childish girl had vanished, as it were, during the early part of her illness. She was more quiet, milder, more grateful, and a certain sadness, a profession, even in playful moments, to let fall a look, an expression, a smile of love for all who surrounded her; besides a graceful developement of the external form; and this made her interesting in a high degree, and for Olof more dangerous than ever, if he had seen her much. But he saw her as seldom as possible, and was generally on short excursions into the country.

The plan of the curate and Brigitta, on which they so much felicitated themselves, for Siri's removal with them to Westeras, was stranded at once against her positive wish to remain there in the home, and in the circumstances in which she found herself. On the contrary, she expressed a lively joy in the prospect of the projected journey to Fahlun; and she talked often of her desire to descend into the great and celebrated copper-mine at Fahlun.

Brigitta shook her head at this longing, and the curate pulled a longer face than ever, as the hope of his wedding and settling down to housekeeping this autumn disappeared. But Brigitta consoled him with the prospect of their now approaching journey, and with,

"The spring doth come, the trees burst out," &c.

Having arranged to meet the Mora family at Fahlun, at the end of October, Brigitta departed with her curate and her brother from Mora to Westeras in the early days of September. Brigitta, who prepared to harangue the bishop in Westeras in Babelish, composed and read over her speech on the way; and Lieutenant Jasse helped her with it in order to counteract the "dreadful melancholy," which the separation from Valborg occasioned him, and which he foresaw would accompany him to the grave, or to—Westeras!

When the lively brother and sister were gone, there fell on the home of Mora a quiet which now became more beneficial than all gaiety. Siri gave no further cause of uneasiness. She was no longer out late in the evenings or at night, but, on the contrary, she was much out in the day-time with Valborg. The hours of discourse with her paternal teacher became to her continually dearer; while he daily became more pleased with her, and affection towards her again warmed his heart. Not a word more was spoken in the family of what had disturbed its peace. All seemed disposed to comfort and cheer one another. The angel of peace spread his wings over the home of Mora, and in their shadow Mrs. Ingeborg again awaked to her former glad life, and to her activity for all and every thing about her.

And the autumn came on, and the days darkened, and the fires were lit in the houses. Like sable troops of mourners passed the heavy grey clouds over the earth, and land and water assumed the dark blue colour which is peculiar to the northern landscape when the sun is absent. Autumn in the north has a still, deep melancholy; but the ever-green pine and fir-woods which crown its mountains and heights, and murmur with equal freshness whether the summer tribes and birds sport in them, or their beard flies before the northern storm, while the ravens croak in the clouds. These forests take away every thing pale, every thing weak and hypochondriacal from sadness, and give it a stamp of elevation and of profound seriousness. The ancient gods breathe under the veil of sorrow. And thus come days, glorious days, when the pine black-birds sing in the frosty transparency of the mornings, when the piled clouds stand in purple and gold above the dark green heights, when the air is light and elastic, light as a flying bird, and the body and the mind of man is winged with it—days when the sun shines in his purest splendour over the many-coloured earth, where the leaf grows yellow, and the bunches of the mountain-ash glow; when the northern lights flame in the evening, then is it glorious in the north.

One splendid September day, sat Valborg and Siri, resting in a wood together after a long ramble. They had conversed about their childhood, their parents; and their communications had not been glad, although Siri's relations of her enterprises and adventures had occasioned many a hearty laugh. Valborg's disclosures could call forth nothing of the kind. A more joyless, wearisome life than hers it were scarcely possible to conceive; and the mental thralldom in which her youth passed may explain, in a great measure, her reserved and cold manner. Her parents had married purely for worldly considerations, without attachment or serious reflection on the union into which they entered; and their life became a succession of little bitternesses and great provocations. The daughter born in this home enjoyed no sunshine of affection on her cradle. Her egotistical and exacting parents gave her no warmth, but demanded from her obedience, and a strict fulfilling of her duties towards them. Often did there pass through Valborg's soul, the query, whether a marriage of this sort, however sanctioned by the forms of society and the church, was not one of the greatest of sins against our Lord's rule on the earth. But she suppressed this query, as all others, in proud bitterness. Disposed by nature to reserve, she became changed by her education, as it were, to a mummy. Thus she had lived without living, till the deaths of her parents, which followed rapidly one upon the other, loosened her chains, and conducted her into a more beautiful sphere of existence; but two-and-twenty years' habit in combination with a disposition, not by nature very accessible, had engrained, as it were, a petrefaction into her disposition, and some violent shocks must take place before it open itself to milder influences.

The two young girls had been silent awhile, when Siri all at once exclaimed, "Valborg! thou hast certainly never been in love! Thou art too calm, too sensible!"

A low tremulous "ah!" from the lips of Valborg answered Siri's question; and a glance from her large, beautiful eyes seemed to open up an abyss of concealed fire. Siri was struck with astonishment at this expression in Valborg's glance; and when she saw the suddenly flushing colour at once fade from her cheeks, then a ~~new~~ light broke upon Siri. Affectionately she embraced Valborg, and whispered, "Valborg! thou lovest—thou lovest Olof. I have heard thee of nights when thou slept utter his name!"

Siri felt Valborg tremble; she felt her cold lips upon her cheek. But not a word said Valborg—she sat pale and speechless.

* A fortune-teller in the old northern mythology.

"Have I wounded thee?" whispered Siri.
 "Oh, don't be vexed!"

Valborg made an attempt to speak. A bitter shade of pain passed over her usually so tranquil aspect. At length she said with emphasis,

"Siri! promise me, righteously, that he never comes to know what thou imaginest. Never! no, never shall he know what I feel."

"But, Valborg, he also is attached to thee!"

"No, he is not! I have never been, and never shall be, loved by any one. A spell is upon my life, which dooms me to solitude and silence; an iron hand grasps my soul. O Siri! thou who captivatest all hearts, thou who playest in the sunshine of human favour, thou who, when thou wilt, callest forth smiles and tears, thou canst not know, canst not understand how it feels to be so sealed up. To know yourself doomed never to be understood, never loved; and that because one is not amiable, because one is dumb, because the life of the heart and the heart's tongue are bound by hard hands!" And Valborg wept bitterly. Siri had never seen her thus. And how eloquent did she now become in order to console Valborg; to describe all her superior advantages, her beauty, her nobleness of mind, and how amiable she was, and how amiable she would appear if she only confided thoroughly in her power, and how, already, that which was in her was discerned, and how even Olof—

But here Valborg interrupted her, saying,

"Oh, Siri, do not talk of that! I neither can nor will make a fool of myself. If I were a flint, or a cloud-shape, or . . . thy shoe-string, I should be of far more value to Olof than I now am. I cannot be so blind, nor thou either, as not to see that his heart, his love, belong alone to thee."

Siri was silent awhile, and then said,

"The heart can change; and his must change, for he wishes it, and I wish it too."

"I have never felt attachment for any one besides, in the whole world!" said Valborg, whose heart, once awakened, seemed to press for utterance. "Ever since we were children and played together, on the estate of my parents, have I been fascinated by him; and every time that I have seen him, again have I become more deeply fascinated by him. And now, as I see him expand into manhood, so rich in endowment, so handsome! Ah! how poor, how contracted have I felt myself beside him, and . . . beside thee. Yes, I have been bitter against thee, and hated thee for the bitterness that I felt. But since thou hast been dear to me, all is so changed. I think that now I could willingly see you happy together."

"But now," said Siri, "that is more than ever impossible; and—Valborg! I feel a persuasion that Olof will yet love thee, and that thou wilt be happy with him."

"No, no," said Valborg, shaking her head, "and I shall learn to bear his indifference and I fancy that this will be easier to me hereafter. But, Siri, we speak no more on this subject—promise me that; and let no one—no one, suspect what thou now knowest! I will not be pitted by any one, and least of all by him; rather would I sink alive into the earth. But thou, Siri, how is it possible that thou—dost not love Olof!"

"I love him," said Siri, "but it is not with the passion of love, from all that I can conceive of this feeling. Perhaps I should have done, if my feelings and thoughts had not been absorbed by another object: the giant in the Midnattsberg—thou knowest."

"Siri, how canst thou jest on this subject, and that at this moment!"

"Pardon me, I meant no ill. I am so thoughtless!"

"I have given thee my heart's innermost secret, Siri, and thou—thou wilt not give me thine!"

Siri turned rapidly pale, and said,

"It is not my own, Valborg, or in truth it should already have been thine; but the weal, perhaps the life of another depends upon its continuing a secret, and a solemn oath binds me."

"Good," said Valborg, breaking off; "then we will speak no more of it. Let us now go to our patients."

And the two young doctresses continued their walk to the remote dwellings, whither the care of the official doctor seldom arrives.

In the evening, when Siri was alone in her little room, she took out a note-book which contained several loose papers. Many a quiet morning and evening had she already wet these leaves with her tears, and thus did she now as she read the following

NOTES.

SIXTEEN years ago there lay a certain prisoner condemned to death in the Smedjegård.* A friend paid him a secret visit; it was the evening before his execution. He was already conducted into the cell where the condemned are placed previous to execution; it lies close to the chapel of Smedjegård. But what a chapel! Neglect and an unchristian mind could not have made it worse. The room of the condemned man was no better; it was filthy, naked, and hideous. A huge picture hung there—Christ upon the cross—from the worthlessness of the painter, a ghastly shape. Did the Merciful One desire that from His cross only horror should go forth to the sinner who looks up to Him for consolation? I looked round, to see whether there were any thing in the room which might awaken the mind, and call up a pious sorrow or a sentiment of solace—something which might make an elevating and salutary impression upon him who had here to prepare for his final and violent exit. But no, there was nothing! The clergyman who was present in accordance with his duty, a man of well-meaning mind but of weak endowments, had been able to awaken in the prisoner who lay there no remorse, and no better desires. The prisoner thought of nothing less than of dying; he was young and tall, and strong as a giant; he thought of grappling with the hangman, and making his escape. The friend who now visited him was to assist him in this enterprise. With a few wild, daring fellows, he was to follow to the place of execution, and there await the hour. The criminal and his friend, as criminal as himself, but more favoured by fortune—for he had been happy enough to escape the hands of justice—now concerted the whole scheme.

It was late in the evening. The next morning, in the early dawn, the prisoner was led out of the gaol, followed by an innumerable throng of spectators: he carried his head high, looked boldly round on the people, and said "they should see a merry dance."

The friend, accompanied by his men, followed, well disguised, in the midst of the multitude. It was a beautiful October day; the sun was bright and clear, and deep blue played the water, and the trees on the shores shone in autumnal splendour, and the Skärgård* lay in the morning light with its rocks and its fir-woods so fresh and fragrant; and all this was beheld as the procession advanced along the endless Göth Street; and the friend of the condemned man thought, "If it were now I who for the last time looked on this glorious earth—if it were I who now went to be hanged!"

When he was a little boy, and drove with his mother from their villa in the suburbs of Stockholm into the city, through the Skans Gate, there was a place upon the road, at some distance outside of the gate, where he always gazed into the wood on the right hand, at once with curiosity and a terrified glance; for there, in the wood, gleamed forth three tall white chimneys, over the tops of the trees—"chimneys," his mother called them, but he knew well that they stood upon the gallows, and that they were posts on which malefactors were hanged; and when the boy saw them he became filled with awe, and shuddered; and never did he see Swedish bank-notes with their inscription, "He who forges imitations of these notes will be hanged," without thinking of the white pillars in the wood. Farther on in life he was to gaze on them more nearly.

The procession of death issued from Göth Street: the name of the street is derived from that of the first criminal who passed along it to execution. In the street is a public-house, into which the culprit is taken to drink a glass of strengthening drink on the way. It was the case now, and the condemned one did not drink feigningly. The procession then again set forward. A little without the gate of Skans the way bends to the left, and so reaches an open place in the wood, and here at once presented itself a white rotunda, with three lofty white pillars, and cross-beams and hooks, and at the entrance an iron door, on which some one, in devilish mockery, had written in large letters, "Göth's Villa." And here, through the iron door into the villa, passed the condemned one with the hangman, and vanished from all eyes, while the people stood in dense crowds on the hills around. But nearer and nearer drew the friend with his men, awaiting the moment.

At once there was heard an uproar before the villa, blows, wild curses, cries. The guard stormed in, all became silent, and—the prisoner came not out! As quickly, again, his friend caught sight of him, but it was above the wall! Then fled he as if chased by the Furies.

He fled from his home and his country, and lived in strange lands for many years a life of adventure, now in the army, now on the boards of the theatre, now in the depths of the mine, whichever was most to his fancy.

But a tender tie bound him to his native land; and when he had caused a report of his death to be spread, he wrote to her whom he had passionately loved, and loved still, to tell her that he lived and should live for her; but he received no answer. Years passed over, and he was in act to return to his native land to seek her out, when a traveller from the place of her abode gave him the intelligence that she, his wife, was become the wife of another. On the shore where he stood, the outcast of his country turned round. For ten years he drove to and fro as before, but more wretched than before. Then was he drawn vehemently homewards. He was a father: in the land of his birth his daughter grew up. The thought swelled in his bosom, delicious as powerful: he must see her, lay her head on his bosom, hear her call him father! As with a band of iron this desire drew him to his native soil; it drew him in defiance of chains and death. He went, and again saw and kissed the earth where his cradle had stood, but where he never can find his grave.

In Stockholm he again passed along the road which he had traversed sixteen years before; he again beheld the deep-blue waters, the trees, the Skärgård. As he went the bells of the city rang solemnly and peacefully—it was Sunday. He again saw the white rotunda, with the mocking inscription: still and hushed was it now there; the sun shone down upon it, and the grass grew green and joyous, and the dandelions nodded yellow and friendly in the breeze, by the steps whose ascent had been trodden by so many feet heavy with death.

Recent traces of an execution appeared at some little distance, and on the fresh, newly laid turf bloomed red flowers. Even to the grave of the malefactor affection finds its way!

There stood a cottage by the way-side, not far off: a shoemaker lived in it, and his thirteen years' old boy, who opened the gate, answered frankly and honestly the questions of the wanderer concerning the execution of a couple of wretched murderers, which had lately taken place there in the wood.

People talk of the criminal's hardihood. Oh stuff!

Sick at heart, with an abhorrence of man and society, he marched on.

And he wandered away towards Dalarna to seek his child, the angel of innocence, who should reconcile him to humanity and to life!

In Dalarna, near the mines of Öster-Silfberg, she was said to dwell. But she was no longer in this district. For two months she had been in Mora with her—O my God!

He tarried a day in this neighbourhood, detained by memory. It was here, here in the vicinity of the now-abandoned silver mines, that she, the formerly beloved one, had dwelt and bloomed, beautiful as the wild rose. Here was it that they became acquainted with each other—here that they wandered together in the still summer evenings and nights, while the fiery-hued phalæna noiselessly flitted around them, and the Silene noctiflora opened for them.

* Rocks and islands on the coast of Sweden.

its fragrant chalices; they also drank from a chalice—it was that of love—young, first, potent, and impetuous love.

Her brother-in-law and guardian was opposed to their love, and especially to the lover, whose already-involved circumstances he was somewhat aware of. He forbade him his house. But for him was his wife, Ingeborg's enthusiastic sister, and she fell into the plans with which love and a desire of revenge inspired him. These also were favoured by the pride of the loved one irritated by the despotic proceedings of the brother-in-law. They agreed upon a secret marriage, which should first be made known when certain circumstances permitted it, and when necessity could effect what now was denied. But what he meant by this, he only properly understood, not the innocent, confiding woman, who committed her fate to his hands. That fate he would conquer and make a happy one, whilst he believed himself, through his genius and address, able to command the laws of society, or to set himself above them.

At the baths of Sæther, he managed to win over a young, enthusiastic clergyman, a stranger to the place, to his plan, which he represented to him in the delusive light in which he himself saw it.

The general went a journey. Every thing favoured the lovers' objects. The priestly ceremony removed all scruples from the mind of the ladies, who had little knowledge of juridical circumstances. Besides, he understood how to make them perfectly satisfied.

One summer evening the lovers met at the ancient chapel near these mines. With lilacs from a grave in the churchyard, he adorned his bride, and thus led her into the chapel, where the priest already awaited them, and united them in the name of the Most High. A more beautiful or pure-hearted bride never stood there before the altar.

As they issued from the church black thunder-clouds rolled over the heavens, and darkened them. But he heeded them not. Amid the roar of the thunder and the flashes of the lightning he pressed the loved one to his heart, and earthly love celebrated his triumph amid the clangour of heaven's hosannas.

That was life!

There is a hue of death on the sulphur-green water which fills these deserted mines, around which stand rugged mountain precipices. The whole country around is a hideous morass. There, amid stone-fields and water-spouts, the chapel has stood from the Catholic times, in which she once stood so beautiful; but that chapel has now been abandoned for many years, open to man and beast. A horrible story of murder is connected with these mines, with this black and decaying house of prayer, and its spirit seems to brood wildly over the country. A pale, sorrowful apparition also wanders there, the apparition of a powerful love, a great but brief felicity. It seeks here its former paradise, and finds only graves, and desolation.

Still stood the lilac bushes green in the churchyard, but their flowers had long ago withered . . . Fool! not to have reflected when he broke them for a bride's garland, that they bloomed on a grave! . . . He entered once more that open-standing house of prayer. It was more dilapidated, the walls leaned more than before; the wind passed more freely through the shattered leaden casements. The altar before which she and he had stood sixteen years before was ready to tumble. and the hideous pictures above it seemed to desire to fall upon him. Some leaves from the psalm-books lay strewn over the floor, and he took up one of them, in the hope of finding a word of consolation or hope, and read:

„Een Böön, när nagor wil begifwa sigh i Ahtenskäp."

"A prayer for those who are about to enter into matrimony."

There is often a mockery in life, which must be a scourge in the hand of some wicked spirit.

A half-open chest stood in the porch of the chapel; he opened it. There lay within it a mutilated image of stone.

All was dark and ugly; and dark was the mind of the wanderer when he issued forth. He went on to Mora! . . .

By the Middagsberg, in a deserted hut at the foot of the mountain, he took up his abode. They were not then at Mora; they were at Sol-lérön, she and her child. Here will he, as a fisherman, make excursions, and visit the islands. He cherished a fancy, in viking fashion, of falling in with his maiden! . . .

And he found again his daughter, his child; pressed her to his bosom; and it yet glows with love, with joy and pain in this remembrance. An accident or . . . why not! God's goodness threw her into his arms. He was out upon the lake, heard a cry for help, and rowed towards the quarter whence it came. He saw a capsized boat and a young girl who was on the point of sinking; she was senseless, and blood was visible on her temples. He took her into his boat, and rowed her to his dwelling. Her appearance, her age, a mark by the left eye, a feeling that went through his whole blood, all told him that she whom he had rescued was—his own flesh and blood, his child! When he led her into his dwelling, and had recalled her to consciousness, he learned her name. She was his daughter! What scenes now followed! What a drama within a few hours, and within four wretched, narrow walls! He made himself known to her; read her her mother's letter which announced her birth, which spoke of the mark by the left eye, which the child had like its father, and he shewed her that by his eye, and she—must believe him. Terrified and astonished stood the enchanting maiden there at first, but he quickly acquired a power over her mind, and the child's love drew fire from his. A strange life arose within her, full at once of light and darkness. But out of the light into darkness and night her father speedily conducted her, when he enjoined her the strictest silence, yes, commanded her to swear it, and made her understand that life or death, both for himself and others, depended upon it. Her mother's name she did not get to know. He would spare the mother—yet. He has something to say to her, some trial to put her to, before he shall have formed his resolve respecting her.

A night and a day he retained his child with him. Then were they obliged to part, but . . . they will meet again! . . .

Twice since then has he seen his child again. A noble nature! Pure as the new-fallen snow, and warm as the heaven of the south. An open, living soul! every word how intelligible, every glance how it kindles! What a delight to form this spirit, to warm yourself at its heart! That ought to be the happiness of her father, but . . . but he must away, and labour for his bread! King Magnus Smek ordained the copper mine for an asylum for criminals "who have not committed crimes too enormous." The wanderer has then a sort of royal permission to reside there.

In spring I shall return to Mora.

In the Copper Mine, January.

Here, one hundred and eighteen fathom deep in the bowels of the earth, in the hard, glittering mine, where all is rigid, cold, immovable—here beats an unquiet, glowing heart. It yearns to be hence—yearns towards Mora—towards the lovely strand where beats another heart, a young, warm heart, the dearest that I possess in the world. In the mines of the Tyrol I was much better. Now I have seen Paradise, and long after it, and suffer. When will the spring arrive! Then shall I be rich—then can I luxuriate, for a time, in freedom. My child, out of the depths of the earth ascends a blessing for thee!

Mora, April.

Again at the foot of the Middagsberg—again near the light-locked maiden, all that I love! and near her who has almost awaked my hate! Since a certain time I feel myself changed. I know not what thirst of revenge stirs in my bosom. Why shall she be happy while I suffer so immeasurably! She, indeed, is the cause of the worst portion of my condition. Burning, bitter feelings!

The bells of Mora! The bells of Mora! Oh their sound is beautiful! They have made me weep, and my gall seethes less bitterly. But melancholy lies upon me, dark and heavy as the eternal night! My beloved child! if thou lay on my heart, if I could see thy blue eyes, kiss thy golden locks, then should I feel better. But in vain do I stretch my arms towards thee—thou comest not, canst not come!

It grows dark; clouds veil the heavens; the lake swells and roars restlessly, and the still and dusky shores seem to be drawn nearer to each other. This people say, is the case when tempestuous weather is coming. Thus do loving spirits draw near each other when misfortune or danger threatens, and seek to defend each other, to hope or to die together. But who approaches me? Whom have I thus to flee to in the whole wide world!

How the strand of Mora seems to creep towards mine in the unquiet evening. I see clearly the church, the green trees, and now the house where my daughter dwells. It comes nearer—nearer. Eternal powers of love! Is that not a miracle—the work of the spirit of my child!

No, it is the work of the powers of mockery and scorn! They wish to allow me to see the treasure, in order then to bear it away. But—

Yet this night will I press my child to my heart!

My arm knit itself convulsively; but her head rested upon it, and it became relaxed. I looked into her heavenly eyes, and the hell in my bosom grew cool. Her love, her affectionate disposition, made me soft and mild.

May.

Again and again I have seen her. Oh! but there is a bitterness in this pleasure, a poverty in this affluence, a thorn in this rose of gladness that I cannot endure. For we must positively separate again and what—what shall be the end of it! What shall the dove of innocence do near the criminal! He can only disturb her peace—perhaps, in the eye of the world, spot her white wings.

She has talked about her; she reports her to be still beautiful—beautiful and happy! There comes at times over me a desire to cause this beauty to turn pale, to entomb this happiness, and—that were easy for me.

I went in the stormy evening up towards her home, in the hope of catching a glimpse of her. I saw her, the lovely woman, my —. More wildly flowed my blood after it! I was obliged to conceal myself then, but I will shew myself again.

"Not yet! not yet!" Thus ring the bells of Mora, and implore for her. Well then—not yet! But I must forth—forth and wander!

June.

I wander whole days through; I make myself weary, weary, but that brings no sleep at night. This want of sleep is fearfully consuming. How weary I am of seeing the sun ascend in his beauty.

Is it possible, then, that one single transaction, in which lay no actually criminal desire can originate such misery! So do I ask myself sometimes; and then comes over me a wondering, a doubt, whether it can actually be so; but it is all over with me on earth—with me, so splendidly endowed, so evidently called to play a great and brilliant part. It seems to me that it must be a miserable dream, from which I must awake when I have fully slept out my sleep; and I then endeavour to sleep, but an invisible, gnawing worm keeps me for ever awake; and when I chance to sleep a moment, and then awake, I behold myself as before, a lost wanderer, fleeing before the sword of the judge.

This morning I rowed out on the river: the morning was blowy and cool, but my blood burnt hotly after the sleepless night. I rowed through a rapid: it looked perilous, but I fear not to drown. One bitterness may be as good as another, nay, better, for it brings an end with it. But there stood before my mind my shining Siri; I longed to see her again, and felt compelled to live. Wandering long amongst the mountains, in the endless pine-forests, I felt myself pressed to the earth. The sun hid himself behind the veil of clouds, like a pale, joyless countenance. I had no other watch. How slowly passed the time. I went into a peasant's hut in the wood, and got a little milk and bread; slumbered then on a flowery slope near the river, and awoke refreshed, and singularly strengthened in soul and body. Thanks, thou verdant, friendly shore!

Ah, that the done could but be undone! But how shall that be? How shall the crime be extirpated, the stain be washed out? The done is done; what has occurred has occurred; neither the powers of earth nor of heaven can change that, and that is—the curse!

What caused my misery! A false conception of society, a passion for riches, for honour—love to—the faithless. When she became mine, I wished to become rich and powerful, that I might enjoy her society in peace. The means were not lawful, that I knew, but—I proposed afterwards to become the benefactor of society, and—"The way to hell," says some one, "is paved with good intentions;" and this way was mine.

My soul is a tossed sea, and I do not know myself: sometimes I am pious, sometimes embittered and wild; sometimes I will pardon all, sometimes I thirst terribly for vengeance; and thus my soul labours and raves, without arriving at any conclusion, or at any repose or order. One hour destroys what another builds up, and all is uncertainty and torment.

Happy, happy are the children of these valleys! these sons and daughters of toil! They know nothing of the soul's misery. Fresh and great is their life, like the river by which they dwell. I have watched their labours the day through, and at evening, when I have approached their huts, I have heard soft and strong voices within them blended in the singing of hymns. How worthless do I feel myself beside these people!

July.

To-day I came to a lake whose shore was black with pinewoods; it was the lake of Ore. Gloomy, but smooth as a mirror, it lay beneath the cloudy sky, between its desolate, wild banks. The melancholy picture pleased me. Then shone forth the sun, and lit up a little towerless church upon an island in the lake. I saw the peasantry flocking around it, and recollected that it was Sunday. I went thither, and on the way sung for my inward rest a little song, which many years before I heard a young boy of Dalarna sing to a wild, graceful air:

"And now, as I came through the seven-mile wood,
I heard how the bells were ringing.

"And tell me, ye ringers, ye ringer-men,
For whom ye are ringing this ringing?"

"And we do ring for a red-gold roe,
Which here shall repose in earth's bosom!"

And thus a young bridegroom learns that they are burying his bride, to whom he is returning after his long wandering.

When I arrived at the churchyard, I saw men and women follow a coffin to the grave. I asked who it was that they were about to marry to the earth? I thought of the young bride who was taken from her lover to be betrothed to the earth; and they replied, "A young peasant maiden from ——" They said that she had lived and died like one of God's angels; that in her last moments she spoke the most beautiful words to her parents and her brothers and sisters.

As I listened to this relation, and gazed on a few white flowers of the trefail at my feet, which bowed their little heads gracefully under the weight of rain-drops, there came a peace over my soul. Now thundered the mould hollowly on the coffin, and the clergyman began, "Dust thou art—" But scarcely had the second shovelful of mould been flung into the grave, when there was heard a heavy fall upon the coffin, and a cry, "Let me die with thee!" It was the younger sister of the dead who had cast herself into the grave, and lay there embracing the coffin. She was borne senseless up again.

And yet this maiden had read neither romances nor tragedies!

By a ferry to-day I saw a peasant youth, nineteen years of age, who, from want of care in ringing the church bells, had got one foot and leg broken, and that so badly, that the surgeons thought it unavoidable that the leg must be taken off. In the meantime this was delayed as long as possible. The youth was most tenderly nursed at the parsonage; his youth and healthful vigour assisted the doctor; the broken pieces of bone grew together again, and the youth could now, after four months, again walk, and was in a fair way to be perfectly restored. "But hast thou not had terrible pains—hast thou not suffered cruel torments?" I asked. "I have so sincerely thanked God that I could have my leg again," was all his answer. From all his suffering he had only learned "sincerely to thank God."

In the Serna Forest, July.

I have now seen the mountain where porphyry and the giants dwell. I have been in the country where quicksilver may be hammered in winter. I have seen Finnmark's* solitary dwellings; lived with the remains in Sweden of that strong, but gloomy people whose most current adage is, "Happy is he that dies in his third night!"†

And I have said the same. I have wandered in the desert, in those gloomy, solitary regions, where nature is unrestrained, and men are few and nearly savage. I have wrestled with nature's giants, often with hunger. I will now hence. Yet, desert, have thou thanks! Thou hast refreshed my soul and strengthened my body. Thanks to you also, flowery shores, fresh waters, turf thick strewn with berries, and beautiful dales! You have given me moments of refreshment, seconds of enjoyment. But what I need ye could not give—neither forgetfulness nor hope!

What do I seek! What does the thunder-cloud seek, when it advances against the wind through the clear sky? It will discharge its lightnings, its destroying fire, out of its own bosom. It follows an inward necessity! . . .

Mora.

I stood on the Bell-hill by the river, and gazed on the mountain on the other side. Thunder-rain had fallen during the day. Now all was still, but heavy clouds covered the heavens and hung upon the tops of the hills.

* Many parishes in Dalarna have a so-called Finnmark; that is, a remote, little cultivated tract, where the descendants of the Finns live isolated within their own community.

† Finnish proverb.

It became more and more dark. At once I saw white ghostlike shapes, softly raise themselves amid the dark mountains. Here I saw an elk chased by hounds; there troops of human spirits with outstretched arms fly up the mountains as if striving to reach heaven; and part were caught up and vanished amongst the clouds, and part were left behind and sank back into the black abyss. Pale wild forms also presented themselves, and then were lost in the passes of the mountains.

Thus did this spectral scene continue, and my eyes also to follow this phantasmagoria—of vapour—as I well knew, but which now made itself into an hieroglyphic language for my soul. And now glid forth a boat from under the Lekberg, and in the boat sat two people. They sat beside each other and seemed bent on an excursion of pleasure. A wind came which broke the boat in pieces, and separated the two, who were turned into confused masses. But these were changed again, and one of them assumed the shape of a dragon, and from the other issued a female form, beautiful, transparent, and of inexpressible maiden grace. And the maiden descended softly towards the dragon which lay immoveable, with its head erected towards her. As if drawn by enchantment, she approached nearer and nearer to him; her head bowed itself as with love, her knees bent as if worshipping before the dragon. In a few minutes she had disappeared in his jaws—her bust alone was still seen above his head, but in a distorted attitude as if dying. . . .

Now advanced from behind him a cloud resembling a bier; and on the bier lay a shape as it were that of a young girl. It advanced in an oblique direction up the mountain, and when it arrived higher up, then the corpse raised itself slowly. It was again the former maidenly figure, but she now bore on her thoughtfully depressed brow a crown, and her bier was changed into a chariot which swans drew up amongst the clouds, where she finally vanished.

The dragon lay on the same spot as before, but was also changed. Swollen, and without form he lay there, like a nameless monster. Later in the night, when the spectral apparition had ceased in the mountains, when the dim troops of spirits had retired to rest, this shape lay still there, against the dark hill. It seemed to me to lie also on my heart. Then heard I Siri's flute, and I hastened to meet her.

She has disarmed me, at least for a time. She has talked of their virtue, their kindness to her. Could the mother be innocent, and merely deceived? And why should I crush this home where my child love has and is taken care of—the only home that she has in the world?

If I should now sacrifice myself; disappear in order to procure peace to all!

But—I will and I will not. . . .

All is to me so uncertain. . . .

Here these scattered notes terminated. They were enclosed in the following letter:

“Beloved Child!

“The hand of necessity seizes on our fate, separating us, and . . . thou wishest it, wish-est that I should fly, conceal myself. I fly therefore, I give way—till a future period! . . .

“These papers I leave with thee, that they may speak to thee of thy father. Long have I thought of writing to thee, to give thee some account of myself, of my fate, but—I have not been able. I had not sufficient interest in the task. Calmness and self-possession too are wanting. But something thou oughtest to know respecting me. I would not wound thy tenderness—and I need thy angel glance into my heart. Canst thou, when I unveil it, still glance therein with affection, then shall I believe that grace and joy may yet be found for me.

“What thou wilt here receive, are—fragments of a broken spirit, a lacerated life, begun in the hour when thy gentle form drew nearer to me, and I felt the necessity of collecting myself before it. They have been contrived in hours when without amusement or employment, the mind was devoured by disquiet and torturing thoughts, and I sought to free myself from them by written outpourings.

“Foul crimes, revolting matters have I here laid open before thee, thou full of innocence! Turn not thyself away, my child! Are the wickednesses of the world the less because we turn our eyes away from them? Ah! learn thou to see all with a steady and unbewildered gaze. Thus only wilt thou come to understand what truly is the question upon earth; thus only wilt thou be able to be truly compassionate. Well for thee is it that thou art a woman, and that thy place on the earth is amongst the lowly. That there lies upon thee no heavier responsibility.

“Gladly would I have stayed longer with thee, gladly, now that I must leave thee, would I have given thee somewhat which might have been of value to thee for life. Ah! to have given life is little—what do I say! It is a cruelty, it is a crime, if we do not give more.

“Oh! a thought; by which the soul might grow strong and great, through youth, through age, through pleasure and pain, the very deepest, even reaching into the highest heaven, which could warm thee in life, in death, and convert thy days, thy life into a still day of creation—could I give thee that, oh! then had I been to thee a proper father, a father who gave thee a life in life. Then had I freed thee from the grave of dust-fibres into which everyday affairs with their petty strivings, petty enjoyments, and petty cares, will endeavour to spin thy soul. Then, methinks, would one glad thought be able to visit my death-bed. There have been moments when such thoughts were not strange to me. They visit me sometimes still, but as apparitions revisit the dwellings where they formerly lived, and from which they have been removed by death. I, myself, am merely the ghost of what I was. The fibres of strength become more and more attenuated; bitter thoughts have disrupted them. I seek frequently the light which I formerly had, and find it not. It grows ever darker within me! Yet will God, perhaps, give me still a ray, a spark—for thy sake. Full of errors has my life been, yet I have traversed regions, and seen manifestations which have not been opened to many.

"Men! my child, if thou canst avoid it, do not attach thyself to any of them in much affection or admiration. They do not deserve it. One only was worthy of it, but his feet tread no longer the earth. Love them, as God loves them, out of charity, and desire then from them no other love.

"Thy mother—do not be severe to her, my daughter! She may be innocent, and only deceived. We shall find that out one day. In the meantime, stand like an angel by her side, as thou hast stood by mine. She may need it.

"Farewell! beloved, adored child! . . . My heart becomes soft—oh! that I should thus leave thee.

"When thou comest to Fahlun, and goest one day into the church, and hearest prayers read for those 'who work in the deep and dangerous places of the earth,' then, my child, do thou also pray for

"Thy Father."

THE GREAT COPPER-MINE.

AUTUMN was on its transition into winter. Strong night-frost had already covered the Silja with a thin coat of ice, and the peasants said of the restless lake, "She goes to rest!—she betakes herself to repose." The ground is now as hard as stone; the forest-clothed mountains stand darker than they did before, with the snow-fields in their black embrace. Now ascend the giants of frost out of the abyss to wrestle with mankind, and mankind combat with them, and—become invigorated by it, as by all contest with mighty powers, when they will not succumb to them.

The last of October which was fixed for the journey of the Mora family to Fahlun, came in with a cold morning. The ground was white with night-frost, and the trees stood powdered with snow, and magnificent; the air was calm, and roseate clouds lay, like a thin veil on the heavens, and immersed themselves in Silja's ice of one night old.

Thus did it look towards the rising of the sun as Siri gazed through the window on the side towards the lake, and a moment afterwards exclaimed,

"Valborg, Valborg, come and see!"

And Valborg came and saw, and said softly, "Heavens! what is it?"

They saw a procession of many travellers slowly advance over the Silja. They saw carriages, horses, and people, but they did not appear like realities, but had a wild aspect of shapes of shadow.

"That is what people call a 'Hägring,'" said Siri, "and more than once have I seen such a spectacle here on the lake, but never any thing exactly like this.* I am always awestruck by these appearances, although I know that they betide nothing. Canst thou tell me whether this represents a funeral or a wedding! If it be a wedding, it is a presage for thee; if a funeral, it is for me."

"Siri, thou oughtest not to talk in that manner! A funeral procession for thee!"

"See, see!" cried Siri; "it advances towards the church of Sollerön! The little white church! Always do I become so peaceful at heart when I look upon it. I would gladly lie in the churchyard there, and thou and the maidens of Sollerön should scatter flowers on my grave. But the bells of Mora should ring for me. The bells of Mora are so beautiful!"

"My dear Siri! thou dost not know what pain thou givest me to hear thee talk thus!" said Valborg, almost angrily; "thou knowest not how empty the world must be for me if thou wert gone! Ah! it is only since I have become attached to thee, that it has seemed to me pleasant to live. And I have thought that we might become happier and happier together. And now wilt thou die!"

"No, then I will live!" exclaimed Siri, and clasped Valborg in a passionate embrace. "Valborg! what thou sayest makes me happy. We will hereafter live like sisters together; and will go together in the funeral or the bridal procession. Is it not so?"

"Yes," said Valborg, and smiled and kissed the cheeks so recently pale, but which now bloomed forth richly under these caresses, "we will never part!"

"Think," continued Siri merrily, "think, if we should both marry on the same day! But no, that may not be, but thou shalt marry, and I will come to thee and thy husband. He shall be my friend and brother, and I will play with thy children, and lead them out into wood and field. Ah! we will be indescribably happy together!"

The shadowy procession advanced on and on, while the young maidens extended their rose-dreams out into the future; it resembled far more a funeral than a marriage train. Finally, it disappeared behind the church. In the meantime the morning had lost its beauty; the rosy clouds had changed to gray, and a thick frost-fog shrouded heaven and earth.

But Mrs. Ingeborg's sonorous voice was heard in the court joyously arranging matters for the journey; and the young damsels hastened to make themselves ready for it, as it took place immediately after breakfast. Under such circumstances it does not seldom happen that there is in the house a perplexity, a calling and scolding, a noise and banging, which converts the day of departure into a genuine day of torment. But Mrs. Ingeborg's harmonious mind here displayed its power, for so well, so lightly, so fresh and joyously did she manage with her people, that difficulty seemed to be a play, and labour a pleasure.

"If there be removals in the kingdom of heaven, they happen in this fashion," said Olof, charmed by his stepmother's manners, and the lively, and at the same time orderly movement in the house. Ten o'clock in the forenoon saw them in the carriages, and, as if it were to give

"Do you see that?" The Dalmen contemplated the spectacle for a moment, and said "Yes, I see it!" turned him round and went.

* Hägrings are a common phenomenon on the lakes in Dalarna, particularly on frosty mornings in winter, and represent, now ships under sail, now splendid buildings, now armies, or advancing processions such as Siri saw. The Dalmen, who reluctantly speaks of the evil powers, which he however believes in, does not willingly speak of the Hägrings, even when he sees them; but takes especial care when in winter he drives over the ice, not to follow the shadowy travellers that he sees proceeding over the icy lake. A clergyman in Mora one morning pointed out a splendid Hägring to a Dalmen, and said, his blessing to the journey, the sun broke the fog and shone upon the travellers.

And the "Great Mother in Dalom" cast an affectionate glance on her beloved Mora, and with cordial words and smiles bade good-bye to the servants who stood assembled round the carriage. She drove alone with her husband in their own carriage. Valborg and Siri drove in one that was borrowed of the prost of Solle-rön, and the fate of which was to be lent almost constantly all round the village, so that the glad-some prostinna sometimes wondered how it continued to hold together. This admirable vehicle was driven by Olof. The carriages rolled thundering forth over the frozen ground, on the way toward Rättvik, parallel with the banks of the Silja.

"What dost thou gaze upon so much there?" asked Valborg of Siri.

"On the Middagsberg!" answered she. "See how it flings off its mantle of mist, and wraps itself in one of gold;—see how proud and solitarily it stands forth, with a crown of piled cloud upon its head, and reigns over all the mountains around in silent majesty! Farewell, thou beautiful and wonderful mountain—farewell!"

"I really believe, Siri," said Valborg, "that thou art more attached to that mountain than to any human being."

"Not exactly the mountain, but the spirit of the mountain," replied Siri, smiling indeed but sadly.

The journey led to Rättvik, and thence to Leksand, in the parsonage of which latter parish the travellers were received with open arms and hospitable board; and the universally beloved Mrs. Ingeborg from Mora was fêted and every where welcomed as the "Great Mother in Dalom;" and never had had more merry jokes and charming riddles for her friends.

At Leksand the travellers left behind the Silja and its romantic shores. Their road to Fahlun lay through a tract, the ugliness and desolation of which are scarcely to be imagined. Here you find the stony Delarna, and in Dalarna you find the ugly as well as the beautiful in extremes. Yet is the former in a far less proportion than the latter.

It was on an afternoon that this part of the journey was performed. The weather was cloudy, but not cold; and the gray atmosphere rendered the wilderness still more gloomy. About a mile from Fahlun, the country became more agreeable: green fields showed themselves by the way; presently were seen at a distance white, thick clouds of smoke, slowly to curl up from the earth, and ascend towards the clouds. They were the smokes from the ore-roasting fires of the great copper-mine of Fahlun, which continually envelop the town, which give the houses a dark hue; and often, particularly in winter, make the air so thick, that you cannot see your way three steps before you. The smoke gives the town a sombre colouring, and may be perceived for some miles distant, according as the wind is.

With an excited curiosity, blended with astonishment, sat Valborg and Siri, as the carriage rolled along the contracting road, through the so-called Mine Street, down towards Fahlun, which road much resembled a road to the bottomless-pit. Walls and hills of dark brown slag were piled up on each side of the road; on each hand other roads opened views into cross streets, and of hills all of slag. It is a town of burnt metal, through which you advance; the ways are black with it; all that you see is black with it, and whichever way you turn, you seem to behold a kingdom of darkness. Yellow-green water falls here and there through the dead city; and before you, where the way terminates, sulphur-coloured flames ascend. By the sound of the carriages you might fancy yourselves driving over an excavated surface; and this is the fact, for the copper-mines extend beneath you. It is so wild that it is very amusing, if you be in good spirits. A hyeochondriac ought not to travel hither. Now you see the town look forth out of its veil of roasting vapour, with its two lofty church towers against a back-ground of dark green hills. On the left hand of the town, that is, towards the copper-mine, the acrid smoke has destroyed all the wood and all verdure; the hill lies naked, with its grinding-stones and its water spouts; bears only a species of grass with singed summits, grow amongst the bare stones, spotted here with the black Fahlun lichen. Nothing more deformed and desolate can possibly be imagined. But on the other side of the city, the hills are green and wooded, and have amongst them enchanting country-houses by beautiful romantic lakes; and within the town you find straight streets, cheerful, well-built houses, and to the sulphureous fume you soon accustom yourself, so that you scarcely perceive it when the wind does not blow direct from the mine into the town.

Our travellers put up at an inn at one end of the town, and not far from the mine. And who stood here in the gateway to receive them, but Brigitta and her curate (from this time we must call him Lector), and Lieutenant Lasse, who raised a triad of welcomes, in which bass, tenor, and soprano, were united in the most cordial harmony.

Brigitta had made all arrangements in the inn for the expected guests, and in the large saloon in the upper story, stood ready a great coffee-tray with various kinds of biscuits, and around it the little company speedily saw themselves joyfully assembled.

Here Brigitta related how she and "the dear old soul" had made their way to Westeras; and how they had taken rooms till spring, and then how they meant to settle themselves. As they determined to incur no debt in this settling, and as they had next to nothing to set up house with, so their establishment should be on the most economical scale; and to begin with, they would live in uncarpeted rooms, in the new-built wooden house which they had selected for their home. But all these plans, and all this frugality, with all the arrangements regarding food and furniture, etc., had in Brigitta's mouth something so amusing and curious, that there was soon no one in the company who was not in a regular uproar of laughter. The lector lay with half his body bent over the coffee-table, and so that you could not see his face, but his body shook visibly. He fell after this into a strong perspiration, and he remarked himself, that after this explosion, and another that remains hereafter to be mentioned, he found himself in a much healthier state both of body and mind.

During the most lively merriment and circulation of coffee, Siri went to a window and looked inquiringly out. Beyond and over the low houses on the opposite side of the street, the walls and hills of the mining-town raised themselves; and farther off, from amongst the black, conglomerated masses, arose coloured flames, which blazed wild and variably, and sent crackling bouquets of sparks and fire against the leaden-gray heaven. These flames arose from the ovens where the copper was roasted. They seemed as if they wished to show her the way to the mine. Softly she descended the steps and out of the house, spoke in the court with a little boy, who, at her desire, promised to conduct her to the mine, and she hastened swiftly forward on the way thither.

It was already near six o'clock in the evening, and deep twilight. Light as a hind, Siri hastened along the black streets through the mine-town, and looked round, ever and anon, in fear, as if she dreaded pursuit. Not a single mortal was to be seen in the gloomy way, but a wild din of falling water and roaring flames followed her as she advanced and left the huts and slag-hills behind her. It was not extraordinary that the young maiden's countenance was pale, as she pursued her way thus alone into the strange and gloomy environs; more extraordinary appeared the beautiful but anxious joy which beamed in her face, while wandering through the kingdom of death, she hastened forwards towards the mouth of the mine. And she had arrived where the subterranean giant opened his abyss, like an enormous mouth, which for ages had cast up treasures of noble metal, and at the same time, these hills, these streets, this city of slag, which now surrounds its orifice. In the twilight of the evening Siri could not see across this gulf, the so-called "Stöten," the copper-mine's huge mouth lying open to the day, nor did she now think upon it. Her heart drew her down into the dark and mysterious abyss, and she leaned herself over the low fence with which the opening of the mine is surrounded, and gazed inquisitively down. But she discerned merely an immeasurable gulf, and out of its depths she heard the thunder of blasting, and the hollow echoes repeating these reports; she heard stones fall, and felt the earth tremble beneath her feet. Dizzy and almost without thought, she stared down into the dark abyss, when, all at once, she caught sight of a little light glimmering there below; presently she descried more, and they moved along in a horizontal direction. It was some time before Siri could distinguish that these figures were men, with burning torches in their hands, who were coming up out of the mine's inner, or still deeper regions.* With excited attention, she now noticed carefully the objects which the torches by degrees made visible. Amongst these was a hut, and not far from it a little green bush. At this sight she was glad, and felt herself almost at home down there. She now saw how the torch-bearers, slowly going one after the other, began to ascend by a zig-zag flight of steps, which led to a door in the mine, through which they successively disappeared. The clock struck six. It was the hour at which those labourers who do not work through the night, come up to go home. Led by the boy, Siri now betook herself along the margin of the opening of the mine, to a little wooden building which stood close by it. Its doors stood open, and within burnt a great fire, blazing against her from a huge hearth. Here was the descent to the mine, and here she entered; and after a while, saw the workmen with black dresses, and torches in their hands, come up out of the dark staircase.

We return now to the inn, to the gay coffee-party, which long continued to make themselves merry. But Olof and Valborg had noticed Siri's departure, and as she delayed to return, Valborg went to seek her. But she sought her in vain in the house, and then with a secret disquiet in her heart, went down into the court, and met Olof at the gate, who was inquiring after Siri. Valborg said that she had been seeking, but could not find her. They then began to inquire of the servants, and heard that a young lady, some time before, had left the inn, and taken the way to the mine; and quickly were Olof and Valborg, arm-in-arm, silently but rapidly hastening the same way.

"It is very wild, here!" said Valborg, once, as they passed through the mine-town.

"Are you afraid?" asked Olof, and pressed her arm closer to his side.

"Oh no, not I! but Siri has passed this way alone."

"Valborg, I think you are very fond of her."

"Yes, more than I can express."

"Ah! continue always to be fond of her. Be to her a guiding friend and sister. She needs it. Some time, perhaps, may I be a brother to her, but now—that is difficult for me. But I shall part from her more calmly, since I know that she has you."

Valborg made no reply, and they had not gone many steps before they saw the light figure of a female, which went softly between the black heaps. Siri had always light, cheerful articles of dress, and by this, as well as by the quick, elastic movement, they concluded that the light form was Siri, and went to meet her. But the figure seemed disconcerted by this, escaped to the right and to the left, and finally made an abrupt turn and disappeared by a side-way in the slag-town.

"Pardon me! wait here a moment!" said Olof, while he hastily quitted Valborg and made after the flying one.

Siri, for it was she, when she saw herself pursued, fled all the faster. Terror winged her feet. Other feelings gave wings to Olof's.

Oh! how does it happen, that that which flies us—when it is a beloved object—becomes to us so inexpressibly dear, dearer than ever, that we will offer up all to overtake and hold it fast! thus was it now with Olof. He felt, moreover, a burning terror, lest Siri, in her thoughtless flight, should precipitate herself into some channel, filled with water which here and there intersected the town. With the speed of lightning he pursued her, and within a few minutes he had overtaken and recognised her, and with a warmth, a tenderness, which at this moment altogether overpowered him, he held fast the trembling girl, while he uttered her name aloud.

* What Siri here saw takes place four-and-forty fathoms deep, that is, at the bottom of the "Stöten," which opening, in a great measure, has been made by fallings-in. On the sides of the great shaft are the openings and doors, through which the people descend into the hidden abysses of the mine.

They were not far from a hut. A volume of wild, crackling flames blazed forth from it, and shone upon them. But wilder still was the angry fire which lightened from Siri's dark eyes, as she turned her head toward Olof; but as her eyes met his, their expression was instantly changed.

Coolly and collectedly, she said, "Olof, is that thou? God be praised, I feared it was some one else; may I take thy arm?"

"Why dost thou expose thyself in this manner?" said Olof, angrily. "It is wrong, it is unwarrantably done, both to myself and to us." Her coldness caused a feeling as of icy steel to pass through his bosom.

"Pardon me! don't be angry!" said Siri, almost humbly to Olof and to Valborg, who now overtook them. "I come from the 'Stöten.' I was taken with a sudden desire to find it out myself, and did not understand that it was dangerous. But the little boy who conducted me related stories to me which terrified me when I saw you at a distance without recognising you. I was just now on the way home."

Valborg and Olof said nothing. They were disengaged with Siri, and in silence they approached the inn. But when they there found the whole family inquiring after them, they said merely that they had visited the neighbourhood of the mine. Siri thanked them for their thus sparing her with glances of the most grateful expression, and with many graceful and child-like demonstrations of affection. Olof was obliged to go out. He felt himself at once too much vexed, and too much pleased with her.

A kind of feverish fire burned in Siri's eyes this evening. She laughed, played, threw out a thousand schemes for herself, which heartily amused the professor. But her merriment was rather overstrained than natural.

Brigitta rather grumbled, and said:—

"Now we shall have a running and a racing to the mine that will be quite intolerable; and Siri will go quite off her head through it, if she be not that already. She will most likely fall in love with the mountain-king, or the copper-king down there; that I expect, and some fine day she will be mountain-kidnapped in earnest, and never come up again into the light of day."

"But thou, Brigitta, shalt come down there, to my wedding!" said Siri, giddily, "and I will make a feast for thee, and treat thee to a roasting-smoke soup, and ore roast, and a copper cake; which shall be quite delicious."

"Many thanks! thou mayst be so good as to eat thy detestable copper dishes thyself. And as to coming down into the mine, that shall never happen with my consent so long as I live."

"But I hope it will happen, though," said the professor, smiling, "for on Monday, that is to say, the day after to-morrow, we propose to descend into the mine, and mean to survey it thoroughly; and I hope thou wilt not then run away from us. Thou too, wilt see the mine, Ingeborg!"

"Yes, certainly, dear Gustaf," said Mrs. Ingeborg. "I quite congratulate myself on the prospect."

"Yes, but I would fain see him that can persuade me to descend into the mine!" said Brigitta, with a determined countenance. "No, I shall not go thither, for I will not go down into it, no, not for all the butter there is in the world."

"Oh!" said the professor; "Godelius shall persuade thee."

"That he had better let alone," said Brigitta, "for then I would break with him. I won't once see the nasty mine. I have heard of people who lost their reason merely by looking down into mines, and my small wits I would willingly retain as long as possible. Nay, my best and dearest uncle, let me remain comfortably above ground; that will be the best for me and all the rest, for I should neither be agreeable nor at ease down there, that I know very well of myself."

"Oh, thou wilt probably think better of it, for we are many against thee!" said the professor, jocosely. "And hear only, Brigitta, all that thou art likely to lose, if thou persist in thy obstinacy: just listen to what I have been reading." And out of Hamnerström's book, "On the Curiosities of the Great Coppermine," which lay on the table, the professor read aloud the following particulars:—

"From the Diary of Carolus Ogerius of the year 1634.

"We were astounded when we arrived at the opening of the mine. With what colours shall we sketch the picture of so extraordinary and wonderful a scene. In the ground yawns a hideously wide and deep abyss, which is surrounded by posts and rails, so that no one may hurry forward carelessly to the limit of the gulf, and, in terror at such an extraordinary depth, grow dizzy and fall headlong in; and although you support yourselves against these rails, yet it still grows dark, and wavers before your eyes when you cast them downwards; and when at length you venture to gaze down steadfastly, you then perceive men like birds, or rather like ants, that crawl to and fro, for so small do they appear. Wherever you turn your eyes you behold things each so strange in themselves when compared one with another; all these mingled together, warmth and ice, light and darkness, so that you might imagine old Chaos were come again. If you carefully notice, you see all the various colours of copper, brass, vitriol and sulphur; pallid, green, red, golden; all the escutcheons of the gods painted, as it were, by Eolus, and you may even assert that the very rainbows themselves are there prepared and stored up."

"Hearst thou, Brigitta," said the professor, "thou shalt see how and where the rainbows are manufactured!"

But Brigitta was prevented replying by the entrance of two gentlemen; and the professor sprung up and embraced two good old friends—the mine-steward, Falk, and mine-proprietor, Björk, who came from their residences in the country into the town on purpose to meet him and his family.

The former was a man of about forty, with keen eyes and strong eye-brows, lively, resolate, sinewy, full of mettle in tone and character, a vigorous and brisk nature, who seemed made to break in pieces the mountains, and by strength and hardihood to triumph over all obstacles. The other was a noble, but feeblar man, who had experienced many troubles, and had suffered himself to be depressed by them. Both contended often with each other, yet were fond of being together. Both had a great regard for our professor, and bade him heartily welcome to "Jernbära-land," the land prolific of iron.

During supper the conversation was upon Dalarna and its people, and many things were related which served to characterise it. The professor and Mrs. Ingeborg had observed it more from the sunny point of love, and spoke accordingly. The mine-steward, again, rather from that of vigorous exertion, and as a trait characteristic of the spirit of the Dalmen,—he considered himself to understand less that of the Dalwomen; and of the manner in which it was necessary to act towards this people, he related the following anecdote:

"Colonel Vegesack was, in the Finnish war in 1809, the leader of a life-battalion, which was composed of Dalmen. One day he had to attack with them a fort, and addressed them in that bold and lively strain which never fails to kindle the spirit of men naturally gallant. The Dalmen made the onset with the greatest bravery; but met with an equally vigorous resistance, and were repulsed with loss. Vegesack again collected his people, and addressed them in this manner:

"Listen, my lads! This time we have failed, but you will not allow yourselves, I am sure, to be beaten by the Russians to-day. Nay, if you are of the same mind as I am, we will give them a good trouncing for having fancied that they could trounce us. Follow me! Let us grapple with them, and I will answer for it that in less than an hour you shall have both fort and cannon in your hands. Forwards, march!"

"But not a man of the whole troop stirred.

"The colonel looked round him with stern glances. 'Ah, yes!' said he, slowly. 'I see how it is. But I will tell you how it shall be. Once more I will give the word to advance, and the first man who shows a symptom of disobedience, I will shoot him on the spot. You know all your duty, and I know mine. Forwards, march!'

"But the troop did not stir.

"The colonel seized his pistol, levelled it at a man in the front rank, and fired. He fell dead. Once more the colonel gave the word, 'Forwards, march!' All obeyed.

"The assault, which was made with a tempestuous fury, was crowned with success. The fort was carried with all its cannon, and prisoners were made far more numerous than were the assailants. The victory was complete.

"But in the hearts of the refractory and revengeful Dalmen rankled bitterness and revenge against him who had put to death their bold comrade, and who had led them by force into the contest. They conspired amongst themselves for vengeance, and for death to their stern leader. He was made aware of it, called his people together, and addressed them thus:

"I hear that you harbour ill-will towards me, because I shot one of your comrades, and that you think of revenging him. Very well, you shall have opportunity for it. You know that there commonly stand two sentinels by my tent. To-night I will dismiss them, and for a fortnight I will sleep there by night, alone, and without sentinels. But on the table by my bed there shall lie a brace of loaded pistols. Any of you that have a mind to come and fight with me are welcome.'

"The Dalmen listened to this address gloomily and in silence.

"For fourteen nights the colonel slept without a guard in the midst of his excited troop. No one disturbed his sleep; and after this challenge, his men followed him wherever he wished, and were devoted to the death to him."

The answer was then related, that a certain Dalman gave Armsfelt, when he received at Tuna a troop of three thousand Dalmen, who had volunteered to march from Dalarna, and save the king and country in war.

A man stepped out of the ranks, and said to Armsfelt, "Thou canst see plain enough that thou ledest good people, but what sort of officers wilt thou give us?" Armsfelt replied, that he would give them upright and brave men as leaders; to which the Dalman made answer, "Yes, that will certainly be most advisable; for, if we notice any one who does not stand by us like an honourable man, a ball shall strike him before he can strike our enemies."

With such anecdotes and discourse, the evening sped rapidly away. It was late when the two friends took leave, but not without having arranged a longer future visit of the Mora family to them at their country homes.

The next day was Sunday, and the Mora family betook themselves to the old coppermine church. After the sermon, and when the clergyman read the customary prayers, he paused a moment, and then proceeded with a more emphatic expression,—

"We thank Thee, merciful God, for the rich treasures and abundant blessings which Thou hast graciously conferred on this place out of the bowels of the earth, and out of the flinty rocks; and we pray Thee, that Thou wilt continue to give, to bless, and to preserve to us these precious treasures; and give us grace to use these Thy blessings with thankfulness, and to the honour of Thy name. Preserve, O God! all those who labour in the deep and perilous regions of the earth from injury, and danger, and all evil, and give them grace to keep Thee perpetually before their eyes, to commit themselves, body and soul, into Thy hands; to consider always the dangers which hang over them, and thus be well prepared, should any violence befall them, to depart hence in blessedness, through Thy Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen!"

For centuries has this prayer been read in the mining districts of Dalarna, but never yet, perhaps, had these words so penetrated a heart as at this moment. Valborg saw Siri tremble, as she sunk upon her knees, but did not comprehend the deep emotion of her mind.

When the service was ended, and our travellers advanced to take a closer view of the church, they were shown a grave, to which was attached a touching example of the faithful memory of love.

In the year 1719, there was found while delving in the Mardskinn mine, eighty-two fathoms deep, the body of a young man perfectly well preserved, but changed into a sort of petrification. It was borne up into the fresh air, on the surface, and a great crowd of people collected to witness this singular phenomenon. Amongst these was a poor old woman, who, as soon as she caught sight of the corpse, exclaimed, "That is he! That is Matts Israelson!" Then it was called to mind that, in the year 1670, there had been a falling-in in the Mardskinn mine, and that at this time a miner, by name Matts Israelson, had disappeared. The people were soon convinced that this was the same man, who had now been discovered after he had lain buried under the earthfall, at the bottom of the mine, for nearly fifty years. The old woman had recognised the true-loved bridegroom of her youth, and besought that she might be allowed to bury his remains.

"Affection never faileth!" said Nordevall, looked on the silent grave, and pressed his wife's hand.

In the evening of this day, the Mora family was invited to a dance by one of the most wealthy mine-proprietors in the town. Lieutenant Lasse danced long beforehand in his thoughts, and played, with great emphasis, on the piano-forte in the great saloon of the inn, "les plaisirs de Fahlun, grande valse composée par J. W. Flaggé." And now issued from their room the young ladies, dressed for the evening festivity; and Lieutenant Lasse quitted "les plaisirs de Fahlun," to compliment his sister and cousins, and make his observations on their toilets. These were very favourable for Valborg and Siri, but not so much so for Brigitta, whose head, especially, Lieutenant Lasse found too rotund, too much like the globe of the earth. She ought to have some flowers, or at least a bow of ribands, thought Lieutenant Lasse.

Brigitta could not do otherwise than agree with him; but then she had no bow, and so she must do without it.

"Ah! a bow of riband I can probably help her to; for this evening thou canst have one of me," said Lieutenant Lasse, somewhat embarrassed, and hastened out.

"A bow of riband!" exclaimed Brigitta, "where has he got a bow of riband! that is not all right: we shall find that he has taken it from some one. Of this I must, assuredly, have some explanation. See, there he comes, and—a splendid bow of riband! From whom hast thou got this, Lasse—that is to say, from whom hast thou taken it? Is it from Mimi Osterdal, of Westeras, with whom thou wert figuring away so at the dean's? I fancy thou blushest a little. It is very well, then, that thou hast still a little conscience left; and quite proper is it that I know whose bow it is. Thanks, Lasse dear! thou canst make thyself sure that thou wilt never get it again."

"It fell from her in dancing," said Lieutenant Lasse, excusing himself, and somewhat embarrassed.

"Yes, and thou took it and pressed it to thy heart—is it not so! The blessed courtesy-practisers! the blessed cavaliers who make fools of the young girls, and steal their bows, and make them believe that they steal their hearts too—and then trouble yourselves just as little about one as the other! really they ought to be put in prison. In the meantime, however, I myself will give Mimi her bow again—after I have enjoyed the use of it for an evening or two; and she shall know how——"

"Nay, by no means——"

"Yes, by all means she shall certainly know it, and we will both of us have a good laugh over it. Mimi Osterdal is a sensible girl. Dost thou not think that she would much rather have her bow than thy heart! such a beautiful bow, at least half a yard of good riband in it—I will answer for it that she will be right glad to get it again. I only wonder whose scarf, or whose handkerchief, or whose bow, thou wilt appropriate here in the town. Heaven help me, what trouble and what an office I have in this world, to take care that all my brother's inclinations that my little sisters-in-law may get their articles of apparel again. I wish sincerely that the right sister-in-law would at once come and put all this to rights. But I shall have my eyes upon thee, Lasse, this evening, that thou mayst be assured of."

Lieutenant Lasse cast from him a little embarrassment at Brigitta's lecture in the presence of Valborg with a hearty laugh, and flung himself with a sort of wildness afresh on "les plaisirs de Fahlun." Valborg and Brigitta began waltzing together, the new lecturer danced solo after them; but now came Mrs. Ingeborg, and called them to go to the actual ball.

Of this we will merely say that Lieutenant Lasse, who divided himself amongst three young and handsome ladies, and that Brigitta often followed with criticising eyes her three fresh "little sisters-in-law," as well as "the divided heart," as Lieutenant Lasse was this evening called at the ball, in consequence of his divided but lively courtesies.

Valborg distinguished herself by her beautiful dancing, and Olof danced more than once with her. Siri, sat still, would not dance, excused herself by a pain in her foot, looked pale, but friendly and clever, and sat much beside her foster-father, sometimes turning on him a sweet but inquiring glance, which seemed to say, "Art thou in good humour with thy Siri?"

Brigitta was constantly in the dance, was gay and merry, and became a great favourite with the company.

So much for "les plaisirs de Fahlun."

DESCENT INTO THE MINE.

THE next day the mine was to be visited. Already early in the morning Lieutenant Lasse hailed the three young ladies with the following song:—

Up, brothers! let your torches glow,
Where duty calls us let us go.
Our way, though dark, is light to keep,
Though down into the deep.

No matter though our path lies through
The yawning shaft, our watch is true.
No matter though that path is long,
The longer is our song.

The mountain opens as we go,
With gladsome hopes we march below—
Below a better world to find
Than that we leave behind.

That better world is all our own,
Whose wealth transcends all treasures known.
A thousand years has flowed its ore,
And shall a thousand more.

The world above is great and shoes,
But here the mine itself is green,
And in itself a wealth doth hold
Exhaustless and untold.

Such joy the earth can ne'er impart
As when we see the copper start—
Mid smoke and dust behold it shine Forth bursting from the mine.*

This brave mine song, which has several verses besides those here quoted, and which once, both day and night, sounded, and still often sounds in the depths of the copper-mine, charmed Siri extremely, and speedily she sung in emulation with Lieutenant Lasse,

Up, brothers! let your torches glow.

The words of the song contributed to kindle her previously excited fancy about the "world's eighth wonder," as the Fahlun copper-mine has been styled. Her eyes flamed with desire to explore every individual room and spot in it which she had heard named, and amongst which she recollected these—the Jewel, the Crown, the Copper Dragon, the Black Knight, Odin, Loke, the Snake of Midgard, the Imperial Apple, the North Star, the Silver Region, the King's Hall, the Prince of Peace, &c. Especially was her curiosity excited about this Copper Dragon, which she looked upon as the genius of the copper-mine, and represented to her imagination as magnificently terrible. Before the ardent mind of the young maiden played images great and wonderful, which the ancient northern sages had accustomed her to see in her imaginations of the fantastic halls of the mine king.

Brigitte, in the meantime, stood fast by her resolve not to go down into the mine,—no, not even once to look down into it. She sat down to write letters, and let the others go, at the same time zealously impressing it upon them, and especially on the lector and Siri, to take good care of themselves. All the rest were in extremely high spirits, and full of curiosity. Mrs. Ingeborg went as to a joyous festivity, and nothing but jokes and merry words were heard on the way through the dingy mine-town, and amid the smoke of ore-roasting fires from the ovens of earth by the road, which resembled gigantic loaves of bread. Through this smoke, however, no one passed with impunity, for the noses of some and the eyes of others ran tremendously; and others, again, were almost suffocated with coughing, for the wind blew the smoke now directly across the way, and it seized on the chest of the lector and made him turn quite melancholy.

"God grant that such a smoke may never fall!" said Queen Christina, when she visited Fahlun, and a fear was expressed lest the roasting smoke might annoy her.

Professor Nordevall reminded the lector of this, but the lector expressed a great contempt for Queen Christina and her taste, and Lieutenant Lasse regarded the mine-town and the roasting smoke as belonging to "les déplaissirs de Fahlun," and he pondered on composing a waltz on this subject, with a strong smoke effect, which he would dedicate to Brigitte. He did not doubt but that it would make the people cough excessively. Abbé Vogler had, indeed, imitated thunder on the piano so perfectly that the milk was turned sour by it in the dairy.

Into the mine-house—a handsome building, with a tower and a clock, situated about fifty paces from the great opening of the mine, and just opposite to the descent to it—the travellers went to clothe themselves in the mine costume, which is used by all who visit the mine. This costume consists of a black blouse, with ornaments on the shoulders, a leathern belt, which buckled round the waist, and a felt hat with broad brim. Thus equipped, people are supposed to be proof against smoke and soot in the mine, as well as the moisture which drops in the passages.

"God and the people! what figures you are!" exclaimed Mrs. Ingeborg, as she saw Valborg and Siri; "but I reckon I look no better myself." And they laughed heartily as they contemplated one another.

Conducted by two guides, in similar dresses, who appeared to be of the race of the giants, the mine-explorers now quitted the mine-house, and passed over the paved level to the little building at the brink of the mine, called the landing-room, because there the descent begins. There, in a great fire-place, burns a fire, which is called "the Eternal," because it has burnt there from time immemorial; no one remembers when it was kindled, and no one the day when it was put out. Thus through the unnumbered centuries during which the mine has been worked, has this fire also burned on its brink. Even at a time when the mine had again for the most part fallen in, and there was no one any longer working there, even then the people of the mine would not allow the fire in the landing-room to go out. It seems to be regarded as the living principle of the mine.

At this fire the guides kindled their torches, made of long pine-shoots, held together by a ring. All the other persons had, Mrs. Ingeborg as well, their burning torches in their hands: Lieutenant Lasse sang—

"Up, brothers! let your torches glow!"

And now the descent began by a dark staircase, which, with broad steps, went winding down in a spiral course forty-four fathoms deep.

On the way down into the mine, the principal guide named several places: as, the New Landing Bottom, the Lower Firehearth, the Radical Blow Attempt, the Lybecker's Haunted-Room, Tilas, Ubi Sant, and the Farmer's Porch, where formerly the farmers had a sort of stable for the horses that they took down into the mine to work. And here our wanderers saw daylight through a door in the mine, and through this they came out into the "Stöten," saw above their heads the blue heaven, and themselves in the midst of the giant chasm; the width of which is one hundred and twenty fathoms from north to south, and from east to west eighty-six. Here they surveyed the strata of different metals and kinds of stones, which, in great layers, marbled with colours of red, gold, and green, projected from the sides of the mine crater; and Olof explained to them the names of the different ores and species of stone. Siri, in the meantime, gazed at the little smith's shop in the middle of the "Stöten," which she had described the evening before, and on the green raspberry-bush near it, which in the middle of the hard rock stood so fresh and friendly.

When they had surveyed the "Stöten," and felt the winter-cold wind which, from never-melting masses of ice, breathed from Ambrus Shaft, they again entered the mine, in order to make a nearer acquaintance with its interior.

There have been learned men who have traced up the origin of the copper-mine of Fahlun to Tubal Cain himself, a master "of all kinds of iron and copper work," as related in the first book of Moses. Certain it is, that its working loses itself in the ages of sagas, when the artistical race of dwarfs were believed to work at their forges in our mountains, and the people of the south glanced towards the north as towards a land of treasures and of giants. More than 1200 people have formerly been employed at once in this subterranean world, which, in its enormous labyrinth of passages, shafts, caverns, and halls, represents an excavated netherworld, the ideal of a mine-king's palace. It is said to demand more than eight days to go through all its rooms, as far as the territory of Terra Nova, and the region of Whereto! which extends two hundred fathoms deep below the bottom of the mine. The various and picturesque names of these rooms and halls, gathered out of all periods of history out of the kingdoms of both fancy and reality, contribute to give to the place a romantic interest for the imagination. Almost all the kings and queens of Sweden have paid visits to this mine. Charles IX., whose heart seemed to have much the nature and character of a mountain, except for the tender woman, his first beloved wife, in honour of whom he founded and named the towns, "Mariefred" and "Mariestad"—Charles IX. was extremely attached to this mining country, was often residing there, and called the mine "Sweden's Fortune," and desired that the great room there might be called the Room of God's Gifts. His great son, Gustavus Adolphus, also exclaimed, as he stood in one of the rooms of the mine where the bright copper ore beamed from walls, roof, and floor, "Where is the monarch who has such a palace as that in which we now are!"

But, notwithstanding all this, Siri did not find here the palaces, the magnificent underworld, of which she had dreamed to herself, and whose names, the Jewel, the Crown, the Sceptre, etc., seemed to promise. There were perpetually the same dark, vaulted passages, the same great empty halls and domes, excavations and shafts, or sinkings,* out of which eternal night seemed to stare upon you. There was everywhere the same damp, cold air, the same dripping and dripping from above, and which rendered the floor slippery. The sides of the mine glittered, indeed, when the torches shone upon them, or when they were struck against them, and sent forth showers of sparks; and the stactites glimmered also as they hung above on the arched roofs; but it was a chill and colourless gleam, which left soul and sense cold. In the passages, the miners frequently were met with torches in their hands, in their black dresses, with solemn, pale, grimy countenances, and slow and heavy steps. The life in the mine did not seem to be joyous, and at every glance Siri's eyes grew darker, and her heart more oppressed.

She would not have been astonished if she now had been told that the most melancholy of mortal ailments, insanity, was one of the most prevalent amongst the labourers of this subterranean kingdom.

After the party near Adolphus Frederick's shaft had seen "The Royal Crown," formerly one of the richest workings in the mine, but now as black and empty as all the rest, they passed through the Cooper's Attempt, by Prince Oscar's Way, to the Fisherman; thence by the sinkings of Grönsiken, Kräftlon, and Gösen, and Louise-Uric's shaft, to the Lobster-band.

"Here is the Lobster!" said the guide, as he paused before the opening into a stupendous rotunda. "Here formerly ran a small bridge, or band, with a handrail, along the wall, so that you might go round within it; but the roof has fallen in, and buried a great part of this, so that you cannot now advance many paces into the interior. But the room is magnificent! I have caused torches to be carried to the excavations above, which open into this room, so that the ladies and gentlemen may get a full view of the vaulted roof. See! there, above us, where the three torches shine, that is the cutting through to the 'Abboren' and 'Gösen.' It is more than twenty fathoms up thither; and here, in the abyss below us, where we see the light shine, that is Kräftlon's bottom, which lies fifteen fathoms deep."

"And the narrow bridge to the left, which seems to hover in the abyss, is it dangerous to go upon?" asked Mrs. Ingeborg.

"Oh, no!" replied the guide: "at all events, you can advance a few paces;" and he advanced a few steps upon the bridge, and swung his torch in order to illumine it. Mrs. Ingeborg did the same, as she stepped forward into the opening of the rotunda. The strong blazing-up light chased the darkness rapidly away, as the lightning-flash cleaves the cloud, and at the same time lit up the tall, darkly-clad figure of a man who stood alone on the narrow bridge, at the edge of the fallen-in earth, and had his pale countenance turned towards the enterers. At this sight, Mrs. Ingeborg uttered a faint cry of horror, staggered, and fell senseless to the ground. But the dark figure was again hidden in the gloom from which he had for a moment emerged.

In the meantime, Brigitta remained in the inn, and wrote letters full of narratives and commissions to her best friends in Stockholm. In this she was interrupted by the mine-steward, Falk, who came to inquire after his Mora friends. When he learned that they were in all probability to be found in the mine, he said,

"Then I came a little too late. My intention was, in fact, to dissuade them from a visit to the mine, at least for a few days. On Friday, when I was down there, I heard certain sighs and shudders which I did not like; for when that old heathen, the copper-giant, sighs and shakes himself, then is he not safely to be trusted."

"Lord, then, my great God and Father!" exclaimed Brigitta, as she pushed the table vehemently from her, and rose up, "How can you tell me this now! It is now too late; they are lost, lost! Ah, the abominable mine! they will all perish together! my curate, my lector, my kind and honourable Godelius! my divine aunt! uncle! Siri! And Lasse, poor boy! Ah, my God! I will run down there! I will move heaven and earth! I will go myself into the depths of the earth, provided I may be able to bring them up thence alive!"

"Heaven help me! calm yourself, my gracious lady!" exclaimed the mine-steward, at once startled and amused at Brigitta's zeal; "it is not so dangerous, really not dangerous at all; for, since Friday, nothing more has been heard in the mine, and that which was heard was next to nothing. Before any thing serious takes place, people are sure to hear other prognostics of it; and it was merely my extreme caution which—but I will accompany you to the mine. The old copper-man and I are old acquaintances, and I understand his meaning. I am not frightened at him!"

And quickly were Brigitta and the steward in full speed on the way to the "abominable mine," which Brigitta never would see.

"Be calm, then, my gracious lady!" said the mine-steward, admonishingly, as they proceeded, "and do not hurry, so that we tumble, or get consumption. I do assure you that there is now no danger on foot. For several years has every thing been quiet in the mine; at least no fall of any consequence has taken place, no, not since the great fall of 1833. But that was really extraordinary. It was on a Friday, in the month of February, when crackings, sighs, and shudders were heard in the mine, and people saw well that something serious would be the result of it. Therefore all the workmen were ordered up out of the mine, and on Saturday there was not left in it a single soul. But as all continued quiet in the mine, no fall taking place, and nothing further than some cracks being heard, on Sunday two workmen stole down into it, in order to convey their ore nearer to the shaft, by which it should be drawn up, and with this they continued busy till quite in the night. But exactly on this night, the night between Sunday and Monday, the vast fall took place, which filled a great part of the mine again. I lived then in the mine-house, close to the mine, and it cracked and thundered beneath it, as if the interior rivers of the earth were in uproar. The doors in the house burst open, the windows shook, and some of them were broken to pieces; and the same thing occurred in other parts of the town. Many people did not sleep a wink during the night. But they who had the worst of it were the two workmen who had descended into the mine. When they heard the fall begin, they attempted to hasten up, but found the ladders crushed above them, and saw masses of rock plunging down around them. They then sought to descend into the regions where they fancied that the danger would be less; but also, in this direction, they found the ladders dashed to pieces. Then they were compelled to flee into a trial-excavation; that is, into an excavation which has no outlet, but stands like a cell in the mine, called Ocean, near Adolphus's horizontal shaft, and here they remained the whole night without light, for their torches burnt out; and, meantime, it thundered and raged in the mine as if hell itself were broken loose. At length, on the morrow, the tumult had ceased, and then the people above on the brink of the mine heard the cry of distress through Adolphus's shaft, and they let down casks; and thus happily succeeded in drawing up the two men, more dead than alive; the one was half raving, and both were very ill for a long time after..."

"Ah, dear heaven! those are indeed frightful stories which you have just related!" interrupted Brigitta in her anguish of heart, "and that just at the present time, when... why, dear bless me! who is that? is not that my adjunct who is coming there, running up to us through the cross-town? is it his ghost, or is it he himself!"

Saying this, Brigitta sprang towards the adjunct and the adjunct towards Brigitta, and both met together in a thick rust-smoke, which lay over the road. Brigitta, however, took no notice of it, but exclaimed—

"Is it you! are you alive? have you kept all your limbs, body, and soul together safe and sound! why do you come here so alone! where are the rest! are they alive, or are they all dead! why don't you speak! speak, speak, speak, I say!"

"Apstshaw!" was the first sound which was heard from the lips of the adjunct. "I come... apstshaw! in order to.... apstshaw—apstshaw!"

"God help you and us all!" sighed Brigitta. "Only say whether they are alive, or all dead!"

"They are alive! apstshaw! apstshaw!"

"All—uninjured!"

"Yes, yes! apstshaw! that confounded smoke! apstshaw! I shall choke—I shall choke! apstshaw! apstshaw! apstshawkoi—a—a!..."

"Then pray do get out of the smoke, Godelius!" exclaimed Brigitta, who then also began to sneeze, "or else we shall both choke, and the comedy will turn into a tragedy. Yes, that's right! here we can breathe freely! Now tell me, are you quite sure that they are all alive, and that no pit has fallen in?"

"Yes, I am quite sure!" assured the adjunct.

"And they have all come out again safe and sound, from out of that leviathan's jaw, and are again upon God's green earth!"

"Yes; but... aunt has fallen into a swoon at the bottom of the mine, and is now suffering a little from the effects of it. I am, therefore, come to request you to go to her; for no one understands so well how to go about with her as you..."

"Ah, my dear heavenly aunt!—what has she been seized with!—That abominable mine!—I wish it were in Blakulla!"

"Yes, yes, and the rust-smoke along with it!—I am in such a perspiration in a..."

"Ah, that will do you a deal of good, my lit-the old man! Ah! thank heaven! now then we are at last out of the nuisance."

Brigitta found Madame Ingeborg in the miners'-hall. Siri had been conducted into the miner's-court, a beautiful room resembling a gallery with different likenesses. She had just been bled, and had also recovered from the swoon, but yet not to perfect consciousness. With wild staring looks she asked:

"Where am I?"

"You are in the room of the miner's-court," answered her husband; "you are with your own family."

"In the chamber of the miner's-court!" said Madame Ingeborg, raising herself up, and apparently trying to recollect herself, "in the miner's-court! Is it not here where the criminals are tried? Am I brought here to be tried?"

"Ingeborg! recollect yourself. Look at me; don't you know me again!"

"Yes, you are my Gustavus!" said she with a heavenly smile, "my only friend, you shall defend me. But hush! (whispering.) Who is that standing there!"

And Madame Ingeborg's eyes fixed themselves with a timorous glance on a full-length portrait of Gustavus IX., in that dark dress, with those harsh features, that rigid, immovable expression, and that singularly trimmed hair, which forms a cross on the forehead, just as they are found every where on the portraits of that king.

On the name of the picture being mentioned to Madame Ingeborg, she said:

"Oh, indeed! I took it for some other person. Tell me . . . tell me, did any one of you see down at the bottom of the mine . . . on the bridge over the precipice, a dark-looking man? Did nobody see him?"

"No!"

Nobody had seen him. (The leader and Madame Ingeborg, who stood in front of the opening, had most probably screened the figure from the rest.)

"It was a delusion," thought the professor; "the black depth turned you dizzy, and caused you to perceive realities in mere shade forms. Such things are not of rare occurrence."

Madame Ingeborg was silent.

"Yes, it is very strange," said she, after a while; "and here in this place it is very strange, too; but I dare say I am a strange being also."

"Aunt ought to sleep—should try to get a little sleep," said Brigitta, then pressing herself forwards; "Don't you think so, dear uncle? We will lead aunt into the adjoining little room, and then I will relate to her the drollest stories that I know, or I will also set myself opposite to her, and continue yawning until she either falls asleep or laughing; and both will be very salutary to her."

Madame Ingeborg was obliged to smile, and the adjunct . . . that is, the lecturer, cast a glance at Brigitta, and said:

"Yes, yes, she gets some famous ideas into her head, that she does."

It was done as Brigitta proposed. Madame Ingeborg, who had now almost come to perfect consciousness, was conducted by her into an adjoining little private-room in the judgment-hall, and there Brigitta remained alone with her in order to be able to carry on her somniferous arts undisturbed. The rest remained in the hall, and the young people amused themselves for a time with the contemplation of the portraits of the Wasa-kluge, and different presidents of the College for Miners and Metallurgists who graced the room, and who, with wise and sharp visages, seemed to look down upon the young folks who were contemplating them. Olof, who kept himself silent and gloomy for a long time, revived again with the contemplation of the beautiful collection of minerals, which were preserved in a glass case in the room, and was soon busy in pointing out and explaining to his friends various curiosities. Such is the nature of youth; the fresh water springs up under a pressure—and it is well that it is so.

But the professor stood there silent at a window, and looked out of the room. A leaden, heavy cloud, had overcast the sky, and lay gloomily over the opening of the mine over the black dross-town around it, and over the naked, desolate mountains on the right hand. And it seemed to him as if the cloud, of which his wife had shortly before been speaking, had now been realized, and impended, pregnant with inauspiciousness, over their heads. He had not seen the cause of her fainting in the mine; no defined object, no distinct image hovered threateningly before him; but he felt himself oppressed by a burning uneasiness, by inauspicious forebodings, for which he could not clearly account, and which he in vain endeavoured to combat.

In this state of mind it was very agreeable to him, that his two friends, Falk and Björk, came to him. He sent the young people back to the inn, in order to dine there, and stayed with the two friends. He himself, after a while, led the conversation to the thought which now occupied his mind, to the disaster, and the share which the accidental fate of a man and his own guilt have in it. Melancholy Björk laid the blame almost exclusively on fate, and was inclined to say, with Solomon the Wise; "It happeneth unto the righteous as unto the wicked."

"Fate!" exclaimed the governor, "I know of nought more empty than that word, and no power more impotent than this, namely—if strength of will rests in the breast to wrestle with it. By patience and perseverance every thing may be overcome; that is a doctrine which the copper-mine preaches here, in rivalry with the great man who at this place took fate into his power and forced it to his side, into his service, after he had long been haunted by his caprices, and had been obliged to experience its hardest blows. Contemplate Gustavus Wasa in his period of misfortune, see him a captive, deprived of his father and friends by the massacre of Stockholm, and afterwards of all his property; see him a fugitive in his own fatherland, wandering about in the disguise of a peasant in the valleys, solitary, pursued by tyrants; compelled to hide himself soon under a cut down fir-tree; soon under the earth; under bridges; in straw, and even there wounded by the spears of the enemy; see him despised, betrayed, continually threatened with destruction; and with all this perpetually rising up again with the same thought, the same mind, the same purpose; namely, of collecting Swedish people for Sweden's deliverance. See him combating with the pusillanimity or coldness of men, never to be weary in warning them; and finally, see how he gains the people's ears, wins the people's hearts; see how they join him, and devote themselves to him as his life-guards, and attendants in life and death! Hither to Fablan it was, where with his four hundred men he marched from Mora; here it was, where he first became the conqueror of his enemies; where he, for the first time, raised the banner of Sweden's liberty; here it was where he commenced his career of victory, which did not stop until he had made his father-land free, and raised himself upon its throne by the free choice of the people. See, that is a conflict with fate which clearly shows of what signification is its power. No, not here in this country, before the men of the copper-mine, is it proper to speak of the power of fate; here we ought to speak of the power of the will!"

"That's all very fine and glorious! and we may read all that in Swedish history by Geijer and Strinnholm, and in that by Fryxal; indeed, we have often talked about it already," said Björk, not in the least strengthened by the patriotic outbreak of his friend; "but I am of opinion that our history is a little in want of examples to the contrary as that of any other country. I mean to say that we can also show forth more than one martyr of purpose and noble efforts, whose endeavours terminated in a total failure of success. Virtue, good-will, and perseverance, may be equally great with two persons; but the one triumphs over adversity, the other sinks under it; that is, the one has luck, the other ill-luck: that's the great difference between them; and when that manifests itself sooner or later in a man's life, it does not at all alter the circumstances. Engelbrecht, for instance, was an equally, if not nobler man than Gustavus Wasa; he struggled for the same cause and in the same manner, and he fell by the hand of an assassin before he had completed his work."

"But he had, at all events, laid the foundation for the superstructure which was afterwards reared," said Nordevall. "As for the rest you are right. You are right in this respect, that earthly fortune does not always engage in the service of justice, that blind fate is a power upon earth. But above it stands Providence, with justice for its balance, with eternity in his hand, and continues where its power ceases, and finishes what is left unfinished. The power of earthly fate extends as far as death; the doctrines of religion, which have opened to us the path beyond this earthly one, have also shown us the prize of victory on yonder side, both for man himself as well as for the good cause of his warfare. And no man is so strong as he who lives and fights in this consciousness. Hence Gustavus Adolphus the Great is a far more pleasing and nobler pattern to me, than Gustavus Wasa. It is indeed a glorious picture to behold, how he with prayer and sword, and with his war-song: 'Fear not, thou little flock!' goes forth with his little band against half a world, contending for the liberty of faith. And the joyous spirit of heroism, which ever caused him to be foremost, and in which he answered: 'The Lord God omnipotent ever liveth and reigneth!' whenever he was entreated to spare his life; see, that is a spirit which I admire. It is a pleasure to see how even derision—a weapon so dreaded by many—becomes itself turned into ridicule before his gravity. What sport was not made in Austria of his design; how did they not mock and laugh about him at the court of Vienna, where they applied the epithet to him of the 'Snow-king,' and so forth. But the Snow-king went forward, and grew and increased until his avalanche made the imperial city and crown tremble. He died in the very midst of his victorious career, and in this way succumbed to his earthly destiny: but, was the victory on that account any less perfect! He himself was removed from the power of earthly fate, and the protestant world honours him to this very day, as their deliverer. The fault with us is, that when we judge of a life and its efforts, we generally take a too low standard of measurement."

"You are quite right, my brother," said the governor; "but you must not deny old king Gösta the hope which you commend in his grandson. Of him too, we know that he built his house upon a stronger foundation than his own strength, just as he has expressed it in his own hymn:

'Oh, Sweden, on God implicitly rely,
And evermore pray to him fervently!'"

"Brother Nordevall, compose me this hymn, and then I will endeavour to prevail upon the miners to sing it during their morning worship. That will strengthen them in a more salutary manner than the brandy-potation, of which they are so excessively fond."

In the room adjoining, Madame Ingeborg had just said to Brigitta:

"Open the door a little, Brigitta. I hear Gustavus's voice, and that voice is dearer to me than the finest music. Hush! Now I can apprehend his words too."

The visit of the physician interrupted the conversation of the friends. He found Madame Ingeborg better, but still in an excited state. He prescribed several soothing medicines, and with it the utmost external and internal quietness.

In consequence hereof, it was determined that she should quietly remain over-night in the miner's hall, and the professor with her. Madame Ingeborg herself was very well satisfied with this resolution. When the young people, however, on their return from the inn, were informed that they were to return to it again for the night, they were quite confounded, and each one said: "May not I remain here!"

"No, not one of you," said Madame Ingeborg, pleasantly, "nobody except my husband. My night will perhaps be uneasy, and this night I will not disturb or trouble any one else, excepting him. A pretty proof of affection!" added she, with a sorrowful but love-replete smile, to which her husband responded with a cordial—"That's just as it should be!"

But Siri meekly bent her knee before Madame Ingeborg's couch, laid her head on her feet, and said:

"Let me stay here for the night!"

The voice with which she entreated had a something in it irresistible. The professor said:

"Let the girl stay here with us, Ingeborg! I'll take all the responsibility upon myself."

And so it was decided. Not long afterwards they all took leave of one another for the night, as they were anxious to let Madame Ingeborg get to rest as soon as possible. Olof lingered a little longer than the rest, for he wished to bid Siri good-night, or more correctly—though he would not himself concede it—to see her for a moment alone, and obtain a kind word, a pleasant look, from her. Ah! the poor heart, in which love dwells, is as the source of Iceland, in whose depth invisible flames are boiling. In the middle of winter, out of the midst of the snow, its water-spouts spring forth with volcanic power. And though they spill their tears on hard rocks and cold snow, and hurl their stones, yet pay they no regard to it—they still continue to spout and to boil.

Siri was not in the room just at the moment; he saw somebody, who stood there as if waiting for some one. Who was it! Ah! he had no occasion to inquire. The first motion in his heart had, more than her light form, proclaimed Siri. He stood still. Wild and painful was the tempest in his breast. She, too, moved not, and he only heard her voice, penetrating, as it were, into his breast, as she said:

"Olof, are you angry with me?"

Olof made no reply. A momentary change was going on within him. Siri's mysterious demeanour, all that he had suffered for her sake, interposed like a dark body between them, just at the very moment when she approached him so meekly, so penitently, and hardened him against her. A desire for revenge was working in his heart. When generous hearts come to such-like feelings, it is sinful of them.

Again he heard the mild voice:

"Olof! you are angry with me. I am not surprised at it; notwithstanding, I have a favour to ask of you."

Siri went up to him, handed him a sealed letter, and said:

"Take this letter, and—take care of it. Take care of it, as if the keeper of the most precious treasure. But on some future day, when I shall give you permission, or, when—I am dead, then break its seal; read it, and when you have read it—burn it; let no one then know what it contained. For therein is recorded—my secret. I have written every thing down. But no living soul shall know it except you. But you, Olof, shall one day know, that she whom you have protected, towards whom you have been so generous, so kind, was not unworthy of it. I now resign into your hands that which is of more importance to me than my life, and—feel no scruples in doing so. So great is my faith in you and your honour, I know that you will act strictly in conformity with my request."

Olof took the letter, but continued silent. This seemed to pain Siri. She gazed on him, mournfully inquiringly with her beautiful, remarkable eyes, with her touching feature about her lips, and said:

"Olof! I have so joyfully looked forward to this moment, from whenceforth I should no longer stand before you wrapped in darkness... Soon we must part, and heaven knows, how and for how long! It would be a comfort to me, could I believe that you, of whom I shall ever think as of my best friend, also think friendly of me and entertain the like feelings towards me. You once, when we used to play together, called me sister. This name is so dear to me. Oh! can you not give me this name again, and that in earnest? Olof, cannot and will you not receive me again, and love me as a brother, now and ever? It seems to me as if then my way would go on lighter; I believe that life would then be easier to—us both!"

There was a something so simple, so earnest and cordial at the same time, in Siri's manner and expression, that Olof became, as it were, penetrated by a new, fresh feeling. It dropped like a soothing dew on the wild glow in his soul, where love and disaffection were in conflict together. He felt himself again changed; and when now he once more pressed the young maiden to his heart, as a beloved sister, and her head lingered again on his breast, so mild, so full of confidence, just as the first time it was done in pain and cordiality, his heart raised itself up anew; he felt himself strong over his own weakness, and renewed the vow of being her brother and friend.

With a hearty "God bless you, my sister!" he inclined over her—and hastened away. Siri looked after him. Her eyes sparkled in a suffusion of tears, but joyously, as when one has seen something noble and beautiful.

She then went softly into the room, and after bidding her foster-parents good-night, withdrew into the smaller chamber, where she was to pass the night, on the sofa. The only window in that room went to the mining-place; and timorously and full of misgivings she dwelt near it.

The two married people were in the large room. Madame Ingeborg, owing to a considerable rush of blood to the heart, could not endure a lying posture, and therefore sat up in a large easy chair. Now everything around her was still and silent. The night-lamp burnt with a steady, but dull reflection, and beside his wife sat the professor, watching over her with the eye of faithful affection. Notwithstanding, Madame Ingeborg got not a moment of repose.

Ever and again she fearfully raised her eye towards the portrait of Charles IX. as if in him she had seen the precursor of a chastising judge, some avenging fatality. And yet that dreaded king was himself almost a touching example of the power of a punishing Nemesis. He who made so many hearts tremble, nay perish, in tormenting fear of death, who caused so many heads to fall under the axe of the executioner, he the inexorable, the mighty in will and power, he stood in his old age before the imperial states of Sweden, and could do nought but point at his sore-stricken head, and stammer: "God's judgment!... God's judgment!..."

THE JUDGMENT OF GOD.

AND night came. With half-consumed disk the moon advanced from the clouds and shone over the gigantic jaws of the mine, over the black masses of slag, with the peculiar dusk light which marks its wane. All rested and was still in the town, which lay behind the mine-house, but down in the mine this night the work was going on, and the dull reports of blasting were heard from time to time out of the depths of the earth.

Mrs. Ingeborg, who was under the influence of a sleeping-draught, which yet was unable to give her rest, awoke at every sound of such explosion, and stretched out her hands avertingly, as if against some secret, threatening danger. Her husband watched her with uneasiness, and was within himself highly annoyed at this sleeping place for the night, which had been selected without reflecting on its unquiet vicinity to the mine. He himself had freed his mind by the conversation with his friends from its gloomy impression. He was again strong and full of consolatory feeling, as usual, and wished only to be able to impart his own tranquillity to the beloved being whom he saw to be the prey of depressing pain.

When he saw that this did not pass away, when she continued to be tormented by gloomy dreams, in a sort of uneasy trance, he kissed her eye-lids and said,—

"Ingeborg, awake! Speak to me; let us converse with each other. Come and walk awhile with me in the room; rest will be better than this sleep."

"Who calls me! Who says speak!" asked Mrs. Ingeborg, as she gazed confusedly around. "O Gustaf, is it thou! Thanks for having awoke me. My soul was in hell. Yes, thou art right; I must speak, now or never."

"What wilt thou, what dost thou mean? Why dost thou talk so wildly?"

"They were beautiful words—divine words, Gustaf, which thou spoke in the evening just past, of victory in death or beyond it; of the power which is stronger than misfortune—than fate!.....Nay, do not look thus at me! I am sane and collected, and know what I say and what I mean. Fate urges, conscience admonishes, God commands, and thou who givest me strength, thou art my judge!"

And Mrs. Ingeborg fell hastily upon her knees before her husband.

"Ingeborg! my wife! what dost thou?" exclaimed Nordevall, and sought to raise her.

"Let me be!" said she, fiercely and gloomily. "I am where I ought to be, where I ought to have been long ago. Hear me, I am a criminal!"

Nordevall sat down and covered his face with his hands, he could not look at her.

"I am guilty," she continued resolutely, "in having for ten years concealed from thee my life's grand misfortune and most momentous secret; in having concealed from thee that, before I became acquainted with thee, I had been married to another man, and that Siri, is my daughter!" Mrs. Ingeborg paused for a moment and bowed her forehead upon her husband's knee. He sat motionless; she continued,

"I was at Siri's age when I was loved by a man of rich but dangerous endowments. He at once captivated me, and won over to his interest my sister. But my brother-in-law set himself vehemently against our connection and sought by force to separate us; but obstinacy and love counteracted him. He, whom I loved, persuaded me to a secret union, and a priest of his acquaintance married us one evening in the chapel of Sölberg, in the neighbourhood of my sister's residence. An approaching change in his circumstances, he said, would quickly place him in a condition to proclaim our union and demand me as his wife.

"Ah, this band knit in blind enthusiasm was cut fearfully asunder. He to whom I had united myself, was soon after involved in a crime and fled the kingdom. My situation was horrible. The secret of my marriage was obliged to be disclosed to my brother-in-law. He was at first furious, but afterwards he took compassion on me, and promised me his help on my oath never to reveal my marriage, which I then discovered with amazement was not valid by the laws of Sweden. My sister and brother-in-law travelled out of the kingdom with me, and on our return Siri passed for their daughter, but mine she was, and at the same time I was obliged to consent to leave her in strange hands, and separate from her; I must do this in order to watch over my reputation and my unhappy secret; must do it also for her sake, because the innocent child's brow ought not to be branded with a tainted name. I wrote, however, to her father, whose place of abode was then known to me, and announced to him the birth of his daughter. From him I received no reply, but through my sister and brother-in-law the account of his death; and his perfect silence for five years after, left me now no doubt of the fact. Long had his image darkened in my soul. His crime. We do not long continue to love what we blush for. O! Gustaf! canst thou understand that when I first became acquainted with thee, when I learned to love thee with the approbation of all my better self, of my mind matured by unhappiness and affliction, canst thou understand that the very love, the reverence thou infused into me, bound my tongue, when thou soughtest my hand, so that I did not confess to thee the secret of my past life. Ah! I would not sink in thy regard; I had not fortitude to discover my union with an infamous person. A sense of duty and conscience admonished me to speak. Love and pride said, no. I sought to tranquilize myself with the thought that my confession could serve no purpose but to make us unhappy, and that no good could result from it to any one; for my child was happy with her foster parents, and was tenderly beloved, especially by the general, who never would have consented to part with her. Canst thou understand how these thoughts, the fear of forfeiting thy affection, thy confidence, the fear of thy anger against me has now, for ten years, caused me on this head to remain silent before thee, whilst the feeling of my fault towards thee and my child, occasioned me inexpressible anguish. But now—at this moment, I feel no more fear. Something higher is upon me, something which tells me that my hour of death is not far off; and till then, at least, must I stand clear before thee, with my offence, that in the grave I may have peace, and that beyond it I may be able to meet thee without a lie upon my forehead. Gustaf! for some time I have seen a form which made the blood stagnate in my veins. I saw it once hasten past on the highway before the court at Mora; once in the woods in Eldfal, but the countenance I did not then see, and persuaded myself that my imagination deceived me. But yesterday in the mine, on the narrow bridge over the abyss, I saw again the same figure, and now saw the countenance, and could no longer doubt—it was he, it was Siri's father, it was.... Julius Wolff!"

"Julius Wolff! the scoundrel!" exclaimed Nordevall with anger and pain.

"The unhappy one, yes! And now Gustaf, listen to me. Either what I have seen is an apparition, and it comes to call me away from thee, or Julius Wolff lives, and I am a perjured woman! But O my God! in the depth of this darkness I see a ray of light! If he lives then may Siri be innocent, and the stranger with whom she was seen, be her father. First in this moment have I acquired this foreboding, this consolation, and—I need it. Gustaf! Now thou knowest all! I have not a word to add in my own excuse, except my love for thee. Many a time has the confession lain upon my lips, but—thou wert so happy in thy confidence in me, and—I was silent. Judge me. Here, at thy feet, I will lie till thou pardon or reject me."

Nordevall's countenance was solemn and pale, as he turned it towards the penitent, and solemn but tender was the voice with which he said:—

"Ten years truth and affection speak for thee, and—my own sense of failing. My warmth of temper, my severity have terrified thee. Poor Ingeborg! How many a pang had been spared, how many a happiness had been won, if—if thou hadst laid thy daughter on my heart! O if man—but the past is no longer ours—ours alone is the present. Rise up my wife, and forgive my faults, as I forgive thee thy only fault towards me. May God forgive us both!"

Husband and wife arose, and as they stood in each other's arms, heart to heart, then came the strength of affection over them. Ten years love and truth, all the sweet, all the bitter remembrance of what they had lived through, suffered and enjoyed together, arose like angels out of the waves of the past, and cast light upon light, flame upon flame into life. It became glowing therewith. Never had they loved each other more intensely, never so felt the immortality of their union.

"Oh!" said Mrs. Ingeborg, "is it then this moment that I feared—that I have avoided for ten years? Where is fear, where is danger now?"

"Here!" replied a hollow and sepulchral voice; and from the shadow at the bottom of the hall stood forth a form; it was the same which Mrs. Ingeborg had seen in the Lobster cavern of the mine. He was even now clad in the black mine dress, and his hair was flung back from the pale and suffering-ploughed countenance.

Mrs. Ingeborg sent forth a cry and seized convulsively her husband's arm.

"Silence!" said the dark form, "wretchedness is here, but—it shall not strike you! I have heard enough to recognize the innocence of Ingeborg; that she did not get the letter from me which I wrote to her under cover to her sister; for I wished to be dead to all, but—not to her! Yet what should she with a dishonoured man! And now, that I have seen my daughter; that I have given her again parents and her natural right, that I have liberated her from unworthy suspicions, and her mother from . . . her dread of ghosts, now will my rôle upon earth quickly be played out. It now remains to free you from—myself. And that shall now be done. Cherish my noble child! Her happiness I shall one day demand at your hands. Farewell, Nordevall! Remember that it is the 'scoundrel,' who confers on thee, the wife, and the daughter, to whom he had a right, and who flies in order not to disturb, thy happiness!" And with a look, in which pride and bitter anguish were combined, the dark man hastily quitted the room, and went with rapid steps over the esplanade, towards the mine, and into the landing-room.

But it was not easy for him to escape from the light-haired girl, who, like a moon-beam, flew across the esplanade in his track, and who here embraced him with the force of the spirit, which renders the softest arms strong as an iron band.

"Thou shalt not leave me!" said she. "Into the bowels of the earth I will follow thee."

"My child!" exclaimed he, with painful emotion, "my child! Is it thou! Oh! thus then can I once more press thee to my heart, before we separate for ever."

"We do not part;" said she, "never! I will go and take leave of them within. I will kiss their feet; but then I belong to—I will follow thee alone!"

"Ah! that cannot be!" answered he. "Tonight, I must sink down in the mine, but early in the morning, I wander forth into the wide world, and have in it neither a home nor an asylum to offer thee, where thou couldst rest thy head."

"Have I not thy heart, father?" answered she; "and have we not both of us the earth, and the heavens for a roof over us! Oh! believe me, with thee in the wilderness I shall be happier than with others in peace, and abundance. Do not fear for me; I am strong and accustomed to live with nature, both in its good and its evil days, and love it. Father! let me accompany thee! Let me partake thy necessity and thy bread. For thee I will work, for thee could I beg, if our need became great, even as I beg of thee at this moment. Dost thou think that they will deny me! I will always be glad. I will sing for thee when thou art sorrowful; and when thou art cold, I will warm thee with my love, and at my heart. With thee I will wander round the whole world. And long shall it be before want shall overtake us. See! what in one year I have saved from the pocket-money which I received. See, Father! It is all thine!" And Siri pulled forth, with beaming eyes, her little board or money.

"Oh!" said he, with an expression of bitter joy, "it is truly a treasure to possess thee, child, and thy love, and these . . . have I forfeited. Thou dear, thou beloved child, have thanks. But what I have said must yet stand.

We must part. I will it. Remain in thy home; remain with thy mother. Give her the affection of a child. My feeling regarding her was right. She was deceived, but not criminal. Make her happy, and—forget not thy father. Pray for him! Poor child! Now passes a tempest through thy life. The young tree shall bend . . . but it shall lift itself again more vigorously, and heaven shall be clear above its head. Live, my child, to atone for thy father's offence, live for that more beautiful order of things, about which he dreamed without understanding its foundation; live to alleviate the distresses of earth!

"Listen!" and the enthusiastic man, who kindled more and more as he spoke, stood at once before the young maiden, almost with a prophetic dignity, illumined, like her, by the flames of "the eternal fire," and speaking as in fragmental lightning; "Listen to me! I will give thee a keepsake! Here, on the margin of the nether world, I will announce to thee a supernatural doctrine. Let it burn in thy heart like an eternal fire; let it light thee through the short life of earth; through all the mists of life and nature. Child! thy vocation is high and glorious! be thy lot upon earth ever so lowly, be thy dwelling ever so narrow. Neither sin nor crime bind thee; now is thy path free, let it be worthy of thy destiny! Listen! Above in the world, they will talk to thee of the powers and operations of nature; of wisdom in the arrangements displayed in the revolutions of life and death, in the laws of war and devastation, which hound the tribes of animals against each other, and make one race the murderers of the rest. They will show thee in disorder the order of the Creator, and in nature an eternal, ruminating, self-destroying, self-reproducing creature, the final destiny of which is—death and putrefaction. But I will impart to thee a deeper doctrine, a doctrine that is proclaimed by the sagas and songs of thy fatherland, regarding the life of nature, of the creature, and regarding the vocation of man. What say the ancient sagas! How in them speak the people of the hills and the streams, of the mountains and the woods! when the light of revelation breaks in upon the north, and pervades the deep, and looses the tongues of the life of nature! Listen! they sigh for redemption; for a more free and beautiful existence; and they call upon men to release them, to release the world into which captivity, into which the infection of misery came through them. They call, they warn them again to elevate them to the "glorious freedom of God's children;" to the glory unto which they were created. O child! be never deaf to these voices, nature's soft and spiritual voices, which sigh in all that is dying, that is miserable, in all that is falling asunder, and which admonish thee to a divine work. And therefore . . . Men will say to thee, "Be pure before the eye of day; be pure before the gaze of the world!" But I say to thee, "Be pure before the eye of night; be pure in the most concealed of thy sentiments, in thy imagination!" They have their living fibres deeply fixed in the life of nature. Thus thou sinkest or risest along with them. Live in nature, but as a bird of paradise, without soiling thy wings in the dust.

Thou wilt then elevate it to the original paradise!

"I dedicate thee to a life in which daily joys and daily sorrows will be counted of little value, but where the smallest of them will serve the Most High. I consecrate thee to a work of peace and beauty; thy days to a still Creation's day! Live for a new heaven and a new earth! . . .

"Happy art thou to be born in a country where deep spiritual voices still resound through life. My child! be a blessing to thy native land! There stand the sepulchral mounds which cover the bones of thy forefathers; there are the primeval mountains, the springs, which preserve the sagas from the most ancient times, when the spirit of man was equally deep as now in its clearest conception. In this nature wert thou born; there shalt thou live and labour. Go! . . . but in humility . . . work out for thyself a glory! Nature shall one day be glorified in its sacred splendour! . . .

"This is thy father's testament! his last commission, his last words to thee. A ray has God given me before the last night. He has given me thee. But now is my sun gone down. Now, my child! . . . my only joy . . . my daughter . . . farewell!"

And he clasped her passionately in his arms, and pressed kisses full of blessings on her brow, hair, eyes, and lips. Then he hastily left her, kindled his torch at the "eternal fire," and disappeared down the mine steps.

Stupified stood Siri there; the springs of life seemed, as it were, to stand still within her, still but listening to the voice of a mighty spirit. But when she saw her father disappear in the dark deep, then flew a light over her pale countenance, her eyes flashed with life and resolve, and she—followed him, as the fascinated follows the fascinator's eye, as even the strong magnet, as love follows the trace of the beloved, whom it fears to lose for ever. Thus silent as a spirit, light as a child, she followed in her father's track, from descent to descent, from place to place, pursuing the guiding torch, but at as great a distance as possible.

He advanced slowly, and as if sunk in thought: the torch burnt dimly in his hand. At the path called the Crown Prince's Path, where the steeper steps commence, he went down to the excavation of the Coppersnake, in which he turned aside. Now he went forward towards the copper-dragon's sinking. Every where Siri followed silently and resolutely. They were now seventy-five fathoms deep. At the brink of the copper-dragon's sinking, he suddenly stopped, as if recollecting himself. He seemed to have proceeded as in a dream, and not rightly to know where he was. He looked round and swung his torch to get more light; it flamed forth and lit up the dark labyrinth, but also shone upon the light-haired maiden, where she stood in the night-black jaws of the Copper-snake. The eyes of the father and daughter met. She extended her arms towards him, and sprang forward. Then fell the torch, wildly whirling in the air; sparks streamed up out of the abyss, but the abyss swallowed up the torch and the sparks; Siri heard the sound of a heavy falling body, and . . . all was silent and black . . .

And never did a blacker night envelope a human being, than that which here plunged down over the young girl. She had seen the gulf swallow her father, and the same fate menaced herself. But of herself she thought not; she thought on her father. She dropped on her knees, and feeling before her with her hands, she crept forward towards the spot where she saw him disappear. Soon the ground failed beneath her hands, and they were stretched over an abyss. But in the bottom of this she saw a faint light glimmer, and she stared fixedly upon it. At once it flamed more strongly up, and showed a rock which descended in a winding direction from the place where Siri stood, down to the bottom of the sinking just where the burning torch lay. This was the copper-dragon's tail, and rapidly did the young maiden hasten down along it, with an agonized and throbbing heart.

Arrived at the bottom of the copper-dragon, she took up the torch and trimmed it. Its light discovered, lying some paces from her, a body. The countenance was turned upwards, and Siri recognised again her father. His eyes appeared to be glazed; he lay stiff and motionless, as one dead. Siri laid a hand upon his heart. It still beat. She called him by name; he answered not, and gave no signs of life. It was with a feeling of the deepest agony of soul that she raised herself, and looked round for help. Ah! here she stood alone in the bare bowels of the mine, and through its stupendous labyrinth of passages and ways, she had no guiding clue. But she knew that the miners were at work in the mine this night, and that people were therefore in it at that time; and with the torch in her hand, she began to wander and explore, marking exactly the way she went, in order to be able to find it again, and from time to time raising a cry for help, which rebounded again from the walls of the mine, or lost itself in the empty passages and arched ways. Sometimes she stood and listened, and heard—only the eternal fall of the water-drops; then wandered she again forward, and the crystals glimmered cold and wildly against her, as she passed along, like demoniac eyes out of the rock. Cold drops fell upon her brow. At once she felt a warm breath upon her hand; she looked at it. It was the flame from the torch, which the draught of air drove downwards, the torch was nearly burnt out. Still stranger, still more dangerous became her wandering; the pulse throbbed wildly in her temples; still more hasty, but more unsteady became her steps. And now she was compelled to stop, for the path was broken abruptly off by a great, black gulf. She looked down, there appeared no bottom; there appeared no light. She looked up. The vaulted roof of the mine was gone, and over her head was only an immeasurable, black, and empty space. Siri stared fixedly forward, and madness came over her. It was a moment when the vacuum above and beneath her, drew into it her very soul; when horror iced the springs of life; when she felt and thought nothing. But unconsciously her bewildered eyes were fixed on an object which descended directly from on high into the gulf, and moved itself gently, and twinkled, and twinkled in the light of the torch. It was a cord, a line, and Siri's eyes mechanically followed this line downwards till it disappeared in the depth. But out of the depth arose now a distant song, and faintly but distinctly, she heard the words of the miner's song:—

"Up brothers! let your torches glow
Where duty calls us, let us go.
Our way is dark, but light to keep,
Though down into the deep."

Siri's consciousness returned. It became clear to her, that she now stood in a shaft for the raising of ore, and that the people below, whose song she heard, must also hear her cries. And she cried, but still the song continued; she called again and again, and the song ceased. They listened to her down in the mine. She repeated her cry; and now the line moved; in a moment she saw a light glimmer in the depth, and soar softly upwards still nearer and nearer to her.

"Siri! Siri! let me embrace my child!" cried Mrs. Ingeborg, in the hall of the mine-court, evidently combating with death. Her husband opened the door of the little room adjoining, but it was empty. The window which was not high from the ground was open. Siri was away.

"It is just!" said Mrs. Ingeborg, with an expression of deep dejection; "it is no more than just. I abandoned her cradle, and she abandons my death-bed . . . it is only right. O! my heart, my heart!"

"Be calm, be composed," implored her husband, affectionately. "Lean against me! I am near thee! and thy child, she is also mine. Trust me, I will find her again; I will one day restore her to thy arms."

"Oh, thou dear comforter, thou true one. Yes, I will rest on thee, and on God's mercy! in life thou wert my joy; in death thou art my support. Gustaf! a prayer! Let me rest in Mora earth, in the grave where thou wilt one day rest by my side. Thanks for all thy love! . . . it becomes so dark before my eyes . . . I see thee no longer . . . but I shall see thee again . . . Lay thy hand upon my head, and read over me the blessing; . . . that I may hear thy voice in . . . the last!"

He did so. His voice did not tremble then, but when he saw the eyes glaze, whose last look of affection was fixed on him, then his knees shook, and he sunk upon them, and laid his head against the heart of his wife, which now had ceased to beat.

There it still lay, and burnt hotly, when that heart had already grown cold beneath the hand of death, as the morning sun broke into the room, and shone on the married pair. He first raised it, when a small piece of paper was presented to him, on which the following lines were written with a trembling hand:—

"A dying person desires the sacrament. Foster-father, come with the peace of God, prays out of the depths of the earth, Thine, SIRA.

Then Nordevall raised himself; wiped the cold perspiration from his brow, and followed the guide who had brought the message, and who carried what was requisite for the holy office. When he came out into the open air, into the glad sunshine, he stood still, looked around him, and seemed to listen. His eyes were dim, and his look not such as before. He seemed to have become many years older. Silent, and with uncertain, but still firmer and firmer steps, he followed his conductor down into the mine. The guide related as they went:—

"He fell from the copper-snake down into the sinking of the copper-dragon; that is, about twelve fathoms deep; so that it is not to be wondered at, if he broke his skull; for the doctor says that it is the skull itself that is fractured, and that he cannot have many hours to live. Still he speaks, and is quite sensible. We attempted to carry him up, but he could not bear it, and so we were obliged to convey him into the king's hall, and leave him there. There he now lies, and there is with him a young, fine lady, who seems to be his daughter, and who laments and weeps so, that it is enough to cut one to the heart to see. It was her voice which first called the people to where he lay. But how she came down there, in the coal-black night, that knows the Lord alone. See, now we are in the Duke of Dalarna, and there, before us, we have the King's-hall."

A strong but melancholy light streamed upon Nordevall as he entered the king's hall, one of the largest rooms in the mine. The servants of the mine stood there, with blazing torches in their hands, surrounding, at some distance, a group, upon which all eyes were fixed. It was a man, who lay outstretched upon the earth, evidently seized on, but not disfigured by the hand of death, and a young woman who knelt by his side, and to whom his looks and words were directed. Amongst these words were heard the following—"I did not wish it ... could not wish it when I saw thee ... but an invisible hand ... the judgment of God ... plunged me down."

When Nordevall entered, the glances of the dying man were turned on him with a cold and bitter expression, and he said,—

"What has Gustaf Nordevall to do with Julius Wolff? what seeks the happy with the unhappy?"

"It is an unhappy one who here comes to his brother," replied Nordevall, quietly and gloomily. Innocently did I deprive thee of the joy of thy life ... innocently hast thou crushed me. I came from ... my wife's deathbed."

Julius Wolff almost raised himself up at this word.

"Is she dead?" he exclaimed; "then ... then I have killed her! this yet was wanting ... now is my measure full. Priest, depart from me!" continued he, wildly; "what wilt thou with me? leave me! I need thee not! I know my sin and my doom."

Nordevall drew nearer.

"Dost thou know, also, God's power? hast thou measured the depths of his mercy?" said he, with a voice and look which seemed not to belong to the earth.

Wolff had sunk back—his countenance changed. Speechlessly he raised his clasped hands, and fixed on Nordevall an inquiring, thirsting glance.

Nordevall bent down to him, fell on his knees at his side, in order to be able to speak softly to him, and hear his answer. His countenance, full of seriousness and compassion, shone in the meantime more and more. And when he raised himself, he stood like an apostle of love and consolation before the repentant man, and imparted to him what life has of deepest and best.

The mine people sang:

"Oh, Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world."

A breath of that peace which the world cannot give came like a bright light over the countenance of the dying man. The young maiden's tears flowed no longer. The sting and pain of death were swallowed up in a divine life, a heavenly anticipation.

The clergyman read the blessing over father and daughter.

Soon afterwards rested the daughter's warm lips on those of the father, which were become cold for ever.

"Blessed are they that sleep!" said Nordevall, as, supporting his weary head, he contemplated the peace in the features of the departed; then bending himself still lower, he embraced the half unconscious maiden, and raised himself with her.

A GLANCE FORWARD INTO TIME

"Up she beholdeth,
Once more arise
Earth out of ocean,
Gloriously green.
Cataracts fall,
And there soars the eagle."

Thus sang in the mist-veiled times of old, the northern seeress, the wise Vala, of the arising of the world from its last contest. And, God be praised! the resurrection of which she sings, this renovation; this growing green afresh, this giving of new wings to life, that we also see—we who still dwell in "the shadows of the earth"—in many a glorious revelation in the life of nature, of the heart, of thought, and of society. It is to us a hint and an augury.

We sketch here, with hasty outlines, merely a little picture of this in the history of the man and the child whom we lately left overwhelmed by the shadows of sorrow and of death. As they attached themselves to each other at this moment, so continued they to do so more and more affectionately in the future. She became an angel through him. His heart, his life, his home, grew again green through her. A more beautiful relation than that between this father and this daughter cannot be conceived. At a later day, when he rested in the earth of Mora, by the side of the beloved departed wife, whom he never ceased in silence to yearn after, Siri kissed the mould upon their grave, and left Mora to follow a happy husband and wife, Olof and Valborg, to their home at the iron-works at Westanfors. As a beloved and affectionate sister she lives here with them. She tends the sick in the iron-works and on the estate; she takes charge of orphan children, and by these means has a wide extended and beneficial activity. This intercourse with nature, with her relatives and their children, quiet thoughts and feelings, which, on invisible wings, conduct her through life, make her happy in the noblest sense. Always lively, always glad, it is as if a secret fire in her heart prevented her growing cold or weary, and kept back old age from her brow. So does she advance on her way. Light is her wandering on earth. The living, affectionate glance is never diverted from its goal beyond it. And as she thus wanders as one of those "who pass through the vale of sorrow and make them wells," her fate is often heard resounding through the woods with the self-same beautiful tones—tones of the hymn of deliverance of the spirits of nature, which she heard in her earliest youth—or her clear, sweet voice sings a "God's peace" over Dalarna, in the cordial words of the ancient Dal song, in which a grateful heart here unites:

God strengthen and gladden the people who dwell
By river, on hill, and in Dalom!

BROTHERS AND SISTERS.

THE YOUNG AND THE OLD.

It was evening twilight.

"Dearest, loveliest, sweetest sister Hedvig. There you sit, like a living picture of an eclipse of the moon, or of a rainy day in November. Now, I shall be obliged to dance again before you like Cupid, and drive away the clouds, that we may have it fine again."

And Augustin Dalberg, a handsome, well-grown young man, began to leap around his sister, exhibiting the oddest gambols and attitudes.

"If we have Cupid now, then we must also have Venus," said Bror, gravely. Bror was a little compactly-made fellow, of a dark complexion, who thrust himself forward with much complacency—if we said with graceful action, that would be saying too much.

"Oh, Venus Aphrodite! Welcome, just risen from the bosom of the waves. But why is Mrs. Venus so black?"

"Be respectful, my son! Why have you such long legs? They would be more becoming to Mercury than to Cupid."

"I am Mercury; I have wings upon my feet, I fly, and—where is the poker?—be respectful to my Caduceus, lady Venus!"

"Room for Jupiter!" exclaimed a tall, vigorous youth, swinging himself in among the others like a tempest.

"And room for Juno, also!" sang a young girl, in a loud voice, plunging forward after Jupiter as ungracefully as possible.

"And for Vesta!" warbled forth another young maiden, dancing into the circle as sylph-like and as gracefully as possible.

"Bravo! Then here we all are!" Augustin again exclaimed. "Let all the planets form a circle. This is the storm-wind dance of the planets around our sister the Earth, to drive away all the mists and clouds. And now look, it clears up! it clears up!—à la ronde dansons! dansons tous à la ronde! And it actually did clear up. Sister Hedvig began to smile, and at last laughed aloud at the brothers' and sisters' drollery as they leaped and gambled around her.

"Do be quiet, dear children!" cried she; "don't upset my chair—take care of my spinning-wheel, you naughty young things. It is a dreadful disturbance you are making; you are making such a draught—you blow through me—I shall get a cold; do you hear?"

"A la ronde dansons, dansons tous à la ronde! Bombardino, bombardino! This is the storm-wind dance of the planets around the lady Earth, to drive away the mists and clouds from her fair countenance, and when one once gets into full career it is not so easy to stop, let me tell you—Jupiter drum-eldarius! don't tread so continually on my corn! for, though I am Venus, yet—dear me, what now? Is mother Earth beginning to explode?"

Balls of cotton, cushions, sheins of flax, footstools, and I know not what, began to fly about, bombarding the planets right and left. There was no mistake; it was actually the excellent sister Hedvig herself, who was thus replying to the politeness of the brothers and sisters. And they were by no means unaccustomed to this kind of thing. This was the signal for a general tumult, in which sofa-cushions, chair-cushions, and every thing which could be thrown without danger of breaking itself, or breaking any body's head, flew about the room, and upon those who in darkness and blindness ran one against another, amidst loud shouts and laughter which sounded almost spasmodic.

"What the deuce of a riot is here! Is it the affair of Bender? I believe here is a bombardment going on! I have got a confounded piece of something right in my face!" said a strong, deep voice at the door.

"Uncle is a planet! uncle is a planet!" cried the young folks; "uncle is the planet Herkules, and must dance with us the storm-wind dance of the planets around the lady Earth."

"What nonsense! Am I to dance?—I? Do I look like a dancer? Planet me here, and planet me there—I shall sit down upon my own planet like a well-behaved human being. But you are all in a confusion together, that I can see, and it is not worth while to think about having, this evening, a rational round game; so farewell to you, you madcaps!"

Uncle Wolmar Otto Herkules was not in a very good humor, as might be heard in his voice, and it fell like a dash of cold water upon the excited and tempestuous spirits in the room. Not that they were frightened or cast down. General Herkules's ill-temper was too good-humored for that, but a certain respect for him, and a desire to fall in with his wishes, caused them quickly to become quiet, order in candles, and begin to put the room to rights. The dust rose to the ceiling, and all the combatants breathed and fanned themselves, and seemed to be all of them affected by the planetary affairs.

Individuals, and families, have each their own characteristic type, and at the same time their own little whim, spiritus familiaris, or more properly perhaps "Nisse," a little spirit whose nature we should find it difficult more closely to define. The characteristic feature of the Dalberg family was a deep earnestness; its "Nisse" was a certain ungovernable temper—something of the Berserker kind, I suspect, which would every now and then break out, and for the most part play comic pranks, and which, uninfluenced by excitement from without, bubbled up like a fresh cool fountain in the midst of the quietest every-day life. We suspect, in short, that this "Nisse" is a spiritus familiaris in Swedish domestic life, and we know that this cool spring of childish, almost foolish-merriment, may continue to flow even amid the most trying circumstances of life. Nor was every thing so bright and merry in the family, the members of which we just now saw floating around as planets; there was also good and sufficient reason for the troubled expression of sister Hedvig's countenance. But of these things we shall speak hereafter.

Now we have light in a large, simply, but well furnished parlor, and the candles, two in number, stand in tall old silver candlesticks, upon an oblong table before the sofa. In the middle of the sofa sat the old count, General Herkules, in a gray linen coat, with the medal of bravery upon his broad breast, looking around him with large gray eyes, the color of steel, which flashed lightning glances from beneath his bushy eyebrows, upon the round-game-loving persons, while with his immensely large hands he shuffled a pack of cards, taking every now and then a draught from the glass of toddy which stood before him.

Only Hedvig and Augustin approached the table, the other planets wandered to a distance. Ivar, lately Jupiter, sits in the corner by the stove, looks like a bull, and seems dangerous to meddle with. Juno and Vesta, otherwise Göthilda and Engel, have crept into another corner, apparently rather afraid of that great table before the sofa. "Venus," little Bror Dalberg, paces up and down and across the room, gazes upon the company, and declaims—

"All the noble gods together,
When the lottery-game was done,

Sate at eve, in chilly weather,
By a fire of cinnamon.

"It does not look very promising here," remarked uncle Herkules, with a half-suppressed sigh, consoling himself with a draught from his glass. Bror continued—

Jove sate playing with his thunder,
By the jovial viands cheered,
And in drinking spilled, no wonder,
Fragrant nectar on his beard.

"What is that? What sort of a thing is that?" said the general, listening. "Ah! yes, Mrs. Leנגren! I remember now—Yes, that is devilish good and merry! Yes, that was a woman for writing—that she was!"

"But even nowadays," suggested Bror, "we have women who can write—Baroness Knorring, Mrs. Carlin—and has uncle read any of —"

"You mean of those romances that you have at home—what do you call her?—Miss Bremer, I think. No, thank you, such confounded rubbish as that I don't read. When I wish to amuse myself with reading, I go to Mrs. Leנגren and Ossian, and they are all that I require of such sort of literature."

"Ah!" that is right, my sweet girls," said the general to Göthilda and Engel, who at length, in obedience to Hedvig's beseeching nods and glances, seated themselves at the table, "and see now, we have the lads at last! We can have a regular and rational game. But what's up now? What is the matter again?" and uncle Herkules looked with a certain degree of terror at Augustin, who, after reading a letter which a servant brought to him, rose from his seat, saying—

"I beg, uncle, that you will be so good as to excuse me for a moment. There is a foreigner, an Icelandic, or Danish Miss Knutson, an artist of great reputation, now in Stockholm, who has brought a letter of introduction to me from my friend E—in Copenhagen. She lives not far from here, and, if you and Hedvig will allow it, I will fetch her here this evening, if she be not otherwise engaged."

"Yes, surely, go and fetch her," replied the general; "she is welcome to join our game and to partake our supper—is she not, Hedvig? But my dear fellow, you will soon be back again, and don't stop amusing yourself with compliments and bows up there—that wastes such a deal of time. Every body must be look after; every body must be help," continued the general grumbling to himself as Augustin went out; "the d— knows how he can stand it. He'll really wear himself out with sheer good-nature. That comes out of the cursed philanthropic nonsense. An Iceland! For what is she come here? And to send so late in the evening—in rainy weather too!—If people knew how to keep quiet, then—"

And in this way the general grumbled for a long time, and to no purpose—or bad purpose, just as you please.

But when, after an interval, perhaps of half an hour, Augustin re-entered the room with a lady of a Juno-like figure, an independent though somewhat noble bearing, whose black dress set off her fair complexion and light hair, the old count rose up, and, advancing toward her, saluted her with that chivalrous politeness which was peculiar to him in his behavior toward women.

Hedvig welcomed the stranger with her characteristic calm cordiality, and when she observed that her hand trembled as she held it, she pressed it the more kindly, and offered her a seat beside herself. Spite of her calm, independent bearing, Lagertha Knutson trembled and turned pale with the eyes of so many riveted upon her: the general's, flashing lightning, Ivar's, gazing somewhat boldly, and Göthilda's, black as Egyptian darkness. But when the general said pleasantly, "And you have ventured alone, and so late in the year, to take so long a journey—and quite alone?—look you, that I call brave and unusual in a young lady!"

Lagertha replied, in a gentle but determined voice, "People may do any thing that they will."

"Bravo! I like to hear that!" exclaimed the old soldier, and fire flashed from both his eyes; "I like that, upon my honor! and it is what one but seldom hears, the deuce it is!"

"Deal the cards, uncle. We must set the game a going," interrupted Hedvig, as she remarked the bashfulness of the stranger; "Miss Knutson must be introduced into the mysteries of our game. She waits for a card."

"And a card shall she have," said the general, "and a devilish good one into the bargain, if I might have my way; but in cards one can not do every thing that one would, that's the mischief. Mrs. Absent, you, Göthilda there!—listen, child, don't be having your eyes in your ears, and don't prick them up as if you were a spy! What the d—!"

But Göthilda did not hear Uncle Herkules' reproaches; she was listening to something else, and, hastily exclaiming, "the cadet's step!" sprang up and rushed to the door like an arrow, that she might be embraced by and embrace two cadets, the one short, the other tall, whom she saluted with the words—"Boys! brothers! you dear, naughty lads!"

"Well, boys! welcome! welcome!" resounded from all sides, as the youths entered.

"God bless you, lads!" said the general. "The deuce, girls—don't run away from me! Let the boys come here and sit down, and play a rational game with us. That would be better than flying about like mad hens. Do you hear, children?"

But the cadets, No. 31 and No. 32, had not time to stay; they were only come to invite the sisters to the ball which would be given at Carlberg on Sunday, and must immediately march—march back again.

"But not till you have first had a little refreshment, dear children," said sister Hedvig, setting at the same time before them a plate heaped up with cakes and fritters, which were attacked and demolished by the cadets while they stood. Hedvig stroked, with her soft, motherly hand, the light hair of the lively youths, and then turning to uncle Herkules, she went on with her game. Göthilda stayed with her brothers, and a lively conversation, together with peals of laughter, were heard from the corner where they stood, in the midst of which might be distinguished the mystic word "Hagar—the desert—angels—permissions—beautiful angel!" and then again fresh peals of laughter.

The cadets went, but, to General Herkules' delight, the company was increased by a gentleman of Augustin's acquaintance, who had of late been much seen in the Dalberg family, and whom we shall call Uno. He was a man somewhere about thirty years of age, of a mild, grave countenance, and altogether of an exterior which involuntarily excites confidence at the same time that it repels familiarity. He was usually silent and reserved, but in his deep, serious eyes, might be seen an expression of warm feeling, and this, to a certain extent, was experienced by those who came near him—for Swedenborg is right in saying, every man carries with him a "peculiar atmosphere which testifies to his spiritual life," and as this fire burst forth into words, it became inflammatory. Uno had traveled much, seen much, thought much, as might sometimes be observed, and he could make himself extremely interesting "if he would"—so said all his most intimate acquaintance. He was a man universally esteemed, had a beautiful estate a few miles out of Stockholm, where he had a large conservatory, for he was very fond of flowers and—every beautiful thing. On this particular occasion he had brought some flowers with him: among them were some remarkably fine camelias, which he handed over to Hedvig. He gave also a little sprig of geranium flowers to Engel, who thereupon blushed—so beautifully. He seated himself beside her; he seemed to cast a kind glance on Engel, and Göthilda's black eyes looked hereupon—rather "à la Egyptian darkness," as Bror said afterward.

The game now went on in full animation, which put new life into uncle Herkules.

Under the protection of Augustin and Hedvig, and listening between times to their kind voices, Lagertha Knutson took part in the game, and won great credit with the general for the attention and zeal with which she played, because he never could bear any one to go wrong in play, and could scold most vehemently those who were indifferent about a game at "Fool," although they never played for money. He, however, was one who insisted upon a certain discipline in every thing.

The game had lasted about an hour, and Hedvig had been absent a little while, when the tall figure of a man, stiff and precise as the law, with a military bearing, a silver medal "for bravery in the field" upon his breast, and a napkin upon his arm, presented himself at the door—we beg to introduce the reader to Corporal Stolt—and, making a military salutation, he announced to the general that "supper was served."

General Herkules had just won the game, and with especial good-humor broke up "the camp," as he called it, and, at the head of "his company," conducted Lagertha Knutson, with merry jests, to the supper-room. There, at the head of a large oval table, stood sister Hedvig, who now, turning her attention from the table, kindly welcomed the guests as they entered. The table was covered with many small dishes of various cold meats, such as we are accustomed to see in the little tea-suppers of Stockholm, and in the middle of the table stood a large, heaped-up dish of gigantic potatoes, steaming forth from their broken skins.

"Be so good and be seated here, upon my right hand, Miss Knutson," said General Herkules, "and then I shall sit between you and sister Hedvig. I always like to place myself near Hedvig, because she is such a good hostess. Potatoes in their jackets—bless my heart! that is excellent. Yes, yes, one can see that Hedvig is descended from the good Ornsköld, governor of Norrland; who first introduced potatoes there, and established linen-manufacturing; so that all the spinning-wheels in a thousand valleys began to buzz and turn. He was a friend of my late father's, and was as resolute in his edicts of peace as my father was in the affairs of war. But do you know how he went on about the potatoes? First of all he talked to the clergy and the crown bailiffs, and tried to persuade them to plant potatoes in their little fields. And the same with the peasantry. But they would not do it. What then did Ornsköld do? Why, he seated himself in his carriage, and took a sack of potatoes with him, and in that way he drove about from town to town, from cottage to cottage. The deuce take me if he didn't drive about in that way! He himself taught them to grow and manage potatoes, and he gave them seed potatoes, and made them do as he would. And, in the end, it succeeded. And that's the way to make things succeed. And, as the peasants came to see how it answered, and what a relish a potato gives to their bit of meat, all went on of itself, from parish to parish, even up into Lapland. Now, they thank him for it every day. And with the cultivation of flax he did just the same. And that was a good thing; for we have nothing in the north better than flax and potatoes: no, nor in the whole world. There they come from the south, and talk and boast about champignons and silk, and make a flash, with their pomp and show. No, I thank you, none for me. I know the value of my gray linen coat and my potatoes. It is cursed trash that they have abroad—with the exception of wine! Wine is the best thing there. May I fill your glass, Miss Knutson? That tea slop is, by Jove, not to my taste. 'Wine maketh glad the heart of man,' says the Bible itself."

"How beautiful that time will be when every body can have both wine and potatoes, both linen clothes and silken stuffs, and when all can choose what they will from the abundance of the earth!" exclaimed Ivar.

"And when will that be?" replied the general, half grumblingly; "that will hardly be before the millennium comes."

"It will be," exclaimed Ivar, with emotion, "when the golden doctrines of communism and socialism become law upon earth; when the golden age of association comes; when we shall have associated dwelling-houses, associated larders, associated kitchens, associated churches, and one general religion; when rich and poor, high and low, become only empty names; when we all labor, and all have equal enjoyments as brethren; when the pompous establishments of fatherland, king, state, monarchy, are all cast-off institutions; when the whole surface of the globe becomes our fatherland, for one great family without class and distinction, laws, boards, imposts, and all such rubbish."

"What cursed stuff is that that you are talking?" said the general, in a tone of approaching thunder, "fatherland an old-fashioned institution!"

"Yes, fatherland in its limited, its old-fashioned signification," replied Ivar. "But the whole will then become our fatherland, and we human beings shall all become merely one single large nation, separated into different groups, but, at the same time, all united in one central administration, one national government, for example, in Constantinople."

"One national government at Constantinople!" exclaimed General Herkules, with a four-and-twenty-pounder glance at Ivar while he became crimson in his face.

"Yes, and why not?" returned he, his intention of having a contest with uncle Herkules being no longer doubtful. "That is as good a place as any other. We Swedes will send our representatives there as well as other human families or nations. You, uncle, yourself, might take a journey there and smoke a pipe with the sultan, who would not, however, any longer remain sultan there, but would be like other clever fellows who worked for their bread. Traveling would become much easier, because it is incredible what facilities there would be on all roads and for every mode of traveling—such railroads and steam-carriages as one can't imagine. Yes, every thing will become easy in the age of human equality, and the most inconceivable, the most extraordinary things will be accomplished, through confraternity upon earth, in works, in enjoyments—in all the circles of life. And then every body will be good, every body will be happy, every body perfect, and every body equal! No masters, no servants, will exist any where. Stolt will no longer stand behind your chair, uncle, but will sit by your side. War—the greatest folly on earth—will no longer be heard of, but we shall then have eternal peace!"

"It is all a confounded lie which you say, and Stolt will continue to stand where he does!" exclaimed General Herkules, in a thundering voice, and now really angry. "If I had a son who talked such cursed nonsense as you do, I would have him put into an asylum, or I would, the d— fetch me—. Where did you get such mad-house prate from? I have sometimes before heard you chatter nonsense, but never anything so insane as this. Do you take me for a Job, that I could bear to hear such stuff? A beardless lad like you call war folly! If you were a son of mine, you may take my word you should follow the drum, and I would, the fiend fetch me, drum you out of this cursed cosmopolitanism and Constantinopolitanism, and whatever the rubbish is called. But you young gentlemen think yourselves very much enlightened and very learned and clever, and you would rule the world. But wisdom have you not, and common sense have you not, and the highest you can arrive at is to pull every thing to pieces!"

Ivar meditated a warm reply, spite of Hedvig's beseeching glances, when Augustin laid his hand upon his arm, and, turning to the general said, in his mild explanatory manner—

"Ivar has expressed himself in rather an eccentric way, in thus bringing forward certain French theories respecting the future. They have, it is true, their extravagances and their folly, but still one can not deny but that glorious thoughts form their foundation, and you, uncle, will certainly approve of—"

"The deuce take me if I do," interrupted the general still angry.

"Perhaps, nevertheless," replied Augustin, with a smile which was peculiar to him, and which gave an angelic expression to his countenance, "at least, I am sure that you wish your fellow-beings every happiness, and would willingly assist in giving to all and every one his share of the good things and the enjoyment of life."

"And I am certain," said Hedvig, "that my uncle would wish that all men should drink a glass of good wine, such as we have here."

At the sound of this gentle voice and these gentle words, the general's looks and tones became milder as he replied:—

"Yes, but that is a very different affair; that is rational and Christian, and I agree with that—that is to say, as far as—. But what the deuce! It is not I that have made inequalities among men; it is not I who made rich and poor. It is God who has done it. It is a principle in nature, and what God does we can not undo."

"But," replied Augustin, "may it not be his will that the unequal division which we see in all the arrangement of nature, in society—yes, may it not be his ordained will that this shall be by degrees done away with, or, at least, alleviated, in the enlightenment of a higher law of reason and love?"

"Does not the sun enlighten all creatures with his beams?" said Uno, with a deep enthusiasm of voice and expression which always gave to his words an irresistible force—"the springtime; water; the fragrance of flowers; every thing that is beautiful in nature diffuses its affluence to all without reserve. And men—the lords of nature—are alone selfish, niggardly, and covetous!"

"Oh, nonsense!" said the general, impatiently, "you have so much grander phrases now-a-days, and poetical fancies, but sound reason and—but I will not contend with you, Augustin. There may be something in what you say; there may be an adjusting of things; but the road to that is neither through the Turks nor Constantinople, nor Constantinopolitanism, nor cosmopolitanism, or whatever the thing may be called; nor will it come either through sunshine, or moonshine, or cold water or warm water, but it will come through every one in his place, and just where our Lord sets him, doing that which he ought to do in conformity with reason and Christianity. And that you will concede readily, Augustin, because you are reasonable, and one can talk with you." (The general drank from his glass and calmed himself more and more.) "But," continued he, "as far as it relates to Stolt sitting down beside me, that will never be; first and foremost, because I should never allow it; and secondly, because neither would he. Is it not so, Stolt, you rascal, eh?"

"Yes, general," replied Stolt, stiffly and resolutely.

"Yes, I knew it," replied the general

"Stolt is a rational fellow, a good lad, and would turn his back as little to the foe as I would. But there is no occasion to place him beside me. Yes, if our Lord had so willed it that he could have done to me and my friend what my father's servant did for him in the war, as —. But I must tell it to you, children. The story is worth hearing. It was during King Charles's war, in Poland, when my father one day was attacked by a number of enemies, overpowered and badly wounded. His head was nearly crushed by the blow from a club; he had a sword-cut in his breast, was wounded by a pike in his stomach, and besides these, fifteen lesser wounds. You see a fellow could stand something in those times, before he was done for. My father was left for dead on the place of combat; and dead he must have been had it not been for his servant Daniel, who had made careful search for him, and amid great danger, carried him in his arms to a place of safety. There he bound up his wounds, and nursed him for many months as carefully as any mother could have done; for six weeks he fed him with wine and milk, which he had to pour into his closed mouth through a straw. Well, my father recovered from all this; mounted his horse again, and followed King Charles into the Ukraïn; and Daniel followed his master with cheerfulness and fidelity, through cold and fatigue, through want and suffering. He was with him at the battle of Pultowa, where my father was again desperately wounded in the hip, and after that, taken prisoner. He followed him, although he might have avoided it, to captivity in Siberia, remained with him in Solimaski, and went about to sell baskets, which my father wove to maintain himself; served him at home in the character of both man and maid-servant, and comforted him with his God-fearing spirit and his good humor, as if he had been his friend. Hang me if he did not do all this; and a better servant and a better friend, said my father, could no Christian have! Well, when, after many years, my father came again out of captivity, and came—it was one evening in the month of May—came to his own seat, to his own Carlstorp again, do you know what he did there? what he did before he went in, to father, or mother or sweetheart? Yes, —." The general's voice, which had been for long mild and cheerful, became at this point almost tremulous, and his eyes sparkled with moisture. "Yes, he went to the yard-dog, and—set him at liberty."

The general here coughed violently, and applied himself to his glass to conceal his emotion and thus continued:—

"And when he afterward sate in his house, happy in the midst of his family, he made his servant Daniel sit at his side, at his table, and had him for his friend and his associate in the face of all men, and would not allow him to serve him any longer, although at first this was difficult to the faithful fellow. Ah, well, don't remember, in after years, how in the evening the two old men used to sit before the fireplace in the hall, with their pipes lighted and the ale-can upon the table between them. Bless me! such stories as they told about the great war of King Charles, while I sate on my mother's knee, or rode upon Daniel's foot, and the fire blazed and the pine-wood logs crackled! My heart beats now as I think upon it! And every morning Daniel took me with him when he went up to my father, with a silver dish, upon which lay a brace of pistols, and both my father and Daniel went out with them upon the balcony and fired them to the honor of the great king. How full of joy was I then! And then it was that I learned to shoot; because Daniel placed the pistols in my hand, and before long I too fired a shot for King Charles every morning; and that was amusing, you may believe me! I was then not quite ten years old. I learned, young as I was, to grow fond of that music, and I have been so ever since. And if Stolt had done for me or my friend what Daniel—but we are good friends all the same, Stolt! Here's to your health, you—" And the general reached him a glass filled to the brim, and raised his own glass toward him.

"To your health, general!" replied Stolt, with gravity, and emptied his glass at a draught.

Warmed by the old memories, the general had become quite gay and good tempered, and, turning to Lagertha Knutson, who had listened to him with evident delight, said to her with cordiality—

"Forgive an old man, and an old soldier, for forgetting that he has by his side a lady who is not used to his ill-humor and his stories, as the rest of them are. They are accustomed to bear —. No, it was greatly to your honor that you came and paid your respects to us in Sweden, thanks to you for it, and for the words, 'One can do whatever one will.' A thousand patrons! That was a word à la Charles the Twelfth. He would have liked it. Children, we must drink to the health of our fair guest and her native land—the brother land of a thousand bullets! We are Scandinavians, and we will drink to all Scandinavians and Scandinavianism. I am heart and soul with it; it is a thought which God the Father first conceived, and afterwards we. Stolt, reach hither the tall Rhenish bottle which stands there; pour into the glasses, my young Sweden now, present and let us drink. Send up your glasses, boys. Ivar, Ivar, join in with us. Reach me your glass. And you, you two cocks of temperance, Uno and Augustin, you must pledge me for this once. And you too, my girls, although you drink wine as birds do water, by just dipping in their bills. There is not one of you, except Gôthilda, who can drink a glass. Bror, hither with your glass! Miss Knutson—but, the deuce, I will not say Miss any longer, I will say thou. We are really relations, brother and sister, upon my soul we are! I will say thou, and we will ring our glasses for this good fellowship!"

"I will say uncle, if you please," said Lagertha, blushing and smiling.

"That you may!" replied the general,— "thanks, my sweet girl! Now I shall reckon you among my own good girls, magnificent girls, you must know. That one with the burning match in her dark eyes, she is famous. She is my girl. There is spirit in her. The boys will all do. Thou must stop with us altogether! And now, children, we must every one of us propose a toast."

"To your health, dear Wolmar Otto!" exclaimed Gôthilda, a little affected by uncle Herkules' enthusiasm, "and God grant that you may always have me!" After this bold say, however, she blushed deeply, and seemed as if she wished to hide herself under the table. But the general laughed and nodded at her, and merely said, "That I wish, as well as you, my little darling."

"A bumper to the rights of man!" said Ivar, solemnly raising his glass.

"Man has no rights, he has only duties," said Augustin, with his angelic smile, "a bumper for our duties!"

"I propose one for friendship and potatoes," said his brother, always ready to divert the conversation from dangerous subjects.

"And I," added Hedvig, "that all may have plenty of good things, as well as we."

"Live—all mankind!" exclaimed Uno, and raised his glass.

"And all little birds!" added Engel, with a cheerful and arch expression which was peculiar to her.

"Live all the world!" exclaimed uncle Herkules, with enthusiasm; "and now, boys, we must have a song—one of Bellman's, Augustin. Ivar, one of Bellman's. That is a d— to take in his embrace the whole world, men and birds, and every thing that God has created, and the old gentlemen into the bargain. There is champagne in him, you may rely on it. To be sure, he gets rather flat sometimes, but we will stick to his champagne. Now, lads, a Bellman which will take into his embrace the whole world!"

Augustin suggested something to Ivar, but Ivar was "moriden," and would not "take the whole world into his embrace," but told Augustin to do it himself. Augustin laughed, bethought himself for a moment, and then struck up Bellman's glorious dithrambic.

Phæbus again brings
The day's golden pencillings,
O'er city and glen flings
The light of his eyes;
His bright coursers dashing
Through waters are dashing,
And, stamping and splashing,
Neigh loud to the skies.
Loud roareth the thunder,
The clouds rolling under Chaste Dian is straying
Through oak-groves a-maying.
And Jupiter sitting
With kings all befitting
Where lightning is fitting
And billows uprise!
Each steed proudly prances
With mane flying free
While with trident here dances
The god of the sea!
War-kings drop their lances,
Pan pipeth with glee
And lovingly, see!
Fiend with angel advances
With wreathed greenery.
Billows are shining and flowing,
Tritons are singing and blowing!

You should have seen General Herkules during this! He laughed, he joined in, he started up and sate down again, and could not control his delight; and when they came to the words—

Blood-smeared, and in gold-lace attired,
Stands Mars with magnificent grace;
In the mountains the cannons are fired
By Neptune's belligerent race,
And apsecters and Cupids inspired,
Most fondly each other embrace.

Up started the general, and, stamping with his feet, loudly exclaimed, "I could find in my heart to spring up to heaven, or down into the other place, to embrace him; that deuced good fellow, Bellman. But now, stop, children. No more this evening; else we shall have too much. Just one glass more. Hurrah for the father-land, the king, and ourselves!"

General Herkules drank his glass; and then, as if in a fit of absence, emptied those of his two neighbors, casting at them a roguish glance, and then, full of delight, stroked his mustaches with his huge hand. After this he politely offered his arm to Miss Knutson, to conduct her from the table. At the moment, however, when they reached the room door, they were met by a maid-servant, of a pleasant, respectable appearance, and large person, who, shrugging her shoulders and dropping her chin upon her breast, while she suppressed her laughter seemed to have something to say to the general, which she found it difficult to bring out. Seeing her, he made a stand; and looking kindly at her, said, "What is it, Maja? What do you want, child?"

Blushing and laughing, she replied, "There is a peasant outside—he—he—he, he! who says that something is broken in his cart, and that somebody told him that there lives a smith here; he—he—he—he! named Herkules! he—he—he! and now he insists upon it, that the smith shall come out and look at his cart, which stands down below in the market-place. He—he—he! What the fool!"

"To be sure—it shall be done," said the general with animation. "Tell the peasant, Maja, that Herkules, the smith, will be with him in a minute."

As soon as the general had conducted Lagertha and Hedvig into the parlor, he made them a bow, and hastened, with a sort of boyish delight, down to his workshop for his tools, and, throwing on a cloak, he went out with the peasant into the street.

"In reply to Lagertha's astonished and inquiring glance, Augustin said—

"My uncle Herkules is a great lover of blacksmith's work, which he learned in his youth, and now it is his favorite occupation. He is so clever in certain finer parts of handicraft works, that many smiths come to him to take lessons from him. And, because he is so fond of handicrafts-men, and, especially takes under his protection smiths and carpenters, he lends them money at a low rate of interest, helps young people beginning life, and assists them both by word and deed. Artisans who are in need of aid come and council with him like a father; but certainly he is sometimes a little à la Charles the Ninth toward them, and lays on desperately with 'Thor's hammer,' as Gôthilda calls it, when they do not behave as they ought to do. But we must some day pay him a visit in his workshop, and see him at his work, and hear him singing his old ballads the while. That is something out of the common way."

"It is something powerful," said Lagertha. More she did not say; but her eyes glistened. Twenty minutes had scarcely elapsed when the general returned from his expedition as smith. He had set to rights the peasant's cart, washed his hands, and now stood quite ready, with Augustin, to conduct Miss Knutson home, she having gained his good graces, partly on account of the attentive deference which she showed toward him.

"What a silent young lady that is!" exclaimed Gôthilda, when they had gone. "I believe she has not said above three words all the evening which one did not drag out of her by a question."

"In the stillest water swim the largest fishes," said Bror.

"But I don't like people who are mute as fishes," said Gôthilda.

"One must not dispute about likings and tastes. Nobody can conceal a cough or love," said Bror. That was his proverb.

"And what do you say, Ivar?" asked Gôthilda. "How do you like our Miss Iceland?"

"How can one like any thing from Iceland?" replied Ivar, snappishly.

"You certainly very much prefer Calypso's island, in the adventures of Telemachus," continued Gôthilda, gently. "But I think it was very prudent, though ill-natured, of that old fellow, Mentor, all unexpectedly to push Telemachus head foremost from the rock into the sea, that he might get him away from that dangerous place, and that naughty Calypso—don't you think so?"

"I think that you are an inquisitive young lady," said Ivar, annoyed.

"Good heavens! how ungracious you look! just as Calypso herself must have looked when—"

The color mounted to Ivar's face; and, with an expression which Calypso would not have acknowledged as one of her own, he rose up and went and seated himself at the piano.

"And what do you say, sister Hedvig, to our silent young lady?" asked Bror.

"Oh!" said Hedvig, smiling, "I have so little right to say any thing about those who are silent in company. I know how unpleasant it feels to me to be obliged, sometimes, to talk when I have nothing to say. I always feel, on such occasions, a wish to go into a convent. If Miss Knutson and I could become acquainted on such terms that we might be silent when we were together without its giving us any uneasiness, then I fancy that I should get on excellently with her. There is something intelligent and calm, in her appearance."

"If I might only be excused from such excellence," said Gôthilda; "because it would be dreadfully wearisome. And, sweet Hedvig, do not go into a convent at present; help me first to get ready a dress for the ball at Carlberg."

"And me too," said Engel; "help me to choose some flowers which I wish to put in my hair. I saw some to-day, but they were too dear. The boys desired us to be beautifully dressed, that we might do them credit. Will you, sweet Hedvig?"

"Yes, certainly; yes, certainly, little children," said Hedvig; "that we shall easily manage."

"And Hedvig," sighed Bror, "help me, too, to choose a waistcoat for that great occasion, because I mean to outdo all the cadets; and a new waistcoat I must certainly have."

"A new waistcoat!" exclaimed Gôthilda. "Well, then, of a certainty that will be the twenty-third."

"Only the nineteenth, my gracious lady."

"Only the nineteenth! We will reckon up, my good sir. First, you have the white with the black spot; and then the black with the white spot; and then you have the blue with—"

While Gôthilda and Bror were thus counting up the number of his waistcoats, Hedvig went up to Ivar, who was playing on the piano melancholy, heart-touching melodies, in which seemed to be unshed tears. She laid her arm softly upon his shoulder, and bent toward him with an affectionate but silently inquiring look. Ivar looked up toward her, and large tears stood actually in his eyes. Moved by this tender and irresistible glance, he placed his arm round her waist, and leaned his head against her, sighing deeply.

"Sweet lady! Margrete told me to get the coffee for to-morrow," whispered the before mentioned Maja, who had the expression and manner of a faithful servant, one of that kind which is not unfrequently met with in Swedish domestic life, and who contribute so much to its comfort. "And," continued she, in a voice which proved how reluctant she was to disturb her, "and, dear Miss, the old count's biscuit-baking! We should have sugar for that!"

"Ah yes, that is true! It is very well that you reminded me, said Hedvig, hastily, "I had so nearly forgotten it!" and with these words, gently releasing herself from her brother, she followed Maja out.

"The confounded house-keeping cares," said Ivar, wrathfully, "that everlasting prose! How are people to live in peace for it? It is a miserable life!" and for this cause he punished the piano, which felt in every string his tumultuous playing.

Göthilda and Bror, in the mean time, amused themselves with the game of "What am I like?" which they kept up till General Herkules' return. When he was again among them, Göthilda, "with her nose in the air," placed herself before him and said, "I wonder, and so do the rest, and all the world wonders, but I wonder most of all, what you say and think, uncle, about Miss Iceland; whether, is she like Hecla or Krabbla? whether there is any fire beneath her snow; whether we shall see any eruption, and whether — I am now at the end of my wondering."

"I say that she is a decidedly superb girl!" exclaimed the general, "a girl who knows something, and who can and who will do something. 'One may do any thing that one will!' Magnificent, on my honor! I like a person who talks in that way. That is a woman who can show the way to many a man."

"Such woman are, according to my taste, altogether disgusting," said Ivar, who seemed to regard the general's observation as a gage of battle thrown down before him, and he rose, therefore, ready for combat from his chair, "and, usually, such people are, to a certain degree, of a feeble and unexpansive character, whose feelings are weak, and who have no experience of the world. The self-possession, the hair's-breadth precision and mile-stone regularity of such a person may be very estimable, and commonly it is very useful to the general order; for one's own purse, and health, and digestion—it is the greatness of mediocrity; but it will never satisfy the most highly gifted, it will not exist upon the free, heavenly paths of genius and art!"

"Heavenly paths; sublime gifts!" exclaimed uncle Herkules, provoked by Ivar's overbearing tone, and at the same time he discharged a battery upon him from both eyes, "sublime gifts! You have them, perhaps, yourself; you young gentlemen who talk about association, and the world, and world-embracing, and world-conquering, and strength, and greatness, and who wish to govern the whole world, but yet can not govern themselves, can not combat against your pleasures and your desires, and who let yourselves be caught by every hook which the devil throws out. Don't talk any nonsense to me about heavenly paths, and banners of genius, and such stuff, as if that were better than walking straight forward like an honest man. Away with your 'heavenly paths,' upon which is neither to be found the fear of God nor common sense, but merely your banner of genius, which floats with every wind. Yes, 'I ride,' said the goose, when the fox ran away with her into the wood; and so will it be with you and your spirit of controversy and eccentricity."

"But uncle," said Göthilda, as with a courageous mien and threatening glance she rushed forward, "I think that Ivar is right about gifts of genius, and therefore dissimilar men must have dissimilar paths. I think, uncle, that you are unjust toward Ivar."

General Herkules turned his flashing eyes upon this unexpected corps which had advanced to the help of Ivar, but their expression changed instantly, and he gazed on his favorite with an affectionate look, which seemed to say, "and thou, too, Brutus!" a look which went through the heart of the little champion.

Every one was silent for a moment, and then the general said shortly, "Good night, children," turned himself, and went out.

"Dear Ivar!" exclaimed Göthilda, earnestly, and with tears in her eyes, "you are too thoughtless and naughty always, to begin a quarrel with uncle Herkules, and to irritate him, and to make others unhappy who would sacrifice themselves for you!"

"My poor little heroine!" said Augustin, consolingly, and caressing her, "it is actually hard to triumph thus!"

"Why, dear Ivar, have you done so?" said Hedvig, and looked at him with a mild, upbraiding glance.

These quarrels between uncle Herkules and Ivar, which had latterly been of frequent occurrence, and which became more and more bitter, were a cause of great distress to Hedvig.

"Ah," said Ivar angrily, "why may not a man have his own thoughts, and express them also; and why must one always submit to the old man, and let him rule and pass judgment. It is unbearable! Good night, brothers and sisters!"

Ivar threw on his cloak, and knocked on his galoshes with unusual energy, and went out. Augustin and Bror lived in the same house with their sisters and the general, but Ivar, the artist, dwelt in another house where he had his studio.

As he was on his way down stairs he passed the general's room, within which he heard some one speaking in a loud and animated voice. General Herkules seemed, from without, to be in earnest conversation. Ivar fancied that he heard his own name mentioned; he stopped involuntarily, and through a little window in the door saw the old man on his knees within the room, with his hands clasped together, praying earnestly. The light of the candle fell directly upon his silvery and abundant hair, upon his powerful and expressive countenance; and revealed his feelings in the privacy of his own room, the door of which, leading into the outer one, the so called workshop, stood open. His voice was so strong and animated that the following words reached Ivar's ear:—"preserve the young man, thou my God and father! Let him arrive at sense and understanding, and lead him from his foolish ways once more into those which are right—into thine own! Let not him, let not any of those young people, whom thou hast intrusted unto me, come to shame or to harm. Take rather my old life! Be thou their defense, Lord and Father, and let not me, old sinner as I am, injure, by my hot temper, those whom I can not benefit!"

The steps of some one softly ascending the stairs caused Ivar to leave his post, and continue his way; he had, however, recognized Góthilda in the one who was advancing, and had heard her gently knock at the general's door, saying, "Uncle, it is your little Gótha, who can not sleep in peace before we are friends again. Open the door of mercy, dear uncle!"

And when the door of mercy opened to Góthilda, the house door was shut with violence behind Ivar. When, however, he had come out into the market-place, into the pure, bright, winter moonlight, he could not look up to the brilliant heaven, but looked with a gloomy brow down toward the earth. Thus went he onward with slow steps to a dark, solitary street—not that in which he dwelt. At this point his steps became more rapid, till they stopped before a gate. Ivar clapped his hands a few times; the gate opened softly, and Ivar passed through it. This house, which looked dark toward the street, had within its court a row of strongly lighted windows. Ivar looked up to these, and light kindled also in his eyes, while he, with hasty steps, buried himself in the gloomy passages of the house.

SKETCHES.

PERSONS, very respectable, and good sort of folk, who would like to have some solution of every position of affairs and circumstances, will turn round and require that we should make them more intimately acquainted with the characters that we have here introduced; they would like to know what they ought to call our young gentlemen—lieutenants, or royal secretaries, or controllers, or directors, or capitalists, or what? We deplore—or rather we are particularly pleased, that it is impossible for us to enlighten them, because—to tell the truth, we don't know ourselves. But then we believe also that this has nothing to do with the business—we believe, good lady and gentleman reader! that you will become right good friends with our friends here, without knowing more about them than we do, and we beg of you to begin from the beginning to call Augustin, Augustin, Ivar, Ivar, and so on, with all the rest according to their names, (but we must call General Herkules, General Herkules). We believe that the artificial types, those which accompany certain official employments, certain titles, certain coats, are old-fashioned, and almost exploded from the world. On the contrary, we believe in the eternal natural types, and natural families, likewise, in the Flora of the human race, and would gladly assist the reader in determining to which of these the men and women of our story may be referred. Dear and disputatious Góthilda! pardon us if we turn for information to a fragment of a letter from her who was so ungraciously called by thee, "Miss Silent," and "Miss Iceland."

"BELOVED MAESTRO!"

"— In the eternal Roma, surrounded by gods and goddesses, by heads of Jupiter and figures of Venus, beneath the glorious heaven of Italy, with the Capitoline hill beside you, and the dome of St. Peter's before you, you yet longed for a northern home, for a Swedish, crackling fire; you wished to see a pine-twigs-covered floor; Swedish countenances, and the customs of home; wished to see the family assembled round the fire in the twilight, to hear the talking and the laughter within, while the north wind howled without, and the snow-storm was raging.

"Fancy and taste are various. And for my part, I would rather be here than by the Capitoline hill. But — there also is it good to be and I will conduct you into that home which your friendship prepared for me, and which afforded me a home in Sweden, my mother's native land, when I was obliged to leave that of my father, and come hither, alone, solitary, and poor. You know how needful it is for me, that the heart or the understanding should entertain feelings of regard toward the human beings with whom I live; you know what delight it is to me to see the cultivated human being assume some determined, individual shape, be it high or low. Palm or moss, it is all one. The beautiful thrives in many forms, so does the good likewise. And I thrive so well in this family, just because I here see some such forms, and because that self, with all its forms, aims toward this object.

"Let me now introduce them to you, by the light of the twilight fire, and if the outlines be then frequently uncertain, the colors pale—it is occasioned by the wavering of the flame, and not by any fault of mine!

"See first in the midst of this family group, that quiet, gentle female form. That is its heart. That is sister Hedvig. This sister-form you may have met with many a time on the earth, but never more beautiful than here.

"Yet sister Hedvig is not beautiful. Many persons, at first glance, would call her plain. Her complexion is without color; the whole figure without brilliancy. But that well-developed form; easy in every movement; that pure forehead, the expression in the calm, moon-light eyes; a certain harmony in the whole demeanor, manner, voice, dress, make her beautiful in my eyes. It was a Vestal-like form, not the pagan, stern Vesta before whom victors walked with naked axes, whose office was to guard the sacred fire, while she herself was cold, dead to all love. She is a Christian Vestal, who preserves the sacred fire burning because she loves, because it burns first in her own heart.

"People talk a deal about the mother, she, namely, who gives birth to the world; she is honored and exalted; but they overlook, often despite—the other mother, the guardian, the teacher, the nurse, who often is more a mother than she who bears the name. And how many sisters endure, as does this sister Hedvig, all a mother's pain and anxiety, without her praise and her joy!

"But Hedvig does not stand altogether alone. Her brother, Augustin, shares all her anxieties with her. If you wished to conceive an image of Balder the good, at the moment when he cheerfully bares his breast to the arrows of the gods, I would place before you, as a model, this bright and pure being. The evening when he entered my mean and gloomy lodging, to conduct me to his home; when I saw that countenance beaming with kindness and lofty intelligence, he seemed to me like a good genius—and so he still seems to me.

"Do you see a melancholy shadow upon these two bright figures, which comes and goes, and comes again, like a cloud upon the face of heaven—like the minor key in the songs of the north—like an unappeased longing? I see it, and I ask myself, is it a tone peculiar, in the temperament of the north, to natures of a higher cast, or is it the expression of a secret suffering, of some painful reality, in the history of this brother and sister? But this suffering seems not to be a restraining principle, but one which is under restraint.

"Very dissimilar is the young figure which I see behind them, more in shadow, and only partially, and now and then, lighted up by the blaze of the fire, in strong "chiaroscuro." He makes me think of the Hymithurs in the northern legends, those shapeless, misty, gigantic beings which seem to me to be the first rough essays of creative power. He is a world in the process of cultivation. Will it become a home for good or for evil spirits? Both are now evidently straggling around it. His features are at the same time both regular and irregular, I know not which in the greatest degree—the expression also, so various, that I can not tell their predominant one. If you look at him from certain points of view, and at certain moments, you see the countenance of a heavenly genius; look at him again from another point of view, and at another moment, and you would not like to meet him alone in a wood. A restless and turbulent temper obscures the expression of beauty and kindness, which, at times, glances forth like stars from a cloudy sky. This young man, Ivar, is, at the same time, author, painter, musician, clever in every one of these arts, but great in none. One sees him, by the fire-light, in a somewhat willful mood, throw himself down on the sofas and chairs, running his fingers through a rich growth of dark brown hair. A crowd of wild fancies appears to swarm about his brain. The character is one which seems to be dangerous both to himself and others.

"Again, a very dissimilar being is that little, agreeable, and compact figure, which stands there with a grave countenance, and beautiful eyes, in which a good-humored archness peeps forth. That is Bror Dalberg, and during the evening fire-light he is particularly busy in playing off jokes on his younger sisters, and hence one hears such peals of laughter. His is a character not at all dangerous to the general safety.

"Now come two young girls as much unlike as day and night—Engel and Gøthilda.

"Engel, bright, beautiful as an angel—good, amiable, pleasant—an embodied sunbeam, and the darling of the whole family, where she is always called 'the child,' even by her sister a few years younger than herself.

"Excellent Gøthilda—naughty, as she is called in the family, and where she has, besides, innumerable names, a dark, thin, rather plain girl of sixteen, with eagle eyes, and eagle nose, quick, odd, full of enterprise, with strong likes and dislikes; a problem at present, in every way, even to herself, as well as to the whole family, who wonder 'what that woman will turn out,' but, at the same time, a particular favorite of the old general, the uncle of the family, whose plaything and established darling she is. You see the young girls, who, unlike the genius of night and day, floating around the room, and around the old man, now here, now there, pausing on the carpet in the fire-light, joking one with another, or engaged in an affray with the younger brothers, two cadets; youths with 'handsome blue eyes' and cheeks painted by health's own hand, and who keep up, in the back-ground of the room, their innocent merriment.

"In the fore-ground of the picture, however, illumined by the brightest fire-light, behold, in the midst of the group, the old General Wolmar Otto Herkules, the uncle of the family, and who secretly supports them in his strong arms—in personal appearance a magnificent pattern of heart and soul in 'old age!' It was delightful to me to see the blaze of the fire light up that strong, honest countenance, with his magnificent eyes flashing from beneath his bushy eyebrows, the broad chest, upon which lay 'the medal of bravery,' and his silvery hair which stands like a crown around his open, broad forehead. One can see that many a storm has gone over that gray head, but without breaking or bowing it. Memories of war and of peace come by turns from the old soldier's lips, as he sits there in the midst of his circle. In the former, King Charles the Twelfth is the principal object, and we hear the stories which the general heard in his childhood from his father—an old Carlist—about this king's achievements. Very seldom does General Herkules tell any thing about himself. In his peaceful reminiscences, women bear a part—his mother, and the home of his childhood. He seems also to have gloomy remembrances—remembrances which cast a shade over the mind for a time; but of these he does not speak. Such is the figure of a Herkules, who could not, I imagine, sit and spin at the feet of Omphale, but whose voice and glance occasionally express a high degree of kindness. This is observable especially when he looks at, or addresses the two young girls, who are favorites, and it is beautiful to see his attachment to them, and theirs to him.

"People talk about how much youth adorns home, but a beautiful old age does so no less. And without an old man or an old woman, a family picture is not complete, and without them the domestic virtues can not fully develop their beautiful existence.

Youth is never more amiable than when it looks in love and reverence to the old—the old never more beautiful than when they bow themselves down to the young in affectionate care. And beautiful and remarkable is that impulse of nature which always unites, in domestic life, the eldest and the youngest, in a mutual interchange of comfort and joy.

"But the evening fire has burned down; candles are lighted; apples and nuts are brought out; the young assemble around them, talk and crack. Do you recognize that?

"You must now turn from the fire-side, from the family picture to another image, more cold and desolate. But no, it is not cold and desolate. It is bright, and full of life, although in another way.

"You must behold your pupil in her work-room, at her work. There has she home, and hearth, sisters and brothers, and—all.

"One day, Augustin Dalberg came to me with an old man of a venerable and attractive appearance, one of the nobles of Sweden and one of her Mæcenases. His countenance seemed to me full of light. It was not until after a moment that I observed that he was—blind! He ordered from me a group from our Northern mythology, which would be suitable for the adorning of a fountain, and left it to me to select the subject. Like a flash of lightning it stood before me: I saw the Norna and the prophetic swans, by the Urda fountain!—the pictured dreams of my youth were now about to become reality. Since that moment my life has been as if renewed to me, and existence, upon the earth, where first the old sagas of the gods struck root, built temples, and came into life, where now stand the heights of Odin, Thor, and Freij, and testify to the fact—existence there seems to me beautiful!

"I thank God that I have a noble problem to solve, a quiet work to go to with my thoughts, my hands; to live for evening and morning, day and night. With this before me, and the eye of God above me, I fear—NOTHING!

"The elder bird builds its nest in peaceful places—makes its home soft and warm with its down, and is happy with its young. That is its portion. The storm-bird, however, of the polar regions, builds for itself no nest; it loves the open sea, the rocky bay, and freedom; prefers to bathe in stormy waters, to float with restless wings over the now rising and now descending billows, with a steady gaze directed toward the deep.

"I feel myself kindred to them.

"Do my words seem to be proud? O! you know how humble I can be before the truly great and good. You know, my friend and teacher, that I am so before you."

THE BROTHER AND SISTER.

SISTER Hedvig sate and span. She sate in the little green room which the brothers called "the sisters' room," and, sometimes, also, "the sanctuary." Polite brothers, were they not?—and never would they enter into this room without first knocking at the door and inquiring—"May I come in?" The sisters—the younger ones—called it "Hedvig's room;" and it was here that Hedvig loved to withdraw into stillness during the few moments in the day which were allowed her for herself. That little room was adorned with especial partiality and good taste; the paper-hangings, the carpet, the furniture, all looked fresh and new. Will you believe that it was the brothers who concerned themselves about this, and who had thus refreshed the interior of the little apartment within a few months, when the sisters were out on a journey? So indeed it was, and I know kind brothers, for example, in an old rich city on the Rhine, who would be amazed at my thinking that there was any thing remarkable in this. Well, I do not think so; and I merely spoke of it because the thought of the little room—"of the sanctuary," and of these brothers, pleased me. I remember now, and might tell you about another "sanctuary," where four young girls lived during the best years of their life, and which was called by them the little "dust-hole;" for which name there was reason; but that the thought does not give me pleasure, and I paused there merely in passing. Again to sister Hedvig!

Hedvig sate and span. The spinning-wheel, made of dark wood and finely carved, standing as it did upon the bright green carpet, made only a low hum as it turned, like the murmur of a running brook. While the flax-thread glided through Hedvig's fingers, one tear after another flowed down her cheeks. Traces also of unusual excitement appeared in the feverish flush of her commonly pale cheeks, in the heightened brilliancy of her eye; and Hedvig seemed to wish to lull to sleep, as it were, her excited feelings by the quiet, composing employment in which she was engaged. What was the cause of this excitement? Was it joy, or was it pain? It seemed to be something of both, and by degrees they both mingled into an expression of infinite affection and pensiveness; like a mild evening sun which seeks for itself a path through clouds, and illumines all that surround it.

The daylight came dimly into the room, from a leaden sky which showed itself above the tiled roof. It was in the afternoon, and the whole of this day, a November day, had been gray and cloudy. At this moment, however, a sunbeam burst forth, and, falling obliquely into the room, let the shadow of the leaves of a little rose-tree, which stood in the window where Hedvig sate, play and dance upon the paneling around her. Hedvig smiled pensively—there was something picturesque in this little circumstance—and reminiscences of her life came forth like pictures, like shadow-figures, upon the canvass of the past.

It was a life such as is lived by many a one in the North; it was like the lichen upon a gray rock. All of us inhabitants of the North have something of the gray rock—something of the lichen, in our lives; but still there is a great difference in the proportions. Hedvig's life had been for a long time like that low class of natural productions which fastens upon the granite beneath the shadow of the pine. But without splendor, without color, vegetating slowly, and almost imperceptibly to the human eye, passing through the changes of their hidden life, visited only now and then by a ray of the sun, and evening and morning wetted by the dew of heaven. Wonderful is it, nevertheless, that in the bosom of this cheerless growth the most beautiful colors, and the most beneficent of juices, should yet be developed. What is their art in this? Simply to receive quietly in themselves, and to elaborate, the moisture which the dew instills, and the light which the sun gives!

The home of Hedvig's childhood had not been a happy one; disorder prevailed in the family, contention between the parents which could not fail of having its influence on the children. Between them also, as is the case in many homes, there were little strifes and quarrels. Hedvig was not always on good terms with Augustin; Gerda and Ivar were, every now and then, desperate enemies, and occasionally came to blows; Göthilda and Bror, when they grew up, had also eternal little squabbles; still, amid all this, the brothers and sisters—who in reality had, every one of them, warm hearts—were sincerely attached to each other, played, were merry together, and were the best friends in the world. As they grew in years and wisdom, and as want and difficulty increased in their home, their brotherly and sisterly affection grew in proportion; their quarrels ceased, or began to assume another character. Hedvig had been the Cinderilla of the family, because she was the least gifted by nature, and, in consequence, but little regarded by her parents or her teachers. For that reason, Augustin, although he frequently rather looked down upon her, always protected her against the cuts and the slashes of other people. This riveted her heart to him very early.

At eighteen, Hedvig was placed at the head of her father's disorderly household, and was called upon to become a mother and a guardian to many young brothers and sisters. From this time, and during the following years, a great change took place in Hedvig, and thus, out of the despised Cinderella, came forth that beautiful Vestal-like woman with whom we are already acquainted. This did not take place, however, by the shake of a magic wand, as is related in fairy tales. It was a slow process, like all the transformations of life in the North; heavenly and earthly love operated also upon it.

When Augustin, after an absence of some years, returned to his father's house, and again saw Hedvig, he hardly knew her, and he then attached himself to her with an absolute admiration and friendship. From this moment Hedvig's life brightened; every thing became easier to her; she began to have a presentiment of a life which might be beautiful. Hedvig loved, and was beloved; not merely by her best beloved brother, but by another noble man, who, warmly admiring her noble womanly qualities, and struck by her excellence, had attached himself to her. Her father's death, which occurred about five years before the commencement of our story, made Hedvig's position one of greater responsibility and difficulty than formerly. Augustin, it is true, stood at her side as her affectionate friend and protector, but he too experienced at this time a grief which deeply and disturbingly took hold upon his very being, and which prevented him from being to Hedvig all that which he desired and might have been. It was a love-sorrow. Augustin had for many years loved a young, beautiful, and richly-endowed girl, to whom he was bound by mutual promises, which were to be ratified as soon as Augustin's outward circumstances would allow it. For this purpose, Augustin labored zealously and hopefully, when the young lady, seduced by her worldly mind, and by a yet more worldly mother, taking offense at what she called Augustin's "indifference," all at once deceived him, broke with him, and married a rich landed proprietor, with a title to his name. Augustin had loved this girl with the warmest affection, and he had made great sacrifices that he might the better prepare that paradise which he intended for her. The thought of his union with her had been the sun in his life. That was now at an end. Augustin obtained the appointment for which he wished; his position in life was established, but his life was embittered. Hedvig, in addition to her many troubles, thought how she might console that noble mind which had lost its trust in what it most loved. Then other troubles arose from money-matters connected with the family income, and the difficulty there was in getting all the children provided for; and although Augustin took upon himself the family debts, and although they endeavored to retrench and live as closely as possible, still their means were not sufficient to provide for so many. It was amid these gloomy outward circumstances, and during a consultation upon them, that the brothers and sisters were one day together in the house. Hedvig saw again this time most accurately in her memory—when a tall, military figure entered the circle, with a stern, yet at the same time thoroughly honest countenance; hair sprinkled with gray; eyes which lit up the whole room; and who said and swore, "See, here am I, the fiend fetch me! I am your uncle Herkules, and you are my sister's children, and I am now come to make acquaintance with you. On my honor I am! Come into my arms, and don't stand staring as if I did not know what I'm doing. I am your uncle Herkules—do you hear? Can you swallow that without its being thrust down your throats?"

After the first surprise was over, the young people soon became acquainted with the old man, of whom they had often heard, although they never till now had seen him. He lived in one of the northern provinces of the kingdom; he had been much displeased by his sister's marriage, and had not visited the capital now for five-and-twenty years. He stayed some days with the fatherless and motherless young people; made himself acquainted with the affairs of the family; listened to their counsels among themselves; and particularly noticed how, in all their proposed arrangements, they wished to manage so as to prevent their being separated, that they might remain together, but which they were unable to do for want of money. One day he took part in the family council, and spoke as follows:—

"Listen, children! I am an old man, have neither wife nor children. I have no property which is worth speaking of, but the king's majesty and the crowd gave me a handsome pension for my deeds in the field, and the old man has saved a little from former times. I have something more than I need. I have now seen you, children—and I like you. And if you like me only half as well, then—we may manage together, I think. The — fetch me, if I don't think so. I will rent a house here in the city, and you shall come and live with me, and I will board with you; so that sister Hedvig takes care that I have my victuals, my coffee, and—a great many biscuits must I have, Hedvig, that I tell you beforehand! Now on my honor, children, that is my scheme if you will fall into it. You see, I am beginning to get old—I can't stand bear-hunting any longer; I feel myself solitary, and that is not good—it is not pleasant. The old heart will live, will see a little life, a little youth around it. Now, say yes, children, all, and then the matter is settled.

"Do you see, I am not a bad old fellow, although I do grumble a little sometimes. That is the Herkules blood!—the Herkules blood, my children! But you are really not afraid of me, my sweet girls. And you, lads, will indeed have patience with an old man who wishes you well, even though he may scold you sometimes. The deuce take me if he did not do it! Now, children, we can make a trial of living together for two or three years. If it does not succeed, why then, in heaven's name, long life to Swedish freedom! Then we can part like good friends. Well?—what do you say? Do you understand Swedish? Do you take my meaning without its being thrust down your throats? Now, I shall strike three blows on the table, and if no one cries "Hold!" before the last falls, then the contract is settled."

Two blows fell, amid general silence; the general made a little pause, and then struck the third blow with his powerful fist, with so much force, that all the furniture in the room shook. With that, up sprang the old soldier, opened his arms, and exclaimed, "Now is it said and done! See, then, come now and embrace me, my children! Hurrah for our fatherland, for the king, and for ourselves!"

It was done as the old man had proposed, and spite of occasional storms, which were mostly occasioned by uncle Herkules wishing to be, as it were, fate and providence to the young people, and because they seldom would submit themselves without a struggle, they still continued to be all united, nay, even in some respects, had become more firmly so than ever.

"By means of a bond drawn up on stamped paper?"

"Ah, my dear friend Justitia, what would be the advantage of that? What would it bind?"

"No! No bonds are really strong, really binding, but those which can not be expressed in writing or by printing; which can not be confirmed by law."

Were not the only fetters which could bind Fenris-ulfen* of an invisible and imperceptible kind? And when the brave Hagbert struck down all that surrounded him, what was it that alone sufficed to bind his hands? A single hair of his beloved Signild! Yes, yes, the strong ones of antiquity knew that perfectly, and we—their weak children—do not as yet suspect it.

Hedvig's thoughts passed from the incident which we have just described, over some calm and not wearisome years, and then dwelt upon the present important moment, a moment which made her eyes sparkle, which agitated her feelings, and caused her tears to flow—lightly and painfully at the same time.

With this, Hedvig's eyes rested upon an open letter which lay on the window beside her. We will not withhold from our young readers the knowledge that this was a love-letter, and from the man who possessed Hedvig's heart, and who had loved her for many years, and who now, for the first time was able to ask her to share his fate. Once more Hedvig read the letter through. She kissed the name with which it closed, and then drying her eyes, seized a pen resolutely, and wrote the following answer.

"When my father lay upon his death-bed, he took my hand between his and said, 'Hedvig, thou art without fortune. Promise me only to marry a wealthy man; a man who through his property is perfectly independent. And whatever thou doest—remember thy brothers and sisters; O, remember the children! Continue to be a mother to them. Promise me this, and I shall die in peace.'"

"I promised.

"Ah! in this promise, and in my situation, you have my answer to your letter. My friend! I am poor, and you are without fortune, and we are both of us no longer young.

"In a few years,' you say. But do not build upon this thought. I know that in a few years I could not give you my hand excepting as a sisterly friend. But do not deceive yourself. Your path through life is too rich and lofty for one so insignificant being to be of much consequence to it. You will live for science and humanity, and your solitary life and scientific labors is a much more perfect existence than that which awaits you in domestic life, where petty pecuniary cares and troubles would divert your attention from your more important avocations, and betray the peace of your mind, nay, perhaps even of your conscience—because you could not be happy if you saw that you had not accomplished the work which Providence had assigned to you. I have heard you frequently say that you wished to devote your life to the discovering of a means for mitigating or removing sorrows. O! I think too highly of you, too highly of your design, to give you a hand which might turn you aside from this endeavor, which might retard your steps to this blessed path. Go then, my beloved friend; think only upon that, and forget me, or remember me only as a friend who loves and blesses you, who rejoices in all the good which you can and will do. You say that my refusal will cause you to go abroad for some years. But I know that you, in this case, would sacrifice peaceful laurels for your native land, and your own comfort for the benefit of your fellow creatures. I have often heard it said that only unmarried men can accomplish any thing great in science. If you travel, think that, wherever you go, whether you are working or resting, that the prayers and the blessings of an old maid accompany you. Think also that your faithful devotion made, and still makes her, happy, and will warm her heart in old age—even in death. Think not, though I write this, that my feelings are calm; that I smile while you weep. Ah no! I too weep, and my heart is breaking! If it can be any comfort to your noble heart to know it—you are the only man whom I have loved, the first, certainly the last! Promise me that you will speedily apply yourself again to your labors—or will travel! It will be painful for me to think that I—even for a few days—disturbed an activity so noble, so blessed! And now, once more, blessings upon it, and upon you, my friend!

"You will travel!—some time you will come back again. Then we shall be older, calmer! It is to me a necessity, a consolation in this hour, to believe that you will then possess a home in my brother-and-sister-home, and that then I shall press your hand as your best, truest friend and sister."

"Hedvig."

When Hedvig had finished her letter, and raised her eyes from her paper, she saw her faithful servant, Maja, standing at the door, who also held a letter in her hand, and stood hesitating whether she should enter, with her eyes fixed upon Hedvig, as if inquiring whether she should disturb her. Her eyes, too, were moist with tears.

We will take this opportunity of giving a more detailed account of Maja. From what the reader has already seen of her figure, we imagine that he by no means suspects her to have been formed by the graces. We must confirm this opinion. She had a strong figure, broad back, high shoulders, and something so ungraceful in her carriage, that Hedvig, the first time she saw her, hesitated whether she should engage her as a domestic servant. But Maja looked at her with a pair of pleasant, light brown eyes, which had an especially grave, kind, and heartfelt expression, and said, "Oh, kind Miss—do take me!"

And Hedvig engaged her immediately. On this Maja laughed, with a short, spasmodic, queer kind of laugh, drawing in her head, and shooting forth her chest, but looking all the while most cordially pleased. Hedvig laughed, too, thought it very odd, but took no notice. It was now nearly thirteen years since this time, and Maja had ever since been a pillar in the family, and seemed now altogether inseparable from it. Her figure was still as ungraceful as at first, but she managed the business of the house so excellently, and her strong frame, sustained by strong health, seemed made to bustle about among house-gear, pails of water, fuel which had to be carried in, and such like, shunning no work however hard, and being able to stand any thing. The laugh, which was heard on every possible occasion, was always alike odd, and mal apropos; but—never did any one see a cloud or an ill-natured expression on Maja's countenance—never; and people grew accustomed to the laugh. Maja planted her heels heavily upon the floor, when she went about her work in the rooms, yes, so heavily that all the furniture trembled. But see her in a sick chamber where she had any one to nurse, and then no one heard her foot-fall; then, Maja was so gentle in her movements, so affectionate, so clever, so unwearied in her attentions that—I very much doubt whether any of the graces could have performed those duties so well, and in particular whether the sick person would have been so comfortable under their care. The cause of all this was that, spite of her broad back, and spite of her ungraceful figure, she had a heart as kind, as pure, as warm, as full of noble impulses as ever beat in a human breast; and this heart was the mainspring in the clock-work of her being. This heart also gave an actual grace to her soul, and communicated the same to her thoughts and actions. This soul shone brightly from her eyes, the only beautiful feature in her otherwise ordinary face, and this faithful, heartfelt glance which seemed to read within the very soul the wishes of those whom she loved—that glance became a light in the family in more than one respect.

When Hedvig's mother died, and Hedvig, then so young, was obliged to take upon herself those responsible family cares, her courage in the first place wavered, and she felt her powers inadequate to the task. She said then to Maja, who had been two years in the family, and with whose worth she had become acquainted:

"Maja, you must now become my stay and my helper, if I am to accomplish all that which is laid upon me. Assist me to take into consideration how every thing is to be done in the best manner, so that every one may be comfortable, and so that it will answer. And help my poor memory with your excellent one, and remind me of what ought to be done. Without you, Maja, I could not manage."

If any one had offered Maja "gold and green woods," they would not so firmly have attached her to them as by these words. She was one of those sterling souls in whom we may place confidence—even as regards our wants and our weaknesses—without danger. The encouragement which Hedvig gave was also a means of awakening in Maja many a slumbering power, both in understanding and judgment. From this moment the interests of the family were her own. She became Hedvig's right hand, without allowing any one else to know that she was more than the left; and thus the relationship between mistress and servant became—without its being in any way deranged—one of an altogether deep and heart-felt character.

From this time it was entirely forgotten in the family, as far as concerned Maja, that there was any such thing in the world as "time for quitting." * This had also been the case for the last ten years, as regarded the general's servant, Corporal Stolt.

Servants!—what an important part they act in the life and history of families! And who can enumerate the deeds of energy and patience, and all the Christian virtues which are day and night performed by good servants? Volumes might be written about them; yet—to what purpose? There is One who enumerates them, and writes them down in his book—that great book!—and we shall one day know more about them when it is opened; when the quiet life, and the unobtrusive deeds which now lie concealed in the shades of household existence, shall be revealed to the day; and when the great Master shall call forth to a joyful reward the good and the faithful servant—who was faithful in the little thing.

We will now close the characteristics of Maja with the remark that she, like many of her class and sex, had a very warm and even practical fancy, with a perception of every thing that was beautiful and good; but—though she bore the same name as the mother of the god of eloquence, yet eloquence was not one of her great gifts.

Her words, like her laughter, came forth in an odd and sometimes misplaced way, in particular if her feelings were at all excited; nay, they would often come as it were back foremost, which, however, did not prevent her having a sort of rude eloquence of expression, the meaning of which was very intelligible. When she had once got fairly afloat in any story, she went on tolerably well. But when she was much delighted, very happy, or very much pleased with any thing, then she stumbled about for words, and could only find one single expression to give utterance to her feelings and her joy, and this was, "It is so feeling-full!" That was the summing up, and the finishing point of all.

We will now return to the moment when Maja stood at the door, hesitating, with a letter in her hand, and her eyes fixed upon Hedvig.

"What is it, Maja?" inquired Hedvig, "you are troubled about something?"

"Ah, yes, Miss! I have been told—something so sad!" replied Maja, wiping away with her apron the tears that would not be restrained.

"What is it then, dear Maja?" asked Hedvig, instantly ready to sympathize; "tell me about it!"

"Ay, Miss, it is—a young girl! And, you see! her mother was the friend of my youth; and she is now dead—and such a kind creature! And she, the girl!—she—has taken to bad ways!"

"How has this happened?" asked Hedvig.

"Ay, you see!—I can very well fancy that she was vain, and wished to make herself fine, poor simpleton! and that her wages weren't enough for it—for she had a place as kitchen-maid in a gentleman's family here in the city—and then she laid her hands on what was not hers. Ah, Miss! how that vanity and that folly about wishing to be better dressed than one has the means for, has brought misfortune to many a young girl of my class! This poor thing fancied—as such always do—that her dishonesty would never be found out. But, look you! it was, and she—got into the house of correction, dear Miss!—Is not that dreadful? And now the time of her imprisonment is ended, but she remains there still, because she is without a place.* Her mother has been dead many years; she has no near relations, and who will take her into service when she comes out of that place, with the character of a—thief? One can't expect it!—"

"I do not know what put me in her heart; but here has she now written to me, and prays me to help her, if I can, to get into service with a kind and respectable family who will assist her good wishes to become a creditable person again; and she begs me to have mercy upon her for her mother's sake, and because she is so young! She writes—so feeling-full—so properly, Miss Hedvig. And she is hardly one-and-twenty, dear Miss!" Maja again put her apron to her eyes. After this she continued,

"She was such a sweet little thing, as a child—and gentle, active, and intelligent, and every body liked her very much. And if her mother could now know what has befallen her, she would die of grief, even if she were in the bosom of our Lord! Her mother and I, we were servants together in a good Jew-family, where I was before I came here. And do you know, Miss! I have many a time thought that for the most part it depends upon the masters and mistresses how the servants turn out. I was young, and knew very little when I went into that Jew's family; and I should soon enough have been laughed out of living there if the lady had not been so kind and so reasonable

* In Sweden, servants are always, according to law, engaged for at least six months, in the country for a year; and the "flyttningstid" is at Stockholm the 1st of April, and 21st of October; in the country, the 24th of the latter month.

* In Sweden, servants are not allowed, by law, to be out of place, otherwise they will be taken up and committed to prison as rogues and vagabonds. Public opinion is now, however, opposed to this cruel law, and it is to be hoped that it will soon be altered.

toward me, and talked to me for my good, yes, just like a mother. And no better or more right-thinking master and mistress could one have had. The gentleman and lady lived as happily one with the other as two angels; there never was a single angry word between them, and so good and charitable to the poor! Ay, right good were they, that I can say! And they brought up their children gravely, and always wished them to be as kind and civil toward us servants as toward strangers. Ay, ay! never were they allowed to ask us for any thing but in a polite and kind manner. And I never saw the lady so cross as once when one of the young gentlemen called me an ugly name. He! he! he! he! I had indeed to beg the boy off—poor little fellow! he! he! he! he!—And do you know, Miss, I believe that the Jews are as earnest in their religion as we Christians are in ours. The lady said always ‘by the help of God!—as God pleases,’ when the question was about any thing important, of course. And once, when one of the children was suddenly taken so ill that they thought it would die, the master clasped together his hands, and, looking up, said, ‘Almighty God, help us!’ and he wept!”

“Did they never talk on religious subjects with you?” asked Hedvig.

“No, Miss, never! But once, when I had been to church, one of the young gentlemen asked me, when I came home, what the clergyman had preached about; and I told him, for it was the truth, that it was about the ‘hatred of the Jews to Christ.’ But was it not odd, Miss, that it should just that very day be a sermon about the Jews’ hatred to Christ? And then said the boy, ‘Yes, it was not we that did so, but our forefathers; we did not advise that.’”

“And in that they were very right,” said Hedvig.

“Yes, I thought so too,” continued Maja, “and certain it is, that many Christian gentlefolks are not so good and honorable, and so careful of their servants, as this Jew family toward theirs. And had this poor lass, who now is in prison, lived with such a master and mistress, then I hardly think—nay, I may say downright, I don’t believe that she would have been there; because, with such a good mother one can not be bad at heart. And now it cuts me to the very soul, to think that she is confined there among so many wicked people, and will get worse and worse every day, and perhaps, in the end, be absolutely lost—when she now would so gladly become a reputable person again. And so young!—It is very hard, dear Miss!”

“Yes,” said Hedvig, sorrowfully, “but it is a very difficult matter to assist her; because all masters and mistresses are afraid, with good reason, of any person who comes out of the house of correction, where they generally deteriorate in morals, instead of improving; and it can hardly be desired of reputable servants that they should live with those who have suffered under a public sentence. They would consider themselves disgraced by it.”

“But I should not think so, Miss Hedvig,” said Maja, fixing upon Hedvig her honest, kind, sincere eyes; “I should really set myself gladly about being as a sister, ~~as~~ a mother, to such a poor creature, and should try to make her a good, and respectable, and happy being once more!”

“Yes, I believe that, my good Maja! Yes, I know that you would do so!” said Hedvig, and the eyes of mistress and servant rested one upon the other with a look that could not be mistaken.

“Ah, Miss!” continued Maja, encouraged by the expression of Hedvig’s eyes—“if I might dare to beg!—We could very well do with one girl more in the house, who would help a little in the kitchen, because Margrete has a deal to do, and who would assist me a little with the cleaning, and the fine-wash now and then. If, Miss Hedvig—if the gentlefolks would take Hannah just for a trial!—I would take care of her, and teach her—and I could set a little bed for her beside mine, and she could put her clothes in my chest of drawers. And she would have a good home and shelter, and might once more become a good character!”

“We will think about it, Maja,” replied Hedvig; “I will speak with my brother Augustin on the subject, and with the general. I will not promise you with certainty, but I believe it may be done.”

“Ah, that good Miss Hedvig!” exclaimed Maja, “Ah, how beautiful that would be! Ah, yes!—And she can recover her character—and her mother!—And I—ah—it is so feeling-full, Miss!”

“But a responsible thing, at the same time, Maja,” said Hedvig; “and the heaviest part of the charge would lie upon you, because you would have the most to do with her, and a great deal will depend upon your way of treating and managing her.”

“Yes, I acknowledge that,” said Maja, “but do you see, I fancy that if one will do the best, according to one’s knowledge and ability, then, as in poverty, one shall have help from God.”

“Yes, and that is also my opinion, my good Maja,” said Hedvig. And after that, the two went each her way.

Hedvig went to look for Augustin, but he was not yet returned.

In the mean time, the hour was come when the various members of the family assembled for the evening. One after the other they entered the parlor. Apples and nuts were set out, and uncle Hercules’ little glass of toddy was prepared by Góthika. It was not till late in the evening that Augustin came. The joyful feelings, however, which his coming always excited, were this time damped by the unusually sorrowful expression of his countenance. He nevertheless embraced and kissed affectionately his young sisters, who threw their arms passionately and joyfully round his neck, and then, withdrawing himself silently, and with a reserved manner, he seemed to wish to avoid Hedvig's uneasy and tenderly inquiring looks.

General Herkules would not play at cards this evening, but, full of good humor and enjoyment, sat and watched the young girls dancing in the drawing-room, and laughing heartily at a caricature Polka, which Gôthilda and Bror danced with the most grotesque gesticulations and grimaces, while Engel, light and elegant as the youngest sister of the Graces, instructed her partner, the general's nephew, young Jarl Herkules, who was very unlike her in person, in the mysteries of that modern dance, with all its variations.

Uno sat beside Hedvig, and looked at Engel.

"I do not think that I ever saw a being," said he, "who looked so really pure and good as she does;—as if there were nothing evil in her. She is like what we fancy an angel to be—a heavenly child."

Hedvig crimsoned with the joy of hearing her beloved young sister's praise.

"And she is what she seems to be," said Hedvig, "as much so, I fancy, as a human being can be, because, beneath this child-like, gay temper, which makes all around her happy, there lies a deeply sensitive heart. May she be happy!"

"Yes, may she be so!" replied Uno, with much feeling. "I could hardly forgive any one who made her unhappy. And if I —."

He did not finish the sentence, and when Hedvig looked at him inquiringly, he was pale, and had assumed that reserved and grave expression which seemed to forbid any inquiry respecting the communication which had been withheld. Hedvig was silent, and continued to sew, and Uno seemed buried in his thoughts.

"Ivar came; made some wild waltzings among his sisters, after which he seated himself in a corner and looked like a thundery sky. Gôthilda went up to him, and endeavored to enliven him by various observations respecting his aventures de Telemaque, which she was at that time reading—Calypso and her island, and so on.

"Don't vex him, Gôthilda!" besought Engel gently, as she drew away her mischievous sister, "he is tired, let him be at peace!"

"I assure you," said Gôthilda, "that he is very cross, and in an ill-humor, and that is a bad habit which young gentlemen can never be soon enough broken of, else they become detestable. Ivar ought really to be educated by Uncle Herkules and me; and it would do the young fellow a vast deal of good if Thor's hammer chased away all witchcraft out of him; for there is some Calypso or Dulcinea that has got entire possession of him, and makes him so 'morblen'—of that I am very sure—. As to you, Bror, you are always rational and in a good humor, and therefore I like you. Shall we two set up housekeeping together, some fine day when we have got something to begin housekeeping with? What do you say?"

"I say yes, if you will promise me beef with horse-radish every Monday, and pea-soup every Thursday!"

"Agreed! and you must provide a bottle of wine for every day."

"Well, that is settled, and as soon as you are your own mistress, we will set up housekeeping together."

"A fine arrangement, upon my honor!" exclaimed uncle Herkules, "but look you, it shall not take place, unless I am included in it. Do you hear that, my little Lady Fanciful? You must not be faithless to me. Such a little rascal! Did you ever hear of such devices and complots?"

"Uncle shall have a share; uncle shall be one of us; uncle shall have beef and horse-radish twice a week, and with sauce that shall give a relish like—a whole bottle! But uncle must promise me one thing"—and Gôthilda threw her arms caressingly round her uncle's neck. He said—

"Nay, what's all this, my little witch? The d—'s in me if I —."

"Yes, dear uncle, that you must leave off swearing so very much, and calling on the Evil One at every turn. It sounds so ill, and —. Will not uncle promise it to his little Gôtha?"

"That I would do with confounded pleasure, my little heart," replied the general, good-humoredly, "if I could keep my promise. But the devil fetch me if I could! Old habits stick so close, you see. And besides, I think that it sounds exceedingly well, that I do. If I were to say, for example, 'my little Gôthilda is a good girl,' how would it sound? Why, just as water-gruel tastes, deuced insipid and flat. But if I should say, 'my little Gôthilda is a d—lishly confounded famous girl!' that sounds well, that has some flavor in it, it has! That has horse-radish in it—it puts some spirit into the thing. Tell me, don't you think yourself that it sounds exceedingly well?"

"Ye—s, certainly," stammered Gôthilda, smiling and blushing, and rather vexed with herself; "but—but—"

"Yes, you see it, my dear girl!" exclaimed the general, laughing; "yes, yes, you are of my sort, that you are! But I can never believe that you are afraid lest the devil and his people should come bodily some fine day and carry off those who call upon him. But don't be afraid of that, my lass—I have settled that business long ago with our Lord. He knows, as well as I do, that it is only the breath of the mouth, and you may believe me, he does not trouble himself about it, any more than I trouble myself about some grains of pepper in the cabbage. And you also must bear with me, my little butterfly."

"With this he kissed her and rose; and Göthilda, somewhat crest-fallen at the result of this attack, which had been long arranged between her and Engel, and now had been resolutely attempted, consoled himself with cracking nuts with the others, and tried not to hear Bror's derisive whisper, "How did you like it?" and not to see a long nose which that young fellow, Jarl, very quickly and maliciously made at her.

Later in the evening Hedvig saw Engel sitting silently, with her head thrown back and her fixed eyes, as if by a spell, upon some object which seemed to occupy her whole soul. She went up to her and said—

"What are you looking so steadfastly at, my little Engel?"

Engel started a little and blushed while she said, "At Augustin and his friend! Look at them, Hedvig, how handsome and good they look!"

Hedvig saw Augustin and Uno sitting in the recess of a window, in conversation, and their fine grave profiles came out extremely well against the dark-red window-curtains. In order to prove what were her sister's feelings, Hedvig said—

"But Uno is not handsome; and besides that, he is so reserved, so——"

"Not handsome!" repeated Engel, astonished and almost displeased, "I know no one so handsome as he—except Augustin!" added she, blushing at her own earnestness.

An hour afterward—the watchman had already sounded ten o'clock upon his inharmonious horn—Hedvig and Augustin were alone together in the parlor. It was their custom to spend an hour together in the evenings, after all the others were gone. Every thing was quiet around them. The lamp burned dimly. Augustin stood at the window. It was a starlight but a stormy night, and the wind bore at intervals to the window the sounds of the lively music of a ball in the neighborhood. Hedvig went up to her brother, and laying her hand softly on his, and looking up into his face, she said tenderly, "How are you this evening? You are not well!"

"No," said Augustin, "the old trouble is there!" and he took Hedvig's hand and pressed it to his heart; "I have seen her this evening!" added he.

"Resina?"

"Yes! she was with—G——a."

"And she?—was she like herself?"

"Yes—no. She was beautiful as formerly, but yet different. It distressed me to see her. When I consider what that nobly-endowed being might have been, and what she now is, and how she becomes more and more——"

"Was she not friendly toward you?"

"Too much so!—Too much so for what now is and can henceforth be between us. She spoke about 'friendship and the old bond,' which she wishes to renew. She will call on you; will be 'with us as formerly.' How is that possible? If she had loved that man for whom she deserted me; had she esteemed him;—but it was merely vanity, self-interest, love of the world;—no, no! It is too late for that, and I can only wish to be able to forget! The wound is yet too fresh! But she requires a friend, and you, Hedvig, ought to become to her what I never can."

"Ah, Augustin!" interrupted Hedvig, "what can I be to another! I feel myself often so weak, so deficient of power even for myself; so that I——" and Hedvig's head sank upon Augustin's shoulder—"that I wish to lay myself down and merely sleep—sleep! I am weary sometimes, weary of life! My heart, sometimes, is so strongly agitated—it desires to live an expansive and noble life; to breathe forth warm and beautiful feelings—but as it can not do so, there are times, moments, when I wish—merely to sleep!"

Hedvig's unusually excited tone and words quickly drew Augustin's attention from himself to her. He inquired, with the most lively tenderness, after the cause of this excitement, and thus became acquainted with the sacrifice which Hedvig had made that day, had been obliged to make, of a life, a future which, to her essentially womanly nature, seemed to be the only happy one—a life as wife and mother. She showed Augustin the letter which she had received, and the one which she had written in reply. It was a consolation to her to consult with her brotherly friend on this subject. Augustin read both letters with tenderness.

"You have done very right," said he, "very right both for him, for yourself, and for us all. Oh! I would that it could be otherwise, but it is not to be thought of. Ludvico, noble and excellent as he is, is not sufficiently a man of business to be able to provide for a family by his earnings; and the small salary he has, is merely enough for himself. You have done very right, very prudently for us all, but—ah, Hedvig!—that you yourself should have so little happiness in it!"

"Ah, that is nothing at all, Augustin," said Hedvig, comforted by his sympathy, "and in a little while I shall become calmer and stronger. You will see that. Don't be troubled about it."

Augustin's glance rested with great tenderness upon his sister, and while he did so, he seemed to gaze into her future.

"Yes," said he, "a time will come which will be good for you, and when you will be happy. That I believe; that I feel sure of! But yet I wish I could see your life, a few years hence, more agreeable and less laborious in great and little things. We men are so egotistic in our way of dividing labor on earth. We have a view to our own success, to the advancement of our own interests in our occupations; we make for ourselves, between whiles, pleasures out of the house, and we regard the so doing almost as a sacred duty toward ourselves. Always, always are we thinking of ourselves. But you—but you, Hedvig, and your sister-souls in the world, what is your life but a continual labor, a continual carrying and dragging for others? From early morning till late at night is your life split up into many anxieties, small and great, for every body and every thing around you. I actually am ashamed, Hedvig, when I consider how little you think about yourself, your comfort, your pleasure; and how I—"

"Nay," interrupted Hedvig, with her usual good-tempered and rather humorous tone: "nay, now, I can not bear any longer to listen if you are unjust to yourself, Augustin, and toward men and brothers who resemble you. And were there many such men in the world, women would find their services easy in the house, and both honorable and delightful also. And that I do after all, Augustin, and for your sake I shall find them increasingly so, now that I know my fate is determined. Do not be uneasy about me, Augustin. God will help me—and you. And now we must talk a little about the others, and their future. I have to-day had a letter from Gerda. She is coming here, in March, with her intended and mother-in-law elect. She is very cordial, and it is quite affecting to see how pleased she is at the thought; but still, in this letter, and in all her letters of late, there is a something which makes me uneasy; she is evidently not cheerful, not happy, and has something on her mind which she will not speak out."

"Yes, I have remarked it too," said Augustin; and I very much fear that this engagement, this marriage, is not a suitable one for her."

"Ah, I fear so too!" said Hedvig. "She scarcely ever mentions Sigurd in her letters. In the mean time, the wedding is fixed for the first of May, and fourteen days before this she goes home with her future mother-in-law and her intended, and such of us as will go with them, because the wedding is to take place at G——: that is decided."

"Yes—but we shall see Gerda before this; and she comes to be some time with us. I confess that I long to watch her and her lover together more narrowly. Even when they were here for a few weeks, some years ago, there was a something in their acquaintance which I did not like, and which caused me not to augur well for the future. However, we shall see. There may, perhaps, be some fault, even on her side. It is an affair that really troubles me. But, Hedvig, there is another acquaintance which promises us pleasure, because I think it begins to look serious. I mean Uno's inclination for our Engel."

"Yes, Augustin, I wish to have a little talk with you on that very subject. I am convinced that it is beginning to be mutual."

"That would give me the highest delight," exclaimed Augustin. "Engel is indeed hardly more than a child yet; but Uno is a perfect man, and a better man I am not acquainted with."

"Do you say so, Augustin? Oh, then, I shall be heartily happy if Uno thinks seriously about Engel; but I must confess that, much as I like him, there is something in him which makes me uncertain, uncomfortable—I don't know exactly how."

"He has something determined, something reserved in his character," returned Augustin, "which operates as a restraint; and I can not say that he has been in any way confidential with me. But I have had opportunities of seeing and hearing much about him which pleases me in a high degree. He is a man who possesses an unusual excellence of disposition and inclination, and he is an uncommonly good man. He does, in silence, an infinite deal of good; and on his own estate he has so arranged that his dependents need not remain in poverty excepting through their own fault. In truth, I do not know a man to whom I would rather give one of my sisters, so certain am I that he will make her happy."

"What you say, Augustin, really delights me. Because I have begun to be uneasy since I observed how strongly Engel is attracted by this man. Now, I venture to hope that it is for the best, and I know scarcely any greater pleasure that could fall to my lot than to see Engel happily married, and under circumstances so fortunate as those in which this marriage would place her, even in a worldly point of view. But, Augustin, we must talk about Ivar. Do you know what is amiss with him? He is dreadfully changed within a short time, and his countenance sometimes has an expression which makes me afraid of him. He is, also, inaccessible and reserved. Can he have any unhappy love-affair? Gøthilda talks and jokes about some Lady Calypso, who has taken him captive."

"Yes, yes, poor Ivar; I fear that he is in the toils of some such goddess of the second or third order! You surely remember a beautiful French woman who came here last winter, and said that she was the widow of a Swedish officer who had died abroad. She was noticed very much for some time on account of her appearance, her agreeable manners, and vivacity; all at once, however, she withdrew from society, and merely saw people at her own house. She continues still to give small suppers two or three times a week, where I hear that play goes on very high. Ivar was immediately somewhat captivated by this handsome lady, and when I, having heard some reports not very advantageous to her character, partly in joke and partly in earnest, warned him of her acquaintance, he became violently angry at the injustice both of myself and the world toward 'the first, greatest female character of the day.' I joked him about his enthusiasm; he was hurt, and from that time became reserved toward me. In the mean time, I know that he is frequently present at these suspicious little suppers, and—I am very uneasy about this connection, particularly as it is evident that his temper is entirely ruined. Hedvig, you must talk to him; seek to win his confidence. I have not time for it; and besides, he is on his guard against me. He, like Gerda, seems to me to suffer from not knowing his own mind—from not discovering what it is that he wishes and ought to do. The fate of many a person is, up to a certain point, a tangle, which must be unraveled by friendly hands, if it is not to be tightened into an irretrievable knot. Sweet sister, I depend upon your gentle, tender—I know how skillful you are in such arts and emergencies." And Augustin kissed again and again his sister's soft hands.

"Take care—you will spoil me!" said Hedvig, smiling.

"Yes, that may be!" said Augustin. "I shall do my best toward it."

Hedvig had still a communication to make out of the chronicle of the day, and that was Maja's prayer on behalf of the erring Hannah, and the taking of her into the service of the family.

Hedvig had not miscalculated upon Augustin's sympathy in this affair, and his willingness to do what she wished.

"Ah!" continued he, "we fortunate people ought to think more than we do about those 'who sit in darkness,' and labor increasingly for those whose punishment is so great and severe in comparison with their crime! Families might do much, particularly if servants and masters and mistresses united, as in this case. I have also thought—but it is not worth while to talk about it now. Some time, Hedvig, when my position in life is more independent than now, and when I have more leisure, I should be very glad to do something, even I, toward the solution of one of the most difficult questions of our time—the manner in which those who labor under social disadvantages and oppressions may be relieved; the fallen raised again.

"God bless you for the thought, for the intention, my Augustin! And how gladly would I live with you for it, and help you—if I could!"

"If you could!" repeated Augustin. "Both as regards my own private interests and those of the community, you must stand by my side Hedvig. There is a great resemblance in our fates, as well as in the problem of our future. Hand-in-hand will we endeavor to solve it. We have a large family circle to live for, my Hedvig? It is not ordained that every one should be married and become fathers and mothers; but it is ordained that we, one and all, should be brothers and sisters to each other!"

The two stood silent for a long time, gently embracing. The lights of heaven beamed down brightly upon them, and above them ascended a starry image, the most beautiful thought which is written in stars upon the vault of heaven. It was the constellation of the twins; it was "the brothers' and sisters' house," with its bright, double stars, and its divine story about an immortal brotherly love.

So stood our brother and sister a long time, and all became still and bright. There fell as it were a starry dew upon their souls, and they felt that the seed of eternal life had taken root.

REPRESENTATIONS.

"Be quiet! be quiet! throbbing heart! Restless thoughts and wishes, be silent! Down, bitter feelings! Away, tormenting spirits! I will be calm, and strong, and free. Endure, oh, my heart! combat resolutely, oh will! till the night is past, and the rosy light of the morning ascends!"

Do you recognize the song? do you remember to have sung it with silent lips amid the heat and burden of the day; amid the long, sleepless nights? You, the heroes and heroines of the inner life, whose silent combats, victories, or defeats no human eyes behold! Yes, you know it; often have you sung it, watching over the battle-field of your happiness.

"Let me sleep, sleep only!" sighed Hedvig. Yes, she slept not that night, neither did Augustin. But already many a night had this brother and sister lain awake. It is a fact, that the best, the noblest hearts may suffer much and long upon earth. But, pure and troubled souls! for you has heaven marvelous consolations and peace in store; for you are growing in the silence, beneath the snow, the seeds of paradisaical flowers, which await only a warm day to spring up—and that day, believe me—comes!

A no small source of satisfaction to pure-hearted people is, their capacity for enjoying the little things, the crumbs of life; souls which have something dark behind them or within them can not do this.

Hedvig experienced something of this power of the innocent heart, in the morning after this sleepless night, when she came down to the breakfast table, and found it festively arrayed, and a Persian lilac—her favorite flower—standing in full bloom by her plate, where a gilt and tastefully-painted cup of genuine china, and a teaspoon of silver-gilt, reminded Hedvig that it was her birthday, and testified the affection of brothers and sisters, and their wish to please her. Hedvig quickly found herself surrounded by these brothers and sisters, who, smiling and caressing, bowing and courtesying, in joke and in earnest, attested their regard, and offered their congratulations.

Bror and Göthilda presented her with a great gratulation on a large sheet of paper, on which was seen the formidable representation of the whole family uniting in a congratulation in verse, which congratulation the said brother and sister, with great exultation over their own cleverness, had conjointly written, and which began with the following poetical effusion:—

Sister Hedvig, with delight,
All lovely joy and pleasure,
Are mixed thee on this day so bright
In hopes, and without measure.
And that thou never want may'st know
On earth where ills await us,
A well-oiled wheel and lots of tow,
Warm friendship and potatoes.

Hedvig's little every-day habits and peculiarities were parodied in the succeeding verses with much merriment. Family affection does not dread such parodies, but finds in them the best seasoning for its every-day dishes. Hedvig could not help laughing at those verses which gave Bror and Göthilda such indescribable delight.

"My present to you," said Augustin softly to his sister, "is in the kitchen; and there you must receive it."

"In the kitchen?" said Hedvig, smiling in wonder, but followed her brother out into the kitchen, where she saw a young girl, who stood by the side of the clear, yet tearful-eyed Maja, and, deeply blushing, dropped on her knees, and embraced those of Hedvig, as Augustin said, "This, Hannah, is your mistress."

Hedvig now understood all.

"Oh, Augustin!" she exclaimed at length, "that, in truth, is the most precious gift you could give me. But how have you been able so quickly to arrange this matter?"

"I knew," said Augustin, "that uncle could not refuse any thing which would give you pleasure on your birth-day, and therefore I attacked him on this delicate subject early this morning, laying before him your and my proposition. He growled a little at our 'modern theories,' and said that people nowadays do more for criminals than for honest people, but at length he gave his consent to every thing that we wished; and—the rest I have managed with the police. Maja herself has fetched her protégée, as was only reasonable."

What good did her brother's kindness, and the joy of the honest Maja to the heart of Hedvig! Oh, believe me, such deeds are more heart-strengthening than the apples of Iduna, if they are not just fruits of that kind.

When Hedvig turned to quit the kitchen, she perceived her uncle Herkules standing at the door, examining, with keen and inquisitive glances, the new-comer.

"She does not look so badly," said he at length to Hedvig, "and she may be likely to give you satisfaction. But keep an eye upon her—that is my advice. Such people are not to be trusted. No, upon my soul, are they not!"

Hedvig promised to be vigilant: and when she came into the breakfast-room, and saw around her all that she loved, and beheld in their looks how dear she was to them, it became warm and light within her, and she could say to her secret pain—"Thou art not an evil."

At the breakfast-table she was again the kind and cordial hostess, and found one pleasant fact after another to read aloud from the newspaper, which always lay by her breakfast-plate, as one also lay by that of Augustin: for they both liked to keep up with the times. Again the gratulatory presents were examined and admired, with their garnishing of extraordinary flowers, and those extraordinary faces of cherubim, such as are often seen on similar would-be witty productions in the houses of the peasantry in Sweden; and the verses were again gone through, in a declamatory style, by Bror, who called upon his hearers to pay particular attention to the lofty flight and aim of the concluding strophe:—

If thou would'st any pleasure win
In this life's wildering route,
Kill care and hang him on a pin,
De'il take him out and out.
Courage! and our wild winter's dance,
Though near the pole begun,
Shall one day 'mid the stars advance,
And waitz into the sun.

Tegren never achieved a higher flight. That was admitted; and, with the usual modesty, our young poets received their meed of praise.

"Ivar! will you promise me one thing—one pleasure on my birth-day?" said Hedvig, as she followed her brother out into the hall, as he was about to go away.

"Yes, as gladly as I live—or more so, for otherwise that were not much to say," replied Ivar; "but what is it?"

"It is, dear Ivar, that you will avoid exciting uncle, and not answer him, when he is excited, then and there. Remember that he is old, and you are young, and that he is our common benefactor. You can not believe how this wrangling wounds me, and I can not understand, dear Ivar, how you find pleasure in it."

"Pleasure. no, that God knows; but it occupies my mind sometimes, and diverts my thoughts into a different channel to—But if I give pain to others, Hedvig, it is because I suffer myself. There are moments when—but, no matter. Good-by, Hedvig, I will not quarrel—I will be like a lamb, or rather a sheep, with uncle, to-day at least, and—so long as I can. Farewell."

He went out hastily—he looked pale and unhappy.

Not long afterward, Hedvig's steps took the way softly but firmly, toward her brother's dwelling.

When she entered the room, she saw Ivar, sunk in an easy chair, with his arms crossed, and his eyes fixed on a picture placed on the easel, and which he was beginning to copy. It represented Judith with the head of Holofernes. The eyes of the lovely woman were wet with weeping; the breath seemed to come with difficulty through the pallid lips; one hand held the sword half-hidden in her flowing robes, but the other, so beautiful, so warm with love, lay on the ghastly and bloody head beside her. You saw, in this act, in the indescribable expression of both hand and countenance, that Judith, while she had slain the enemy of her country, had also murdered her own love; but she had sacrificed the woman to the patriot, and the heroine.

The room, in every thing else, displayed an artistic chaos. Elegant articles of dress were hung upon sofa and chairs; on the table lay manuscripts, microscopes, books in utter confusion, besides a brace of pistols. Hedvig's eyes fixed themselves rapidly on the last, and then reverted to her brother who sat with his back toward her. He gazed no longer on the picture, but buried his face in his hands, and appeared sunk in despair.

Hedvig approached, and laid her hand on his shoulder, at the same time pronouncing his name.

Ivar started, looked wildly up, and demanded hastily—

"What is it? What do you want?"

"Only to call on you, and see how you are," said Hedvig, in her kind manner.

"Oh, indeed! Thanks! oh, I am quite well—ill, I believe—I don't know exactly how I am."

"Ah, Ivar! it has not been well with you for some time. I have observed it long.

There is something on your mind; something that makes you unhappy. Tell me, can I help you?"

"God bless you, dear sister!" said Ivar with his most beautiful expression, as he gazed upon her with tearful eyes.

"Tell me only, Ivar, what I can do—I will do it so willingly. Let us talk, let us think together."

"Talk!—think! And of what use will that be?"

"To find some way, some means of helping you."

"But if no way, no means are to be found at all? If I—if I am altogether past help?"

"That is not possible. Ivar. God will find—there is always found—"

"But I tell you, Hedvig, that no help can be found for me; that I must, must—that I shall be lost, for—I will not be helped."

Hedvig was silent—terrified by the vehemence of her brother's speech and manner.

"You, good, sisterly souls," continued Ivar, bitterly, "you believe that every thing can be helped, and patched, and mended up, because you have never encountered any thing but trifling rents and bruises. But while you are talking so finely about every thing being capable of help, there sits a Tasso in the madhouse, poor Haydon shoots himself through the head, and countless sacrifices to misfortune and despair sink daily into the gulf of perdition; and I—I shall sink like them."

"And if they thus sink, Ivar, may it not be because they have no friend at hand, or that they will not listen to his prayers and his counsel?"

"That may be; but it may also be, that their misery is stronger than human counsel and comfort. Hedvig—I have played a high game. I have set all my happiness on one throw, and—I have lost, and . . . I am bankrupt. O, this terrible, devouring agony! . . . But what avails it to speak to you?—you know not what it is to love."

"I—do I not know it?" said Hedvig; and the tears, which had long swelled in her breast, flowed abundantly over her pale cheeks.

"No," continued Ivar, without noticing this, "no, to love with fire, with the whole strength of your being, with the worshipping homage of heaven, and a consuming flame at the same time. But thou canst not, and dost not understand. Thou art an angel, Hedvig. Can any angel know overruling fire? Can it be carried away fascinated by the strong powers of the earth? Angels only cross themselves, and flee. They love only the heavenly, and the heavenly spreads its blessed peace over them in sorrow as in joy. But when one loves a d—!—When we know ourselves to go to perdition with her, will rather suffer torment with her, than without her enjoy heaven and all its blessedness . . . look you, Hedvig, this is love. And such love is mine!"

"And—you are loved in return?" demanded Hedvig.

Ivar sprang up, stamped, and wrung his hands, as he exclaimed—

"O, that I did but know that!—that I was certain of that;—then could I sink to destruction, and exult—then could I kiss the dagger which gave me death. But not to know—to doubt—to feel the serpent which has fascinated, which has stung me, glide away cold and slippery—O, what torment! Mark me, Hedvig! I have confided in this woman more than in thyself, or in my Maker. I saw in her a new revelation—saw the perfect, the free woman which St. Simon imagined, and his disciples sought—in vain. I believed that I had found her, and she became my light, my sun, my eyes. I saw the whole world glorified through her; my own future, and the future of mankind, glowed in the ruddy morning light of a new day—a day the light of which she was, and which I became through her. She has darkened, and with her every thing: I do not know myself again. Hedvig! there are terrible beings. They fascinate, they allure, like the mermaid in the sagas—promise inexpressible happiness, and draw their lovers to them, only to offer them to death. They appear glowing, full of mystic fire, but within they are cold and hollow as the grave. They are beautiful and smiling in front, but seen from behind they are hideous wretches. O! why do such as these possess such wonderful power? O! I feel myself bound, drawn along, and can never again be extricated. The whirlpool has already seized me, and I must go down."

"But I will not let go of you, Ivar!" exclaimed Hedvig, embracing him. "My beloved brother! I hold you fast, and will contend for you. You must not, you shall not perish!"

"Give me then the will to resist!—give me only the power to will it! But ah! see, Hedvig, a longing seizes me,—look at that pale, bloody head. I would be like that, simply that it might be her work, and that she laid her warm, beautiful hand thus—thus.—Ah! my God!"

"Ivar pressed his face forcibly with his hands, and wept aloud. Hedvig silently mingled her tears with his, without uttering a word. This calmed Ivar. He raised himself, and said, affectionately—

"Pardon me, dear Hedvig! I know that I distress you; I shall perhaps often distress you again! You see in me a shipwrecked wretch, who still holds fast by a plank, and rises and falls with the waves. For I am not always thus. I am sometimes better: there are moments when I hope that she is still the same as formerly; that merely an appearance, an illusion, impose on me—that an evil demon, some unblest misunderstanding, has got between us, which must and will soon be dissipated, and then—merciful Heaven! then. But soon—soon must I have assurance of this. I can not long live, as I live now. What intolerable days and nights!"

"You believe that she loves another?" asked Hedvig.

"I suspect it," said Ivar. "Count B., of the French legation, is often with her; he is rich and clever, people say. I know only that he plays high, and that he is often with her on a footing—for which I could hate her, and take his life. But she commands me by her pride, her plausible words. She protects that she loves me only, but—she does not admit me so often as before, and is to me no longer the same. The false one!—O! that I could but properly hate her! There are moments that I feel as if I could do it: but a single look of hers, and I am her slave more than ever. I wish that the ice on which I walk would either bear or break. This state of restlessness, doubt, and uncertainty, is insupportable!"

"But, Ivar, you should seek some employment, some diversion which might occupy your thoughts, and settle you."

"I am continually painting, as you see. I endeavor to write, to compose, but all my power has departed. I can do nothing more. There lies, as it were, an electric sky above me, which destroys all my vigor!"

Hedvig sighed. She felt herself destitute of counsel for this condition. At length she said—

"The air without is fresh and cool; shall we not allow it to breathe upon us, Ivar? I will willingly take a long walk with you. Will you not go with me?"

Ivar consented: pleased on some pretext to be snatched from himself and his tormenting thoughts. He took his cloak and hat, lit his cigar, and soon the brother and sister were strolling in the still winter air, on the new-fallen snow, out toward Norrtull. The opportunity of sledging had drawn out a multitude of sledgers, who, with white nets fluttering on their snorting horses, came gayly ringing their bells along the road toward the Stallmästar-gård;* grand sledges, with ladies and gentlemen wrapped in warm furs; little, rapid sledges, with one gentleman behind, another sitting on bear or tiger skins, flew at full speed past, scattering the snow on the quiet foot-passengers.

Hedvig, whose open bosom, free from all envy, enjoyed every thing that was beautiful, was charmed with the spectacle of the fine sledges and the noble steeds; of the handsome bonnets of the ladies, with their flying plumes and veils, and the lively and joyous movements.

* A celebrated tavern near Stockholm.—TRANSL.

"See how beautiful it is!" she exclaimed more than once.

"I think it is not very beautiful or joyous to be splashed all over by their horses!" rejoined Ivar, angrily. "If we were rich, Hedvig, I would drive you in a handsome sledge, and you should not be splashed by the equipages of others, as you are now."

"It is only snow," said Hedvig, shaking the flakes from her fur cloak; "and for my part, I much prefer walking to driving. One is more independent on foot. The horses of the apostles are my favorites."

"Yes, if I were but rich," continued Ivar, "many things would be different to what they are. The rich are happy. It is easy for them to win respect, pleasure, advantage of every kind—and the favor of handsome women. It is the unjust distribution of things in the world that makes me exasperated with it. I love justice, right, and have not patience to see every where the contrary. If I had but the power, much should be altered. I therefore thought, sometimes, whether I could not do something toward a new and better state of things; but that was perhaps a dream, like many another beautiful thought and belief. The more I see of this world, the less I think it worth while to live in it, or to strive for it. Chance, the blind goddess, has far too much power. Numbers of human beings must perish, in order that others may succeed. Death seems to me the only representative of justice on earth: he treats all alike."

Hedvig listened to Ivar's bitter outbreak, and comprehended by it the contest in his soul. He continued thus for a good while to abuse the world and its proceedings, and secretly, at the same time, his own fate, in which many great and noble desires appeared to be trodden down by want and adversity. But at length he said abruptly—

"But, Hedvig, why do you say nothing? Are you become altogether dumb?"

"No," said Hedvig, kindly; "I think I could answer you in many particulars, but I am certain that all that I could now say you will say much better yourself when you are so disposed. . . . Shall we go a little way into the wood here, Ivar, and rest upon the rocks under the trees?"

The brother and sister now found themselves in the beautiful wood of Solna. The city sledging-parties had not yet come so far. Here were peace and quiet, and the fine trees of the wood murmured softly over their heads. This calm freshness of the air, Hedvig's gentle words and tone of mind, operated beneficially on Ivar. The bitter, distracted expression of his countenance gave way to a mild melancholy.

They left the track, and went on a little distance up into the wood. Here, beneath lofty pines, protruded a little mossy rock, offering a convenient seat. The green vault overhead had prevented the snow from penetrating into this place, and green and fresh lay the carpet of moss on the earth. Hedvig seated herself on the rocky seat; Ivar threw himself down on the ground, and laid his head on her knee.

"You will be cold," said she, anxiously.

"Cold!" exclaimed Ivar—"God grant it. It would be a comfort. I burn—the green, cooling earth! Happy he who can bed himself deep, deep in it! . . . Do you weep over me, Hedvig, or is it some angel from above? . . . Weep not now. I am not now in danger, I am calm. . . . How delightfully the wood sounds. Here let us build a hut, far from all mankind! I will cut wood for you, fetch water, work. . . . Then might I perhaps be once more a man. . . . But there are two men in me: the one good, warm, wishing every creature well, and desiring to live and labor for them. The other is egotistical, vain, irritable, and revengeful; and the two contend within me for life or death. But the evil one is in the ascendant. I have felt it for some time. Now he is silent; he sleeps; but I know that he is there, and will waken again."

"Let us not awaken him! let him sleep!" said Hedvig.

"Yes, forever if he will!" said Ivar. "He creates, sometimes, a hell in me. I myself could sleep now. I have not slept for many a night: so calm as I am now I have not felt for a long time. This is a blessed place, Hedvig."

And, soothed by the sound of the pine trees, Ivar actually slept, while Hedvig's hand played with his dark locks.

For a few minutes only, however, continued this sleep. It was broken by a wild shout in the wood, at which Ivar sprang hastily up—and they saw a little man, clad in skins, and with a pointed fur cap, leap down from a cliff to the ground, and with the speed of an arrow, hasten on his snow-skates into the wood.

"That is a Laplander!" said Hedvig. "No doubt one of those recently arrived from Lapland, with a present of reindeer for the king. Shall we follow him, Ivar? I would gladly see the reindeer. They certainly pasture them here in the wood."

They followed the traces of the Laplander, and it was not long before they came upon a herd of almost thirty reindeer, part of them lying on the snow, and part of them busy seeking and feeding on the reindeer moss under it. In a cleft of the rocks overshadowed by lofty pines, sat the nomadic attendants, small grotesque figures, with sparkling brown eyes, and dark, shaggy hair, streaming out from beneath their head-dresses.

Ivar and Hedvig entered into conversation with them. The Laplanders belonged to the so-called Swedish Laplanders, who do not live so far north as the others, and speaking Swedisch as well as their mother tongue.

Hedvig admired their fine stomachers ornamented with silver, noticed the various implements which were suspended to the belt which encircled their waists, and among which was their scanty toilet apparatus.

"What has induced you," she asked, "to come so very far from your own country with your reindeer?"

"What?" said one of the women, briskly and energetically, "shall we not bring a present to our new king? My troth, he has plenty of children to feed, that he has! Shall not then his children in Lapland help him with this? And as for our way back, we shall find it as well as we found it hither."

"Are you well off then, in your cold country?" asked Hedvig of one of the men, whose blue eyes and melancholy expression did not accord with the usual Lapland physiognomy. He replied, with a sort of pensive serenity—

"Oh yes! God has appointed to every one his lot; and that which people are accustomed to, that they can endure."

"Have you any books, then?" demanded Ivar from another of the men with sparkling, dark-brown genuine Lapland eyes, and knowing aspect.

"O yes!" he replied, "we have the Bible, and Luther's Sermons—Arndt's 'True Christianity,' and the 'Voice of one crying in the wilderness,' and many others; so that there is no want of those that show us the way. The difficulty is to go to it."

"That is really excellent!" said Ivar—"I fancy that we must actually travel to Lapland to learn wisdom."

"Yes he is wise—wiser than I am," said the brown-eyed one, turning his gaze on the melancholy one, whose large eyes were apparently made to see farther than into the world of the Laplander's tent.

"Tell me, my old man," said Ivar to this one, "do you not wish, sometimes, for something that you can not obtain; and what say you then?"

"As God will!" answered the Laplander. "And come the day, comes help. It never dawns without council. God rules all for the best."

"If things go altogether to distraction? If every thing runs against you; if all things turn out unfortunately, and you lose all that you hold dear?"

"Shall we not receive the evil day as well as the good?" said the Laplander. "What God does, that is good!"

And this the other Laplanders also reiterated.

"One can not move these people," said Ivar, impatiently. "Can you not sing something, good people?"

The Laplanders made some excuses, but suffered themselves to be persuaded, and the youngest of the men sang a sporting song, in which the cries of wood-birds, bears, and wolves were imitated in as unmelodious a voice as possible. After that, one of the women sang a love song, little more harmonious, but from which a melody of soft, warm sincerity broke forth like a sunbeam, though fleeting as Lapland's summer, and as the episode of love in their smoky and wearisome existence.

"You can also tell fortunes?" said Hedvig; "which of you will tell me mine?" And she stretched forth her hand.

"Nay, see what a beautiful white hand!" exclaimed the young singer, enchanted, and seized Hedvig's hand in his little black-brown ones.

"Are people tolerably gallant in Lapland?" said Ivar: and he gave the Laplander a silver penny, and bade him tell the lady's fortune.

The Laplander contemplated the lines of the hand, and promised long life, good fortune, children, and flowers.

"Now tell the gentleman his fortune," said Hedvig, amused by the life and expression of the little man. Dear Ivar, give them your hand, for the joke's sake. Pity that Göthilda is not with us."

Ivar stretched out his hand carelessly to the woman who had sung the love-story. She gazed at it long and observantly; then let it go, and would not say a word.

"What now?" said Ivar, struck with wonder; "what means this? And why will you not tell me my fortune?"

The woman only shook her head.

"Do you then see something so terrible in my hand?" asked Ivar; "some fate so disastrous? Speak out. I am not unprepared. Will you not? Well, then, some one of the others must tell me what it is."

But when Ivar presented his hand to the rest, then began the woman who had just been asked to speak warmly and excitedly in the Lapland language, showing to them the make of the hand, and hereupon all the others began to talk; a dispute, for so it sounded, in their own tongue, but still they came to the same unanimous conclusion, not to tell Ivar his fortune from his hand.

"That was curious, indeed!" said Ivar, as he withdrew with Hedvig. "But did I not tell you, Hedvig, that my fate was unfortunate?"

"Ah!" said Hedvig, smiling, but still inwardly vexed at the upshot of the experiment to amuse Ivar; "I believe just as little the fortune with children and flowers, which they read in my hand. It is egregious folly. But, Ivar, did you notice how cheerful, and, on the whole, happy, those step-children of nature appeared. How contented with their lot!"

"Yes," said Ivar, and he thought, they have probably much to thank their obtuse or rather petrified minds. "It is a strange feature of this nomadic and yet stationary race, who continually traverse the arctic circle, and never escape from a fixed circle of unprogressive ideas."

"And yet it is good, Ivar," replied Hedvig, "when these are broken from the rock, like sundry of those which they expressed. I rejoice in the fullness of their faith, and trust that they have this midnight sun to light and warm them in their long winter nights."

"It grows dark, Hedvig!" said Ivar, gloomily; "let us hasten home. I think the heavens will fall upon us."

And they seemed actually to bow themselves down, and snow began to fall heavily. The two proceeded silently; at length Hedvig took Ivar's hand, pressed it, and felt, by the kind return of the pressure, that he was not displeased with her.

It was dinner-time when they got home; the clock struck three. At table uncle Hercules brought out wine, in honor of sister Hedvig. Ivar drunk glass after glass without uttering a word, further than uniting in the healths which were proposed. His obviously unhappy turn of mind communicated itself to the whole circle, except to uncle Hercules, who took no notice of it, was gay and jovial, and exhorted the rest to drink. The moment they rose from table, Ivar went away, on the plea of headache.

In the drawing-room the pleasant afternoon fire blazed in the grate, and made the room bright and glad. Uncle Hercules sits in the corner of the sofa, and takes a nap after his coffee. In an easy chair, by the fire, with her feet on a soft ottoman, sits sister Hedvig cosily, for Hedvig loves all her little comforts, her great work-basket, with lid and handle beside—which perpetually attends her, and is sometimes excessively heavy with a variety of rubbish which her brothers smuggle into it—and all her sewing in her hand. But now the sewing and the hands rest on her knee, while she relates, to Augustin the events of the morning, and, with tears in her eyes, describes the state of poor Ivar. It is always so indescribably relieving to Hedvig to open her mind to Augustin, for he sympathizes so warmly, so earnestly, and yet looks always so bright, and invariably finds so much consolation. Thus it was now. He will see nothing at all dangerous in the brace of pistols which Hedvig saw among the papers on Ivar's table. Augustin has himself the very same. On the contrary, he sees such infinite good in Ivar's being willing to speak, allowing himself to let out some of the anguish which gathers within him. He sees in Hedvig's sympathy, in her affection, the electric conductor which will divert danger from Ivar's head. He raises his sister's courage, while he calms her uneasiness. In the mean time they resolve both to be watchful and active. Augustin undertakes to make himself better informed regarding the beautiful Hortense, the object of Ivar's passion, and will endeavor to obtain some account of her actual position with respect to her lover.

While the elder brother and sister thus conferred by the fire, the younger ones, that is, Bror, Engel, and Göthilda, were busily consulting in the dark, by a window, quietly but zealously, about that which we shall see anon. They agreed, at length, on a deputation, which was constituted by Bror, who repeatedly requested of sister Hedvig that, for this afternoon, she should be regarded as blind and dumb, and more especially dumb. That is, that she should neither see, hear, nor comprehend what was going on in the house, at least for a time.

Hedvig smiled, and promised. She had observed the whole of their proceedings, and although discovering, she would gladly be quiet and freed from all festivity, yet she would not allow herself, on that account, to spoil the children's pleasure.

The time arrived when Augustin must go to his work, and then Hedvig withdrew to her own room, leaving for the present a clear field to the young ones.

In her room, Hedvig had a long conversation with her new maid, speaking with her as a Christian and mistress of the family, of her future life and fresh duties. After this, Hedvig showed her her place in the house, her daily routine of business, and assured her that the same confidence should be put in her as in the other servants, and none of the articles of the house would be locked from her more than from the rest. She then consigned her to the care of the trusty Maja. After this she had to listen also to Maja, for her heart was full, and had great need to unburden itself about the morning's ramble; how fresh the wind blew, and how beautiful the sky was, and how bright the sun, and how happy she, Maja felt herself when she thought of the young creature who would now be taken out of prison, and conducted to freedom among good people, and to an honorable life. It was all so "feeling-full."

After Hedvig had talked with Maja about the new-comer, her concerns and treatment, Maja went to pour out further her feelings before Corporal Stolt. But here she encountered the wrong man, and by no means one full of feeling. Stolt partook of his general's notions of criminals, especially if they were women; for Stolt was, in general, strict in his opinions about women. He was by no means pleased with the reception of Hannah into the house, assumed toward her at once a stiff and proud mien and tone, which she very soon met with a manner petulant and uncourteous, such as young girls even of a more educated class frequently commit the mistake of assuming, under the idea that it is an evidence of a fine independence. Thus the situation of things which arose from the reception of Hannah in the house became vastly less "feeling-full" than our warm-hearted Maja had flattered herself would be the case. This in passing. We have still a little more to relate of Hedvig's birth-day.

In the mean time had Göthilda and master Jarl made a great bustle, nailing, hammering, draping, and illuminating; and master Jarl, who, for his great talent for putting together, and still more for taking to pieces whatever could be thus treated, was styled, by Göthilda, the architect, made in haste a little master-piece of a theater for the scenes which were to be presented. There was an especial overture, and an establishment of rope and cloud which . . . yes, you shall see! you shall see!

Hedvig, who had found it impossible to obey Bror's injunction, to be deaf amidst all the hammering and nailing, and all sorts of confusion, the coming and going, which went forward in the house; nor was either so stupid, that she could not comprehend that all this portended a representation for the evening, which should not pass off without visitors, made her toilet, in order to be ready to receive them. Her dress was little different to her every-day attire, except that the white, three-cornered muslin neckerchief, which covered the well-formed bosom, and was fastened in the same manner as the peasant girls and women of the common class in Sweden wear their neckerchiefs, was now exchanged for a large, white, handsomely-embroidered pelerine, light as a cloud, which fell low down over a dark purple merino dress, with a quarter and half-quarter wide trimming of gray squirrel fur, the white gauze hiding not the full view of the handsome well-proportioned figure, which no stays appeared to cramp out of the harmony and ease of nature. A beautiful gold chain, the gift of uncle Herkules, rested on neck and bosom, and a little watch was stuck into her belt, the broad ends of which fell down to the trimming of the dress. This ornament Hedvig wore every day. The hair, without any adornment, as usual glossy and well dressed, was confined behind with a tortoise-shell comb, round which the plait lay simply and pleasingly; in front it was parted, and encircled her smooth and fine forehead in bands. Thus was Hedvig's appearance attractive and refreshing, and the eye rested on her with an enjoyment for which the soul seemed better, more pure, more harmonious. Hedvig was always dressed with care, and she cultivated her outward as well as her inward being. She did it, I imagine, without thought, from an internal instinct of beauty and purity. But had she thought of it, she would have done it equally, convinced that it is a duty of affection to endeavor to be agreeable to those about you, to parents, brothers and sisters, and other connections, just as much as for a husband or a bridegroom; and that the last is a highly sacred duty, neither books of education nor romances leave any doubt. Probably this extreme charm had no small part in the influence which she exercised over all at home, especially on her brothers.

Scarcely was Hedvig dressed when Augustin came to fetch her, and, availing himself of the occasion, and of his brotherly right to make a little bustle, and throw into a little disorder his orderly sister's orderly room, received the wished-for reproofs and lectures, kissed with assumed humility the hand of his corrector, laughed, took Hedvig's arm, and conducted her down to the company; for a little company of some connections and friends was, as Hedvig anticipated, assembled in the drawing-room, who received her, as she entered, with congratulations and flowers. Uno presented a bouquet which surpassed all the others in beauty.

We will present the guests, as rapidly as possible to the reader. And first we greet the admiral's lady, called by General Herkules, sister-in-law; and by our brothers and sisters, Aunt Queen Bee, a very kind and excellent person, but who far too much endeavors to represent "woman in her perfection," and to be "wiser than the seven wise men of Greece altogether," says General Herkules. She is a connoisseur in polite literature, and has of late acquired a passion for attending lectures. With brother-in-law Herkules, she is generally in strong opposition, and has with him not seldom hot sparrings, especially upon education, in which she regards herself as a great light, but on which the general declares that she is "stark mad," and she that the general is "not altogether in his senses." She insists that he utterly spoils Göthilda, in whom she takes a certain interest, and he protests that she through and through ruins Master Jarl Herkules for him, who would otherwise be a fine young fellow.

Master Jarl, the architect, whom we now for the first time introduce, is a boy of sixteen, his voice just breaking, and the whole of his being, soul and body, just in the sensitive period between boy and man. His father was a half-brother of the general's, living in Finland, who has a large family, and who, at the desire of "Aunt Queen Bee," his sister-in-law, left her one of his sons to be brought up in Sweden. Master Jarl at first was Göthilda's great friend and playmate; but of late years a division had taken place between them, occasioned by the less agreeable ways of the former, and the less tolerant spirit of the latter. Göthilda calls him a "rough diamond," and he, affronted at this, predicts that she will one day be among the "old maids." He looks a somewhat clumsy, large-limbed lad, with a great mop of hair hanging over his forehead: for the rest, he is steady, lively, and industrious, and therefore finds much favor in General Herkules' eyes, who begins to take more and more notice of him, and is angry with the home education that he receives from the sister-in-law, and which he declares will totally ruin his good abilities.

Here is also Director Urbanus Myrtenblad, called in this family and many others, Uncle Urbanus. He is a many-sided, highly accomplished man; has the good fortune, he tells you, to be the friend of almost every distinguished man in Sweden, and to think with them altogether, and to be in correspondence with them all. He is an elderly gentleman, a widower, rich, and a great friend of the ladies of the Dalberg family, especially of Göthilda, whose dawning capacity for music and poetry he endeavors to foster, by permitting her to admire his own fully-developed genius. He is, for the rest, a warm advocate of the lofty and the beautiful, a very estimable gentleman, rather deaf; the bore and torment of Ivar.

Serafina and Mina are two poor girls, the daughters of a rich father, the patron and superior of Bror. Some assert that he is a millionaire, others that it is "not so tremendous as that;" but the fact is, that he is so avaricious that it is both a sin and a shame. The two girls are motherless, good-looking, nice, modest, sentimental friends of Engel and Göthilda, but no favorites of General Herkules, who says of them, "There is no spirit in the girls—only fond of romances and such trash. They are not fit to set up housekeeping with. The deuce take such wretched looks. And one of them is consumptive—that is pitiable. But all this comes of reading those cursed romances."

It is certainly true that the young girls read romances immensely, and feed on them; but that is because their life at home is of such a pinched and penurious kind, as well through the character and disposition of their father, as through the blunt and bitter sister who manages his house. Young life will live; and if it do not find aliment in the world of reality it will seek it in that of fiction. But since Bror has come into the house he has constituted himself their "maitre de plaisirs," or counselor of enlivenment, and supplies them with books through which a marked selection is made in the favorite reading of the motherless young girls: and since Hedvig has taken them much by the hand, as much as she can, they are well and even tastefully dressed, although economically. Before, they had not a frock to put on free from a patch, and Aunt Perpetua's taste in ornament was abominable, especially when she tricked the poor children out in the rags of her own cast-off finery. The two young girls are clad exactly alike, and are alike in appearance, though one, Mina, has something more serious and firm than the other, Serafina, who is evidently more soft and sentimental. This is she who is consumptive.

We have also in the company a young gentleman, a friend of all the young in the Dalberg family, and especially of Ivar. He is called by them David—has been their playfellow, and, for his good heart, his fine voice, and many other good qualities, is beloved by them all, and by many others.

Finally, there is Lagertha Knutson, and—no more guests, I believe.

Yes! there is the Wandering Jew, now so much in vogue. He has entered the company, and looks, with his long beard and red short cloak, like something wholly unnatural. He introduces himself to the company as a traveling artist, and protests solemnly against the use which Eugene Sue has made of his personality. "He has never been in love; never fell on his knees by Behring's Straits; never had any thing to do with the cholera. He is an honorable tourist and lover of art, and travels round the world in order to increase his knowledge, and to diffuse a taste for the fine arts; and has come for this purpose even to Sweden, where he means to read a few lectures on some works of art of superior merit, and thus contribute to the elevation and ennobling of good taste. He has been invited to this company through a letter of recommendation from the pope, and is willing to sow the seeds of a higher cultivation of the world and of art, if it is desired, if he is entreated to do so."

The company wishes, the company entreats him to do it; and the Wandering Jew graciously consents, particularly as Göthilda, with whose resemblance to "the last Mrs. Nebuchadnezzar" he declares himself to be struck, earnestly unites with the rest in the request, and thereupon vanishes.

The company now seats itself in a half circle before a mysterious red curtain which covers a doorway; and in front of this, and in order probably to prepare the company for the approaching enjoyments of art, the Wandering Jew delivers a lecture. We deeply lament, and we are sure that the reader will deeply lament it with us, that we are not able to give it; for all who heard it said, that nothing more absurd, nothing more confused, had they ever heard. Augustin laughed till the tears ran down his cheeks, and even the melancholy Ivar was compelled to smile. Aunt Queen Bee was enchanted, and exclaimed one time after another, "Charmant! he is too droll; the little Bror! How clever he is!"

The lecture continued about half an hour, when the speaker, further to develop his views, said that he would demonstrate them by tableaux of action, or acting tableaux.

He entreated the attention of his whole audience to the pictures that he should now exhibit. "He could not certainly say whether they were after Raffaele, or after Hogarth."

The company smiled. The curtain was drawn up; and there was seen Hagar in the wilderness, sorrowing over the thirst-consumed Ishmael, who lay under a—spruce fir. Near him lay the empty water-flask. Gøthilda, notwithstanding her youth, was in the eastern costume, an admirable Hagar, energetic in the expression of her grief and despair.

"Nay, look at my little rattlepate, how grandly miserable she looks!" said the old count as he contemplated her. "Heaven send her help quickly. And help shall she have; that stands in the Bible, Where the dence is the angel loitering?"

The greater part of the spectators gazed on the form of Ishmael. The expression of patient suffering in the fine and engaging face of the child was irresistibly moving.

Uno seemed to feel it so. Stooping forward, he contemplated the child (it was Engel) with a deep and sorrowful attention. His face became pale as if he had witnessed some sorrowful reality.

"Attention!" exclaimed the traveling artist, "now comes the new and extraordinary!" The background of the picture moved; heaven appeared to open (the architect's master-piece), and an angel descended, upon a shining cloud.

But whether the architect and machinist let down the cloud too hastily, or that the rope broke, or the angel became giddy, certain it is that it lost its balance, and, about to come down to earth more rapidly than was intended, it seized in its terror fast hold of the heavens in such a manner that the whole cloud-heaven gave way, and would have buried the dying Ishmael, if Uno, quicker than lightning, had not sprung forward from the theater, caught the child in his arms, and borne it out of the confusion into which the unlucky angel, cadet No. 31, now came tumbling, with clouds, lamps, draperies, and Hagar, who, terrified and confounded, endeavored to open her mouth, but at the same moment was carried off by General Herkules, who was in a rage, and swore dreadfully at the machinist, who tore his hair and felt himself not very happy.

"Have none of you hurt yourselves?" demanded Engel anxiously of the actors, as one after another emerged from chaos. "No! . . . Well then we can not trouble ourselves. It is merely one spectacle more to laugh at!"

And she set the example with a fresh, hearty laugh.

"But you have wounded yourself, Engel! There is blood on your arm!" said cadet 31, in great anxiety.

C

"Oh it is nothing! merely a scratch!" answered she joyously, but still turning pale, as she sought to forget the not so insignificant wound. "It is nothing! nothing at all!" protested she afresh and zealously to those who pressed around her. But she quickly disappeared from the company, with Hedvig, to have her arm bound up, and the torn clothes changed.

"Stupid theatricals!" grumbled uncle Herkules.

"Very good indeed, really quite neat and interesting," said director Urbanus, with the most learned smile, to the admiral's lady, who looked rather excited at her foster son's share in the "interesting" scene, "and it were much to be wished that our young ladies and gentlemen would seriously turn their attention to æsthetic enjoyments. What say you? For my part, I consider them of the highest importance to morals. Yes, I will call the beautiful and exalted the portal by which man can enter by the shortest cut into the religious life. Don't you think so? Ay, ay, so think I!"

"Bror Dalberg," continued he to Ivar, who now happened to pass, and whom he seized by the coat, "I was just saying to the admiral's lady, that I regard the exalted and the beautiful as the gate by which we can soonest enter into the religious life. Eh? Yes, yes, to be sure. For the exalted and the beautiful are not——"

"Completely hideous, if the true be not wanting!" muttered Ivar, shook himself loose, and rushed past with the aspect of a storm.

"Eh? Ay, ay, yes!" exclaimed uncle Urbanus, who in his difficulty of hearing did not understand Ivar's words, but yet remained somewhat astonished at his manner, and continued, turning to the admiral's lady—"And it is a matter of great importance that some counterpoise should arise in social life to the dissatisfied, restless spirit, the discontent, which it grieves me to observe is continually spreading, especially among our young gentlemen. I always assert that it is people's own fault if they are not happy. I, for my part, am always happy; and it proceeds from this, that I never placed my demands on life too high; that I never require any thing excessive, either from the world or from mankind. My principle is, to be contented. Therefore my friends call me—and I have the good fortune to have many friends—the contented, or the happy. Eh? Yes, yes, certainly!"

"But how do you manage, my good cousin, to be able to be so invariably happy?" demanded the admiral's lady.

"How! Why, I am constantly employed on something which interests and amuses me. Yes, I assure you that I never knew tedium. Eh?"

"There you have a perfect recipe for contentment," said Augustin; "and which, through education, might perhaps be made available for every human creature."

"I would gladly learn that," said the admiral's lady. "For my boy, I fancy it would be the happiest if I were to allow him to learn watchmaking or some other handicraft work, for in such employment he is the happiest, and he is always delighted with handicraft work. For reading, on the contrary, he has no taste."

"And will you actually make an artisan of the young count, my gracious cousin?" exclaimed director Urbanus, with an incredulous smile.

"Most willingly!" replied the admiral's lady, "if he through it was virtuous, and happy, and could make his way handsomely."

"My gracious cousin," said uncle Urbanus, "one must confess that you are not very aristocratic."

"My good cousin," said the admiral's lady, somewhat proudly, "I confess that I feel myself above these prejudices of rank."

"See! there, the deuce! Now is sister-in-law upon her democratic stilts again!" exclaimed the general. "Sister-in-law has certainly read Count Rudensköld's book on the circulation of Rank! A good book, and a fine book in spirit, but—I am for none of your modern theories: I stand by the old, and believe myself equally the friend of the people for all that. But if any one says that a young lady of rank is better than a citizen's daughter, because she is a young lady of rank, I say then that this is stupid stuff, and so say I also of much which people formerly called mässalliance. Those times are gone by. Göthilda, if an honest citizen, who is doing well, and is well educated, makes you an offer, I hope you mean to marry him."

"I will marry the chimney-sweep in Haparanda, if uncle wishes it," answered Göthilda; "but if I may be allowed to choose, I shall prefer a man who is good-natured, rich, and genteel. All or nothing! that is my motto."

"Nay, listen to my little Miss Götha; my Madame Solotopp; my princess!" exclaimed uncle Herkules, delighted, while he lifted the girl high up. "So, indeed, she turns her nose to the wind, just like her dear aunt in Skåne! Ha, ha, ha! the chimney-sweep in Haparanda! Nay, my dear, for him thou art too good. But that fine gentleman, that prince excellent, that prince extraordinary; him indeed you will have to wait for, my little enchantress."

"Ah, uncle, he is sure to come," said Göthilda, seriously.

General Herkules rubbed his hands, and said, laughing—

"Nay, do but hear; she is certain of her affair, the young mixx. Well, I hope that I shall be asked to the wedding. My word, won't I dance at my little Götha's wedding, if not before?"

And Göthilda took a cane, and began to play, "My lady invites you to the wedding," and took herself the invitations, and brought back the answers to uncle Herkules, imitating the different voices and gestures of the invited, which made him laugh heartily.

"Yes, she is bewitched," said he, "sometimes; if I were young, I would take her myself."

In the meantime, Hedvig had again returned with Engel. The latter fell immediately into the play, where Master Jarl distinguished himself by his hideous grimaces in answering the invitation to the wedding.

Hedvig seated herself, with her sewing, on the sofa. Uno sat beside her.

"You are right happy here in your family circle, with your reciprocal affection," said he, after a silence. "It is a warming atmosphere, which even a stranger can feel with pleasure, although it awakens a sense of regret."

"Why regret?" asked Hedvig.

"That he himself never possessed this home, and family joy—that he still is wholly solitary," answered Uno. "So at least it is with me. My mother died when I was a mere child. I scarcely recollect her. My sisters went thence to a relative residing far from my home. I went to school, and have ever since then gone most solitarily through the world. During the vacations, I went indeed home to my father, and there was very happy, simply because I was in my home; but my father had not much time for me, and then I felt myself solitary even at home. How did I long there for a brother's, and still more for a sister's society. But I have always wanted the nearer, warming intercourse of close connections, and therefore has much in me been half-developed, cold, and stiff. I have not been unhappy in my life, but I can't say that I have ever felt myself happy, and I am now near my fortieth year."

Blushing, and with her countenance bent over her work, Hedvig said—

"But if you united yourself to a good young girl, and if she loved you, you might create for yourself that happiness which you estimate so highly."

"For me? yes, but—for her? If a man wishes to unite himself to a beloved and amiable being, he must first believe that he is able to make her happy!"

Hedvig was silent; her heart beat audibly.

"Sister Hedvig! good sister!" whispered Uno, bent himself over her hand, and kissed it. A tear wet the hand. Surprised, Hedvig looked up at Uno, and saw in his deep eyes, in the whole of his pale and expressive countenance, the trait of a profound emotion.

And through Hedvig once more trembled, the belief which she had once expressed to Augustin, "he has something within him—not happy."

Uno's agitation continued only a few seconds; he then mastered it, and appeared calm and composed.

"What can this be?" thought Hedvig, anxiously; and her glance sought Engel's, who this evening was so child-like glad, and appeared enchantingly handsome.

Uno also followed constantly with his eyes the engaging young girl.

"Light, pure as light—a living sunbeam—a heavenly child in whom there is nothing dark! No, no! I can not! I ought not!" So spoke Uno's thoughts while he gazed on Engel.

Uncle Urbanus talked with the admiral's lady about M. de Suzor's lectures, and about the lectures of our Swedish savans, and both spoke without either listening to the other. Director Urbanus said, smiling, that he too could probably deliver a lecture as well as some others. He had lately written a letter upon the dramatic art in general, and especially with reference to our own country; and upon this letter his friend, Professor T., had answered him, "You can never imagine to yourself, my friend, what a treasure such a letter in our poor and remote country is, &c." "And if the admiral's lady wishes, it will be a pleasure to director Urbanus to read this letter, of which he has a copy."

Aunt Queen Bee replied, that it would certainly be "infinitely interesting."

"Upon my word!" exclaimed uncle Herkules, who heard a little of what was on the tapis, "if sister-in-law is so bent upon lectures, I can treat her to something of my own composition. And now I think of it, it would be quite amusing, the deuce take me! to read it aloud, and hear how it sounds. The truth is, that I have sketched from memory one thing and another out of the wars in which I served, and which it seems to me would be a pity to suffer to be lost; and this work has swelled to a thick, goodly volume. Well, children, I shall read you something out of it these evenings. It may be a more useful reading for you than that romance trash. And I really believe that it will interest sister-in-law."

Sister-in-law said that it would be altogether uncommonly interesting.

"And for dessert," said Bror, half aloud, to the young ladies, "I shall read you a romance called, 'The Delusive Realities, or the Love Affairs of the Countess of Montclair.' It begins thus—'The Countess of Montclair was tall, slender, and well-grown, and had probably a thousand lovers, who hung about her neck.' Is not that promising, and touching?"

They laughed, and thought that no part of the reading promised more pleasure than this.

When the day for the great reading was fixed they separated, every one in good understanding with the rest, and all with the promise to meet at the great reading. The cadets also were to be there. General Herkules wished it, for the sake of their pleasure and advantage.

Hedvig sat for a while up in her room, as was her wont, before she went to bed, and read, comfortably wrapped in her night-dress; and, as usual, she listened to the glad some gossip of her sisters in the adjoining room, of which the door stood open.

This evening Göthilda was in an ill humor at the failure of the spectacle. "The good-for-nothing lad!" exclaimed she, "that Jarl, to behave so wickedly! he is born to my misfortune! Oh! thy dear beautiful arm, that it should be so ill-used! I could just weep for vexation when I think of it."

"Nay, don't weep, Göthilda," said Engel, "and don't scold, nor let it vex you. I am so glad, so happy! . . . I will thank the architect! love the whole world! . . . Come and kiss me, my dear creature!"

And from the bed where she lay, she extended her arm toward her sister, who, grumbling a little, continued—

"Kiss you, that will I gladly; but thank the architect—that I would rather do with a box on the ear. For he is and will be my disgrace. What did he do at the last Carlberg ball? How did he waltz with me? Over we tumbled, and seven couples upon us! I was so angry! so angry! Never will I waltz with him again! But why are you so glad, Engel?"

"That is my secret, my little secret. That will I tell to no one! Nay, don't look at me as on the Egyptian darkness itself. This much I will tell thee, that had the misfortune, as you call it, not happened, I should not have been so happy."

Göthilda wondered, and guessed, and asked, and prayed, and almost begged, scolded, and coaxed; called her sister "Engel and Bengel, and witch, and stock, and stone!" but she got nothing further from her this evening.

Anxiously Hedvig listened, anxious for the beloved child, and the happiness of which she spoke. She thought of Uno, and of his dark and mysterious words, on Ivar and his dangerous condition, on the friend from whom she now separated herself, perhaps forever on earth. She thought of Augustin, and her sisterly heart raised itself on the wings of prayer for all the dear and near ones, for the newcomer into the house, the erring one restored; and then, leaving the narrow circle of home, she inclosed the great brotherhood on the earth, and sunk with all the weal and woe of her heart into the arms of the great and good Allfather, and found repose.

THE GREAT LECTURE.

ALL are assembled—the cadets as well as the rest.

General Herkules sits at a little table, close beside the great table of the drawing-room. On the table stands a shaded candle; before the general lies a thick manuscript; beside him a water-caraf and a glass.

At the large table sit—

Aunt Queen Bee, with a devotional and friendly mien, polite and interested in the highest degree.

Uncle Urbanus, speculating on getting to read his famous work on the dramatic art, which he has laid on the table by him, and, ever and anon, regards with affectionate glances, and a sly smile, as if he would say, "Ah, yes, yes!"

Göthilda, secretly speculating on snatching away and confiscating this same formidable work.

Ivar, gloomy as Prince Hamlet at another certain reading, or rather representation.

Master Jarl, with his hair in his eyes, gravely occupied in spoiling Göthilda's scissors.

Hedvig silently went on with her knitting, a little sleepy.

Augustin, unobserved, busy in raveling her yarn, so as to waken her up with spoiling her work.

Engel, a little pale, as if with some secret trouble of heart. She appears to listen, by starts ever and anon, and looks toward the door.

Mina and Serafina, the one red, the other white, trying to avoid Bror's roguishly solemn and threatening looks; beneath which they hung their heads like lilies of the valley.

The future defenders of the Fatherland, Nos. 31 and 32, sit erect as lighted candles, and unhappy as recruits.

All is not right with them. They have been broken off from a hot wrangle with Göthilda and Master Jarl, in order to attend the great reading, and their spirits have been thereby powerfully oppressed, but have by no means gone to rest with their bodies. They may be compared to two ale bottles which have been uncorked, and then corked again, but loosely, and which work and fiz in secret, ready every moment to explode and send the cork to the ceiling. When they look at aunt Queen Bee's devotional aspect, at uncle Urbanus and Göthilda, and especially when Bror looks at them, then and there do they look in a perilous condition.

General Herkules has a dangerous look, too, but of another stamp. He is about to awaken the reminiscences of war, fierce and solemn, and he is plunged soul and body into them. He, too, has glanced sundry times at the door.

The clock strikes seven!

"Now have we waited long enough," says the general. "Uno is certainly not coming. We may begin." And with a stern and severe expression, he commences:—

"The great Ehrenheim says:—

"History has had its convulsive epochs when some great interest of state, struck by accident, has lost its political and moral counterpoise, and is given over to the despotism of the passions. Human weakness, carried away by the impulses of the highest power, the bonds of social order, the illusions of fortune, rushes blindly onward along the open road, and takes officious zeal for the standard of the morality of action."

"A deep reflection that!"

Aunt Queen Bee.—"The morality of action—very fine!"

Uncle Urbanus, who did not hear more than the last word—"Eh, eh! very moral."

Bror, who did not comprehend any part of it—"Very moral."

Convulsive movements among the cadets; solemn glances from aunt Queen Bee, stern ones from uncle Urbanus, excessively stern and threatening ones from Bror, upon which symptoms grew still more violent.

General Herkules reads:—

"It is an inevitable law, grounded on the organization of states, a consequence of the connection between the factor and the instrument—the palladium of obedience for the moment."

"Hum—not so clear, that; do you understand it?"

Uncle Urbanus.—"Eh? oh, yes."

Aunt Queen Bee.—"Not—not altogether."

The cadets sneeze, and seem to have a violent cold. Uncle Urbanus looks at them with indignation, aunt Queen Bee reprovingly, Bror menacingly, shaking his head violently, and clenching his hands at them.

General Herkules proceeds:—

"What the devil does he mean? Well, we shall see."

"But at length the object will some day be obtained or relinquished; a final conclusion will arise; the whirlwind of agitation will lay itself; the vapors will disappear, the war will cease, and now will awaken the calm judgment of reason, with the indelible feeling for the just and good."

"That is truly grand."

Uncle Urbanus.—"Eh? yes; the good and the beautiful, and the—what do you say?"

Dreadful symptoms among the cadets. Bror knocks on the table at them.

No. 31 explodes, and darts hastily under the table.

General Herkules looks about with astonishment, but resumes:—

"After this the general opinion admits the laws."

No. 32 explodes with a species of snorting, and disappears also under the table. Suppressed tumult beneath it—consternation above it! Mina and Serafina seem ready to fall.

The general proceeds:—

“She constructs after this her model for warriors in their white and unspotted armor, with their open alacrity in the knightly form, which gives to the conqueror the revenue of the conquered.”

“Beautiful!—exactly the thing for our young boys to hear and learn by.”

Uncle Urbanus looks under the table, starts instantly, and draws terrified back.

Unable any longer to hold herself up, the laughter-loving Göthilda now dives down, drawing with her uncle Urbanus' work! Uncle Urbanus dives in desperation after his treasure. Tumult! The laughter mine under the table explodes, and draws with it, irresistibly and helplessly, every person above the table, with its ringing merriment.

At the sound of this explosion, General Herkules looks hastily up, with glances of lightning. The guilty ones under the table begin now to pop up their heads, with countenances red and distorted with convulsions of laughter! There was a general confusion.

But this soon gave way to terror, for General Herkules was tremendously wrathful, threw down the shaded candle, flung the manuscript aside, stalked through the room like a roaring lion, and exclaimed, pale with rage—

“D—take me if I ever read another word before such cursed —! I had expected from young people, and especially from young fellows and boys;”—and he here advanced with clenched fists toward the cadets, “I had expected from youths who have a head on their bodies and sense in their heads, that they would have a mind for something besides boys' play and nonsense, and that they would have a regard for the honor of the Fatherland, and for the thoughts and words of great men. But I see that I have been mistaken; I see that you have neither merit nor common sense,—that you are a parcel of ungovernable animals, you boys!—and that you are not worthy to hear a sensible word. But the devil take me, boys, if I have not a mind to give you a thrashing.”

It is difficult to say how far the general might have extended his lecture in this moment of passion, but Göthilda was seized at that instant with a violent hysterical attack, laughed out aloud, rolled her eyes, and stretched out her arms, with which she knocked down the candlesticks, the table, the caraf and glass, which tumbled all together upon the floor with a huge noise, and thus broke suddenly off the general's ebullition.

He stood still, totally confounded, and stared half terrified at the girl, who continued to roll her eyes and look totally possessed.

Engel wept, Hedvig sought to appease the general, and placed herself between him and the cadets: Augustin took Göthilda in his arms, and shook her vigorously, saying, “Göthilda! fie then, Göthilda.”

Bror picked up the water-caraf, which had been so honorable as to hold, and dashed the remains of the water over his sister.

Serafina and Mina lay here and there half drowned. Ivar struggled with uncle Urbanus, who had got hold of him, and held him fast.

There was a universal confusion.

But anon it allayed itself. General Herkules said not another word, but strode, dark and out of humor, with long strides, to and fro through the room.

The cadets retired into the corner of a window, and there put their heads together with Göthilda's, and looked dismal. Their hair stood on end. Göthilda was heard to say—

“Yes, if I had not sacrificed myself for you, and been possessed, then —”

Something dreadful was left to be supposed. All inclination to laugh appeared annihilated. Bror looked rather guilty and repentant. Aunt Queen Bee and Hedvig begged of the general to proceed.

“No, my friends,” answered he; “no more this evening.”

He was no longer angry, but appeared sunk in a gloomy recollection. His head was depressed, and his eyes rolled sometimes as if they had some unwelcome object before them. But the brothers and sisters had many times seen him thus.

“Perhaps we now,” said Bror, half aloud, “could pass over to comedy, and take into notice ‘The Delusive Realities, or the Love Affairs of the Countess Montclair.’”

“What is that? What is that?” hastily interrupted uncle Urbanus; “nay, could we not leave that for the after-piece, and I first read aloud my letter on the dramatic art? What do you say? Yes, eh? That will do. Yes, yes.”

An awful pause followed, which director Urbanus took for assent. It was plain that the “Love Affairs of the Countess Montclair” would have been more to the general taste. But uncle Urbanus unfolded his letter with equal zeal and pleasure, and read it from beginning to end; but the passages which he regarded as particularly profound he read two or three times over. Thank thy patience, my reader, that thou wert not present at this reading, for thou hast escaped being half killed with gaping, like Augustin. Aunt Queen Bee slept. The poor cadets! Laugh they dared not, nor sleep either; they had no mind for either. They sat and pined, and wished for the after-piece. But that never came, so long was the acting of the drama. But at length came supper-time; and this is always a consolation. And thus the evening came to an end,

When the cadets advanced and bowed to the general, he slapped them on the head, pulled them a little by the hair, and said "Boys! boys!"

But more he did not say, and the culprits moved off, rejoiced to have escaped a curtain lecture.

When master Jarl stepped forward and made his bow—he had during the foregoing catastrophe maintained an admirable countenance—the general said, "Come hither, thou;" stroked back the hair from his forehead, laid his hand on his head, and held it back, keenly observing his features. The boy blushed strongly at this, and became handsome. Long and attentively the general gazed upon him, and when he finally let him go, without saying a word, several large tears hung on his eyelashes, which he dashed away with his hand.

The general was left alone with Hedvig and Augustin. He went, usually, early to bed, but seemed now to have forgotten himself, and sat silent, sunk in deep thought.

Hedvig, who would gladly see him cheerful again, placed herself beside him, and said some kind words regarding what had passed this evening, but he interrupted her, saying, "Nonsense, dear child; that is now over; and you must no longer fancy that I am vexed about this folly. Youth will be youth, and I know how it is at that age; I have been young myself. No, but now I am vexed with myself, that the old blood can still boil up so cursedly. It mortifies me that I, at nearly seventy years of age, should not have more power over myself, and that such lads should see—that is too provoking. And more than any other person ought I to know how to keep the heart and the mind in check, for I know what evil it can do if it once gets loose. I know that it can cause one to do what one would at the cost of one's life have undone again; yes, which will stand like a specter before one our whole life through.

"I will speak before you, children, of what I have on my conscience; I will say it, for it will make me easier in my mind this evening. Mark you—I had a brother, only a half-brother, but whom I loved as seldom real brothers love each other. He was a fine fellow, both in body and soul; no hot blood like me, but calm, firm, mild, and generous. What he said was said; what he willed, stood fast. He was self-willed, but I liked even that in him, for he was at the same time sensible and amiable. He was like a rock in a storm: and I found protection and help from him, though it was sometimes hardly dealt. But I was attached to him, and he to me. Deuce take me if we were not like David and Jonathan together. And he was as courageous and valiant as a hero. Well!—war broke out between Sweden and Russia; the last won, and we went together, my brother and I, to the war, from our father's house in Finland, which we then possessed and managed together. This war, children, I do not like to talk of, for—for it pains me. It gives me pain that it went as it did. It cuts me to the heart that it was so ill conducted, that so much blood and so much money should have been spent in vain, all through the mad king, and the remissness and incompetency of the chiefs in command; for the subordinate officers fought gallantly, and the soldiers equally. Yes, children, there were things in that war, isolated deeds, and many of courage and strength of mind, which rejoice me to remember. And of these you would have heard this evening, if that confounded spectacle had not occurred. The very women were brave. The wives of the soldiers themselves urged their husbands out into the war, and there were some who accompanied them, and some who, when they fell, took up their weapons and fought in their places. And I remember one woman, who, when a courier from the field of battle rode through the village in which she lived, rushed out to him and cried, 'Ah! tell me how it goes!' 'Very bad,' he replied, 'your son has fallen!' 'Who has conquered?' she shouted again. 'We have beaten the Russians.' 'God be praised!'—and then first the mother found tears to bewail her son. Is not that fine? It is, confound us, so beautiful that I can weep at it myself. Such women deserve the medal of bravery. And they had also honor from their sons—these women of Finland. They desired nothing better than to go out against the enemy, and they shot and fought so that it was a pleasure to be near them; and when, at their officers' command, they were obliged to surrender their weapons, they wept in burning indignation, and stamped their arms to pieces. Yes, such were the people whom the commander-in-chief had to do with. I do not speak of all. God preserve me from such injustice! Adlercreutz, Sandels, von Döhlen, and others, are names eternally connected with the military glory of Sweden. But, — well, it does not signify now. They lie in their graves now—they, who were a disgrace to their people and country. They are gone to answer before the highest tribunal.

"My brother Arthur and I went to the war with a burning enthusiasm. We participated in the same dangers, the same food, and often the same want of it. We were in the same regiment. 'The brothers Hierkules,' people called us; and the enemy were not pleased to see us in the armament. But it was to us a joy together to attack them, and thus we fought through the whole war.

"Well, peace came—the peace which I would have given all my blood to have been able to prevent. I could remain no longer in Finland. Land and money, all that I possessed on earth, I would leave, rather than become a Russian subject, and I believed that my brother thought and felt as I did. I could not believe any thing else. I should sooner have believed the good angels to enter into alliance with the evil ones. But my brother did not think as I did; he saw the matter in a different light: and when it came to speech between us, and I heard him say that he would remain on our father's estate—when I heard him say that he would be true to his adopted country, and live for its advantage, even under another lord, then—I could not at first understand him. Heaven help me! it was as if he talked Arabic to me; and when I did understand it, I would not believe it, and when I was compelled to believe it, then I became beside myself. I prayed him to reflect—I begged, I entreated him with tears—tears of blood, to relinquish his design. So have I never prayed any other man, nor God neither. And when he, my brother, still withstood me, and continued steadfast in his purpose, then—my blood rushed to my head; I became furious, and swore that it should not be, that no Herkules should become a Russian subject. Hard words followed between us; I called him 'friend of Russia—traitor to his country,' and before I was aware, had we—we brothers—drawn our swords against each other. He merely defended himself; wished to strike the sword out of my hand—but I was frantic, struck hard at him, and did not pause before I saw a great bloody mouth gape against me in his breast, and felt his blood spirt in my face. I see . . . I feel it now!—"

The general's eye rolled wildly at this, and his hair seemed to stand on end on his head, as he stared on some invisible object. He added, with a smothered voice, and shuddering—"I was near committing fratricide."

He paused a moment, took a deep breath, and continued:—

"His arm fell powerless with the sword; mine also. His blood had cooled me—I fell on my knees at his side. I myself bound up his wound. I sat by his bed day and night—but the past was now the past. It was never again between us as it had been. Our swords had crossed each other, that was a trifle: our convictions ceased to be the same. It was forever; and the roots of our hearts were fixed so fast in them, that they were torn asunder in separating, though it was with pain. I could not love the friend of the Russians; not because I hated the foe—for there were brave men among them, and who can hate the brave? Nobility of mind was to be found among them too: and our brave commander, Björnstjerna, had certainly long ago fallen, had not the Russian colonel, Kulneff, in pure admiration of the recklessness with which he exposed his life in the affair of Sütajocki, given his men orders not to fire upon him; a noble act, which Adelcreutz repaid by commanding his people to spare the life of Kulneff. And many a time during the pauses in the war, the Swedish and Russian officers met and emptied peaceful bowls together, and in lively mood pledged themselves to cut each other down as soon as possible, and laid wagers upon it, which the losers were to pay with full bowls. I was myself present at such entertainments, for I am just of such a spirit in war.

"But to become a Russian subject never entered my mind; and I could not pardon my brother for not thinking with me on this subject, and for not being moved by my sorrow and my prayers.

"And when we for the last time stood together at the head of Björnborg's regiment, and our general, Von Döbeln, took leave of us; the regiment standing in close phalanx, he in the centre of it, in his gray blood-stained great coat, and addressed us with words warm as red-hot balls. That was a moment! Not one eye was dry, but in mine burned, as it were, seething fires; and when the general ceased to speak, and uncovered his head, with the black bandage around the heroic forehead, which had been shot through, and the wound of which never healed—and the drums beat; then I looked at my brother. He stretched to me his hand, but I turned away in the bitterness of my heart! . . . Children! I have never seen him since; it is now more than thirty years ago. The wound which I gave him has long since healed, but that which he gave me, will bleed till I lie stiff and cold in the earth. It remains still in the marrow of the soul. Yes, children, I can not even yet forgive him, that he went over to the Russian side, though it was not done traitorously; though God knows, and though I know that, wherever he is, he is laboring for that which is good and right, and though I thank God every day of my life, that he preserved me from perpetrating the murder of a brother. But no man did I ever love like him, and no man ever gave me so much pain. He has put division between me and my better self; he has put an enemy into my bosom, the point of whose sword still every day wounds and rends. I feel him; and though we have had a truce for a long time, I know that he is there, and will probably remain there till my last hour."

The general was silent for a moment, and then proceeded. "There is something strange in a human being, children, and he is more changeable than can be conceived. I have experienced this in my own feelings in this affair. Truly sometimes a yearning seizes me to press my brother in my arms, a yearning so intense that I think my heart will burst—I think that if I could see him with that handsome, honest face, with those beautiful eyes, it would be as if I looked into heaven itself. But the deuce take me, children, if I am certain at another, whether if we should meet, I should not run my sword through him again. That might depend upon time and place. If I met him in the enemy's ranks—but may a bullet strike my head first! and therefore, it is probably quite as well that we never meet; so strange and so joyous as it would be now to see the old boy. He is old now, he is I. I wonder whether he is still like himself? . . . He was a handsome fellow. His son, Jarl, reminds me of him, particularly in the eyes and forehead. I like the lad. He would turn out a clever fellow, if the sister-in-law did not so confoundedly spoil him. But I shall, deuce take me, make . . . but of that I shall perhaps talk with you another time. Now you had better go to rest, children, and I shall also sleep now I have relieved my mind of—good night, my children."

And the general shook hands heartily with Hedvig and Augustin at parting.

While uncle Herkules had related his history to the brother and sister, Göthilda had made for Engel a sketch of the evening's occurrence, which she called "The great lecture, or, the confusion of Babel," and went through it in such a manner that Engel literally laughed herself ill. More than once she had begged of Göthilda to cease; but Göthilda had now got a strong dramatic bent, and did not cease till she herself, tired with her tragi-comic exertions, fell at once into a deep sleep. Then Engel laid her head down on her pillow, not to laugh, not to sleep, but to weep silent, heavy, and bitter tears, such as sorrow presses out of young hearts, such as fall only in night and solitude, for shame never accompanies them.

But why wept Engel?

WHY ENGEL WEEPS.—A SURPRISE.

THREE weeks had passed over since the evening when Uno snatched Engel from beneath the falling sky of board and pasteboard—since the hour when she felt herself pressed to his bosom, as a child to the heart of its mother; when she heard his lips stammer out words; when she saw in his eyes the expression of a sentiment, which had caused a mew, but hitherto imperfectly conceived heaven to open before the young girl's, long in secret, half unconscious, yet really loving heart. Three weeks since that day had elapsed, and Uno never once during this time had been seen in the house. Hour after hour, day after day, had Engel thought, "he must come!" and waited with throbbing pulse. But he came not, he was not heard of. Then came by degrees into the young heart an uneasiness, an anxiety, a sad sensation of unhappiness; then faded the bloom on her delicate cheek; then grew silent the first child-like laughter, the joyous sally of wit; then stole Engel at times away to shed the tears which collected so heavily in her bosom.

Thus became Engel aware how deeply she loved Uno; how interminably was the happiness of her life connected with him. Upon the rack of suspense she became aware of this. Warm (poor!) heart, do you know?

But Engel alone did not suffer from this waiting. Hedvig, who saw her beloved sister grow pale, and as it were, wither beneath a secret pain, Hedvig grieved over her situation, and her own disappointed hopes. A rumor that Uno was betrothed had begun to spread itself, and had even reached the Dalberg family. Hedvig thought Uno's proceeding inexplicable, and Augustin's wild glance became stern when he turned his thought from this young and beloved sister, to that which caused this change in her appearance and manner, and which never—so thought Augustin—ought never to have gone so far when he would thus absent himself. Göthilda became, now and then, very like Hagar in the wilderness, and her dark pair of eyes sought with a murderous expression him who did Engel this wrong. Engel's lips remained closed upon this point. Nor did she complain of any thing. She endeavored to be glad as formerly with her brothers and sisters, but—it would not do, and when she observed this, she was seized with a fit of excessive industry, and sate continually over a frame in which she worked in embroidery magnificent slippers for her brothers. Thus she best could forget the painfully beating heart, and eyes that would continually fill with tears; and no moment of bad or irritable humor betrayed to any one that the young girl felt herself unhappy.

There is something sacred, something deeply touching, in a secret and patient suffering of this kind. Engel's brothers and sisters felt it so, and no one touched on the secret of her heart. They surrounded her with silent affection, sought to create her diversion, and, ever and anon, Göthilda beguiled her with laughter.

One evening—young lady reader, are you awake? Accompany me—one evening, or rather one afternoon, Engel sate at her embroidery-frame alone in the drawing-room. It was grown dusk. The needle had fallen out of her hand, and her head sunk down upon her hands, while some withered flowers from a lilac in the window fell upon her hair and her embroidery-frame. Thus every thing was in a falling state; even Engel's courage. She sank into sorrowful musings, and thought that it would be a blessing to her to—die. Young people often fancy so: old people, on the contrary, seldom. But while the young girl sate thus cast down, the fresh Swedish spirit rose in her bosom, which never permits itself long to be depressed, but like the toy mandarin which, knock it over as you will, stands up again erect and perpendicular, and thus said—

"No! This does no good! Thou wilt not allow thyself to sink. Think on thy duty, thy brothers and sisters, all the beautiful and good in heaven and in earth. Exert thyself; cast care from thee; be thyself again. Courage only, and it will succeed!"

And Engel sprung up, took the guitar, and began to play and sing her favorite air:—

The sparrow on the house-top is a little bird,
Is a little bird;
Can not boast one handsome feather
Sees no grandeur rare,
Finds but scanty fare,
And no pleasure but fine weather.

But while she sang the tears began to flow, for she felt that she was no longer the sparrow of which she loved to sing, and to which she liked to hear herself compared; and so she wept over herself.

"But no! This will not do either!" said she to herself. And the young clever girl resolved not to allow herself to be overcome, put aside the guitar, and began to dance, while she at the same time shook the tears away from her cheeks, and wiped them with her hair, and danced, and danced!

And we would lay a wager with—any one—that she would in this manner have sung and danced away her first sorrow if Providence had so required. But Lot's wife was not more instantly changed into a pillar of salt at the sight of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah than Engel to an immovable statue, as she saw all at once before her—Uno.

But as Uno approached her she trembled and grew pale. The change in her appearance seemed to astonish him.

"Engel! has been weeping! weeps yet!" said he, taking her hand. "How is it? Is not all quite well?"

"O yes!" answered Engel; and without properly reflecting on what she said, added—

"You have been a long time away."

"I have been at my estate for a few weeks. Have you missed me?"

"Yes."

"Engel, too?"

"Yes."

"Engel, then, has a little regard for me?"

"Yes."

Never have more modest and, at the same time, more distinct questions and answers been pronounced in the world-wide play, the play of lovers.

And what followed?

Well, it followed that Uno, who had resolved to separate himself from a beloved being whom he believed that he could not make happy, and who now came merely to say, "How do you do?" but came so unexpectedly that he asked something quite different—Uno was so surprised by his own feelings, and carried away as to press to his heart the amiable and beloved young girl, and to enter into an engagement with her that death only could dissolve. He felt "the child" tremble in his arms, terrified and happy at the same time at the outbreak of a love, which, after it had so long burnt in secret in Uno's breast, now burst forth in such violent flames.

It followed that uncle Herkules, and Hedvig, and Augustin, and Ivar, and Bror, and Göthilda, were quickly informed of what had taken place, and that Uno solicited the hand of Engel of her relations, and that Engel, this very evening, stood as Uno's betrothed in the circle of her family, where every countenance reflected the happiness which illuminated the glances of the betrothed ones.

All were taken by surprise. Thou too, my reader, I hope. Thou hadst not expected this!

"Now are we indeed brother and sister, Hedvig! and I may say sister, and thou!" said Uno, as he seated himself beside her and took her hand. His heart was open and tender.

"I have so long desired it!" continued he, but I have contended with the feeling which drew me to Engel. I have found that I was not good enough for Engel, that I could not make her happy, and I fear it still."

"But why so, Uno?" asked Hedvig, as she gazed solemnly upon him.

Uno was silent, as if hesitating, and then said—

"Who can answer for his power? There are so many deficiencies—so many dark points in us, which we can not help, and which might operate disturbingly on the happiness of others. For my desire to make her happy I can answer, but if that should not be found sufficient, then . . . Hedvig . . . sister! . . . then you must judge me leniently."

He held Hedvig's hand, and gazed at her with deep, gloomy, but warm eyes. Hedvig returned the pressure of his hand, but said nothing; her former uneasy foreboding passed through her heart. Willingly would she have continued the conversation, that Uno might more clearly have explained himself; but uncle Herkules left little opportunity for that. He would have wine-drinking and toasts, and songs and jollity, and gave himself no rest till he had changed the serious mood of the company to a more champagne one. And this task was not very difficult under the present circumstances.

But more agreeable was it for Hedvig to sit alone in her room and listen to the expressions of her young and happy sister.

"Is it possible, Hedvig!" exclaimed she, concealing her blushing countenance in Hedvig's bosom; "is it really true that he is fond of me; that he will have me for his wife? . . . A man so good, so excellent, so superior as he, and a girl so unimportant, so insignificant as I am. Is it possible that he can be so much attached to me? that I can make him happy? Oh! how can I become worthy of such a lot?"

She talked to the young girl in the fullness of her heart. Then came more playful, childlike thoughts of the future.

"Ah!" exclaimed she, with transport, "how happy it will be to invite you and my brothers and sisters, and uncle, to dinner! Every Sunday we must invite you. But you, Hedvig, must come often, often. You must teach me, observe, how to manage my housekeeping, so that all shall be well done, and Uno be truly pleased. For I understand so little yet. And there will we have for thee the very choicest potatoes with fresh butter—for there must be fresh butter at Ekarna, such as you will like—or I will churn it myself for you—and the most beautiful fresh water—there is a well which—what do you think?—Uno calls it Engel's well—and which is as clear as crystal. And hasty-pudding and milk you shall have, and—and all the good, cheap dishes that you like so much, because every one can have them. And in the afternoon you shall have an easy chair and a footstool—with your great basket beside you, and then coffee—and all Uno's library to choose out of! Oh, you shall see, how comfortable you shall be with us!"

"But I shall not grow fat on all that," now exclaimed Gøthilda from her bed, with tears in her throat at finding how little she was thought of in Engel's paradise.

"Oh! cried Engel, "when you come, we will kill an ox, and two good calves, tap three hogheads of ale, and make such a jollification as never was seen before; and you shall get so fat that you can not move from the spot, but must stay with us altogether!"

"Gøthilda laughed, and Hedvig laughed, and Engel too, at this grand description; and the sweet girl continued thus in seriousness and play to lay plans for the future, till she fell asleep with Hedvig's hand clasped in hers.

Engel was one of those most charming young girls which romances often, but actually life more rarely present, who are invari-bly handsome and charming, by day, by night, in ball-dress or night-cap, walking or sitting, standing or lying, and as she lay, with the smile of happiness on her lips, beautiful as a white, dewy rose, in the hour of its unfolding, rich in love, kindness, and hope, Hedvig thought she had never seen any one so enchanting. Long did she linger by her bed, enjoying the sight of her, thinking of her future, and only now and then let an anxious thought like a light cloud spread over her mild and cheerful face.

A CHANGE.

SOME few days had gone by, and—Engel was no longer glad. She avoided her betrothed; avoided her brothers and sisters; her cheeks were again pale, and the eyes late so beaming were grown dim, and, at the same time, shrunk from the looks of others, yes, even from those of Uno, which now sought hers with anxious inquiry.

Hedvig saw this one day—heard at night Engel weeping silently in her bed; saw her arise, and fall upon her knees, with uplifted hands, as in great anguish.

The next day Hedvig called her to her in "the sanctuary," threw her faithful, soft arms around her, and said—

"What is amiss with my child? Why are you so unhappy?"

Engel, with an agony, cast her arms about Hedvig's neck, and hid her face in her bosom, as she whispered in broken accents:

"Hedvig! he—Uno—does not believe in God—nor in his revealed word—nor in a life after this—nor upon—ah! he is an Atheist!—a godless! It is indeed horrible!"

Hedvig turned pale at this unexpected communication.

"It was that, then, that he meant!" thought she, as she remembered Uno's dark expression. She clasped the trembling girl closer to her heart as she asked—

"But how came you to know this?"

"We happened the other day—the day before yesterday, I think—to speak on serious subjects, and I asked him his thoughts on several. He gave me, at first, evasive answers; but I, in my childish zeal, would not be contented with them. With that he became grave, and told me candidly that he did not believe at all in that which was to me so important, so great and holy. He told me his creed. Ah! it was pure, dark unbelief!"

"And what did you say?"

"Ah! I do not know. I was so grieved, so shocked, that I cried; it made me so unhappy. It seemed to me as if the whole world became darkened; that heaven and earth reeled, and thus they still seem to reel. Something tells me that it is a sin to love a godless man—to become his wife!

But Hedvig, Hedvig! I can not, I will not give him up. During two nights, in which I have not slept a wink, I have thus combated, although silently, with my heart—combated with myself, with him, and I may say with God. And I can see only one single way!"

"And what way?"

"In that night when all was dark and silent round me, I thought:

"If above me there was a world full of light and beauty; with angels, songs, and all the glory of the world or of heaven, but he was not there—

"And if below me were another world, dark and desolate, cold and silent as the grave, but he was there—in which of the two would I be?"

"And which?"

"In the grave!"

Hedvig smiled, a gentle light was kindled in her eye through a swelling tear.

"Oh yes," continued the child enthusiastically, and with clasped hands; "in the grave, in the eternal darkness with him! Ah! I think perhaps, my faith, my love, may kindle in him a little light."

"And you thought not that his darkness might extinguish it—might impart itself to you?"

"No, I thought not of that, and—I do not believe it, Hedvig. And is his darkness, Hedvig, then so dangerous? His soul is indeed light, and his heart as pure as gold. He wishes well to every human being; his love is so warm and beautiful! Every body esteems him; many people love him. What has he done, that I should give him up? But ah! I feel that my head swims! perhaps my love blinds me. If I attach myself to him, perhaps I give up—God, my best benefactor, my Father, and my Lord! How can he be good who does not believe in God, who does not love him in his revelation? Is not all goodness, all virtue, which does not proceed from his love, specious and delusive? Hedvig, Hedvig! it is thus that I have asked; thus that I have doubted. Now I am nearly in despair. Teach me, enlighten me, guide me—tell me what I ought to do!"

Steps were heard in the ante-room, and some one knocked at the door.

"Oh, it is he! it is he!" exclaimed Engel, trembling. And she felt that the hour was come which should decide her fate.

"Come in!" said Hedvig. "Engel, we should talk openly with each other. Be calm—be calm, my dear child!"

Uno entered. It seemed evidently, by his pale, grave countenance, that he was prepared for an explanation of great moment.

Engel did not rise to welcome him; she sat on a stool at Hedvig's feet, and hid her tearful countenance in the folds of her dress.

Hedvig offered her hand to Uno with frank kindness, and said—

"Come and sit with us, Uno, and talk with us, and—comfort us, if you can. Tell us, that Engel did not properly understand you—when she understood—when she believed that you—do not believe in God—that you have not any religion."

"If you," replied Uno, "mean by religion certain accepted notions about the being of the Creator and his relationship to men, which the Christians call religion—then—no, Hedvig, I do not believe in these, and Engel has understood me properly. But that you, for this reason, should look so gravely upon me; and that Engel, for this reason, should hide her face from me as if I were a criminal, is, I think, an injustice on your part. My religion—from which I never shall deviate—is a belief in the goodness of good, in the holiness of a sense of duty, and in the happiness of man if he fulfills its commands."

"And you do not believe," returned Hedvig, "you do not believe in a good, protecting Father of all the children of the earth, who gives completion to that life and labor which is cut off here by misfortune or death; who has compassion on the fallen, and has expiated the crimes and frailties of all men? You do not believe that friends separated on earth shall be reunited in a better land—after death?"

"I believe," replied Uno, "as I already have said, that man can on earth create his own happiness; that he has directions for this in the arrangements of nature, and within his own breast. I believe that they who endeavor to do what is good and right, need no other reward than the witness of their own conscience. I have not known the need of any other, and I feel convinced that I shall never be unfortunate so long as I fulfill the inward and the highest law of my conscience and my reason."

Hedvig said nothing, but her eyes rested sorrowfully upon Uno, and her heart was full.

Uno continued with a more excited voice, "But you must not confound me with those disbelievers in a God whom I from my heart abhor; who scoff at that which is sacred to noble minds; who endeavor to destroy a faith and hope which the half of mankind does homage to, and regards as the most precious, precious thing which they are possessed of in life and death. Far be that from me, I respect that faith although I do not share it. But if I am not able to believe as you, and many others do—is that a fault, a crime?"

"It is not levity, it is not indifference to religion, which has conducted me—to what people call unbelief. I have honestly inquired and investigated according to my ability; I have sought, and sought only for the truth. Even when I was receiving my earliest religious instruction, I inquired and investigated in the same way, with an inexpressible de-sure for truth and consistency. The clergyman who prepared me for my confirmation was a saint in piety and manner of life, but he was not the man who could enlighten a doubting and inquiring mind. My questions were silenced and evaded, instead of being replied to; my doubts condemned instead of being enlightened, and thus that time became a time of darkness in my soul. Doubts of that which people wished that I should blindly believe, led me to disbelief, and might have led to I know not what mental wilderness. But I was rescued in another way. I began at this time to make pedestrian journeys in my own and other countries; and these awoke a new life within me. Wandering on the beautiful flower-clothed earth, feeling the breath of spring which caressed all living things, and the sun which embraced and illumined all beings, aroused within me thoughts of harmony and beauty as the fundamental laws of creation, and, glancing down into my own breast, I found there the necessity for goodness and beauty which I recognized for the fundamental law of my being, and it was merely requisite for me to obey this to become happy and the promoter of happiness in others; in a word, to fulfill the destination of my being. Thus, by degrees, was my view of life formed. And is this view indeed wicked and dark?"

"No, Uno," replied Hedvig, "I do not think it so, but—is it sufficient? Ah! I see many dark regions in life where this light could not reach."

"I do not deny that it may be so!" said Uno; "but I must adhere to the light which I have found and which I know; every thing else is uncertain to me; it has no existence to me. I know that what I call my light is regarded by many as darkness, and that Engel considers it so. I have, therefore—you know it, Hedvig—for a long time hesitated to open my heart to her. I feared to darken her bright world. Love took me by surprise. I drew her to my heart before I revealed to her its inmost recesses. But the hour is come, and I should not be honest, if I did not openly acknowledge, and if I did not candidly state, my principles, that I do not share her faith and her hope."

"And you do not think," inquired Hedvig, "that you can embrace opinions more conformable with hers?"

"I know," replied Uno, "that people may change their convictions; I know many sooner or later pass through a religious crisis; I deny not that this may happen, even to me. But—I do not believe it—that I must candidly confess. I am no longer young, and am inclined rather to be strengthened in old opinions than to receive new impressions. It is not in levity, it is not in stubbornness, worthy of punishment, that I say this. I know what I have to dread. That you will be afraid of giving Engel's hand. Engel will fear to consign her heart to me. You will draw her away from one whom you call a God-denying and a godless man!"

Engel clasped her hands to her breast, raised an inconsolable glance to Hedvig, and then toward heaven.

"And if it is so," continued Uno, in a voice whose powerful emotion was, as it were, controlled by a stronger power—"if it is so, that her happiness, her innocent joy, can suffer by a union with me; that what you call my darkness can cast its shadows over her; in that case—yes, in that case I ought to be the first to require a separation. And how can I deny that circumstances may occur in which she may need a brighter faith than mine; a glance toward that heaven which I do not see open; a support and a hope which the strong do not require? If her happiness is endangered in my breast, then I will rend her away from my heart, even if it—"

He could say no more. Silent and pale, he paced the room hastily, and then continued more calmly—

"But why only see, why only think of my influence upon her? Deep are the mysteries of love! When soul unites itself to soul, heart to heart, spirit to spirit, wonderful things are done. Nobody can calculate upon them. And if there be truth in Engel's belief—it may, perhaps, become clear to me, may become a certainty to me through her. If there is a Being which is truth and love itself, will he not be found by those who seek for Him in sincerity and truth? And if there be not, and if life be confined to this short time on earth, still is it not beautiful to unite in love; to make one another happy while it lasts? But no! I will not, I ought not to persuade. I will not be selfish. You now know me. Decide in freedom. Engel is released by me."

"On another occasion in my life, I heard similar words to these," said Hedvig, after a little silent reflection. "I heard them some years ago from a lady—my friend. She also had no belief in the truths which both Pagans and Christians regard as the highest and most beautiful in life, and she died without hope of a life after death. Her death-bed was sorrowful; but her life!—how true, how Christian, how penetrated was it with the purest spirit of love! What would she not do and suffer for her fellow-creature! How indefatigable, how strong and patient when she had to help, to amend an erring, a fallen fellow-creature! And her friendship, how tender and steadfast it was! How pure was her love of truth! how sincere her humility toward every thing that was high and holy! Ah! if she, and those who resemble her, can not find an entrance into the kingdom of Heaven—then I know not who can. But she, and some others whom I have known, have made me think that there is a faith, a secret love of God, in the human heart, which operates separately from the consciousness thereof, and attracts and guides them without their being aware of it themselves. Such persons may deserve the very highest esteem, and admiration, and love, but—I have not found them happy, or, more properly, able to make those dearest to them happy."

"And, therefore, you do not consider it advisable, nor a happy circumstance, to be nearly connected with such," said Uno, closely observing Hedvig, and seeming to read her soul.

"Uno," replied she, with deep emotion, "pardon me! but I should fear for her whom I love!"

"You are, perhaps, right!" said Uno, after a moment's silence; "and," added he not without bitterness, "Engel thinks so too, and considers it as the most prudent and the wisest to—"

"Be not unjust toward her!" exclaimed Hedvig! "be not severe, Uno, toward her who would rather partake with you, and that forever, the darkness of the grave, than the joy of Heaven without you!"

"Is it so?" said Uno to Engel; "have you said so?—you will accompany me into the desert of life, into the eternal night?"

"Oh, yes, Uno!"

"And you are not afraid of going with me?"

"No, I fear not!"

"Oh, then, indeed, all is clear," exclaimed Uno; "Engel, beloved, you, young, angelic, adored girl—you sunbeam, you heart of my heart! Come, share with me darkness, light, death—whatever fate, whatever Providence decrees. Come, mine own! What dare, what can separate, when your heart speaks thus? Are we not one? Oh, what and whom art thou that didst create love?—beautiful, wonderful power! thou must also bless her, crown thy most beautiful work! Hedvig, mourn not, be calm, be joyful. If you trust in an eternal God, who is full of love, then trust also in his mercy to us: see his work in us. Give me the child of thy heart without hesitation—give me thy blessing."

"Ah," said Hedvig, "who am I that I should venture to decide, venture to bless? You yourselves must prove—you yourselves must decide—"

But, spite of all hesitation, all proving, all questions, love, full of light and confidence, had already given his decision. The lovers were clasped in each other's arms. Spite of that gulf which threatened to separate them, they had bound themselves together as a sacred defiance of all the powers of darkness, in the light of a love, which let them "believe all things, hope for all things, overcome all things." A mighty, heartfelt joy, trembled through their souls with unspeakable harmonies, while eye beamed in eye, lips met lips, and words of holy, burning tenderness, passed from the soul of one into that of the other, amid blessed tears and smiles.

Hedvig wept in silence; she sympathized in their feelings; she was happy in their love, and the words of warning upon her lips changed into blessings. It was not till she was alone that clouds returned to her soul, questions and doubts. She longed for evening, and the hour of conversation alone with Augustin.

He came, and Hedvig eased her heart, and communicated to him the important event of the day, and the sad secret which had been made known to her.

Augustin started at this unexpected communication. But the same thoughts which calmed Hedvig were present also in his soul, and his sanguine temperament made him discover, beside these, new light wherewith to overcome Hedvig's continued uneasiness.

Hedvig then said, "It is, however, sorrowful when husbands and wives think differently on the highest and most important questions of life. They then can never properly become one!"

"No," replied Augustin, "not in all belief, all hope, but truly so in the one needful—in all love. And know you, Hedvig? since I have more closely observed differences of opinion in the world, and have become acquainted with excellent men of great dissimilarity of views in religion, politics, and science, I have arrived at the conviction, that these differences—which often are merely like different boughs of the same tree—have their foundation in the designs of the Almighty with regard to us and life. He allows people to be born with dissimilar organs and under dissimilar influences, in order that they may take hold of the dissimilar sides of life and truth, and that thus, by means of them, the whole manifold substance of truth may be developed, like links in the great chain of thought, like preparatory theses and anti-theses to the great synthesis.

"And it is precisely these differences which ought rightly to embrace, to advance, and to develop the only unity, in which we all can fully become one, and become one with God. People say so much about unity. But I do not trouble myself with respect to any unbounded unity, any unity of form or appearance. Let us, in Heaven's name, be different. The combat is not the evil. It arouses, and causes development. Bitterness and dishonesty in the combat are evil. And they must be done away with. The important thing is that we are honest, and in earnest in our search after truth; honest and chivalrous toward one another. Thus may we hope, upon whatever side of the question, or the conviction, we may find ourselves, that we may be instrumental in the hands of Providence for the advancement of his world-plan."

Augustin was silent for a moment, and then continued :—

"It is, for the rest, very difficult, nowadays, to say who is a Christian, or who is not. I know no better proof of this, than the disposition and the fruit. Christian life has so penetrated the life of the world that we are in the midst of its current, driven on by its knowledge, even without our own consciousness of it. In manners, in laws, in social life, in literature, every where do we meet with its light and its spirit. And he who loves this light, this spirit, and is guided by it, he is a Christian, although he should mistake its origin. And the voice which cries through the world, 'Blessed are the pure in heart! the merciful! the peace-makers! they who hunger and thirst after righteousness!' has likewise pronounced a blessing on these nameless worshippers, yes, on all who, from the beginning of the world, have lived in love to truth and virtue. There are degrees in every thing; there is a being more remote, and nearer to the divinity in comprehension and in activity. But, Hedvig, why should we separate the beams of the sun from the sun, and deny that they are a part of his life? The word of God does not do so. It shows clearly how they are connected. Man has separated what God united. But if man universally acknowledged this divine connection, there would be a universal church established, and the scattered heaps would be assembled upon earth. Then would the invisible church, which was and which is, be made visible, and many would acknowledge themselves to be Christians, who now do not do so. But wherever I see a man, who lives in purity, and who labors in true love, there I see a member of that universal, eternal church, because I believe with the apostle, that 'all they who are impelled by the Spirit of God are his children!'"

"What good your words do me, Augustin! said Hedvig; they seem as if they had the breezes and the light of morning in them, I become so assured and so hopeful. And Uno is certainly one of those of whom you speak?"

"Yes, he is. He deserves, of a certainty, to have the name and joy of the Christian, because he has the Christian disposition. And I consider it as very probable that his marriage with Engel may lead to a change in his mode of thinking. I have known more than one man who has handled the highest questions of life very superficially until he became a husband and a father, and asked himself, 'What shall I say to my child? what shall I give to it as a stay, and as an object in life and in death?' and these questions have again led him into a deeper investigation; through her he has ascended the most beautiful truths of life. Engel's soul and temper have ever since childhood had a singularly warm and bright religious tendency. She can not be without influence upon Uno. It is not possible for me, no, it is not possible for me to be uneasy about their union."

It was near midnight when Hedvig found herself alone in her own chamber. She went softly into her sisters' room to see if either of them were still awake. Göthilda slept soundly. But Engel sprang up from her light slumber, sat up, and looked as if terrified around her. When she recognized Hedvig, she stretched out her arms to her and smiled.

"Oh!" said she, "I have had such a strange dream; both sad and beautiful, and, above all, so extraordinary. If certainly means something, Hedvig!"

"Merely that my Engel was excited in the day, and had both dark and bright thoughts!"

"But latest only bright ones, Hedvig; I have been so happy this evening; I have had a feeling of—an inward certainty, that Uno through me shall have a faith, a hope which he now lacks."

"But you must not argue with him, my sweet child; nor seek to show what you believe and know; this habit leads to disputation, and seldom does good. Besides which, you have not knowledge and ability for it."

"Oh, no! I know that very well, Hedvig! Neither have I thought of such a thing. I will merely—love him; make him happy every day, and I think that God will help me—teach me. I feel myself so happy, Hedvig—so calm and so filled with hope. Uno is so good! I believe that I like him better than ever now; because I think that he is to be pitied, because he is not happier. But, Hedvig, how pleasant it is to love with all our soul, and all our heart, and to live for him whom we love! That is life! Sweet Hedvig, I must kiss you!"

DAYS, POINTS OF LIGHT, AND MEDALS.

"THAT Engel! she gets handsomer from day to day!" said Bror one day to Göthilda, as they were busied together setting the house in order for the winter; and Bror, for the time being, had put himself under his sister's command as her "men servants."

"Yes," replied Göthilda; "but I tell you what, Bror; I think that nobody in this house is so handsome as Hedvig. When she sits there at her spinning-wheel, and the light falls upon her on one side—or when she goes softly about the house, and arranges things nicely for every body—or when she looks on one of us with eyes which penetrate our souls like a sunbeam, so warm and kind, and just as if they would lay a blessing there I often wonder how it is that she is so beautiful. But it is a beauty within her which beams without; and for some time it has seemed to me as if she were really glorified—as if there were some great, silent joy within her.”

And it was so. For some time Hedvig had borne some words in her heart—such words as human beings write at the moment when they are angels. They were from her friend, who had now journeyed into the east; words of parting, but by which he had wedded her to him for eternity. He had told her that the slightest intimation from her should recall him to his fatherland, even if it should reach him on the summit of the Himalayas, or in the mines of Golconda. And, above all, till his return, should she, his guardian angel, be with him, guide him, cheer him, in his researches and in his labor.

With such words upon her heart, within her heart, from the man whom she loved, Hedvig felt not as an evil the pain of separation; a sort of heavenly joy lay within her soul; and, freed from self, she could give herself up to the joy which Engel's betrothal occasioned in the family, and which the connection with Uno contributed to increase. He made presents to all; he seemed to wish to communicate to all something of the happiness which he himself felt. Hedvig saw in this Uno's beautiful disposition, full of human kindness, and Götthilda's observation was correct, when she saw more and more beautiful days brighten up Hedvig's gentle countenance.

For the rest, in a home where love and prosperity abide, lights and shadows always so fall that the slightest shade of beauty of which human nature is capable becomes perceptible, and is observed. Yes, that loving look is itself such an illuminator, because it so willingly sees every thing in its best light: it knows how to collect the rays, how to discover the hidden beauty, and how to give to that which is not either beautiful or agreeable a comic turn which calls forth a good-humored smile. O! that glance is a great artist! And it can not only see, but it can avoid seeing, and to avoid seeing, “to let alone; to take no notice” is, as Thorikd says, “a very divine art!”

“A little higher with that picture, Bror—our Claude Lorrain, as I call it—still, a little higher, so that it hides the spot on the paper—there, that will do very well, and—don't fall down from the step-ladder, I beg of you, my dear workman—there, and hang that landscape a little lower which Augustin is so fond of—so that he can see it from his sofa corner—when he sits and cuts open his new books, and glances first into them and then around him, and enjoys life, as he says. It is a charming taste to be fond of books; fresh life always comes with them—and Augustin always brings new books and fresh life with him. He brings repose with him, as Ivar brings disquiet; though Ivar has been a little better of late.”

“And what do I bring, I should like to know?” said Bror.

“You bring—a merry fellow, and my very dearest brother, who will now come and help his very dearest sister with this window finery. Not so, wicked monseer. Ah! what destructive, clumsy things lads are! A horrid race! Now, do you see? this is to stand between the double windows, so that they may not get frozen. Are you sure you understand? First this cotton wool, then make a parterre of this beautiful pure moss—do you see the snowy evergreen in miniature, and between that green moss—”

“Hypnum umbratum, it is called by the learned,” interrupted Bror.

“Yes, I care nothing about that, I call it green moss,” said Götthilda; “and then between these terraces of moss, these little flowers which Engel and I have made. Is it not pretty? Afterward we shall put them in the double windows. And all this that my young fellows may sit, as it were, in a glass cloak without feeling a draught of cold air from the windows. All out of kindness to you, and you ought to kiss my hand for it, because I am a regular Madame Bonne for you.”

“Your most humble servant! J'ai le honneur, to be Madame Bonne tres humble serviteur!”

“Fort bien, mon petit! Very well said!”

“Ah, le français! Je suis fameuse dans se lange! Donner les leçons au public in spring, pour le bienfait de la patrie! C'est beau! pas?”

“Oh, sublime! But now, will Monsieur le Professeur take and carry away this rubbish? We must have this in order to-day, so that we may get the carpets down to-morrow; the one with the red roses here, and the one with blue roses, which uncle gave to the family, in the little room.”

“Roses in the windows, roses under the feet! We shall get regularly to dance on roses; and this will become a regular little paradise; the blessed love that comes into the house must have made it so.”

“I do not know: but we shall this year have right excellent winter-quarters, and winter may now rave about out of doors as he best likes.”

“According to the number of winters,” says Geijer, “our forefathers counted the years, thus calling the whole of the year by the largest portion of it; and, properly speaking, it is the winter which gives a character to the northern domestic life. People can not live here by the day; they must live for the year, and during the far greater part of the year, upon the provision which has been laid up during the shorter part."

From this domination of winter follows the infinitely severe form which life assumes in the homes of distress, the nakedness, the frost, the unsightliness, which makes the heart freeze in the breast and all joy expire. From this, likewise—on the sunny side of life—proceeds the care which people take about the dwelling-house, about the little world within those homes which are raised above the earth-level of poverty, so that during the severest winter they may live a pleasant summer life—in so far as no spiritual north wind blows over it.

"Because snow likewise falls within the most carefully kept dwellings—snow and sleet, and——"

What was it which Bror just said? we hear so much about ourselves that we forget our brothers and sisters—Göthilda replies.

"No, Bror, we will not do that, because Hedvig does not like it."

Bror!—"Oh, it is only a trifle."

Göthilda!—"Nothing is a trifle which is displeasing to Hedvig."

"Thanks, Göthilda! Thanks, good girl, for that word. And if every body thought so, there would not so often arise that dull bad weather, those clouded feelings, those little bitter disagreeables, by which married people, brothers and sisters, parents and children, by degrees embitter one another's lives, and which create altogether that great, gray, heavy oppressive cloud—discomfort."

A fly is a very light burden, but if it were perpetually to return and set itself on our nose, it might weary us of our very lives.

"Thanks, therefore, Göthilda, for the proverb, 'nothing is a trifle which is unpleasant to our friend.'"

And by the side of this we would inscribe upon the tablets of home, "Nothing is insignificant which gives pleasure to our friend." Because from this arises that bright summer-mild atmosphere in the home, which is called comfort. And without this, how cold, how miserable is home in the north.

Hedvig, however, had long since inscribed this proverb in her heart, and affectionate desires and womanly delicacy of feeling guided her in the employment of it. Hence her silent attention to the likings and peculiarities of every one; hence her regulation of the home and the daily life within it, so that every one might find his own individual comfort in that of the whole.

"But how did she do this?"

Yes, my young lady reader! Will as she willed; seek as she sought, and thou wilt find it out. It is not to be told by words.

There are animalcules, invisible to the naked eye, which make the sea brilliant as fire, so that every wave seems bordered with gold. There are also small reptiles which occasion those miasma which by their plague can slay the strongest natures. Even spiritual life has its monads, and the life-atmosphere of the family depends upon what the nature of these is.

But have I not just now said, probably, the same thing? And have I not long ago written and said, probably, the same thing? I am very much afraid that I have. Because out of the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh. But, gentle reader—bear with me this once. It is perhaps the last time in which I shall sketch for thee pictures out of domestic life and certainly it is the last in which I shall give such a long history. And now again to our story.

It would have been easy for Hedvig to spoil the people about her, because she was too kind and too fond of ease to be at the trouble of correcting any one, excepting through her own example. She followed the advice of Thomas à Kempis.

"When any one, after being warned once or twice, will not correct himself, do not contend with him, but commend him entirely to God, because he knows very well how to turn the wicked to goodness."

And yet, in the end, every body in the family did that which Hedvig desired and wished. How did it happen? It was because Hedvig possessed that sort of temper which every woman ought to possess, and which would make them so powerful that they themselves and all the gentlemen would be astonished—she possessed—gentleness. There is something stronger in the world than the arms of giants—there is the wind of the spirit which breathes through the world, and which can bow human hearts, those fluttering leaves of the world's tree.

For Hedvig's sake her brothers became more and more careful to remove every thing of a disturbing nature from their home; for Hedvig's sake Göthilda struggled with her naturally violent and restless temper; for Hedvig's sake even General Herkules reformed himself by degrees in certain coarse, old bachelor ways and habits which were painful to womanly delicacy. And the young girls assisted her unconsciously in this respect.

It was not without justice that Bror said, "Engel gets handsomer every day."

When Moses struck the rock and the water gushed forth; when Aaron's staff budded at once into green leaf and flower—it certainly was miraculous. But almost as miraculous is the change which takes place in two persons who love each other, and who, from mere acquaintance, become betrothed. A partition wall has been removed from between them. They might love; they might show their love to each other; they might show it before the whole world and stand before each other as suns, and bloom forth in beauty before each other. But who can describe how the mystical depths disclose themselves in the deep, inward soul? It must be experienced. The change is the greatest in the woman; because habit and custom and that bashfulness which nature has given to the young girl before him whom she secretly loves, all fetter her behavior, and put, as it were, body and soul in armor. But—hast thou read the beautiful old song about the Valkyria which lay bound in a deep sleep in her armor, under the strong power of witchcraft? The knight comes who unlooses her coat of mail, and then she is released. She wakes; salutes the day, salutes the night, heaven and earth, gods and goddesses, and looks joyfully on all the world, and she is now, the newly awakened, who gives to her deliverer, to her beloved, the drink (the mead) which makes him clear-sighted—

Human strength blended
With might of the gods:
Full of sweet singing
And power of healing,
Of beautiful poems
And runes of rejoicing.

It is she who interprets to him the mysterious runes of life; he who, enchanted, listens to her and learns.

Something like this takes place not unfrequently between two lovers, and something like this took place between Uno and Engel. In the light of the new life which arose before her, the young girl seemed to develop herself into more beauty before him who had awakened her slumbering spirit; new, beautiful feelings, thoughts, anticipations sprang up, like wonderful flowers out of the depths of her soul, to cheer and to diffuse fragrance around him. And Uno, happy and captivated, often would listen to words of almost wonderful wisdom and love, which, profound and childish at the same time, came from this pure and devoted heart. It seemed as if this young sunbeam had sprung warm from the bosom of the All-father, and had fallen in love with night, which it would warm and illumine and overcome; and thus, as if even the shadow which gave a dark side to the union of Engel with Uno, served to increase life and light.

The betrothal of Engel Dalberg with a man of wealth, and one who was universally esteemed, caused a joyful excitement in the circle of the family acquaintance. Aunt Queen Bee, who was accustomed to say, "I know the world," asserted of a truth, that never were people discovered by their fellow-beings to be so full of faults and failings as when they were going to be married, and never so rich in merits, as when they were about to die; therefore she recommended that at every wedding the guests should have plenty to eat, that they might forget to talk. And we listen willingly to wise ladies and have faith in their wisdom. True, however, it is, nevertheless, that the happiness and good fortune of good people always excite a hearty sympathy in the circle in which they live and move. The Dalberg family had experienced this. They had greetings, congratulations, handshakings, and nods from acquaintance and half-acquaintance, and almost no acquaintance at all. They found themselves possessed of good friends every where. And if many of them were of that race which "comes with the flood and goes with the ebb," they did not think about it now, but enjoyed the high-water of the moment.

"I find," said Göthilda, "that we Dalbergs are now really the most remarkable people in the city, and I expect that some fine day people will have medals struck of us altogether. I think, therefore, that we ought to prepare ourselves for the occasion, and to choose for ourselves suitable attributes and mottoes. Come, Bror, let us, two lay our heads together, and prepare a rough sketch of the attributes and mottoes suitable for all the members of the family."

Bror and Göthilda laid their wise heads together; pondered, laughed, and made designs, and in the evening laid before the family circle the following sketches of medals, the figures all a little caricatured.

General Herkules, with the hammer of Thor uplifted in his hand. Inscription—"Against the devil, and for the fatherland."

Augustin, as a schoolmaster, with a stupid-looking schoolboy before him, representing "the rising generation," on whom he is endeavoring to impress his motto—"Man has no rights, he has merely duties."

Sister Hedvig, spinning at a flax-wheel, with the flax in heaven and the spinning-wheel on earth. The inscription—"Patience." On the reverse of the medal a wreath of lilac, and within, the words—"For all."

Ivar, rowing a boat on the open sea in a severe storm. The inscription—"Where does my fate lead me?" On the reverse—"It all goes madly."

Gerda, as Valkyria, with an uplifted knee; a runic and mystic inscription around it. Bror could not undertake to interpret it.

Bror himself, as an arbitrator between two fighting cocks. The inscription—"Let no one dispute about tastes and likings."

Göthilda, striving with fate for dominion, represented by a scepter, which might also be mistaken for a poker. Inscription—"All or nothing."

Engel, cheek by jowl with Uno, singing the one to the other an aria out of "The Creation," "Thy will is my law."

The Cadets, No. 31 and No. 32, armed, the one with a pancake, the other with a muffin, which they are just about to swallow down. Inscription—"Pro patria."

Lastly, the family medal, upon which all the members of the family are seen in a large carriage driving up a lofty mountain, on the top of which may be seen the temple of the sun. The horses pull with all their might, and the coachman, the genius of the family, cries out—"Gee up!—allons!"

"They look devilish restive, those horses; and the coachman is certainly not quite sober," remarked uncle Herkules. "I am afraid that the whole party will be upset and tumble into the ditch at least twice before they get up to the top of the hill, and my rattle-pate will get a scratch from fate. Ha, what an idea!"

SHADOWS.

BUT while figures of light increased in the family circle, and spread around living beams, one form began to grow darker and darker, and to throw shadows on this life. After a short time of unusual calm, Ivar became evidently more uneasy and more unhappy every day.

The worst of a misfortune, of suffering which takes deep hold upon a human soul, is, that it reveals to itself the darkness that is in it. The soul perceives not this darkness so long as the outward life is green and covered with flowers. But the storm goes over it, and every thing is changed. It believes itself good; it believes itself strong, able to conquer heaven and earth: and now—it finds that it is deceived by itself, as well as by others. Thence come feelings and moments of dejection!

There was more than one circumstance at this time which contributed to cast a gloom on Ivar's temper. He was a partner in a literary journal, and had got into one of those polemical disputes which produce any thing but comfort and good humor. Having been attacked with bitterness, he had replied in the same spirit, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, and had received as much or worse, in return. In vain Gôthilda had endeavored to calm him with the proverb—of Arabian origin I fancy—"People only throw stones at trees which are rich in fruit." And Augustin with the old northern one, "The better often yields when the worse strikes!"

Ivar would neither allow himself to be calmed, nor yet take advice; he would strike, would have the right to overcome his adversary at least by the power of abuse, and thus he very soon placed himself on the wrong side, and was blamed both by friends and foes.

Ivar knew himself to be wrong, but that only embittered him the more. In a word, there was at this time a change in Ivar's life, such as takes place in many men when they know that it—goes wrong.

In the moments when he felt this most vividly, when he knew not what to do with himself, and the burden which oppressed him, and the suffering which tore him to pieces, Hedvig stood by him, and then, with her, in "the sanctuary," he gave way to his frenzy against his beloved, against the world and mankind, against life, and sometimes even against its Creator. There only found he comfort; yes, there had he sometimes moments of wonderful calm and freedom from suffering.

In certain agonies of the soul, as in certain ailments of the body, there are paroxysms which set in and rule with demoniac power; and intervals in which they sleep, when the unfortunate one has rest—yes, when life smiles on his soul, like the sun amid the rain-filled clouds. So was it with Saul; so with Orestes: so is it with many children of the earth in these days, and so was it with poor Ivar. And as the furies only left the Grecian youth in the sacred grove of which his sister was the priestess, so was it only when near Hedvig that the demons of jealousy and suspicion which rent Ivar to pieces sometimes left him in peace.

At such moments Ivar was amiable, and spoke beautiful words.

"How pleasant it is to be with you, Hedvig," said he sometimes; "your spirit, your voice, your glance, is like a song, which charms the serpents in my breast. Now they sleep—I feel nothing evil. God be praised for this moment! May I lean my head against you? Peace goes not from you. Ah! it is good. You are like Minnetrost, Hedvig, in the Magic Ring; she with the eyes clear as moonlight, and the lilies which infused such a delightful peace. How I liked that story when I read it! Waking or sleeping, I dreamed of being in that mountain, under the magical influence of those eyes, of those lilies. And now—I am there indeed. Do not move, Hedvig! let us be still, still—so that the magic spell may not be broken, and the evil spirits escape; I now would sleep—I have not slept so long! But are you not weary, Hedvig?"

"Weary!—no, Ivar; I would sit night and day with you, only that you might have repose."

"You are like Sigyn in the old legend. Do you know it? It is said that Loke once was bound by the other gods upon three stones, and above him hung an adder, the poison of which continually dropped upon his face. Beside him, however, sat Sigyn, his wife, who held a dish to catch the poison; but when the dish was full she went to empty it out, and then the poison again fell upon the face of the captive, and he trembled so with the pain that—yes, yes, the resemblance is more close than you can believe, and it becomes more so every day. Because I know that a great change is taking place in me, a great and gloomy change. My heart has been warm and gentle;—I have loved mankind; I wished to live to make them happier;—God knows how I wished to live, yes, to sacrifice myself for them!—but now, I feel bitterness and misanthropy creeping into my heart—yes, there are times when I shrink from myself!”

“But I do not shrink from you, Ivar,” said Hedvig; “I am not afraid of you. Because I see you more correctly than you now see yourself, and I know you better. And when this time of combat and darkness has passed over—”

“Yes, when! but when will that be—and—how? Ah! Hedvig!”

“Some time, it is quite certain to be, Ivar; some time, and not so long before, either. Ah! I have seen so much darkness become light, so many combats pass over, I can not be distrustful of you.”

And now Hedvig related many stories of what she had seen take place within the human breast, or in the silent household; and she allowed her brother also to look into her own heart, to see its silent struggle, and how it had conquered. It did Ivar good to hear about the sorrow and struggles of another (it is common to the human being in his need, and not so bad, either, as it seems. He finds companionship, comrades in suffering;—he is no longer solitary upon the rocks of misfortune, that is all!) and when he looked into his sister's soul, and saw how she loved, and had given up her lover, how she could expect so little enjoyment on earth for herself, and yet how she was so kind, and rejoiced so much in the happiness of others—a beneficial admiration stole into Ivar's heart. Many a time would he lie, long silent upon his knees before his sister, holding her hand between his, and looking deeply into her mild, calm, affectionate eyes, which rested upon him like the moonbeams upon the agitated sea, and poured the oil of peace upon the tumultuous swell of his feelings.

In such moments also Ivar's heart was accessible to the words and elevating prospects of religion; to the world of light which had thus been extended over the dim and restless earth. And when Hedvig read to him out of the Holy Scriptures, he listened and would say with delight:—“How beautiful that is! How grand and perfect!” But these moments of light did not last long, and they left behind them no brightness when the time of darkness came, and when Ivar's spirit was dragged down into the vortex of his anguish. When Ivar was thus under the influence of the pangs of jealousy or hatred, he was frequently like one insane; sprung round the room, wrung his hands, while he uttered the most violent curses against the woman who had deceived him, the friends who had forsaken him. He thirsted for their hearts' blood. In other moments he sunk into the most awful musing over himself and life, and spoke the whole time not one word. The blood then rushed violently to his head, and these were moments when he seemed almost mad.

“You must travel, Ivar, you must get away from this place,” said Hedvig to him one day, terrified at his condition—“This will kill you!”

“Yes,” replied Ivar, “I know it, I shall perish! But to travel!—Where? where is the paradise on earth, from which I should not long to return to her feet, even in order to be again spurned, abused!—”

“But, Ivar! you are too noble, too good, to be sunk so low! You can not be a slave to that which you despise.”

“Can I not? ah, Hedvig! others have been so who are greater, and stronger than I. And to be obliged to worship, to adore, what we despise, what we detest—it is murder!—”

“Yes, if we do not combat with ourselves—overcome, or—fly. And we can combat with ourselves, Ivar; we can, at least, make the attempt. Dear, beloved Ivar, you must go away from this place for some time; step out of the magic circle, break its power. Augustin, or, if he can not be spared from the duties of his office, David, must take a journey with you; nay, uncle Hercules himself, if we would talk with him about it, would take you with him to his beloved Jemtland, and there feast and hunt bears with you! Alas! that I myself can not travel with you!—”

“God bless you, my sweet, dear Hedvig, for all your traveling companionship. But to hunt bears up in Jemtland with uncle Hercules, is not at all to my taste; and the other traveling companions would be as wearisome to me as I should be to them. You would be the only one, who—but I must not travel now; I have not the money, neither have I—you see, Hedvig; many a time it occurs to me, that I—as Hortense says—am the one who is wrong in this affair; that my suspicions are unfounded, that it is my restless, distrustful temper which is the cause of all the misunderstanding; that she is faithful to me, and will belong to me, marry me, as she says, when I have succeeded in acquiring a more independent position in life. It is, indeed, possible that it is so; that merely my jealous eyes are to blame, and that my demands have been too great, too unreasonable for a nature such as him. Yes, it is sometimes impossible for me to believe that she is that bold woman which she must be, if she merely decoyed me to—lead me into folly, played with me, and then—cast me off for a richer and more high-bred lover. I can not believe it, and I ought, at all events, to know it of a certainty before—”

“Before what, Ivar?”

“Before I—travel, or at least, leave her and you, and—all! Oh, Hedvig! Oh, my dear, kind sister! if this take the unfortunate turn which I foresee—vindicate my memory! say to people that I was not so foolish, so godless as it appeared; that I once was good, and wished to do good—but no, say nothing;—it is not worth while! What should I care about people’s opinions, if—let them say what they will! Do you only love me, and—forgive me if you can.”

The brother and sister wept together.

Sometimes Ivar irritated himself even by the comfort and the hope that was offered to him.

“Do not attempt to comfort me, Hedvig,” he then would say, impatiently, “and do not fancy that I can be assisted. Never propose to me to go and hunt bears with uncle Herkules, because I then should shoot him or myself. And do not preach to me, because I can not bear it. That which is right and reasonable, or what the world calls so—I know as well as any body. But I have no wish, no inclination for it; and the virtuous, estimable people whom I see going backward and forward in the world like puppets, give me no taste for it either. They are intolerable;—I wish them all at the devil!”

“And me with them!” said Hedvig, smiling, as she endeavored to give a jocular turn to Ivar’s disposition.

“And you—no, not you with them; because you are after all, the best of the lot! and you—you will forgive your poor brother!”

And Hedvig’s hand was again clasped within Ivar’s, and her gentle eyes beamed upon him so warmly and so soothingly.

“And your noble, beautiful thoughts, Ivar, your thoughts for your fellow-creatures, for the well-being of the poor and the oppressed!” said Hedvig sometimes—“you must live, you must raise yourself up for them. He who has any thing so great and good in view, must not, can not be subdued by one single misfortune—”

“I very well understand you, Hedvig,” said Ivar, gloomily, “but that is also in vain. My wishes have been good and kind—I knew that I have had strength and ability which were not common, which might have led me to something great, but—all that has been, it is so no more!—It is past: and my misfortune is, that I am so fearfully clear about myself, that I no longer can deceive myself as to my condition. It is as if I hovered over my own grave, and saw my corpse lying within it. That woman! O she has bound me hands and feet. And then, if the best should happen, if she still loves me, still might become mine—still I am lost, because she is not that which I believed; she is a wicked woman, a fallen spirit. But I must nevertheless love her—It is my doom and my perdition. The poisoned garment which I wear, which feeds the blood in my veins, I can only tear away with my life.”

“Do not believe it, Ivar!” besought Hedvig, filled with anxiety; “do not believe that old gloomy legend. It is a miserable dream, which you will dissipate if you will only awaken!”

“Why should I not believe that which I know, and which so many have known before me?” replied Ivar; “and why should it fall out so much better with me, than with so many other human beings? Look around you, Hedvig, and you will see many who broke off in the middle of their career, who stumble and fall as if they were smitten by a curse. We see them, we pass them in the streets; we call them ‘wretches,’ and pass them by with indifference, and do not recollect that they once were young, hopeful; until people say that it was their own fault, that they were weak, that they allowed themselves to be misled, and so on; but, Hedvig, human character is wonderfully dissimilar, and there are human beings who seem made to be unfortunate. How unlike are we three brothers! There is Augustin, a soul almost without blemish, brilliant with truth and love. There is Bror, a steady and merry fellow at the same time, whom our Lord must have created in a moment of good-humor, who works like a horse, at his desk with his ledgers, and then dances the galloppe till the sweat drops from him, and his hair flutters up and down. How could such a man ever be any thing but fortunate? And then there am I, with my eternal unrest, with my earnest desire to do something great and perfect, and my inward inability. I am like the wave which the tempest elevates to kiss the heavens, and which is continually cast down again into the abyss. Oh, Hedvig, I have dreamed a beautiful dream;—the redness of the morning was tinged with gold, when I began life, and believed all to be good, and hoped every thing; but—now I have awoken, and it is vanished! I have honestly asked myself, how I could bear that heavy, colorless, joyless life, which I henceforth expect—how I shall manage so as not to be a burden to others as well as to myself. And to this I can find no answer.”

“Let time speak, Ivar, time or—God! He can show us. He can turn evil into good, and perhaps—yes, I sometimes have a presentiment of it—this misfortune one day into your good.”

“How absurd!” said Ivar, impatiently; “no, the best good fortune which could now happen to me, would be death as soon as possible!”

Sometimes Hedvig let Ivar talk and predict his own ruin, without answering a single word of consolation; she only wept quietly over him, and that dew of love abated the fever in his soul; and Hedvig's opinion of him and his future, was to him, after all, a little ray of light in the dark night.

When the insect passes through its changes, it often seems to struggle much, to suffer much, and it even happens that it sometimes perishes during the process of change. If it passes through it happily, it comes forth in a glorified form. It is not otherwise with the human insect (forgive me, lord of creation!). And it is well when, at the hour of the change, an affectionate eye is present through the struggle, watching and beaming over him, like a warm and bright sunbeam, because it—helps him through!

Ivar's unhappy state of mind, and his violent outbreaks at this time, affected Hedvig deeply; destroying the peace of her days, and her repose at night, but the more warmly did she attach herself to her unfortunate brother, whose sole confidant and consolation she was; and she was unwearied in her endeavors to console and comfort him, and she neglected no means for this purpose, not even the most childish.

It was unfortunate that Ivar did not live in the house, because it then would have been more easy for Hedvig to watch over him; now, however, it was often difficult to find him. Many a day he never came home at all; but if Ivar did not come to Hedvig, then Hedvig went to Ivar, even if it were late in the evening; and neither storm, nor snow, nor darkness, prevented her from this—nor yet Ivar's occasionally severe and repulsive words. She endured it with the dignity and the gentleness of love.

Oh, goodness! There is in the world so much talent, so much ingenuity, prudence, wit, genius, artistical perfection—but goodness—pure, simple, divine goodness! Where is it to be found? Baldur is dead. The good is dead. Wherefore do all beings now shed so many bitter tears? It would not be so if goodness were powerful on earth. Yet if you would know why some people are more beloved than others while they live, are more lamented and missed when they go hence, the answer which is given is, “they were so good.” That they, more than others, approached the original of that life which vanished with the golden age, of that which shall again return with it to earth.

But what did the rest of the family say about Ivar and his condition?

WHAT WAS SAID IN THE FAMILY ABOUT IVAR.

ENGEL said—nothing, but she wept when she saw Ivar look so agitated, and when she saw Hedvig weep. But her own life, so full of the sunshine of love, took up too much of her thoughts for her fully to dive down into a misery, which she, at all events, only half knew. Besides this, she was at that age, and in that state of mind, in which people “hope for every thing.” She could not comprehend but that all would very soon be right with Ivar.

Göthilda took the business tragically—sometimes called Ivar, “Our Erick the Fourteenth, our Prince Hamlet,” and fancied fearful things. Sometimes she “took it coolly,” and proposed that Ivar should be sent to school to uncle Urbanus, to learn how to become contented and happy. Sometimes she desired to surprise him in some great manner—an earthquake, a shower of moon-stones would have happened very seasonably. She pondered likewise whether she should not sacrifice herself for him; leap into the north stream before his eyes, or go to the “horrible Hortense,” and frighten the life out of her, or frighten her out of the country by giving her up into the hands of the police, by which means she—Göthilda—herself would run the risk of being strangled or stabbed by Ivar, or martyred for him in some way or other. But it was only passingly that she pondered on this. She was steadfast in the conviction that the cold water cure would be the best remedy for Ivar, and she wondered whether a Mentor would be found to counsel this new Telemachus. She pondered likewise a little on uncle Urbanus, for this purpose, but—

“Folly! confounded nonsense and folly!” grumbled uncle Herkulee. “Is a lad like him to fancy that he has a right to disturb a whole house with his whims, and that that angelic Hedvig!—In love? Vieschl Vieschla! Who has not been in love, and been a little foolish, too, in his life? It has happened to the best of us—it has happened to myself! but to turn the world upside down because of it, and look like desolation! That comes of your modern education and your modern theories, and from his having nothing useful to be doing. But I have, the deuce take me, a good mind to read the law to my dear Ivar, that I have, one of these days, so that he shall remember it for a while, and have something to think about! Yes, on my soul, that have I——”

In the mean time, the general went down to his room and let Thor's hammer thunder as if he would smash all small and great witchcraft, singing the while—

The good old times to me are dear,
The times of Charles now left behind,
For he was gay as peace of mind,
And brave as noble warriors are.

"Patience! patience, yet for a while!" said Augustin, consolingly, to Hedvig; "it will, it must go right with Ivar in the end. I have made inquiries, and I am almost sure that Ivar's suspicions of Hortense are well founded, and that it will soon be seen. And then he will—release himself. For, let him say what he will, he is too pure-hearted and noble to love any one whom he must despise, and who deceives him. And when that time comes, then is the time to give him our best support. In the mean while people must have patience with him; must leave him to himself; must let him pour out his own troubles, as you have done. But then, you ought not to be alone in all this. It is too much for you, my sweet Hedvig. Uno, myself, and David, we must consider together how we can best endeavor to divert his mind, and, at all events, leave him as little as possible alone. We must agree upon some plan of operation, because Ivar's state of mind will become more desperate as the crisis approaches. And then, Gerda will be here in a few weeks, and I expect much from her influence with Ivar; both are musical; both a little eccentric in their ideas, and they were life and soul to each other in childhood. They have many feelings in common. I hope much from Gerda. And you, my sweet, good Hedvig, do not look so dejected, so anxious, else—I shall be obliged to dance before you."

Bror said—nay, Göthilda first said to Bror, one day—

"Bror, you ought also to try what you can do to take care of our 'Prince Erick'—because if Erick the Fourteenth had been properly taken care of, looked after and advised by his relations, he would certainly not have committed all the horrible murders which ended in his becoming mad. And Ivar may likewise go mad if we do not take him in hand. And you, who are both good and wise, ought to give him your brotherly advice and admonition."

Bror shrugged his shoulders and looked dismal.

"What would you have," said he; "that a Philistine—because Ivar regards me as such an one—should venture to touch that sacred ark—his inner world? I should be slain in the attempt."

"Yes, but you ought, nevertheless, to attempt it," returned Göthilda; "you ought at least to go and visit him now and then. Little brother can really pay his respects to big brother, and at the same time give him a little good advice."

"Advice! Little brother to big brother!" said Bror, and shook his head thoughtfully. "But—very well. I will try to talk rationally with him. Nothing worse can happen to me than that he should become angry and give me a box on the ear, and I should be glad to receive two at his hand if he would only come to his sound senses again."

"You are my own generous heart's-brother!" said Göthilda.

A few days afterward Bror came home one morning looking very much excited, and desired Göthilda to give him a glass of spirits—"something that would strengthen the stomach or the nerves, by all means."

"What is amiss with you? What has happened? You look so strangely," said Göthilda, quite ill with the sight.

"Ay, indeed! I have fulfilled my brotherly duties according to your wishes. Yes, it did not do much good. Don't you see paint on my coat! there on my back!"

"Not the least. But, Bror, what does all this mean?"

"It means that I, this morning, summoned courage and went, according to your good advice, to pay a morning visit to my brother Ivar. He was in his studio, and was standing, when I entered, with his back turned toward me, and was daubing—a nose I fancy—painted, of course.

"Good morning," I said.

"I received only a grumbling for an answer, and a half turning of the neck for a salutation.

"I will seat myself, thought I to myself, although nobody asks me; so I sat down on the only chair which I saw unoccupied.

"Beautiful weather to-day," said I, to begin the conversation.

"No answer. It is very entertaining, thought I, and pondered for awhile upon what I should begin with. At length I said—

"How are you?"

"No answer for half a minute, and then a stiff 'What now!'

"Why, I only asked," said I, 'because I fancied that you were not well.'

"No answer, only a sort of angry sound which was to represent, 'the devil take you!'

"Our prince is not in the best of tempers to-day, thought I, but that shall not deter me, and I began again:—

"You should take a little more exercise, I think, Ivar."

"But look you, he turned round at that, and gazed at me with a glance that went through me, and might have driven me right through the wall, if I had not steadied myself. But I now summoned up my courage, and said—

"My dear Ivar, you really look so strange and so wild that I, and we all, are troubled about you, and I must really most solemnly beg of you to consider—"

"My dear brother," said Ivar, interrupting me, and placing himself opposite to me, with a flaming countenance, and his pallet in one hand, his pencil, like a spear, in the other, 'I shall just as solemnly beg of you that you will trouble yourself about your own concerns and not mine; and not come and tease me with any such nonsense——'

"'Nonsense!' said I, and became a little excited.

"'Yes, nonsense, and nothing else,' said he. And then we went at it, one saying one thing, and the other something else, till we stood, with our faces as red as two turkey-cocks, opposite each other, and Ivar all the time with that confounded pallet of oil-colors in his hand, coming nearer and nearer, so that I, in dread of having it wiped upon my coat, made a hasty turn, and was off through the door. And I shall not be in a hurry to go there again, at least to give advice. No, that I am not fit for. That was what I got for the fulfillment of my brotherly duties."

Göthilda laughed till the tears ran down her face at her brother's relation, and lastly he laughed heartily with her at his unlucky expedition. If, however, any sensitive reader is offended at this, and finds fault with their hearts, we must take their part. They were carried away by youth, that was all. Neither had they a clear apprehension of Ivar's state of mind. Afterward, when they more clearly perceived what it was, they did not laugh. And yet the tragic and comic often stand so close to each other in this life, that people, with minds open for both, have sometimes a difficulty not to cry and laugh almost at the same time.

"Only bad digestion, my dear friend," said aunt Queen Bee; "believe me, for I understand these things. What is the diet he is fond of? Sweet things, tarts, and such trash, forenoon and afternoon. Sister Hedvig has actually spoiled him, both temper and stomach. Bad tempers of this kind proceed from the stomach. He must drink Saischütze for a week, and afterward, for a month, a decoction for purifying the blood; he must eat his meals regularly, and go to bed early; and not go about, as he does, to masked balls, and such things, till late in the night. If he will take medicine and diet himself for some weeks, then we shall see. You may believe me."

But aunt Queen Bee knew not of the deeper causes of Ivar's melancholy, and therefore none of the initiated put any faith in aunt Queen Bee's wise counsel.

"Do you know, Stolt," said Maja, one evening, as she sat mending stockings in the maid-servants' room, to Stolt, who was doing something to the general's clothes by the same tallow candle—"do you know, Stolt, that things are beginning to look badly with Mr. Ivar. He looks so grave, and there is neither rest nor quiet in him; he used formerly to be so gay, and one heard him singing every time he came home. God knows what is come to him, but it is plain enough to see that he struggles and suffers a deal. And I have been very anxious about him for a long time."

"He ought to go into the wars," said Stolt. "He should go out into a shower of balls, and the smoke of gunpowder; then he would be merry enough again. I was never so merry as when I was in the war, although we often came off badly enough, and did not know one hour if our heads would sit quiet on our shoulders the next. But it was just that which kept one's head up. And merry comrades has one in the field, which enlivens one's spirits. I had the late Glad for my comrade. He was like my other self. Where I was, there was he; and where he was, there was I; and we always went together into battle; and 'Stolt and Glad' were a firm of which the enemy was not very fond, that I declare. But all the comrades liked Glad. He was the best lad in the whole regiment, and we stood one by the other as our two masters—the two brothers Herkules—did at that time. And since Glad and I parted—because, after the war in Finland, he remained there with his master, when I followed mine into Sweden—yes, since he parted from me, I have never been in a right good humor. He was always merry—had always something funny to say. I never knew what wearisomeness was when I was with him."

"You should have married, Mr. Stolt," said Hannah, in her sharp and rather sarcastic tone, "and then your life would have been more entertaining, and you, perhaps, have been more entertaining to yourself, than you are now."

"That I might easily have been if I would," replied Stolt, proudly. "But I know the women, and have kept myself free from that trouble. Women are, after all—women!"

"Indeed," said Hannah, "and men are, after all, men, however odd that may be. But perhaps the women kept themselves free from you, Mr. Stolt. Do you know the look of a basket, Mr. Stolt?"

Without seeming to hear the sarcastic question, Stolt turned to Maja, and said, "Yes, if I had liked, I might have lived in ease and comfort ever since the peace—upon my laurels, as people say—because, after I got the wound in the Norwegian war, which unfitted me for service, I had a pension both from my king and my general, so that I might have settled down in peace, upon my laurels, as people say. But, you see, I never could forget what my general was to me in the war—how he, many a time, fared badly himself, that I might be better off, both for food and warmth, because I was only a lad in the first war in which we were together, and much younger than he, and could not bear so much; and how he was a father to me, and once saved my life at the risk of his own; no, I could not forget that, and I could not get on well if I did not see his face and hear his voice every day; so after I had spent three weeks in that sort of pleasant life, I left it, and went to my general, and told him that I would serve him, come what might, to be with him. And so I became his servant, as a volunteer of course, and for so long as I will. And all that I do for him and his horses, I do with all my heart. But that waiting at table is not one of my affairs, and does not suit me, especially since the general has placed himself in such a large family; and I would very willingly be excused from it, though I am very willing to stand behind my general's chair and the young ladies, and like to see them all; and so one day goes on after another, and—it goes."

"Ah, yes, depend upon it, every thing goes, provided there is plenty of friendship!" said Maja, with emotion. "Friendship makes every thing easy, and it is—so blessedly fine, so feeling-full."

Hannah laughed, and said—

"And how affecting and how greasy that feeling-full is. It was certainly out of that blessed fullness of feeling that Mr. Stolt, the other day, threw the melted butter over Miss Göthilda, till she had a complete pancake in her hair?"

"No," answered Stolt calmly, "that was caused by the wound which I have in my shoulder, and which makes me unable to present my weapon, and even to wait properly at table, because I can not lift my arms as I would. But so long as they like to have me, I have nothing to say against it. I shall stand at my post till somebody comes and releases me."

"You are very honorable and very good, Stolt, that is certain," said Maja warmly, and much pleased with Stolt, but much displeased with Hannah.

"A man should do his duty equally in peace as in war!" said Stolt calmly.

"And the noble duties of war," returned Hannah, who was in a spirit of warfare against Stolt, whose gentleness at this moment seemed still more to excite her; "the noble duties of war consist in slaying your neighbor, or in stealing his goods, and doing him as much mischief as possible."

"No!" replied Stolt, with more acrimony in glance and tone than hitherto; "not his neighbor, but the enemy of his king and country. Yes, a man may slay hundreds of such, and nevertheless not have a drop of blood on his conscience, but keep it as pure as an innocent child's. Not that I wish to praise war. I know that many wicked things occur in it, and that many sufferings are caused by it. And though a man may at first keep his hands clean from plunder and wickedness, yet if it continues long he gets savage, and does not know what he does. That I know by myself. I remember, one day, how I had been out with a foraging-party and had got nothing, and came home to quarters as hungry as a wolf. Then I saw my Glad, sitting and enjoying himself over a beautiful cabbage-soup which he had in a dish before him. I went without ceremony and seated myself beside him, took out my spoon, and began to eat with him. But on that he grinned quite savagely at me, and dragged the dish to himself. I dragged the dish back to me and grumbled at him, and then he dragged and I dragged, and then he grumbled and I grumbled, till we were ready to come to blows. But when I raised my hand to his head he burst out a-laughing, for he had the whole time only been making fun of me. But I scolded him for it, because it might very easily have gone wrong. And by that one can see that war may make a man quite savage. But I know not that I ever intentionally did wrong to either friend or foe. I can sleep calmly, and I do not know what remorse is. God be gracious to him who can not say so!"

Stolt did not look at Hannah as he said these words; but there was something in them that struck her, and to conceal it she said, "Oh, goodness, gracious! That is not so bad; either. Every body is not—so full of feeling!"

"All the worse for them!" said Stolt, raising himself up, and fixing a severe and keen glance on the giddy girl, whose hardness excited him. "Better be full of feeling than without feeling; and woe to him who is hardened!"

Hannah grew pale; and, turning her back, she threw the snuffers which she held in her hand on the table, till the snuffs flew out of them on Maja's lap, and with a jeering laugh she skipped out of the room.

"She ought never to have come into the house!" said Stolt; "and she ought to leave it as soon as possible. She is a bad character."

"Don't talk so, dear Stolt," besought Maja, crimsoning deeply, and with tears in her eyes. "She is still so young, and has been long in bad company. She may perhaps be good when she has been as long among good people."

"Yes, but I hardly think so," said Stolt. "I know what women are. I will lay any wager that it is such a piece of goods as that, which has put Mr. Ivar into such a state of bewilderment and confusion, and which has caused all his misfortune."

"No," said Maja, who had but little esprit de corps, "and a deal of good-humor: 'I will lay a wager that it will be another such a one which will come to bring his good luck. You know the proverb, Stolt, that a man must find his remedy where he has taken his bane.' Hi—hi—hi—hi!"

"Hannah ought to leave the house, and all women ought to be sent out of the world; there will be no peace till then, and no remedy either," said Stolt.

"Dear Stolt, how can you talk so foolishly!" said Maja.

Thus did they talk about Ivar and his condition in the family. We reckon the servants as belonging to the family; and it would have done badly without them.

In accordance with Augustin's "plan of operation," Ivar was from this time much more under the care of his friends, and this was good for him, and especially for Hedvig. A time of comparative peace succeeded in the family.

The days and the weeks passed on as they usually do in the winter-time at Stockholm with families of moderate incomes, and who go but little out into the world. Now and then a ball for the young people, now and then a visit to the theater, now and then a sapper, which nowadays are very different, and no comparison quieter and better than they were twenty years ago, diversified the monotony of their daily life; for the rest they were thrown upon their own resources; and in this capital there assuredly exist dissensions between family and family.

"Calm, but wearisome," might be the motto of every-day life of a great many families in the North, during long periods. The evenings—the time of shadows—are long with us, and none can escape from their dominion. The inclination of life to drowsiness and sleep is felt, more or less, at certain times, by every one. Perhaps it is a good, a merciful institution—this slumbrous state of life. When the bear sleeps in his winter den he knows no longings, no wants; he knows not that the snow falls, that the storm raves; perceives not the long winter, its darkness and its frost. Yet "watch!" says the gospel, and no living soul can long sleep in this way. And we firmly and fully believe that there exists in man the power to make the time of twilight one of morning twilight, or evening twilight, for his whole life.

Natural philosophers tell us that the earth of Sweden slowly elevates itself—from those southern woods where the nightingales sing, up to the northern cliffs, where the midnight sun shines upon never-melted snow, this breast elevates itself, through night, through day, through summer, through winter, incessantly and silently (about four feet in each century) from some unknown cause, or, as is presumed, from subterranean fire.

And that which the earth does ought man indeed to imitate in his own way, through the night, through the day, through the winter, through the summer, even during the time of twilight, even during—"calm and weariness."

In the Dalberg family there had properly been neither calm nor weariness for many years, since the members of the family had been all together, and their dispositions and their dissimilar gifts had had room for exercise. And if here and there weeds grew up with the wheat, yet there was growth and activity in the meantime. The one, who, without question, was the most active in the house, was General Herkules—he liked winter, and was then more lively than at any other time in the year. On market days he went out early in the morning into the market, watched the people buy and sell; talked with the old women about their wares and their prices, and merry words and accompanying jokes and laughter failed not on either side. When the peasantry from Norrland came down in their sledges with birds, and linen, and furs, he always got into warm conversation and bargaining with these people whom he particularly liked, for their strong minds and good-humored repartee; he called them by preference "countrymen." And on these mornings he commonly returned home with a brace of black cocks, or half a dozen ptarmigans, or grouse, in his pocket.

"Here have I now again shot something for you, Hedvig!" exclaimed he, holding up the beautiful grouse before Hedvig, who looked heartily delighted, and praised Uncle Herkules' sportsman-like skill.

Sometimes also the general would go out to the chase himself, and, taking with him merely a piece of bread in one pocket and his Ossian in the other, he would call his two dogs Hopp and Hej, which leaped about wild with joy, in a thousand gambols, and commonly remained out during the whole day. If, toward evening, he came home with a hare or some other kind of game, he was in the very best of humors, and whistled one merry tune after another. If, however, he returned empty-handed, he was silent, sometimes rather gloomy, and would have a game at "fool" to enliven him. Once he persuaded Ivar to accompany him to the chase, but it remained to be the first and the last time. Göthilda believed that "Samiel" must have revealed himself to them on this occasion, so entirely empty-handed and so ill, or rather evil-tempered, did they both of them come home.

On other occasions the general visited the artisans in their workshops, and taught them—for the general was fond of teaching—how they should manage; and took under his own charge their private and public affairs, and the management of their societies. He himself gained much knowledge in this way, he said, and the one who always listened with pleasure and attention to uncle Herkules' learning on these subjects, was Augustin.

"Yes, yes, my dear brother, Augustin," said the general, sometimes, "such knowledge as that people won't readily find in books! You read too much, Augustin; you always bring home too many books. You will become a regular bookworm, I am afraid. That will not do any good in practical life."

Augustin only smiled—that beautiful, angelic smile!—never disputed with uncle Herkules, but always contrived to bring home books of every sort, and sate, in the afternoon in the corner of his sofa, while uncle Herkules took his glass, and peeped into them, and glanced at the pictures and at his sisters, and "enjoyed life."

Almost every day, about noon, the general rode out for an hour, either upon Svartklippar or Svanhvit, his two riding-horses. And when he had come out through the gate into the street, he always looked up to the windows, and waved and nodded to the two young girls, who—especially Gôthilda—liked very much to see uncle Herkules on horseback. And he looked very stately on horseback, the old general; and particularly so, when before Gôthilda's dark eyes, Svanhvit or Svartklippar made all sorts of curvets, and at last set off at a magnificent gallop.

Hedvig's daily, silent walk did not look so magnificent, but it was her custom—a good custom, and gave soul and body that which they needed most—fresh air.

The days went on—the rooks came—the heralds of spring in Sweden; here and there a lark already sang its lays above the icy lakes; the gilly-flower budded and diffused its fragrance in the window-gardens of home, and out of doors, in the streets of Stockholm, the dirt was altogether disagreeable. Spring was actually approaching—the time for Engel's wedding, for Gerda's arrival—the time when the bear wakes out of his sleep, and the fetters are removed from the mind of many a one, who with the milder air breathes, in anticipation, all sorts of approaching delights. It was now only March, but in the home of the Dalbergs it was often said, "Gerda will soon come!" in the same tone which people are accustomed to say "Spring will soon be here."

GERDA COMES.

"GERDA!" joyfully exclaimed Augustin, one day, as he looked out of the window. A traveling carriage had drawn up before the house, and a young head, with light-colored ringlets, was turned up toward the window, with eagerly inquiring glances. Augustin sprang down the steps, and Gerda rushed out of the carriage into his arms. The next moment she stood in the midst of her brothers and sisters, laughing and crying at the same time, embracing, kissing, and intermingling terms of endearment with nicknames. That was a tempest, but a summer tempest, when the wind is warm, and the rain and the sunshine play amid the cloud. And, as in the storms of summer the leafy branches and brilliant flowers enrich each other, playfully, caressingly, and chastisingly in affection, so was it in this family meeting.

When the storm had lulled itself, they must examine one another; must again become perfectly acquainted with each other by the light of reflection and understanding. The feelings—the swift-footed—had, as usual, come first.

The brothers and sisters contemplated Gerda with a joyful surprise. They had not expected her to be so handsome, so vigorous, so brilliant in appearance as they found her. She was no longer now the undeveloped and ungraceful young girl who had left them five years ago; she was now, at two-and-twenty, the well-grown young woman, to whom life unfolds itself in its luxuriant, perfected bloom.

Her figure, which was slender and delicate, was of the noblest proportion, and her hands and arms were of rare comeliness the most distinguishing beauty of her countenance consisted in its soul and expression. A trace of restless melancholy, which cast a shadow upon her open forehead, was not at this moment observable, when joy and smiling affection beamed around the youthful, but determined mouth, and in her beautiful eyes—eyes as full of soul, as bright, as energetic and clear as the coloring of the spring heavens, as the song of the youth of Upsala, as we fancy those of Valkyria, when, mounted on her winged horse, she bears the fallen heroes up to the halls of Valhalla. The delicate, easily-expanding nostrils, which seemed to wish to inhale life with vigor, and the action of the head beneath the crown of golden hair, gave, at times, a proud expression to her carriage. But it was pride without arrogance. So, at least, it now seemed to the brothers and sisters.

"Do people grow so handsome at G——?" exclaimed Bror, after he had attentively observed Gerda. "Gôthilda, shall you and I go and take lodgings there? What do you think about it?"

"Ah, people grow a great deal handsomer in Stockholm," replied Gerda, laughing. "Engel, Gôthilda, how tall they have grown. And you, Augustin, and you, Hedvig, how much you are alike. Sweet, dear brothers and sisters. I fancied I had forgotten what it was to be really happy, really warm in one's soul, since I left you. Now again I know what it is. Ah, how good it is, how delightful. Now I will not again leave you," continued she, and waltzed round with Augustin. "Now I must remain with you if I am to be happy."

"Think what you are saying!" said Augustin, holding her fast, and looking into her eyes with a half joking and a half grave glance—"You, a bride elect—shall I tell that to Sigurd?"

"With all my heart—with all my heart," replied Gerda.

"Good," said Augustin, smiling; "then there is no danger for him. But—when shall we see Sigurd?"

"He will come later in the evening. He wished first to see mamma safely established in her quarters. But I could not wait, I must see you the first thing, dear brothers and sisters."

"And your wedding, Gerda,—that is to be early in May?"

"Yes—so they say; but,—let us talk about something else! Hedvig! how good she looks, and how handsome, Augustin! She looks as if she had made peace with all the world, and only lived to be glad in the gladness of others, and to weep with those who wept. Those good, affectionate, sincere eyes!—"

"She is," said Augustin, "a sister in the deepest and most beautiful signification of the word; a sister to all who come near her. And such a sister as that is a blessing."

"There is no dissatisfaction within her soul," continued she as she contemplated her sister,—“she is perfect—she is in harmony with herself. Happy she; but Ivar—Augustin—what is amiss with our poor Ivar? I no longer recognize him; he does not look happy—there is something about him so gloomy, so forlorn. What is amiss with Ivar, Augustin?"

"We will talk about Ivar another time," said Augustin, "when we can go into the affair. I have hoped much from your coming, for Ivar. What do you think about Engel? Has not she grown?"

"Oh, how sweet she is. Altogether dearest, sweet, and lovely. And she looks so happy!" and Gerda heaved a sigh.

The entrance of General Herkules interrupted the conversation of the brother and sister. He too would have his share of the newly-arrived guest, and quickly took a lion's share; when, after having seen the way in which she received his salutation, and answered the questions which he liked to put to people to try them, he remarked that "there was metal in the girl;" and besides that, he liked her exterior and her manners.

In the evening he would have Gerda to sit beside him, and she still more won his favor by her manner of listening, smiling, and answering. When, however, the general began to question her, and to joke her in various ways about her lover, the wedding, and so on, Gerda became almost silent, cold in her manner, and seemed not at all to enjoy it. On the contrary, she became all the more lively when the conversation turned upon the recollections of her own and her brothers' and sisters' childhood; recollections which they had in common, the pleasant, the sad, the merry; when they gave the reins to their enjoyment, as people only can do in the family circle, in merry talk, joke, sallies of wit, sense and nonsense; in laughter, that laughter which in its excess ends in tears; that laughter which makes people fancy that they shall be ill, but which is so wholesome. Gerda was the most unrestrained of them all, and the most full of merry folly. In the midst of this universal gladness and fun, which uncle Herkules enjoyed with patriarchal pleasure, Sigurd entered.

He was a tall, handsome man, that is to say, he would have been handsome had not a certain sharpness of feature, a certain self-sufficiency in his demeanor, and a certain severity in glance and expression, produced an effect which operated against the regularity of his features and person.

His entrance occasioned a hasty silence, then a general rising. He was welcomed by Gerda's brothers and sisters without any particular pleasure, but at the same time with a frank cordiality, and uncle Herkules clasped him in his lion embrace, and placed him on his left hand, opposite to Gerda.

"Because," said he, "I have made a vow to part lovers; they ought never to be allowed to sit together, for then one can never get either a word or a glance from them—I know them;" and he cast a knowing look at Uno and Engel.

Sigurd fixed his keen eyes upon Gerda, but she avoided meeting them. Altogether, a great change had come over her from the moment that Sigurd entered the room, and this was more and more perceptible every moment; she became silent, the crimson glow on her cheek faded away, and her whole being seemed as if stiffened.

Sigurd, on the contrary, talked a deal and talked well, although rather dictatorially, and with a stern voice. He spoke with knowledge and interest on many subjects, and Augustin purposely drew him out. General Herkules, however, had evidently less pleasure in listening to him, and left the table as soon as politeness would allow him to do so.

Augustin took Gerda's hand when they rose from the table; it was cold; he looked at her inquiringly. She attempted to smile, but the smile was constrained and melancholy. Her soul seemed as if bound by some evil witchcraft.

During the conversation which took place after supper, she, however, became more cheerful. Augustin introduced a subject which was discussed in the newspapers of the day, and which had reference to one of those societies for the protection and oversight of the poor, which are beginning to be so general in Sweden among the wealthy, and in which men and women go hand in hand in such a noble spirit, to assist the common good work. On hearing of this Gerda's countenance beamed; her eyes flashed, while tears started into them, and enthusiastic words escaped from her lips.

"How beautiful it must be so to live, and so to labor for our native land! Even if a person were humble—"

The words were as if arrested on her lips, because her warm glance had involuntarily sought for that of Sigurd, and a scornful smile, an artificial yawn, met her eye, together with a jest from him about "the philanthropic fascinations of ladies," but that they ought to remember Mrs. Leungren's advice to her daughter—

Let dress employ thee head and hand;
To the needle let thy thoughts be given,
For trust me, child, our native land,
Needs not our care, with care of Heaven!

Gerda blushed, and was silent. But Ivar, who was easily irritated, took up the affair for her, and spoke some angry words.

Sigurd made a cold, satirical, and somewhat haughty reply.

Ivar, on this, drew himself up for battle, but Augustin interrupted it by asking Gerda to sing.

The two combatants cast a dark glance the one at the other, and from this an antipathy sprang up between them.

Gerda, in the mean time, had risen and gone to the piano, with a pale cheek, and suppressed tears. But when she had struck a few notes by way of prelude, and in such a manner as betrayed at once the accomplished musician, she began to sing as if she would breathe forth the suppressed feelings and thoughts of her soul in the tones she uttered. It was the song of Jephtha's daughter, in which she bewails with her companions, her joy and her young life, before she is sacrificed.

All listened, almost amazed at the power of her song; because the expression of the soul, still more than the energetic strength and purity of her voice, gave to it its power of fascination. Hedvig and Augustin sat, pale with emotion and delight. General Herkules wept.

Sigurd evidently enjoyed the astonishment of the others, as much as the song itself.

"I have allowed her to have the best masters which money could obtain!" said he. "And now, with a month's instruction from Berg, I think that she really will be perfect."

Gerda now began to sing Swedish ballads, the simple, fresh, heart-felt ballads of Geijer and Lindblad, and sung them as delightfully, and with as much naïveté and heart, as she had sung that higher song grandly and powerfully.

And now all eyes were full of tears of delight. After these she sang the people's songs; merry, laughing, peasant-songs, and these she sang merrily, as if with the excess of joy.

And now every body was obliged to laugh.

"Nay! I never can stand that!" exclaimed General Herkules, "I must have you in my arms, the deuce I must!"

And so he had. And Gerda embraced him, laughing, and was greatly delighted to have thus pleased her brothers and sisters, and uncle Herkules. She now called upon Ivar to sing with her. Ivar, who for the last several months had disregarded all music, and had almost forgotten that nature had gifted him with a beautiful voice, was persuaded by Gerda to sing duets with her, and astonished himself by finding how well they succeeded, and how well they sounded.

"Thanks, brother!" exclaimed Gerda, warmly, as she rose up and embraced Ivar, "you sing beautifully. O, we must often sing together. Thus to live and to breathe together in harmony—nothing can be more delightful on earth!"

A cold, stabbing glance on this silenced her delight, and Sigurd, approaching her, said—

"It is getting late. We must go home!" Gerda pretended, however, not to hear this, and, turning away from him, began to talk merrily with her sisters and brothers.

On this, Sigurd approached her from another side, and, with stern, commanding glances, indicated to her that she should take leave; after which, turning round with a sort of untroubled defiance, she continued to talk, but not without a certain nervousness in manner and glance.

"Gerda—my sweet love!—Sigurd wishes to go—I fancy!"—at length said Hedvig, who, with some anxiety, saw what was going on.

"Let him go, then!" replied Gerda, saucily; "we are not yet man and wife—and one of my brothers can go home with me. I want to stay a little longer with you now."

"But his mother, perhaps, expects you—and he looks so much displeased. You had better now be a well-behaved little bride!"

"I have no inclination to be so this evening. But if you wish it, Hedvig, I will go—I would go this moment, even if it were to—Siberia. And—it is, perhaps, not so very far from there!"

"What do you say, my sweet child?"

"Only good night! And that I love you so much, and that I long for to-morrow, when I may see you again—your good, dear eyes! And I shall pin my collar on crookedly, that I may hear you say, as you used to do, 'My sweet love, your collar is crooked!'—Ah! those dear times when I heard it every day, and when we wept and laughed together—"

And Gerda now wept at the recollection, and then she embraced and kissed the beloved, maternal sister, and again and again took leave, amid the jokes and laughter of the rest, spite of Sigurd's dark and impatient glances.

"If you were Sigurd, and I were Gerda, I should refuse you, that I would have you know!" said Göthilda to Bror, when they were gone.

"And if you disliked me, as Gerda dislikes Sigurd, I would not have you for any money, that I would have you know!" said Bror to Göthilda.

"That is a confoundedly fine girl! that Gerda!" exclaimed General Herkules. "And what eyes she has, like a Valkyria, a regular Amazon, the deuce take me! And how she sings! The like of her I have never heard. Him—the bridegroom elect, I don't much like. But—as Bror says, people must not dispute about likings and tastes—although I didn't think that she seemed to be so confoundedly fond of him either. But we must have a betrothal feast for this couple, Hedvig, as we are not to have the wedding. Do you hear?"

"How will it succeed?" said Hedvig and Augustin to each other, the first time they were alone.

Augustin shook his head.

"It will not succeed!" said he; "they are not suited for each other; and Sigurd has, as he used to have, a manner toward Gerda which is neither happy nor agreeable."

"And she," said Hedvig, "is evidently unhappy, and under constraint before him, and is afraid of him sometimes, spite of her apparent defiance. Ah! they two can never be happy together."

"I fear they can not," said Augustin; "and it makes me very uneasy about Gerda. She has a warm heart, and is richly endowed by nature; she really strikes me as something quite uncommon. Of Sigurd I know but little; but I have never been very fond of him. He is considered as a man of good character and good abilities. Gerda has, I fancy, actually loved him, but he has already drawn the reins too tight with her. And she may, perhaps, have too little gentleness; she should take lessons from you, my Hedvig. Perhaps, also, he irritates her by his manner, and that all the fault is his. We must closely watch them, Hedvig, now that we have them so near at hand. And if this marriage would make Gerda unhappy then—it must be broken off, before it is too late. We have here a home to offer her."

"Yes, thank God, that we have! And how delightful it would be to have her here with us, especially now that Engel will be leaving us so soon! But to break a bond which nine years' benefits and habit have knit; to give up her who, for nine years has been her mother, and him to whom she has been betrothed nearly seven years, and that just at the moment when they expect her to become theirs forever; poor Gerda! It will be a hard struggle."

"The struggle is already there—in her heart, that is evident," said Augustin; "she is in a state of inward warfare against her fate, and against those who seem to have such absolute power over it. We must endeavor to put an end to the combat—she must become free, or submit herself; in some way she must be placed in harmony with herself and her lot. As it now is, that will not be done at the altar. This union would be a fearful lie, and it seems to me that Gerda herself knows it."

"But to-morrow we will go and pay our respects to the lady mother, and then we will more closely take a survey of the family. Only think that we—you and I, Hedvig—should become spies! People find themselves in extraordinary circumstances in this world, without their knowing a word about it."

The brother and sister laughed, and separated for the night.

The following day, they two went to pay a morning visit to Gerda's "lady mother," or rather "aunt Juliana."

She was a lady with a pale complexion; a large nose of the aquiline kind; eyes, which resembled her son's in glance and expression; and a demeanor which, while it inspired respect, had in it something depressing. She looked stern and exacting, but not toward herself.

At the moment when the brother and sister entered, there was a certain sunshine on her countenance. Her son was just come home, and had brought with him some presents for Gerda, more showy than tasteful; and both mother and son were pleasing themselves by adorning her with them. All this looked well, and Gerda's lovely, grateful expression, bore witness to her warm feelings. Happy they were not—that Hedvig saw clearly; she saw that Gerda endeavored to seem glad and happy, and that the feelings of gratitude were attended by some others—but not by delight. Aunt Juliana and her son were evidently more pleased with the presents, and with displaying them to her brother and sister, than Gerda was. After this, they talked about their plans for visiting the city; about where they should go, and what they should see. Gerda was to take some lessons; to go to some balls, and see some sights, and to look about her in the great world. Gerda said little, and looked at her brother and sister as if she would have said—

"Oh! I would much rather be only with you!"

But she did not say it.

Some days passed on. Whenever Gerda could, she was with her family. With them she was happy—with them she was joyful often to excess; and with them she seemed to wish to forget herself and her future, about which she never would talk.

"I have had so little youth; I have been so rarely merry for many years!" she said one day; "just let me be free and happy for a moment—before the bondage comes. Hush, hush!—don't let us think—don't let us speak—about these affairs!"

Gerda's influence on Ivar was beneficial. She soon became his confidante, and knew how, by means of music and conversation of general interest, to snatch him, for long periods, from the influence of the demons which tormented him. The brother and sister found many points of union between themselves in the interest they felt for the beautiful ideas of the age; in their mode of conceiving of life and art. From the fire of Gerda's inspiration were again kindled within Ivar's breast the warm, beautiful thoughts of a life devoted to these objects.

"If I could only disentangle myself; if I could only free myself from their fetters," said he sometimes, "then I would still—But—it is impossible!"

Gerda practiced Ivar's beautiful voice, and it was a delight to hear them sing together. And soon the singers became many. David, the friend of their youth, had also a good voice, was musical; and now not merely duets, but trios, and, with Augustin, quartets were sung in the Dalberg family, to the great delight of their auditors.

Gerda had really a musical genius; she composed music also—delightful melodies—and irresistibly carried along with her the dilettanti whose talents were elevated, and, as it were, inspired by hers.

That Gerda's musical genius inspired David with another feeling besides admiration, was suspected by no one at present—least of all by herself; and therefore she indulged all the more unhesitatingly in that familiar intercourse, which their old acquaintance, and the young man's amiable character and demeanor so naturally induced.

The one, however, who had his eyes open to these duets and trios, was Sigurd, who soon placed such impediments in the way of Gerda's spending much time with her brothers and sisters, as called up a stormy cloud in her heaven. In particular, she was not to be any evening later from home than eight o'clock. At that hour, Mrs. Juliana had her three-handed game, and Gerda must be there to be one of the party. Sigurd himself seldom neglected to be the third. If Gerda did not come home precisely at the moment; if she delayed her return only a quarter of an hour, she had to encounter severe looks, reproofs, and lectures on duty, both from the lady mother and her son; then Gerda would weep, beg pardon, and be un- happy, and became every day more uncertain in her behavior to her lover.

Her brothers and sisters often could see, by her eyes, that she had wept; often could see the secret disquiet of her mind. But her lips were sealed as to the cause of it, or she merely touched upon it by a passing, indifferent expression, and always evaded going into any particulars on the subject.

It was gratitude; it was piety which sealed Gerda's lips. But we, who are unprevented by such feelings toward Mrs. Juliana and her son, will go somewhat more particularly into the circumstances of the case, which were the grounds of the misunderstanding of which our brothers and sisters, and our readers, have already become aware.

At the time of the great necessities of the Dalberg family, Mrs. Juliana—the half-sister of the elder Mr. Dalberg—paid them a visit, and heard the young Gerda, then fifteen, sing. In part, pleasure in the young girl's singing and lively demeanor, and in part a desire to do a good action, led her to offer to take the young promising Gerda, and bring her up as her own child. The offer was gratefully received by the father, who was much straitened in his circumstances. And Gerda—she wept violently at the thought of giving up her father and her brothers and sisters. But the world, the great, rich, beautiful world, revealed itself before her, so wonderfully, so enticingly! She had hitherto never been from home, never had traveled, never once seen an inn; and she was not merely to see one such remarkable sight, but many—because she was to travel with aunt Juliana—and beside this, to see many cities, rivers, mountains, new provinces, and new people. Her head almost turned with delight. And what letters, what diaries would she not write about all these things home to her brothers and sisters!

At the first inn—the first remarkable station on her journey into the world—she could scarcely sleep at night, because then, at half-past three in the morning, she would get up to watch the sun rise, out of the skylight in the roof.

The sun—which is seldom favorable to these gettings up in a morning to see him rising—ascended, in the meantime, amid clouds, and so also did Gerda's life's sun, in whose bright ascending she would now have so much rejoiced.

Mrs. Juliana had been possessed of property, but had lost it through the fault of others. With estimable strength of mind, she had again placed herself in easy circumstances, by keeping a large boarding-school. Her son became the teacher in it, and assisted her faithfully. A large inheritance, which they might look forward to with certainty in a few years, made their prospects very good for the future. In the meantime, they labored with the utmost industry at their calling, and had their reward.

When Gerda came under their protection, or rather under their discipline, she could not understand how it was that she felt herself to be so inexpressibly unhappy. Full of gratitude and devotion, she wished to do every thing for those who had adopted her, and who so evidently wished her well. But Mrs. Juliana and her son belonged to that class of people to whom nobody can give their entire affection without being punished for it. The more the young enthusiastic girl gave in love, in service, in industry, and attention, all the more was required from her. And every fault, every oversight, was punished, now with endless sermons, now with penances, now with that silent lowering weather which weighs like a heavy firmament of lead on the head of him upon whom it falls, and which to warm-hearted natures is worse than a strait-waistcoat. Gerda, it is true, had her faults and failings; she had those which belong to a rich, an ardent, but an ill-regulated character, which has grown up with all its foibles. She had, however, good desires without bounds; great powers of mind, and if they had been rightly directed by the people whom she loved, the combat would have been easy and joyful to her. It was, however, by a perpetual fault-finding, humiliation, discipline, and chastisement, that her education had been managed. With thousands of tears, with feelings often of actual despair, had the young girl struggled to overcome her faults, and to possess herself of those virtues and qualities which they wished her to possess. For a long time she was not able to discover any faults in the people whom she loved, and whom she regarded as the ideal of perfection. Every fault she ascribed to herself alone, and considered herself, therefore, all the more unhappy.

Had it been possible to subdue this fresh, powerful character, and to change it to an automaton, it would have been done under the hands of Mrs. Juliana and her son. But the vigorous northern girl could not be thus subdued, and beneath the yoke which they endeavored to lay on her neck, she raised herself up, through the force of an inward, increasing strength, and with a growing self-esteem. In consequence of this, a secret breach arose between the oppressor and the oppressed, which gave rise to severe encounters, but which always were ended and followed by reconciliations, because Gerda in her oppressors, always acknowledged, always loved her benefactors, and because any feelings of resentment toward them were always followed by repentance, self-reproach, and by a wish to do good to those whom she believed she had grieved.

How it was that Gerda had become the betrothed of Sigurd she did not rightly know herself. It seemed as if he had very soon regarded her as belonging to himself, and that she, in her admiration and love for him, her master, had not thought that it could be otherwise; the more, however, the woman woke to consciousness within her, the more awoke opposition to Sigurd's overbearing disposition. She became unequal in her temper, and at times proud and insolent toward him. But, singularly enough, she seemed, on the contrary, to become only the more interesting to him. He had begun to treat her with arrogance, and a certain degree of depreciation. Now, he took the trouble of combating her opinions, and it seemed as if his cold character could feel a certain elevation, a certain pleasure in these scenes, which were caused by irritated feelings, and the termination of which he always could calculate. It seemed, sometimes, to amuse him to excite anger which he knew that he could control. And in her tears, her touching beauty when she besought forgiveness, when she became mild, and gentle, and submissive, and did every thing that any body wished, he had a strange—one might almost say a savage—delight. Nay, he would often withhold that forgiveness in order the longer to enjoy her state of humiliation. But he never foresaw that by so doing he was destroying the bloom of her warm devotion. He fancied that he had brought up a wife, whom, some day, he would perfectly govern, and he—but we have now said enough on that subject, and will therefore leave circumstances to speak. We will now merely say that the expected inheritance had actually come, which made Mrs. Juliana and her son rich, that she gave up her school, that Sigurd proposed to celebrate his marriage with Gerda, and that he had taken a large house, furnished it handsomely, and calculated upon a comfortable, and even luxurious city life for himself.

Every body congratulated Gerda; but Gerda was now less happy than ever. Many circumstances had occurred to defer the marriage; the time, however, for it was fixed, and Gerda was come to see her brothers and sisters before it took place, and before she was removed a long way from them, and—as she thought secretly to herself—before she, like Jephtha's daughter, bewailed her fate with her companions, before she, for a long time, took leave of life and gladness.

General Herkules wished, as we know, to have a festival to celebrate Gerda's arrival and approaching marriage. He thought, according to old-fashioned custom, that people could not sufficiently honor such occasions. And accordingly, to please him, the most intimate acquaintance of the family were invited to an evening party for music and dancing.

Hedvig, on this day, had gone out in the afternoon to make some purchases, and on her way home called on Gerda, and we now go with her to make our observations on—

A COUPLE.

UNCOMMON AS LOVERS, NOT UNCOMMON AS A MARRIED PAIR.

WHEN Hedvig entered, she found Gerda ready dressed for a dinner-party to which she was going with her lover and her aunt. She was entirely dressed in white, well and tastefully dressed, but without the slightest jewelry or ornament. She was sewing industriously at a lace cap for Mrs. Juliana, was unusually pale, and tears seemed to swim in eyes and feeling. Sigurd was pacing up and down with a proud step, and seemed to be interrupted in the middle of a lecture.

When Hedvig went up to her sister, kissed her forehead, and looked with tender inquiry into the tearful eyes, Gerda threw her arms around her, and with that the tears began to flow in torrents.

"There now! we are going to have a scene again!" said Sigurd, and shrugged his shoulders impatiently; then, turning to Hedvig, he said, "Gerda is a little childish to-day, as she often is. She thinks of making herself interesting and looking like a sacrifice, and therefore she has dressed herself in that shroud-like costume. And now she thinks it—with the usual woman's way of reasoning—extremely unreasonable and barbarous of me that I desire her to dress herself as is proper and becoming for a young bride-elect, with some of those ornaments which I have given her. There is really something to cry about, because she is so urged contrary to her nature—so cruelly treated! poor child!"

"But," said Hedvig, "as Gerda is so well and becomingly dressed, although simply, it seems to me that it might be left to her own pleasure to wear more or less of ornament."

"Nay, with all my heart," said Sigurd, with a particularly severe voice; it may be also permitted to have a thought about what is becoming to her, and to declare that as she is now she does not please me!"

The two sisters were silent; Gerda leaned against Hedvig, and clasped her in her arms. Sigurd took a few more turns through the room, with a haughty air, and then, stopping before the sisters, he said:—

"Young ladies have, of late, conceived a very high opinion of their own worth, their rights, and are in particular careful to show themselves obstinate, especially toward those persons who have a right to direct them. They fancy themselves by that means very powerful. But I would just advise them, for their own sakes, and just for the sake of that influence which they strive after so much—I would advise them to direct themselves according to the wishes of their husbands, and to be more careful about pleasing them to please whom is their best—"

"We are not yet man and wife, Sigurd," interrupted Gerda, hastily raising her head, and shaking back the golden ringlets from her forehead, while the fine nostrils expanded themselves with a proud expression.

"Very much the same; we shall be so in about a month," said Sigurd, very calmly. "I will say that young ladies would find their best weapons to be making themselves agreeable, and that by so doing they might obtain far more influence than by all those childish schemes of working for 'humanity' and 'fatherland,' that they prate about! I should not concern myself about these little matters, if I did not clearly see their connection with the greater; and I like Gerda too well to be able to see with indifference, how she is becoming infected with the follies of the time; drawn out of the circle and away from the duties which Providence and the laws of nature assign to her. My intentions toward her are too honest for me to flatter, as the lover, a whim which, as a husband, I should not tolerate, and which would make both her and me unhappy. I know that many men pursue a different mode of tactics. But I will be honorable toward her with whom my heart is fixed; I will not let her have any illusions with regard to the connection into which she is about to enter. Gerda now knows—my will!"

And with these words strongly emphasized, Sigurd, with a majestic step, left the room.

Gerda was deeply excited. She rose up, clasped her hands together above her head, and lightning glances flashed from her tearful eyes, as she said—

"A pair!" Hedvig, that implies a strict resemblance! a pair, it is a grand expression—great and divine! A pair! that is, entire unity in feeling, in thought, in wishes, in every thing! Does not God's word say that man and woman should be alike, that is, a pair, 'like the angels of God in heaven?' Tell me, Hedvig, can Sigurd and I ever become a pair?"

"Oh, no!" replied Hedvig, greatly affected, "not if you remain as you now are; not if you do not greatly change, either you or he."

"He!" repeated Gerda, "he will never change; therefore that is not to be thought about;—he will not. No;—he is honest with me, and I know what kind of future is before me with him!—and I—"

"No, but just think, my sweet love—could not you alter yourself in some particulars? For instance, be more conciliating in little things, and avoid contentions, as—"

"Oh yes, Hedvig, I might, if I would, and I often do when Sigurd's manner does not make me angry and obstinate! Ah, Hedvig, tears often swallowed down; bitter words often repressed, make the mind hard and severe. And when little things become a mass—grow to a mountain—they oppress the soul and crush the spirit!—and if they were only little things—but when the one human being is an eternal negation to the innermost being, desires and life of the other, then this innermost becomes changed, and that not for good. A plant or flower can not develop itself in its truth, in its beauty, if people twist it hither and thither, and wish to bend it against its own nature! In that case it must become misshapen. Can a human being, Hedvig, go in a strait-waistcoat through life, and continue to be a true, good man? I don't know, but I could not.

"Oh, Hedvig, what you now see between Sigurd and me, and what you now see in me, is merely a little part, a moment out of the struggle of many years. And believe me, I have read, I have prayed to God, I have struggled infinitely with myself that I might obtain power to overcome myself. I have endeavored;—I have a thousand times given up my will, my likings, have restrained my aspiring wishes, and have thought, 'Things will become very perfect, things will become very excellent' in time! but no—they become worse; the struggle increases, instead of decreasing, within me, without me, and has never been more difficult than at this moment; because now it has not reference only to myself, but—but to my intercourse with you, my brothers and sisters. Sigurd insists upon it that it is not necessary for me; that, in particular, Ivar is injurious to me, and he threatens that he will separate me from you earlier than was talked of. And all this out of regard for me—out of regard for my well-being. Oh, Hedvig, there are embraces which stifle!"

"But he shall not stifle you in this way!" exclaimed Hedvig, deeply wounded, "he shall not separate you from your earliest and best friends. Better in that case, that you—separated yourself from him; and I begin to think that it would be the right thing, and the best, and—what do you think yourself, Gerda?"

"It would be so, Hedvig, if I merely thought about myself, but I know that Sigurd and his mother really love me—that I should deeply wound them. And Sigurd—he has many qualities which I must love and respect. Yes, I often admire his strong right-mindedness, his unselfishness with relation to other people, his severe sense of duty, his perseverance and force of character. He is an excellent son, a good master of a family, and will, in his way, manage every thing for the general good. He is a strong, proud man, such as a woman might with pride call her partner—if only—oh, if he would but understand her nature, and allow it to be worth something; but—

"But I myself have contributed to depreciate this nature in Sigurd's esteem; I have been unequal in temper, fickle, often with the best intentions. I have a thousand times been unjust to him, and he merely one single time, and that continually, unjust toward me—inasmuch as he entirely mistakes or misunderstands my soul and my heart.

"I know that many women complain in this way without cause, and I do not wish to be like them. I have also many a time thought, when I have been reflecting on all Sigurd's good qualities, that I ought to compel my nature, subdue my will in all things, that I might become only Sigurd's submissive, obedient appendage. But then I have known a few such wives, who made me afraid. There was peace in their home—silent submission in their behavior—which looked like harmony. But I looked into their hearts, and do you know what I read there? Yes, one only thought, one only anticipation, one continued, deep, silent longing, and that was for their husband's death! Ha! to go on in that way from the marriage to the silver nuptials, and after that with a deep untruth through life—is it not horrible, Hedvig? Oh, I will not, I can not go on thus!

"I do not know, I do not comprehend at this moment how it is to be, what is to become of me, but—I will endeavor to get right. And for that reason I will not contend about trifles. I will give Sigurd pleasure when I can do it. And you, I know, wish that I should do so."

Gerda said this faintly, and now began to put flowers in her hair, and to ornament neck and arms with fine jewels. Hedvig assisted her.

While they were busied about this, Sigurd entered.

"So, indeed! what, you have now become rational?" said he, smiling. "Is the great disturbance now at an end, and my little sweetheart doing her duty again? Nay, this is charming!"

"Sigurd—you understand me very little," said Gerda, crimsoning, and a tear of anger forced itself to her eye.

"Not understand you, my child? What man can understand all a woman's whims and tempers? that is too much to expect. A man may be very well pleased if they dress themselves as becomingly as—your toilet becomes you just now."

"That is not generous, Sigurd," said Hedvig, somewhat angrily, "you punish Gerda, because she is doing what you wish."

"I? Bless me! I am very much satisfied with her, and would rather reward than punish her!"

He threw his arms round her and wanted to kiss her; but with a proud movement of the head Gerda turned herself away.

"Aha! now beginning again!" said Sigurd, smiling. "Well, well, patience!" And, whistling an opera air, he went to the window.

It was now time for Hedvig to go, and she left this couple which was to be, but—as Hedvig thought—which never could become a pair.

ABOUT FATES AND MEN.

On the evening of the same day, amid music and the dance, Gerda was not the same being as she had been in the morning. She seemed, as it were, to have kindled herself anew by her own song—by her own ardor, and to have become brilliant, beautiful, fascinating—and her glance at times met Sigurd's keen, jealous eye, with an expression that seemed as if it would say—"now I am free!"

She danced and joked with Ivar; she danced with David, and she did this with such right good-will, that Sigurd, in a most unceremonious manner, took her arm, and led her from among the dancers, that she might go home with Mrs. Juliana, who had ordered the carriage to come for her at an early hour.

Göthilda declared that in so doing, he looked like a Nero, a Caligula, a "Christiern, the tyrant," and that he frightened the life out of Gerda by some words which he whispered into her ear as they went out, and when she seemed to wish to withdraw her arm from him.

"He has, I am sure, pinched her, or hurt her dreadfully!" said Göthilda, "I am certain that her arm is all black and blue. He is abominable!"

We fancy that Göthilda's supposition must have been unfounded—as we have never heard of a lover—whatever we may have done now and then of married men—making use of such demonstrations of impatience. This, however, is certain, that after this day, Gerda's gayety and cheerful spirits seemed as if annihilated. For several days her family saw nothing of her, and when they did see her, she was not like herself, so deeply dejected did she appear, and so gloomy in mind.

"There must be an end of these convulsive efforts for freedom!" said Augustin to Hedvig, one day. "Gerda, through them, injures her own cause and her connection with Sigurd, beyond redemption. She must get into another state of mind, into another position, either by freely submitting to this bond, or by breaking loose from it. If she would only come into a state of clearness as regards her own feelings!—"

Thus spoke Augustin, as he put on his great-coat, and took his hat, in preparation for a visit to Gerda.

Gerda was sitting, as was customary with her every afternoon, at a game at "marriage" with Mrs. Juliana. In consequence of Gerda's late misdeeds, Mrs. Juliana had subjected her to a chastisement of silence, and had not spoken a single word to her for two days, unless it was to order her to do something. For Gerda had long since proved herself indispensable in the house, from her willingness and ability to look after every thing, and well too, from the department of the kitchen to Mrs. Juliana's caps and collars. Nor was Sigurd's favorite dish or Mrs. Juliana's toilet ever really successful unless Gerda's eye and hand had given to them their last perfecting touches. Like a hard, gray winter's day, with its frost and icicles, and dark, leaden sky, Mrs. Juliana now sate and played, and spoke not a single word which the game did not require. And pale, with the long, dark eyelashes drooping to the cheek, sate Gerda, opposite to her, and played mechanically. After some vain attempts to break the ice in Mrs. Juliana, it had become so dark, and cold, and dead within Gerda's heart! A gloomy, torturing sense of a something unendurable, alone made her sensible that she lived, and it was as if a dark spirit had jeeringly whispered into her soul—

"And thus will it be, and thus shall it become forever and ever, amen."

At that moment, Augustin entered. O! how beautiful in certain dark hours, seems a gentle and beloved human countenance—even if it be as ugly as that of Esop! Augustin's, however, was handsome as a bright opening day. An enlivening sentiment passed through Gerda's soul at the sight of him. He seemed to open her prison doors, and she sprang up and embraced him.

Augustin, who stood high in Mrs. Juliana's esteem, easily obtained permission for Gerda to accompany him on a walk to see "one of the beautiful parts of Stockholm."

It was with the feelings of a liberated captive that Gerda hastened to dress herself, and soon found herself in the open air, walking by her brother's side.

"Is it too cold? are you starved?" asked Augustin, as he felt that Gerda pressed her arm to his side with a slight shiver.

"I? here in the fresh air, and by your side? Ah! I could stand at the north pole and feel it warm!—give me only freedom, and warm, living hearts!" replied Gerda.

"Look, there is Lagertha's studio!" exclaimed Augustin, after they had walked silently for a little while, and as he looked up toward two windows which were lit up by the afternoon sun—"shall we go and call on her? I should like to see how far she has advanced with her great work, and I should be very glad if she and you became better acquainted. There is strength and an industry about this woman which ought to carry her very far."

The brother and sister went up to her rooms; they entered through an ante-room, where a young girl sat at her sewing, and which opened into Lagertha's studio, the door of which stood ajar.

They entered softly, and unperceived by her. She stood at her work, with her back turned to the door.

The room was lofty, and the afternoon sun shone in through the high window of dimmed glass, and cast an illuminating glory over the figures of the heathen gods which stood there in silent majesty, over the artist herself, who in silent inspiration was contemplating her own creation; lighted up the Edda which lay open on a table beside the Sagas of the Kings, in the Icelandic tongue. Gerda looked round her in a certain joyful surprise. There was something in this quiet dwelling which told her of a life of which hitherto she had had no presentiment.

Lagertha was enjoying one of those solemnly beautiful moments with which the genius of art sometimes rewards her worshippers, and which afford a rich recompense for many pangs, many combats, many restless days and nights. She had this day completed the model for the Urda, the first of the Fates; at this moment she had succeeded in giving to the countenance the expression which she desired. Now, therefore, she stood before her creation, triumphantly glad, and humbly proud. Yes, humbly proud, those may go together in a human soul!

The brother and sister had approached very near to Lagertha before she observed them. Now, however, she turned round, and with an exclamation of joy she greeted Augustin.

Gerda stood and contemplated the figure of the Fate, and, without her being aware of it, large tears rolled down her cheeks, while with her hands clasped against her breast, she softly breathed forth—"O! it is glorious! glorious!"

As when Corregio, for the first time, saw a picture of Raphael's—as when the wild swan, in Anderson's charming story,* for the first time saw and heard the beautiful birds of whose race he was, and uttered a cry and dived down into the deep water and, was so strangely excited—so was it with Gerda at this moment. A change took place within her.

The beautiful, polished, white and rosy hands first attracted the eye of the artist—still more, the energetic and beaming expression of the tearful countenance. She smiled and looked at Augustin; he smiled also, pleased at the effect which was produced in Gerda.

The common enjoyment of a noble art produced a joy which, for the moment, overleaped all the ditches and barriers which conventionality has placed between human beings—and bound them nearer to each other in affection. Deliverer! thanks to thee!

"You have not followed the customary conception of the being of the Three Sisters," said Augustin, when he had attentively observed the miniature model of the large group, in which the Three Sisters were united on the margin of the Urda fountain, beside the swans which—so says the legend; shall for the first time lift up their voices at Ragnarok, (the last days of the world). "You have followed quite another idea, and I am glad to see it, because it has always appeared to me that the interpretation of Urda being the past, Verdandi, the present, Skuld the future Fate, was perfectly without meaning, and says nothing. But—I do not know whether I have rightly understood what your Nornor say—but I see in your Urda a forewarned, an inspired, as it were a prophetic life—in Verdandi suffering, struggle, combat—but still noble combat—she is a combating Valkyrie—in Skuld, the combat is ended—the victory won, and all is harmony; she seems to me the Fate of the accomplished, the perfected work."

"You express that which I intended and aimed at expressing," exclaimed Lagertha, with flashing glances. "Yes, that is my own idea on the subject, and in it I have followed the deep-thoughted interpretation of our Grundtvig. It expresses my own feelings and my own thoughts entirely."

"Yes, the thought is good and beautiful!" said Augustin, still contemplating the group with his beautiful and intellectual smile. "And in this way the Fates still continue to be powerful in life; they are again met with in every true human life, and hover like good, powerful influences over its inspiration, combat, and accomplishment, by which it must become noble and great-minded—as are your representations of them. It has really given me a great delight to have been made acquainted with this thought."

Gerda looked at Lagertha's books, the Edda, and Grundtvig's Northern Mythology.

"I read every day some portion of these works," said Lagertha, "the genius of the north speaks in them."

"How happy you must be," said Gerda, with tearful eyes—"nothing petty—nothing constrained—all great, all free."

When the brother and sister left Lagertha, she earnestly begged Gerda to come soon again to her. She had seen in her what she wished to represent in the struggling Fate, and this she said candidly. Augustin promised for the blushing Gerda, that she would not oppose the will of the lofty Fates, because that was not advisable.

Gerda sighed as she left this little and yet this large world. Her heart swelled within her breast, with inexplicable presentiments and wishes.

She walked along, leaning on her brother's arm, like some one in a dream, and not a word from him disturbed the silent, dark work in her soul.

They had left the walls of the city behind them, and the pine-trees that grow on the hill in the park sighed around them, when Augustin made a pause and said—

"Look round you here, Gerda, because it is so beautiful."

It was toward the end of March, and the snow now lay over all the fields. The sun had just set, and the western heaven was on flame; fiery red arrows and spears seemed flying as it were in combat across the field which he had just left. The windows and towers of the city, and the tops of the trees, shone brightly in the sunken sunlight. Higher up in the light blue heaven floated light, am-purpled feathery clouds, airy palm-branches and garlands above the heads of the brother and sister. Every thing was perfectly calm and still, but in atmosphere and coloring there was a noble, an energetic life which penetrated Gerda electrically.

As the two stood there in silence, a wind arose from the west, and passed sighing over the plain, driving up the snow before it in light, glittering whirls, which came sweeping on toward the brother and sister, floated around them, caressed them, their foreheads, their cheeks, their eyebrows, with wonderful vivacity. It was a wind full of spring. Gerda heaved a deep sigh.

"Eternal freshness; breath of God. O how thou dost penetrate our souls with the life of spring and a new existence."

So thought Gerda, with a slight shudder.

"Ah, Augustin!" exclaimed she, "help me to freedom—to freedom!"

"Tell me what I shall do," said Augustin, warmly, "tell me what you wish?"

"Help me," continued Gerda, "to understand my own heart, to become clear with myself."

She was silent, and seemed to hesitate to speak out.

"Let me see whether I can read your heart," said Augustin, as he gazed on his sister attentively. "Gerda, you no longer love Sigurd; you wish to be free of your engagement to him."

"I have loved him very much," replied Gerda, "and I love him still, but not sufficiently for me to accompany him on the path through life which he will conduct me. Oh! no, no, I can not breathe, I can not exist there."

"How beautiful it must be, how glorious, Augustin, to live and suffer for our native land, for our religion, for humanity, or for something which benefits and ennobles. The martyrs, and those who struggle and die for truth and right, how happy they are! I have shed tears of joy and longing when I have heard or have read of them. I do not know, but—I would be as they; would know a life, a fate like theirs, and every thing which people call good fortune on earth, in the every-day meaning of the word, has seemed to me common-place in comparison, as something poor, paltry, wretched—no worth living for. I have sometimes expressed such sentiments to mamma Juliana and Sigurd, but I have always been talked down and treated as 'a fool,' as an infatuated, enthusiastic creature. And I have at last almost believed that I was so, and that I ought to conceal these feelings, these desires, and to become the household and parlor piece of furniture—which they wished me to be. I have repressed my elevating thoughts; I have—ah, I have been very unhappy, Augustin, through this incessant contest with myself and my connections. But to-day with Lagertha, and now at this moment, have I known that I am not infatuated, that mine are not longings after empty air-bubbles without reality, as they tell me. I have felt that there is another goal for me than that of emulating the ladies of G— in giving grand feasts; I know that there is a life beyond that of housekeeping, even for women, a life, an activity for thought, as noble, as beneficial as the other; that there is a parental character higher than the common one, and that is as regards—the children of the mind.

"And something of this kind, Augustin, I feel should have been my calling—might have made me good and happy, and have called all my faculties into play, if—but now, now it is too late for that!—now I can, and ought no longer—"

"Why not, my sweet Gerda? The natural disposition is a vocation of God, when it is strong and noble, and it is a duty to follow its bent. You can not make any one happy by controlling it."

"Oh Augustin, what is it that you say! What words, my dear, dear brother!"

"Only become quite certain, quite clear with regard to yourself, become sure as to that which you wish, and every thing will then disentangle itself and become bright, although some pain may have to be borne; and never fetter yourself with any thought about its being 'too late;' about 'your not being able to do it,' and so-on. Remember Lagertha's words—

"'People can do whatever they will.'"

"Oh, Augustin," said Gerda, deeply affected, "it would be easy to wish, easy to do, if one only knew with certainty what was right and best; if, with Gustavus Adolphus, we could say, 'God is with us.'"

"Yes, that is every thing!" said Augustin, as he gazed joyfully on his sister.

They walked on again in silence.

The bells in the city began to ring, and with joyful solemnity their voices flew in melodious tones through the heavens.

"Hark! the bells!" said Gerda, with animation, "how lovely they sound! Ever since my childhood have these sounds had an extraordinary effect upon me. They seem, as it were, to awake me, and to call me to something higher and better. They drive the demons from my soul. And when I hear these voices of the temple in the open air, resound over city and country, it seems to me as if they uttered a 'holy!' over all human activity; over all the striving, the suffering; over all the happy; as if they would purify, release, consecrate every thing to the highest service. O! how I wish to be such a free, melodious tongue, sounding abroad 'over the earth, giving life, giving peace and joy, as a voice, a tone of the eternal harmony! Is this arrogance, fanaticism, Augustin?"

"Oh no, Gerda! And I the last to doubt about your right to such a destiny.

"God indeed, in his goodness, has called us all to something of this kind. Some are appointed to exercise their gifts in large spheres and for the great human family. These are called geniuses and artists. They are pre-eminently the consecrated tongues, which, with a sound of liberation, should travel through the world."

Again Augustin felt an electric thrill penetrate the arm which rested on his own. Gerda said not a word, nor did he.

Before they separated, however, this evening, Augustin took her hand, pressed it closely in his, and said—

"Keep in mind, Gerda, that there is a home open to you at whatever moment you please; that you have brothers and sisters who will do every thing to see you satisfied, and—happy as you may and ought to be!"

Gerda answered nothing. But she clasped her brother in her arms, and Augustin felt upon his cheek a burning kiss and a tear. Gerda then vanished into the gloomy entrance of Mrs. Juliana's room.

Three consequences followed this walk and this conversation. The first, that a little light was kindled in Gerda's soul. The second, that Mrs. Juliana's curiosity to hear something about the beautiful things that Gerda had seen caused her to thaw a little, and she condescended—although with a cloudy countenance and a severe voice—to ask some questions. The third, that Gerda soon afterward visited Lagertha in her studio, and again experienced the effect, which developed still more the thoughts which the first visit had awoken.

She returned many times to sit as a model for the figure of the Fate; and Sigurd, who felt himself flattered by any kind of attention which gave to his bride elect a flattering celebrity, made no objection.

During these sittings the otherwise silent and pale artist was often enlivened by the animated model, and revealed to her many a picture from her past life, many a feature of her silent and strong soul, which produced an enfranchising effect upon the young Gerda.

We have collected the scattered traits into a picture, and present it here before the eye of the reader as—

THE ICELANDIC LADY.

IT sounds like a legend, but it is nevertheless a reality, that there lies up in the North Sea, an island with a burning volcano, and hot bubbling fountains, amid eternal snow; an island rich in ice and fire at the same time. It is called by the bardic-song of the Scandinavian north, its cradle. There, by the sound of the sea's eternal swell, the bards noted down the songs and the legends of a remote antiquity, the first-born child of the popular mind. There, upon the perpetually trembling earth, did steadfast minds write down the memories and the history common to the three oldest nations of the north. There arose the Edda, beneath the fires of Hecla, bringing down the old legends of the gods with their treasures of still unexhausted wisdom, through stormy centuries to our own times. And more, for four hundred years, amid the songs and writings of the bards, lived and fought upon the volcanic island, a powerful race of the three Scandinavian royal kingdoms.

Still seethe the volcanos; still leap up the boiling fountains amid the snow-fields of Iceland; still heaves the stormy ocean around the shores, and the swans sing to the light of the midnight sun; but the heroic life upon the island is long since dead, and the songs of the bards are silent. Still, however, the legends abide in the memories of the people, and serve to enliven the long winter evenings by the light of the fire and the hum of the spinning-wheel. And still warmly beats here and there a heart for that wonderful poetry which the island possesses, not merely in its memory, but in its natural features and magnificent scenery.

There was Lagertha Knutson born. Her father was the Danish governor of the island, a cheerful man, with a great love of art, as is frequently the case with the Danes. Her mother was a Swede, a silent woman, of a still but deep character, as are Swedish women generally. The child seemed to have inherited from her father his feeling for art, and silence from her silent mother. A few years after the birth of the child, the mother died. The only daughter became unspeakably dear to her father. Her bed was in his room; her play-place at his feet, or on his knees. When he sate at his writing-table, she sate under it, and amused herself with cutting and carving wood. One day she cut her finger and began to cry. The father took her upon his knee, and cut his own finger, so that it bled, and let her see that he did not trouble himself about it, but only laughed. From this hour, bodily suffering never cost the daughter a tear. How beautiful if she could have grown up in the sunshine of this paternal love; because—if thou hast seen a bright-eyed girl lean upon her father's arm, her head toward his shoulder, following with her glances every movement of his countenance, taking in every word from his lips—then hast thou seen an image of one of the most beautiful, the purest, the most ennobling attachments which the earth possesses;—nay, heaven itself knows no higher, no more delightful and more holy attachment than that between father and child.

But dark clouds arose upon the bright heaven of Lagertha's childhood. When she was in her thirteenth year, her father married again, and the young, handsome, gay wife seduced away to herself all his love. He still loved his daughter very much; but she was no longer every thing to him. He was no longer to her what he had been. The young girl felt this bitterly, and all the more so because her education came into the hands of her stepmother. Lagertha must now be fashioned according to the type which people invariably regard as womanly. She must make herself fascinating, in order to fascinate. But the girl did not trouble herself about fascinating, was not fascinating, and would not become so by tight-lacing, and dancing-lessons, and all the means used for this purpose. They wanted to bend her will by force, and that made her self-willed. And when her mother or her teachers saw her busied with her childish ugly figures of wax or of wood, in which she took the greatest delight, they said, "What's that for?—throw that rubbish away." Thus the young girl became ashamed of her favorite employment, and spent all the more time out of the house.

"Let her be—leave the girl more to herself," said the father; "she'll get right in time."

And when handsome and agreeable children filled the house, it became difficult to nobody to let her alone.

Lagertha escaped out into the wild scenes of nature; and, amid the cliffs of hardened lava and basalt, by the lofty, leaping fountains of the thundering Geijzers, she felt happy and vigorous in mind. In her own home she became stiff and silent, and grew up reserved and incomprehensible—even to herself—tall, slender, white as snow, and apparently as cold likewise.

But when, during the long autumn and spring nights, the swans, which lay by thousands in flocks near the shore, struck up their song, and the sound reached her, clear and vibrating as the tones of the glass-harmonicon, and warlike as the trumpet, or the hunting-horn; then awoke within her a life, an unrest, a longing, painful and yet delightful at the same time. Then rose she up and looked over the sea—looked afar off; listened to wild, melodious sounds, the dance of the northern lights around the old traditional island, very often irregular and wild, as the emotions in her own breast, but sometimes also perfecting themselves into the northern lights' crown, that beautiful phenomenon, in which all the rays leap together into a pyramidal point, around the top of which is formed a crown of light no longer unstable and flaming, but quiet, without the least movement; serene, white, clear as a glory round the head of a saint.

And wherever we see completion, be it in the northern crown, or in the life of Washington, or Gustaf Wasa, there we see also a prophetic sign, which speaks to us of our own destiny. No wonder then, if in the soul of the looker-on, joy and pain, humiliation and pride alternate; no wonder then, if the lonely, reserved, but in spirit strongly animated young girl felt in this nocturnal spectacle her heart beat with presentiments of something great, and free, and of a glorious life out in the world.

Thus, during many a night. During the day, when the disquiet became too powerful within her, she seated herself in her little boat, called "The Star," unfurled its sail, and let it fly before the wind, through the high waves, through dangerous breakers, often with momentary hazard; but there she stood joyful at the helm, and allowed herself to be wetted by the foam and blown by the storm; and—never did she feel happier than when she thus wrestled with winds and waves.

In the winter evenings, when the handsome lady of the governor of the island assembled around her, for the dance, or some other amusement, all the company which Reikiavik, the capital of the island, afforded out of its five hundred souls, Lagertha lay before the fire in her father's room, with his dogs and his tame bears, and heard him read aloud in Sturleson's Legends of the Kings, or in Sæmund's Edda, and love for the great and the strong awoke there from within her. Her heart beat high—but she knew not wherefore.

In the summer she had a happy time for some weeks. It was then that her father made a journey to visit the northern parts of his government. On these journeys he was accompanied by Lagertha, on horseback, over untracked and dangerous paths, over rocks and through spring torrents. Through many a beautiful summer night thus traveled she, while the midnight sun advanced above their heads, and the swans sang swimming with their young in calm creeks and inland seas. She lived in the tent with her father, and arose every morning to take part in the divine service which was performed beneath the open canopy of the sky by her father and his Icelanders. She wandered away, and clambered among the cliffs, and the sulphur-pools of Krabbla; saw the Eldborg, in whose unfathomed deeps, tradition says, lie strange and beautiful gardens; bathed in the warm springs of Sturleson's bath; was present at the hay-harvest—the Icelanders' only harvest—on the slopes of the valleys, and visited the inhabitants in their nomadic homes.

That was a time of peace and fresh life: after this, however, she was again at home, solitary at home; solitary in all her desires and endeavors; solitary and unemployed, and knew not what she should do in that great, marvelous world where nobody had any need for her, and where she seemed to herself a stranger whose language no one understood. And always in her soul was that unrest, that thirst and longing for a life, an activity, respecting which she had merely dark dreams, that thirsting for a fullness of existence for which she believed herself to be destined, and which so many others renounce.

Every deep longing, however, is a prophecy of accomplishment; to every earnest seeker it is promised that he shall find. Accident is the apple of Newton, which by its falling from the tree, brings the hidden thought and plan into reality. If the bent of the will and the disposition are but strong enough, sooner or later the apple falls; the opportunity is given.

Lagertha's father became a second time a widower, and removed to Copenhagen, with ruined affairs, and almost ruined health. But his daughter—became his comfort and his support.

It was in the Church of Our Lady, while standing before the Apostles of Thorwaldsen, that the artist within her awoke to conscious life. Here she began with her own hand to draw and to study.

One day, while she was at her work, she heard near her, a voice which was speaking in Swedish in praise of her work. She looked around her, and encountered, a thoughtful and friendly eye, and a grave countenance full of benevolence. It was a Swedish sculptor, who now made himself known to the young Danish lady. He afterward became her teacher and her friend.

It is often said—and not without reason—that men are jealous of women having a more independent, and a freer development of mind, which they fear as much for them as for themselves. But if the women who have arrived at a higher step on the ascent to science and art, are asked who it was that developed their gifts, who encouraged and directed their beginnings, we shall find that the greater number, with hearts warm with gratitude, will name—a man.

It was so with Lagertha.

At the age of two and twenty, she devoted herself, with burning and incredible industry, under the guidance of her teacher, to the art of the sculptor. She had accustomed herself in Iceland, to wrestle with difficulties and to overcome them. This training was very useful to her in her new path. And when success crowned her labors—when her future enlarged itself, then the beloved father looked with admiration up to the daughter who now supported his old age, and gave new glory to his name and house. Then what life was hers! how changed seemed the world to her! Whichever way she looked, she saw form, and word, and meaning; subject for thought and for creative art. The swan's nocturnal song of combat; the flaming crowns of the silent northern lights; the midnight sun; the sun which never set, became new realities in her spiritual life; and high as the fountains of the Geiser sprang her feelings, and her thoughts, while with this sight and this sound in her mind she went forward, laboring in the sweat of her brow, and the gladness of her heart.

Fortunately for the young girl, she lived in Denmark, because Denmark is the artist among the brother-nations, and artists are here more patronized, and cared for than in Sweden or Norway. Love of art exists among the people. In the houses of the peasants and the artisans, pictures and statuettes are met with by the artists of the country. The young artist, therefore, soon obtained orders which enabled her to continue her studies, and to maintain her father's house. But she also worked. Strong health sustained her with courage, and enabled her to make efforts under which weaker constitutions must have given way.

Fifteen years had now passed between the time when Lagertha's artist-soul awoke to life before the spirit of Thorwaldsen, and that in which she worked out the figures of the Fates in Sweden with independent creative power.

Of what the circumstance was which had occasioned her to leave her country, and her sphere of labor, Lagertha said nothing to Gerda. Gerda fancied that there had been some volcanic eruption, which had destroyed her life's happiness, and threatened to annihilate her existence. But she had fled, and had built on another shore a new habitation, and sought now to erect a new temple to the eternal worship. Lagertha told not how she had suffered, and what it was that threat ened her, but she permitted her young friend to know how living and working for the ideal, can elevate the human being above the fettering bonds of earth.

And Gerda learned; listening to, and observing her, and seeing how true independence protects purity, and every thing that is good and noble among men.

When Hedvig—as often happened—came and interrupted such like conversation in Lagertha's studio, and in her friendly and cheerful manner invited the "upward aspiring ladies" to a dinner of potatoes "in their jackets," and herrings and fresh butter, or to dried fish and peas, or to "wholesome water-gruel," and other such prosaic food, the two friends accepted the invitation thankfully, and, as larks which have winged themselves, singing up to the heights of heaven, descend to rest upon the meadow turf, bedded with thyme and fragrant grasses, so accompanied they with delight sister Hedvig to her home, and her excellent dishes.

We will now turn to that home, in order that we may take notice of the movement within it; but as we consider Gøthilda best able to give an account of them, we think we can not do better than to read scraps of her letters.

SMALL TRIFLES.

FROM GØTHILDA TO SERAPHINA.

Bulletin No. I.

MY SERAPHIM,

I AM in my very worst temper, vexed, angry, tired, provoked with myself, everybody, and the whole world. I must break out upon something—must break something to pieces; glass and porcelain won't serve my turn; it must be steel—iron, a bar of iron! I would thunder in the world, and on all the fiends that are in it, with a Thor's club! I would do—I don't rightly know what! I have quarreled with every body, and have ended with growing desperate against myself, and that which made me. I don't believe that it was our Lord, at least not alone—somebody else was with him in the plot. I suspect also that I have not been regularly and properly christened, the heathenish mind is so very powerful within me sometimes—and I shall just examine our honorable Dr. Lund on the subject, when he comes here to marry Engel and Uno. And then—to christen a poor, sinful human creature to virtue! that is indeed to tempt our Lord and—the Evil One also, and to give folks such claims on one's excellence. Well, I have taken care that they should not do this with me. I suspect also that marriage has been invented to make many people unhappy. We have now two weddings in prospect in our family; the one seems to me like an actual misfortune, and the other—why, yes, it may be a happiness for some, but to me it is a misfortune, because it takes from me the friend of my childhood and from home its most cheerful sunshine. And already is Engel half severed from us in soul and heart. Besides, of her No. 1, every body else has become No. 2, and I have become almost null. Yes, I cry sometimes about it, when nobody sees me, because—Mrs. Nebuchadnezzar does not like to look dejected, and turns up her nose at No. 1, who, if he do not gain too great an influence over Engel, shall find favor in my eyes, because he is a very excellent and good man, although I have not perfect confidence in his principles. Ho! ho! on Friday afternoon the wedding is to take place. We wished to have had merely a slight entertainment, but uncle Herkules says that he does not understand such "kickahaws," but will have a regular supper, with proper meat, and a justifiable number of guests; so now we have sent out our invitations. After supper Uno immediately sets off with Engel to his estate, which is seven miles from the city. That will be in the English fashion; and it may be as good as any other, as she is to go soon from the house. Whom now shall I have to talk with at night when I go to bed? and to cry and laugh with on all occasions? No, that will not do now; I shall drown my paper with my tears. I must think and talk of something else. But then another wedding stares me in the face, and drives me mad; and if I were a man I know very well what I should do with "le coupable monseer Sigurd."

"Can you show me either a God or a devil?" was said, as I have heard, by a blind man who was reckoned foolish (but who, I think, was very wise!), and who continually stood silently looking up to heaven, even at night. Yes, good or evil, that is an honest and a clear game. But nowadays every thing runs together, and has a little of every thing. From this comes confusion and uncertainty. And here in the family, where people wish to be so Christian, and so reasonable, things are turned on the one side and on the other, and people stand choosing and deliberating between worthy and unworthy, and so they never come to a decision. It is so with Monseer Sigurd. I, for my part, don't like him, and I tell him so openly, even to his face. I think that a bold, open enmity is better than an uncertain, lukewarm friendship. That is the old pagan in me, you think of a certainty. That may very well be the case, my Seraphim, but—I can not help it. I say with uncle Herkules, "Friend or enemy! then it is clear." But nowadays every thing runs into another, and that I don't like. My adage is, "every thing or nothing."

Later.

I have calmed myself and become a little more sober over a game at chess with uncle Herkules, and over mixing (and tasting) his toddy, and looking at him and hearing him. Uncle was this evening particularly mild and agreeable, and went into his "peaceful reminiscences," and in them he always introduces ladies, and I think it is more amusing to hear of them than his warlike experiences. This evening the subject of his conversation was our aunt at Skåne, that little extraordinary gentlewoman whom uncle declares that I resemble both in eyes and spirit. She learned in her youth to be a wicked young lady, probably like the undersigned, and knew nothing more amusing than to have some tricks in hand which set people a staring, or laughing, or else frightened them sadly. She had the most magnificent long light hair that any body can imagine; and no little renown did this beautiful hair get among the relations, and no little was said about—how, when she was a bride, this hair would become her, plaited like a crown upon her head. But when, on the morning of her wedding, they came to dress this beautiful hair—because she was to be married in the forenoon at church—and when they took off her nightcap—behold, there fell the beautiful golden plaits of hair to the ground with the cap; and there the bride sat with her head round as a turnip, and with her hair cut short, and she was ready to die with laughter, to see the consternation of those who saw it, and how they could hardly refrain from screaming in horror.

The bridegroom, however, laughed with the bride at the joke, and they two were a happy couple, although she continued many of her peculiarities which were not altogether womanly. Thus, she always wore men's clothes, and was fond of manly occupations, such as hunting, riding, turning on a lathe, and even occasionally smoking a pipe. But with all this, the odd little lady was so truly gentle, and kind, and cheerful, that she made every body happy around her, so that every body cordially liked her, and became attached to her. Uncle Herkules went to live with her when he was twelve years old, after the death of his parents, and was brought up on her estate, together with her six sons. These young gentlemen lived together in a large parlor, called "the lion's den," and there was merriment and noise enough; still, from their very earliest youth they all assembled to family prayers, morning and evening. The little countess was the very best of mothers to these lads, alike prudent and kind, and nothing pleased her better than to get up a hunting-party, or some sort of amusement which would entertain them. They were, at the same time, happy and merry young men, and never thought of doing any thing which was wicked or unjust.

As a widow she lived splendidly on her large, magnificent estate, often drove out; when she used black horses in her carriage, she was attended by a black dog, and when white horses by a white dog. After she had cut off her hair on her wedding-day, she always wore a curled and finely-powdered gentleman's wig. She commonly wore a white cravat, white waistcoat, and a coat with rounded laps, which hung over the petticoats. A fine and delicately white frilled shirt, wristbands, and boots, completed the costume, to which belonged a little man's hat, with a broad brim, which sat rather on one side of the head. The little, little old woman in this dress, with her upright carriage, her elevated head, her nose as if snuffing the wind—like the undersigned—and her handsome countenance, looked really beautiful, and commanded the respect of all. She was looked up to and beloved by her children and her dependents, and was always called by the latter "Sir Countess." She loved hunting and fishing even to her old age, and when she was seventy years old shot a roebuck in her own park.

Among her household she was always cheerful and kind, and amused herself greatly by giving them riddles to guess, in particular to one of her women, who always forgot the solution of the riddle.

"Who gave the first kiss in Rome?" was one of her most frequently-repeated riddles, and the answer that was returned always was, "Oh! how should I know?—it was, perhaps, the Pope!"

And with that the little countess would laugh immoderately.

"Yes, she was a dear little old woman!" exclaimed uncle every now and then, while he was describing her excellent qualities and her oddities, and his eyes, as he said this, beamed warmly, inspiring warmth in others.

It is a great pity, my sweet Ina, that you have not seen uncle in his most beautiful moments; I assure you that if you had, you would be a little bit in love with him; yes, and then we should become rivals. But look you, my Seraphim, it is not worth while being too seraphim-like and too angelically good with him. People must have a little spirit in them, and let him see it, now and then, into the bargain. For my part, I don't know how I should keep up my temper if it were not for him, and if I had not him to stand by me, and did not hear Thor's hammer thunder through the house.

Good night, my eyebright, my lily of the valley; promise me to drink chalybeate water in the morning, and to read Kalmodin's Mirror for Women at night, instead of novels, till you drop asleep; and I promise you that you shall have a little bulletin from me every day, which shall tell you all our vivacity and folly here at home till the wedding is over, and I can go myself to you, and serve it all up a second time, and make an onslaught upon your paleness, and aunt Perpetua's dishes. And this I tell you, that if you do not become for one day red as a rose, both on cheek and in temper, I do not think it worth while to be well-behaved.

I will not, however, still suspect our Lord's management, but will believe that one of these days he will take fate into his own hand, and then—yes, then every thing will go on bravely, and you will become my little sister-in-law! I, however, shall always remain, as now,

Your faithful
WICKED ONE.

Bulletin No. II.

Monday. Gloomy prospects! Mrs. Blandin, the cook, whom we usually employ on extraordinary occasions, can not come this time; she was engaged beforehand to our neighbor, Grocer Pepparkorn, whose eldest daughter, Olympia Corona Napoleona Ly-sandra Pepparkorn, is to be married on the same day as Engel, and on which occasion a great feast is made.

Infatuated by Miss Iceland's creed "people can do whatever they will," and to pacify Hedvig, and to avoid having a strange cook in the house, I have foolhardily undertaken the management of the kitchen for that day, that is to say, as head of that department, and I foresee that all will go wrong. In the mean time I read incessantly Margareta Nylander and Cajsa Varg, and have continually in my head these and other such words, "take a pound," while aunt Queen Bee and Hedvig lay their wise heads together and determine on dishes.

We have all a great deal to do in the house; I mean the ladies, for the gentlemen do nothing—but give trouble.

"Le coupable" comes here like a jealous Turk after his beauty, who is now helping us to sew, and to get Engel's things ready, and has quite lost his good temper. He is horrible! I consider him as descended directly from Saturn, who ate up his own children out of love to himself. If he makes Gerda unhappy, then—let him take care of himself; as far as I am concerned, he is not safe of his life.

Our "Prince Hamlet" looks mysterious, and I am continually expecting that some misfortune will happen, that he will either kill himself or Sigurd, and perhaps all of us! his keepers and his guards, it seems to me, are beginning to look more uneasy—I have a black sea of thoughts within my soul. Ah! my eyebright, what a deal of darkness there is in the world. And if I had not some stars which I could look up to and which always shine bright, then—

Adieu, my very dearest! I have not time to write a longer Jeremiad to-day.

P.S.—I have got a pimple in the middle of my forehead and two on my chin. Beautiful ornaments for a bridesmaid! I was certainly born under an unlucky star! I am a sacrifice to fate. In case not—

Bulletin No. III.

Tuesday.—Hurrah! every thing grows light; every thing improves; and I congratulate myself and the whole world! King Ahasuerus of haughty memory could not have felt greater pleasure when he saw the beautiful Esther than I, when this morning I saw, in her frightful bad-weather costume, Miss Esther Sara Sjöberg, that sun among housekeepers, who was all in all in my parents' house, managed the housekeeping and gave us lessons in French—though I never properly could make clear to myself how rightly to use "la" and "le;" whether it was her fault or mine I do not know—who taught me my first legends and songs—she whom I believed to be at fifty miles distance, but who now—the good soul—was come to overlook Engel's bridal, and to assist us at it! I knew well that Hedvig had written to her about it, but none of us believed that she would come. But now she was come, and as she stood there with her round, respectable countenance, beaming with good will; her broad, excellent figure, that looked as if it could carry Atlas upon its shoulders, we sisters were so delighted that we began to dance a regularly tempestuous dance around her, while she at the same time laughed and cried for joy over us. After this I became again a supernumerary, have placed myself as a volunteer under Jamsell Sara's command, and—do whatever I like, and defy Mrs. Blandin and "le coupable," and the pimples, and the whole world, to put down my courage. Now every thing will go on bravely, either in one way or another, that I am sure of.

Uncle Urbanus threatens us with a poem in honor of the solemnity; Dalerin the joiner with a similar one. I have also had a little poetical stream of my own, but it has dried up in the prospect of the great flood.

Every body who is invited "will have the honor of coming!" Let them come; let them come! They shall be received with a warm welcome.

I send you herewith a sample of our excellent housekeeper's gingerbread, and a sketch of her portrait.

Bulletin, No. IV.

Wednesday.—Every thing still goes on well. But it becomes more and more plain that the Pepparkorns and we are rivals, and that mother Pepparkorn and father Pepparkorn, and Olympia Corona Napoleona Ly-sandra Pepparkorn have vowed to tread us into the dust with their state and grandeur. Mrs. Blandin, our former cook, whom they have taken from us, comes in here from time to time and has consultations with our house-keeper, giving her on these occasions—as I fancy, by particular desire—various notions of the preparations which are making for the Pepparkorn's wedding—and carrying back with her—as I suppose, to them— notions about the preparations for the solemnity here, which are very much more unexpensive. In particular very great is the difference in the wardrobes of the brides. Thirty new dresses, “the one silk dress more beautiful than the other,” says Mrs. Blandin, has Lysandra had made for herself; collars which cost fourteen rix-dollars a piece; pocket-handkerchiefs which cost twenty rix-dollars each, and so on. The furniture accordingly; nothing can be too grand; “the dearer the better.” And the wedding dinner! and all the wines; it makes me dizzy in my head! If Mrs. Blandin was to know that Engel has had only three new gowns, how she would clasp her hands together, and would lose, I believe, all respect for our family. I did, however, let out before her—as the greatest secret, of course—what I will now tell you—that when uncle Herkules, the other day, presented Engel with a two hundred rix-dollar bill, “to make herself grand with,” as he said, she threw her arms round his neck, and asked him whether she might do with this money as she liked; to which uncle said “yes.” Whereupon Engel employed the greater part of it in perfectly clothing ten poor young girls who last year were confirmed at the same time with herself, and retained only a small portion to “make herself grand with,” according to uncle's wishes. I told Mrs. Blandin that I thought this application of the money was more beautiful than all Lysandra's grand furniture and dresses; and I had not at all, in so saying, a countenance of Christian humility: I can believe that I looked much more like Mrs. Nebuchadnezzar. Mrs. Blandin looked rather blank as she went out. It did me good to send a little peppercorn to Pepparkorn's. Much good may it do them.

Thursday morning.—The peppercorn sticks in my throat, or has risen there, and rather burns my conscience, and lets me know that it is not so pretty nor yet so respectable to try to out rival the blessed Pepparkorns, as I did yesterday with my bragging. But what is done is done, and what is written is written, and I will not seem to you to be better than I am.

Ha, ho! to-morrow!—to-morrow I shall hardly find time to write to you; but the day after I shall do so at length. My pimples are better, thanks to white alum; but—I fancy that the world is heavy! Stand by me, even if I should never become rational and——

Virtuosa, or Woman in her perfection

Bulletin, No. VI.

Saturday morning.—Every thing is now topsy-turvy in my head and in my heart, therefore if what I am going to tell you comes topsy-turvy on the paper, do you your best to get it in order, my Seraphim.

Where shall I begin?

It was six o'clock, I believe when the bride stood ready dressed, surrounded by her bridesmaids and two marshals, with large branch candlesticks, which were lighted, while she showed herself to the people. The people were legion, and were very inquisitive, but said that they never had seen a more beautiful bride, or one more like “an angel.”

And so she looked—as pious as a child, and bright and happy when she stood by Uno's side before the silver-haired Dr. Lund, who married them. He performed the ceremony so worthily and so beautifully; I felt myself quite good and pious. Uno was pale and serious, but Engel—her color, her glance, her whole being remained unchanged; she looked like an angel of light!

After the ceremony, Dr. Lund made a short, warm-hearted address to the young pair, about how “they should give a home to the Saviour in their house.” Any body must have been a pagan who had not been affected by it! I looked at Uno; there he sat and concealed his eyes with his hands, and I then saw a large bright tear roll down his pale cheeks. I felt myself more nearly akin to him than ever before.

An hour before the marriage Hedvig and he had some conversation together, and I heard her say,—“Let them be to you holy, Uno! take care not to disturb them!”

To which he replied with a reproachful, and yet at the same time, beautiful look, “Are you so little acquainted with me?”

Only the nearest relations and friends were present at the marriage. When it was over, the other guests arrived. Uncle Herkules would have invited all the world, if Hedvig had not made him satisfied with half, probably about fifty people. There were, of course, too many for our small rooms, which thus became hot and close, and felt all the more so, as the company was any thing but lively and talkative. I have often heard it said that weddings are generally wearisome, but have never rightly known why until now. Now I believe it. And many causes contributed to make none of us cheerful, neither Hedvig, nor Augustin, nor Gerda; Ivar looked as Erik the Fourteenth must have looked just before he committed the Sture murder, and “le coupable” looked like a regular Christiørn the Tyrant. Bror declared that I looked like the confusion of Babel, and I thought that he had somewhat the appearance of a Swedish Corydon; in a word, we were all, more or less, out of tune, and there occurred such infinite pauses in the conversation—you know how such feel in company! We grew more lively when supper-time came. But even here, at the great table, we could not be merry. Uncle Herkules tried all he could to enliven us and himself, and he proposed toasts, but people always relapsed again into the old silence, and uncle was not in a merry mood himself,—and one heard nothing but a clatter of knives and forks. But "hast du mic's gesehen!" with the countenance of a royal herald, up rose uncle Urbanus—long live uncle Urbanus!—and begged the attention of the company to a most curious and remarkable wedding-poem, which he had found among his collection; whereupon he read the following:—

The Epithalamium of the well-born Matthias Ulf (wolf), and Miss Adelf Get (she-goat) of Näsgård, in the parish of Adela Vedho, in the northern province of Vysbo, who were solemnly married by Mr. Björn (bear) Gudmundson: an. 1640.

A Wolf he set himself to think one day
How he could make a young She-goat his prey.
Sweet were the words which he to her addressed,
Ere he got hold of her, the cunning beast!
He asked the Parent-goats, as well he might,
Whether a Wolf would cause her sore afflict:
If not, he would make free on her to call:
He did not mean offense—oh, none at all!
The Buck, the Wolf, the young She-goat they meet,
And now the Wolf comes walking on two feet:
Right glad was he, both heart and soul, to know
That he had now got hold of such a Doe.

The Goat she bleats, the Wolf he barks, the sinner,
Yet she fears not lest she should be his dinner;
For they have sworn, as true companions may,
To be good friends unto their dying day;
And thus the Wolf by no dire fury prest,
May clasp the young She-goat unto his breast
A Fox was marshal on the wedding morn,
An Owlet did the youthful bride adorn:
The old Goat gave the young She-goat away;
A Gadfly was the herald, trim and gay.
The Dragon and his little ones were there,
And of the wedding-banquet had their share;
The Black-cock also, with his plumage bright,
Was heard to crow there till the morning-light.
The ancient Buck was bidden to the feast:
The well-fed Hog was there, a welcome guest.

All came who would, both high and low of station,
All came to offer warm congratulation.
More came than were invited, welcome then,
Noble and peasant, and good clergymen.
A Bear he married them, and shortly after,
There was a deal of merriment and laughter.
Of their descendants what may be the sum,
That may be reckoned up in time to come!
All this is true, and not an idle chime,
And worthy to be writ in runic-rhyme.

Scarcely was this Epithalamium read, before there was a universal burst of laughter, and on every side noise and merriment among the company, and many of them who had names of animals or vegetables, began to call on each other: Swineshead nodded to Orhead; Ram butted with Buck; Eagle drank, to Dove; Fox jingled glass with Cuckoo; Mrs. Pike was the best of friends over a glass of water with Mrs. Goose; and I almost think that young Mr. Garden made a declaration of love to Miss Rose. And last of all, everybody joined in a toast to uncle Urbanus Myrtleleaf, who, happy as a god, stood smiling to himself and the whole world as he said—

"Ay, ay—ay, ay! Is it not remarkable?—Eh?—thanks most humbly!—thanks most humbly!—Eh?—ay, ay!"

And it was remarkable how now, all at once, every body became merry and talkative; yes, indeed, so much so, that they hardly allowed themselves to hear uncle Urbanus's own poem in honor of the solemnity, in which there was a great deal about "delighting" and "inviting." Still less would they listen to Carpenter Dalerin's, which Bror undertook to read himself, and in which I remarked the following lines:—

Little Venus tries to lure,
Because it is in his nature:

As well as this to the bridal pair: *

He is so rich; she is so true;
And both to love pay homage due.

After supper, I took an opportunity of complimenting uncle Urbanus on his wedding-poem; and as we were both of us very merry and a little affected, he desired and obtained—a kiss.

I made a discovery at table. It was that "the rough diamond" can look quite passable and quite agreeable, when he is trimmed up and smartened like better folks, which is but seldom. He has really some resemblance to uncle Herkules. (But he will never be so handsome.) I told him after supper that I began to have hopes that, after all, he would do credit to his name and his family. The good-for-nothing fellow immediately combed down his hair over his forehead with his five fingers, and assumed altogether the look of a poor and miserable creature, just like a broken-down, half-starved fellow. I begin to hate him. He does every thing he can to vex me. Well, well!

Miss Iceland was also with us, heaven help us! Augustin was especially attentive to her; and I observed that she thawed under the warmth of his beams, and there was fire in her eyes, so that I began to think about Hecla and Krabbla and their flames beneath the mantle of snow, and upon the old proverb, "fire kindles fire!"

Take care of yourself brother Augustin! and take care of yourself, Miss Iceicle! because, before I press her to my breast as a sister-in-law—

But I have-esteem for Miss Iceland. She has had the courage to make two models of her Fate of "consummation," or "perfection." I think it is called, because she did not think it perfect or successful, and that is respectable. They say that she cast aside even her third attempt. It is a difficult thing this "perfection." But now, if Augustin and the Island-lady sit and talk (as they often do) about northern mythology, and northern art, and northern spirit, and other northern things (which freeze me and make me yawn), till they kindle fire in one another. . . . I have nothing more to say, but feel murderously inclined—and return again to the wedding.

I took the opportunity of examining Dr. Lund with regard to my christening. He laughed, and declared that, as far as himself was concerned, it was all right, but that I screamed like an evil spirit during the whole ceremony. That is indeed sad! I felt it to be so, and to comfort myself, I took a glass of punch, and drank to every body, and said to them—wonderful things I believe; I do not remember clearly, because I became a little queer in my head; and when Dr. Lund took my hand, and danced a Nerika polska with me—it was all over with me. I only remember that I found myself in close combat with Jarl Herkules, and almost in a fray with uncle Urbanus, who wanted to part us, and that uncle Herkules came and took me away, and was angry; and then—I saw nothing more, not even the lanterns glimmering round the carriage, when, in the night and darkness, Engel was carried away from me. I was altogether in a state of confusion.

Next morning, with a clear head, I asked Bror—

"Bror, if that had happened to a sweetheart of yours which happened to me last night—would you have had nothing more to do with her?"

"No!" replied he, smiling, "but I should have told her to go to bed!"

Most edifying! and in particular—most romantic! Ho! ho! my Seraphim! Do you think that I shall ever make a figure as a heroine in a novel? ever become a pattern of a "perfect woman?" Ho! ho! I feel myself very humble to-day—now and then.

Dejected also. Engel is away. Ah, my little she-goat, art thou now in the wolf's claws? How will it be in the long run? My forebodings are all out on the Black Sea.

I am out of sorts, and have sprained my foot. I am also alone. Hedvig is gone to Ivar. May she only come home alive! Augustin, Bror, Gerda, and all are away. And I have had a rat in my conscience ever since last evening. I must go and see uncle Herkules, and hear Thor's hammer, to get a little spirit into myself again. After that I shall let Esther Sara Sjöberg entertain me with old legends about "ragouts and bridal-meats."

And then I shall think about the whole family being invited next Sunday to Ekane, to Engel's, and then I shall think about you, my Seraphim, and have Heaven before my eyes, and—

Lastly, in the morning you will see before your affectionate eyes the author of these remarkable letters, your

Virtuous-wicked
GOTHILDA.

SPRING DAYS.

Spring Days! How delightful that sounds! We think of warm winds; the song of the lark, cowslips in the green grass, and so on. But it is with the spring, here in the middle of Sweden, as it is with exhilaration in our society; it is difficult to bring it forth, and very easy to come of itself. Tegnér complains—

That in the north the spring-time
Has snow-flakes in its hair.

And Elias Fries resembles it to "a continually returning ague." Even the larks, the exulting heralds of spring, are silent in April—and sometimes in May—relapses into cold weather occur; the northern winds prevail as in winter, and the meadows are covered with sleety snow; or else a bleak, chilly grayness prevails, more unpleasant sometimes than thirty degrees of cold. We call this the "gray spring." It was this which prevailed in Stockholm for some days after Engel's marriage. A penetrating, chill, gray fog enveloped the earth, and made every thing cold and uncomfortable. But there was one district in Stockholm which had, during this, its own cheerful life. This was the district around Norrström, below the royal palace. It was now the time when the Mälar, swollen by spring floods, pours its waters with violence into the salt lake, and rushes broad and foaming through the arches of the north bridges a long way down the shore of Blasieholm. Then is the season for smelt-fishing, and on this evening there might be seen a number of smelt-fishers, mostly ragged youths, some younger and some older, with red frost-bitten noses and hands, some standing upon the quays, some sitting in boats made fast to the shore, or out in the stream, and with large nets brim full of these small well-tasted fish; and it was amusing to see the little silver shoals glittering in the nets as they were turned out in baskets and tubs, and to see the faces of the half-frozen lads as glad as sunshine because this evening the riches of the smelt-fishing were open to them, and there would be a feast in many a poor man's house. There were, however, very few spectators there; the bad weather kept the promenaders within doors. One well-dressed young man only walked up and down the quay, without seeming to take notice of any thing around him. That which he saw in the outer world was only what he saw within him, a gray bleakness, divested of all sunshine, all beauty—desolate space.

Poor Ivar! The certainty which he had so long waited for, so long doubted of, so long feared, had this day become his own. She whom he had worshiped had deserted him, had set off with another, his dreaded rival—all was over! Ivar had known this since morning, and since that hour had he gone, gone the whole day, he himself knew not whither. His mind was disordered. It appeared to him as if he were seeking for himself. His chest seemed oppressed and contracted; he could scarcely breathe. Now and then a bitter tear wandered down his cheek, but it afforded him no alleviation.

Sometimes he said to himself, "I will go to Hedvig; I will lay my head in her lap; she shall weep over me; then indeed will these iron bonds be unloosed—then I shall be able to breathe—then I perhaps shall be better!"

But yet he did not go; a strange fascination kept him beside the foaming deep; because there was something in this life which resembled her—whom he had loved, whom he still loved, and who attracted him powerfully. She had desolated his heart, his early welfare—for Ivar had deeply involved himself in debt on her account; if he could now have died in her embrace, it would have been well for him—well as for Mark Antony in the treacherous arms of Cleopatra, as Holofernes beneath the sword of Judith, as King Ague by the murderous hands of his bride; so thought he. To die by beloved hands would be easy; but thus to be deserted, plundered, cast aside—to have to drag about with him these fragments of life—it was of all bitter things the most bitter, the most unendurable. It was madness to think of.

The noise and the glad tumult of the billows spoke to him of forgetfulness, of refreshment, of deliverance. The whirlpool beneath his feet called to the whirlpool within his brain; and every time that Ivar came to the steps which led down to the river near the opera-house, he stood still, he went down the steps, watched the white foaming billows heave themselves up toward him, kiss his feet enticingly, foamingly, as if to draw him down to them. Oh, how they drew him! But then he seemed to hear, as if from the shore, a tender, anxious voice, exclaiming, "Ivar! Ivar! think of thy brothers and sisters!" It was Hedvig's voice; and Ivar turned from the seductive deep, and begun again to walk, walk!

Beggars, men and women, miserable objects, which are seen, alas! too frequently in the streets of Stockholm, approached the well-dressed wanderer and asked his charity, and Ivar, always weak toward the necessities, gave all that he had about him. It was not much.

It began to grow dusk. A light shone in a window on the Blasieholm. It reminded Ivar of that which Hedvig perhaps had lighted waiting for him, because he had promised to see her that evening. The little light seemed like a friendly hand beckoning him to her; and now an anxious yearning toward that affectionate sister, and toward his home, took possession of him. Just, however, as he turned himself hastily on his way thither, he came in contact with a gentleman, who exclaimed—

"No: but look, brother Ivar! That is very agreeable! You are taking a little walk, brother, for the sake of exercise, I see. I will go with you. The weather is not of the best kind, but——"

"I beg pardon! I am in haste!" murmured Ivar, and endeavored to pass.

"Who'd have expected this! Shall we go together? Yes, with all my heart; we shall get all the better exercise; that will be very amusing!" said Director Urbanus, as he linked his arm firmly into that of Ivar, and began to walk with him, talking all the time.

"Yes, as was said, the weather is not the best, but I have made a rule never to let any sort of weather prevent me from taking my daily walk. I take one in the morning, and one in the afternoon. The first gives me a good appetite for my dinner and after my last I sleep like an angel. For my part, I regard it as a duty toward myself and others to take care of my health, and to live properly and according to rule, both for soul and body. Those are my thoughts. Eh?

"And I believe it would be a happy thing, if our youth, nowadays, would think more about living by rule instead of rushing into every possible pleasure, which destroys health, and substance, and peace of mind. I assure you, brother, that I know a young, lusty fellow who seized upon pleasure in his youth, and who now, in consequence, lies in the Danvic.* Eh? Yes, ay, ay! There he lies among other fools; I knew him very well in his younger days; he was a wild blade, and never would listen to a reasonable word—and now he has become so careful of himself; and he fancies that he is a flower, and will sit with his feet in water lest he should wither! What do you think, brother? Hi, hi, hi, hi!"

"Ha, ha, ha, ha!" laughed Ivar, hoarsely.

"Yes, is it not comical? But do you know, brother Ivar, you have such a queer laugh sometimes. You laugh as if you did not laugh. It makes me think about the laugh in the Swedish folks' legends, about which I lately read in Dybeck's Runa. Do you like that journal brother? Eh? It is very interesting; and so are the folks' legends about which I have been speaking. According to them, one of the most dangerous spirits in the Swedish forests is the laugh. It is a wicked and mischievous spirit, which has a pleasure in decoying, and beguiling, and mocking human beings. If any one finds a treasure and rejoices over it, then 'the laugh laughs, and away vanishes the treasure nobody knows how or where.' And hence comes the proverb, 'the Treasure and the Laugh.'

"In winter-time it comes sometimes out of a thick wood, and takes its place upon the carriage of the traveler who is driving through, and then they lose their way, and the carriage becomes so heavy that the horses are all in a sweat. It never fails, however, but that the laugh 'runs off,' as it is said, that it slides to the ground, uttering a melancholy laugh, and vanishes. It possesses also the faculty of imitating human beings, so that at nightfall, when any body is traveling through the woods, they will hear their own voices, or their own singing so well imitated, that it seems to them as if they themselves were speaking or singing. Is it not curious? Eh?"

"It shows itself sometimes to people, and then most frequently it is like a beautiful woman who smiles and beckons. But if any body approaches her, she bursts into derisive laughter, and vanishes, turning her back as she goes, which looks like a rotten stump. Is it not extraordinary? Eh?"

But while uncle Urbanus was thus talking, all the more painful and intolerable feelings and thoughts, as it were, collected in Ivar's soul. A sort of demoniac frenzy toward his own folly, toward the beautiful, perfidious woman who had deceived him, and whose scornful laugh he seemed now to hear over his sufferings, and lastly toward his poor, deluded self, took possession of his soul. Little accustomed to control himself, he felt in the agony of this moment only a frenzied desire to free himself from his torments, which seemed to him scourging furies. His thoughts were bewildered; madness took possession of his soul, and with a wild laugh he tore himself free, knocking down uncle Urbanus, and rushing on without consideration whither, like a tempest through the descending night. People saw him with astonishment as he went by, but the shades of night and the mist soon concealed him from the inquiring glance, and the unhappy man sprang on—

Uncle Urbanus, however, lay in Queen's-street, and cried out like somebody attacked by robbers.

Hedvig went home and waited for Ivar—Augustin was from home, for a few days, on business connected with his office. Uncle Herkules was gone with Gôthilda to the opera. Hedvig was alone, and longed for Ivar's arrival. She had set all things in such beautiful order for his coming. Her lamp burned brightly and quietly. The scent of the gilly-flowers made the air of the room fragrant, and upon glass plates were heaped up particularly nice preserves and cakes, of which Ivar was very fond, and which sometimes dissipated his troubles. This may sound childish and absurd, but there is indeed, reasonable ground for it, as the child always continues to live in the man. By means of unabating little attentions, Hedvig endeavored to entice her brother again to his home, and to let him feel that a sister's love would be more tender, more considerate than that of a mistress. "If she deserts him—if this illusion, with all its golden dreams, vanishes," thought Hedvig, "he shall not fall upon the rocks, nor into the abyss; he shall feel that he has a soft arm to rest his head upon; that there is still light, and love, and hope for him in the world—no, he shall not be lost."

Hedvig felt assured—her loving heart was very cheerful this evening; she was more than usually happy. The visit to Ekarna—the impression of Uno's and Engel's happiness, and their heavenly and heartfelt attachment, had left a sunbeam in her soul: she thought of Augustin, and the thought of him was at once strengthening and delightful; she had a presentiment of how rich her devotion to, and admiration of, this brother, might make her life—and within her heart she kept a memory of another friend, far away, yet very near to her. Hedvig felt herself as happy as the angels are whose existence is love and adoration. And when she thought of "the children of her disquietude," as she called Gerda and Ivar—still her thoughts continued to be hopeful and rose-colored. And now, this very night—she had good words to speak to Ivar, she longed for him to come—she wondered why he delayed, and she walked backward and forward in the room, to and from the window, looking out into the uncertain moonlight, and following with her eyes the figure of every man who, wrapped in a cloak, approached the house where she dwelt.

It was already nine o'clock, and yet no Ivar! At length she heard the front door open. It is he! thought Hedvig, and went out to meet him. But it was not Ivar, it was Gerda whom Hedvig saw before her, but Gerda so pale, so determined, with such a bitter expression of suffering in her countenance, that Hedvig was afraid.

She removed the wet over-garment without Gerda seeming to observe it—she conducted her in, clasped her cold hands in her warm ones, kissed her pale cheeks; Gerda seemed both body and soul changed into ice. Beneath Hedvig's warm glance and caresses, however, she seemed at length to relax, and a flood of tears eased her oppressed heart, and Gerda was able to reply to Hedvig's anxious inquiries.

"Oh, Hedvig," said she, "I could not bear it any longer—I must talk with you. It must now be ended one way or another; now all must be told. I can not any longer endure her society and his injustice. Hedvig! for four days mamma has not spoken to me, and Sigurd—oh, he does not do right, he does not behave well either to himself or to me. You know, Hedvig, that our journey was arranged for the end of this month: I had still fourteen days to remain with you—and now, to-day, they have determined that it shall be at the end of this week; Sigurd has announced it to me so coldly and decidedly, and has told me to be ready. I know that poor Ivar, and my affection and anxiety for him, are the reason of this new punishment. But they give me, by this mode of proceeding, courage to oppose them. For the first time, for a long period, have I asked a favor from Sigurd: I begged him not to hasten this journey, at this moment, when Ivar's mind seemed to be more uneasy, and more disordered every day—I besought him most earnestly—No!—I besought of him, with tears, that he would concede this once, for my sake.—No!—I besought him almost on my knees—yes, Hedvig, I bowed my knee before him, and besought of him, as I have hitherto besought of God; but—'No,' and again, 'No!' was the only answer that I received. At this moment something within me raised itself up—dangerously, and I felt that my soul separated itself from his. Tell me, Hedvig; am I proud—am I arrogant, as they assert? Ah, I would lie at your feet, or at Augustin's, and kiss them. I would serve you as a maid-servant. Before you, I am so gentle, so submissive. But this man has awakened serpents in my breast. The most hateful of all feelings; hatred, has every day, more and more, its home in my heart. I know that I will not, can not, ought not to endure a man who can decide thus, and can thus command. But now, the hour is come, now it must be done:—Sigurd has strained the bow to the uttermost, and in three days I must be—either a slave or free."

"Free! free!" exclaimed Hedvig, with energy, "free to-day, at this moment! You are now in the house of your brothers and sisters, do not leave it any more. Write hence to Sigurd, or let me write, and say—or let Augustin go to him, and—"

"No, no! Hedvig, that will not do. It will look like cowardice in me. He would say that I have fled, that I have complained;—no! I must see him—still have some talk with him. I have often been unjust to him; I will justify myself before him even when—we must separate. But oh! that I knew—that I was certain how I ought to do it!"

"You still love him?" said Hedvig, looking sorrowfully at her sister, whose heart she wished to read.

"Would it be so dark, so bitter to me if I did not do so?" replied Gerda, while bitter tears flowed down her pale cheeks: "and remember—this man has been my benefactor, Hedvig, for many years—I can never forget that; and I know that this separation will be very painful to him—"

"Do it in love, Gerda!" said Hedvig, "for it must be done. It is better to part in love than to live in strife, and in the end—in hatred. Go, then, down into the depths of your own heart, and speak to him thence, and tell him candidly and tenderly at once how it is, and how it must be."

Gerda leaned her forehead against her sister's shoulder, and clasped her in both her arms, as she softly repeated—

"Part in love!—part in love! Go down into the depths of my own heart!" and with these words she clasped her sister all the more tenderly, as if she would seek from her sincere womanly nature, so full of the spirit of truth and goodness, support and nourishment for her own soul; and gently withdrawing herself from her sister's bosom, Gerda sank down at her knees.

"And if I come," said she, glancing with anxiety up to Hedvig, "is it certain that I shall not be a burden to you, my brothers and sisters, in the home of my childhood? My little income, Hedvig, my inheritance from my father—I was able formerly to give it up to you, because I had then sufficient, but now—"

"No!" interrupted Hedvig, "if you say another word of that sort, Gerda—I shall be angry. We have indeed quite enough to live economically all together; and what need is there of more than that, when people are attached to each other? Ah, my dear child! leave a love which only commands and oppresses, for one which would make you free! Yes, if I thus earnestly beg of you to resign the wealth which you might possess, for our necessitous life, it is because I know, know of a certainty, that we all shall become enriched thereby; for I believe that a dinner of potatoes and herring with your own family, with peace and freedom, would please you better than all the great dinners and suppers at G—; that you would dwell with a more cheerful heart in my little room up here, than in Sigurd's great house; it is for this reason that I am thus bold, I, you see!—"

Gerda smiled through her tears and said, "Ah, you divine, bold Hedvig! If I only knew—"

The conversation of the sisters was here interrupted by a stranger's voice, which was heard to say in the hall—

"For Jesus' name's sake, I beg that I may speak with her!"

"It is uncle Urbanus!" said Hedvig, astonished; "what can he want? Are you going, Gerda?"

"Yes, I do not wish to be seen here by strangers; and I must now return, that they may not seek for me. I will go down the little staircase."

"Yes, but Maja shall accompany you with the lantern. Go into Augustin's room, and I will send her to you with your things. But I really must soon hear from you! You will soon come again!"

"Yes, yes, very soon!"

Scarcely was Gerda out before Director Urbanus entered, and Hedvig immediately had a presentiment, from his disordered appearance, that some misfortune had occurred.

"Ivar!" was her first thought and her first question. And it was precisely about Ivar that Director Urbanus wished to talk, but he did not get on, for he was naturally circumstantial, and he wished to prepare Hedvig for the catastrophe, and therefore poor Hedvig was kept in a painful state of excitement before he arrived at it, and ended with saying—

"I believe of a truth he is gone mad! else he would not have behaved in that way to me."

"But whither is he gone? Which way did he take?" exclaimed Hedvig, with the greatest anxiety.

"Where?—yes, indeed! how should I know? I only know that I——"

"Ah, my God! but we must hasten after him, seek for him!"

"Seek for him!" repeated uncle Urbanus; "you might as well seek for a tempest; where is one to seek for him?"

"In the whole city, in—the whole world," said Hedvig; "in the whole world will I seek for him till I have found him! O, my poor Ivar! Dear uncle, go immediately, go to Ivar's lodgings, and ask whether he, perhaps, has returned there!—I dare not just now go out, lest he should come here. But go, uncle, if you love me!"

"Yes, good heavens! I will go, I will run—but—I shall never catch him!"

The last words were said in an under-tone within his great-coat, which uncle Urbanus put on again, as urged by Hedvig's anxiety and prayer, he hastened on his way.

Hedvig then called Stolt, whom she sent to the houses of Hortense and David, to inquire whether Ivar was there: but no one was at home at either of these places.

Immediately after ten o'clock, General Herkules came home with Gøthilda, who was prepared to dance a part of the ballet before Hedvig, and to act Donna Anna, but who was completely sobered by the news which met her at home,

No one in all the family went to bed that night, which was spent in dispatching messengers in vain, and in vain expectation. Hedvig's anguish and anxiety were indescribable.

When day came, they began to search through the city in all directions. Bror, David, uncle Urbanus, General Herkules even, wandered about seeking for him. Hedvig went almost incessantly between Ivar's lodging and her own home, to inquire whether he was not yet come.

Even aunt Queen Bee was in motion, and Master Jarl put on his seven-mile boots, and marched from one end of the city to the other.

When evening came, Ivar was not yet found, and they had not yet met with the least trace of him. All those who had been seeking for him were thoroughly tired, and at a late hour they assembled together to take counsel, aunt Queen Bee with them. One only of the party felt no fatigue—that was Hedvig. It was with some surprise that she saw the others prepare themselves to go to rest. She could not understand how Ivar's friends could think of taking rest when he probably was wandering about insane, and every hour might be his last. She, for her part, would still continue to seek him.

They represented to Hedvig how fruitless such an attempt would be at night, when they had not the slightest clew to guide them, and that by so doing she would only waste her strength in vain; that it was better for every one to spare themselves till the following day, when they might all recommence the search with renewed energy. It was more than probable that Ivar was not in Stockholm; that he was gone into the country, and that on the following day they might hear from him, in case he did not himself make his appearance, which was by no means improbable, as every body knew his irregular habits and way of life, and that on many former occasions he had been away for the day and night, nobody knew where. The departure of Hortense from Stockholm made it also very probable that he was not to be found in the city, as he was perhaps endeavoring to overtake her. The summa summarum of all being, that any further inquiries that night were pure folly; and would serve to no purpose at all; and so on; for which aunt Queen Bee had many unanswerable arguments.

Besides, where were they to seek further for Ivar at night?

All this was true, was right, reasonable, undeniable, and Hedvig at length was silent. But it happens sometimes, and perhaps frequently, that when reason, and prudence, and calculation have exhausted all their wisdom, and wearied themselves with seeking to the bottom of things, a something then begins to move, which silently arises, bursts forth, and overturning all the profound labors of prudence, goes on in its own course. It is a mean thing, often despised, ridiculed, compelled to silence in company; is called foolish, and—it often is so—we call it feeling.

When the feelings are warm with love, they become not unfrequently inspiration; genius,—its presentiment divination.

When all had retired for the night, Hedvig called Maja, and said to her in a determined but cheerful voice—

“Maja, dress yourself, you shall accompany me.”

Göthilda looked at Hedvig with astonishment, and said—

“You will go out then into the pitch-black night, and into this storm? What are you going to do?”

Hedvig merely replied, as if she were thinking—

“Yes, yes, I shall go;” and continued to make preparations for going out; put on her black silk hood edged with lace, and trimmed a little dark lantern, which she apparently intended to take with her.

Göthilda followed her for a moment with her eyes, and then, stepping resolutely forward, said—

“Hedvig, I shall go with you.”

“No, you shall not do so,” said Hedvig, embracing her; “you must stay at home and rest yourself, and be ready in case Ivar should come here during the night, or any message should be sent from him. What I am now about to do is perhaps folly, and I do not wish that any one should share it with me; still I must attend to the idea—the foreboding that I have. Maja alone shall go with me. You will go with me, Maja, will you not? Is it not so?” continued Hedvig, addressing her, who now entered the room, dressed in her large red-plaided woollen shawl, and with her three-cornered piece of linen on her head.

“Yes, sweet young lady, if it were to the end of the world. Hi, hi, hi, hi!” replied Maja, as if struck and amused by her own bold idea.

“You are pale, Hedvig, but your eyes flash fire,” said Göthilda, ready to cry, as Hedvig, in taking leave of her, kissed her coral lips,—“Ah! take care of yourself.”

“Do not be afraid for me,” replied Hedvig, smiling and nodding to her sister.

As she left the house she took the arm of her attendant, because the street was covered with ice and slippery, and went with her to the nearest stand of hackney-coaches; took one, promised the driver a good fee, and bade him drive to Solna wood.

They reached it after a drive of half an hour, and Hedvig desired the coachman to stop and to wait for her there. A good sum for drink-money, as well as a promise of higher payment, induced him to do this, and, after some astonishment and shaking of the head, and looking after the two women who wandered into the wood, he settled himself with northern phlegm to sleep, while the snow covered his gray cloak with a white mantle.

Hedvig had lighted her lantern, and by the help of it she pressed into the wood. It was a miserable night; the wind howled and whistled through empty space, and the sleety snow lashed the faces of the wanderers. It was cold and dark. In the sister's heart, however, there burned a little flaming light, which neither wind nor sleet could extinguish. It was a presentiment—one of those extraordinary forewarnings which sometimes pass through deeply sensitive and affectionate natures, and which whispered to her that in this wood she should find her brother. This feeling led her to visit the spot where she had once sate with Ivar, when he had felt life lighter; and where they had seen and talked with the Laplanders. Hedvig was not certain, however, that she could find it again, and the wandering in the wood through snow and pools of water was extremely difficult in the dark, stormy night. Those who know how dangerous are the streets of Stockholm and the surrounding country, for solitary wanderers at this season of the year, and how, not long since, many persons found there a bloody death, will not lightly esteem Hedvig's courage in this undertaking. The thought of this, however, occupied her so entirely and completely that she thought not of danger to herself.

While she was thus wandering, supported and assisted by the faithful servant, she called aloud Ivar's name repeatedly. Once she fancied that she perceived an answer; she stood still and listened, but then heard only a scream of ravens and crows, which seemed to have some assembly in the neighborhood. She went on in the direction in which she heard it, and as she advanced she seemed to recognize the place she was seeking. The cry of the birds of prey increased, she saw them flapping their wings among the leafless branches above her head, with screams and hoarse laughing sounds.

“Stop, Maja,” said Hedvig; “here is something.”

She took the lantern and threw the light upon the surrounding objects. At once she saw an arm raise itself as if from the bosom of the earth, and beckon her, and instantly she knew his wounded countenance, and heard a voice exclaim—

“Hence, away with thy disgusting witchcraft! I know thee.”

It was the voice of Ivar. She went now, with a heart trembling between fear and gladness, toward the uplifted arm, which continued to throw toward her pieces of moss and earth. By the light of the lantern, she now saw Ivar sitting half-upright, fearfully bloody, at the foot of that stone bench on which they had formerly sate.

His appearance was wild, and like that of a maniac.

"Ivar, Ivar! It is I, Hedvig! Do you no longer know me?" said Hedvig, and fell upon her knees beside him without fear, and embraced him in her arms. He fell down faint and powerless.

"Hedvig!" said he, "ah, is it you? I fancied that it was—did you hear the laugh in the wood, Hedvig?—it was here just now with its servants; they scented blood, and thought of having a feast, and laughed and made a noise—because I am dead, Hedvig. You see that I am dead—but I have not killed myself—don't believe that. Such a sorrow as that I could not, would not give you. She—the laugh has killed me. Are you come here to shroud me?"

"I am come to awaken you, my beloved Ivar, and to lead you home. Are you not thirsty?"

"Yes, I am—thirsty."

Hedvig took some of the newly-fallen, pure snow, and put it between his lips; she laid some also on his head; she bathed his temples with cold snow-water, and washed away with her wetted handkerchief the blood from his face and neck. While doing this, she was convinced that Ivar had ruptured a blood-vessel, and had become faint in consequence. She warmed his cold hands at her heart, and when Ivar, with the expression of a good child, allowed Hedvig to do with him what she liked, and said repeatedly, "Ah, how nice that feels!" new hope and new joy awoke in Hedvig's breast.

Without returning to consciousness, Ivar permitted Hedvig to do whatever she pleased; he allowed her to raise him up, and then went, supported by her and Maja, through the wood to the carriage; this walk was, however, difficult in the highest degree, so exhausted and bewildered was he. The birds of prey also continued, as they went along, to fly round them and scream. When the carriage began to move, Ivar fainted, and when at length Hedvig arrived with him at home, she knew not whether she sustained a living or a dead man in her arms.

But Ivar lived; and when General Herkules had opened a vein in his arm with a lancet, and had thus caused him to lose a considerable quantity of blood, he revived, opened his eyes, looked around him, and recognized all who surrounded him.

And Hedvig—how happy was Hedvig!

The physician who was called in during the night prescribed composing medicines and much rest, and gave them good hope of his recovery.

Ivar was laid in Augustin's room, and Hedvig watched by him through the whole remainder of the night. He slumbered, but the lightest sounds awakened him, when he lifted up his head and cast wild glances around him. When, however, he encountered Hedvig's mild and calm eyes, he said—

"Ah, you are there, then all is right?" and again slumbered. In the morning he slept soundly for several hours. When he awoke, he seemed to be conscious, but complained of a violent headache, and appeared to be deeply dejected.

The physician, on his morning visit, shook his head, and feared brain-fever.

With the first beams of the morning-sun, Gerda stood in the chamber. None of the family had seen her during the preceding day, and had carefully concealed from her their uneasiness and fear for Ivar.

It was not until he was again found that she was made acquainted with what had taken place, and now she was come to him full of disquiet, of hope, of pain and joy, full of feeling and thought—full of life.

She went to her brother's bed, fell on her knees at his pillow, and kissed him. He threw his arms around her neck, pressed his face close to hers, and loud and violent sobbing announced to the others that the severe bond of suffering had burst, and that the brother who was sick both in soul and body, would soon find an alleviation.

After this outbreak of feeling, Ivar seemed to breathe more freely.

"Gerda, and all of you, my brothers and sisters," said he in a weak voice, "you are too good to me. I am not worthy—I will be grateful—do you have hope for me—rejoice in me—but—I can do neither. The world and life are shut against me!"

"Oh, no, do not say so, my Ivar!" exclaimed Gerda, still upon her knees by his bed, and with his hand clasped in hers—"do not say so. The world is great, and life is great also, and glorious; but, Ivar, we must begin to live anew. You and I have both been bound and unhappy—the moment is now come when we must release ourselves, and begin a new path through life. We must travel, Ivar; we must go out into the world together, and as artists win our bread and win for ourselves new joy and life. We must go out into the world, and breathe over it in song, all the freshness and poetry, which lives in our woods and dales, and in the hearts of our people. O! my Ivar, we must refresh ourselves with the sounds of our own songs and with our in-born friendship for each other, and with the goodness of God. For God will be with us, Ivar, if we in earnestness and love seek to raise ourselves through the gifts which we have received from Him. Wake up, rise up, my brother. You have no time to be ill—no time to think of the future, because—it is spring. Do you see, it is morning—the night is past—the day is new—rise up, my beloved brother—rise!"

"My beautiful Valkyria!" said Hedvig, half aloud, in delight at her sister's words.

"Yes, yes! I will—I must!" said Ivar, as, like some one in delirium, he raised himself up and stared toward the morning sun, whose rays streamed into the chamber, and upon the beaming Gerda, whose countenance was lit up by the fire of inspiration. He seemed half intoxicated by the old and the new influence, and could not rightly compose himself.

Gerda then drew his attention upon herself, by describing to him the condition of her own soul, and her connection with Sigurd, and her determination now to break off with him, and to live merely for her family, and that future which she, by her own power, and through her own means, would form for herself.

"I have longed for it very much," continued she; "but never till now have had the courage to take this step. Now you, Ivar, have given me a courageous heart. For what I now do, I do no longer merely for my own sake, but for yours. I care for your happiness while I am caring for my own. That makes me strong and assured! We shall become children anew, Ivar! Do you not remember that as children we traveled together and discovered unknown islands, and lived there as king and queen? Now we will realize the dreams of our childhood.

"We will voyage across the great sea together, and let it waft its freshness into our souls;—we will see new lands and new people;—we shall become so much to each other, when we two are alone together in the great, strange world. And, somewhere or other, we will have a little home of our own, where we will rest after our day's work, and talk about our home in our native land, where our brothers and sisters are together. And we will sing about them out in the world, among foreign people, Ivar! We will sing about family-life and family-love in the north, so that people shall clap their hands and shout 'da capo!' Ah! Ivar, I know that we shall begin to live da capo, and that a better and a happier life—tell me that you know, that you believe it also!"

"Yes, I believe it!" exclaimed Ivar, as he threw both his arms around her—"yes, I know it. O, you talk so cheerfully!—you can charm away evil spirits, I believe! I know not how it is, but—I feel myself changed. All weight—all torment is gone!—my head is relieved—there is new life within my veins! The sea!—did you say?—oh yes, the sea is unfathomable as the depth of God's goodness—on the sea we will—"

"Stop there, my dears! there has been enough of sailing for to-day!" sounded here the strong voice of General Herkules. "Tomorrow we will talk farther of the matter, and take sound sense into the council. But I am well pleased with you, my children!—it is very good! By all means! people should have something to do; people should not allow any thing to knock them down, so that they can not rise up again, and get through in one way or another. Now then! It may so happen in the world that the battle is lost a few times. It has happened to myself. It has happened to the best of us; it happened to great King Charles. But did he remain cast down for that?

"When he lay wounded on the field of Pultowa, and his officers—my father was one of them—gathered round him like lions to face the enemy, and the enemy's fire raged all around him—it had a bad look out for him then, a very bad look out! One of the lieutenants—he was the honorable Gjerta—dismounted from his horse, and gave it to the king, and seated himself, severely wounded as he was, under a hedge to wait for death; but look you, just then came a squire from the castle with the king's old war-horse, Brandklippare, and the king was lifted on, and then looked around him, first of all to see if there were any hope of conquering; but when he saw his people stretched on the earth, and the whole field filled with the victorious foe, he gave the sign for retreat. But, do you believe that he fled like a man that was afraid? No, but slowly and with music playing, withdrew he with his little band. And this inspired such a fear-some respect for him in the minds of the Russians, that they did not dare to seize upon him, or to disturb his retreat. It was not until he was quite out of sight that their courage rose again!

"And when he lay captive at Bender, was he then vanquished? The best domestic regulations for negotiation and commerce which we have had since the time of Gustavus Adolphus have come from Bender from the land of Charles XII. And when, after so many misfortunes, he returned to his kingdom—solitary, without army, without money, was he without courage or resources for all that? Never was he stronger, or more full of resources. He arranged the internal government of his kingdom; he was supported by his scientific knowledge; and he organized anew his army. —fetch me if the king and the whole realm did not stand on as sound a footing as if no defeat, no misfortune, had ever happened. They stood ready for peace or war, for life or death.

"And you see, my children," and the tears sprang into the beaming eyes of the old soldier, "it is for this reason that King Charles is so dear to me, because he was greater than his fate, because he grew in adversity; and therefore all hearts grew by contemplating him. Yes, children, and now my old heart rejoices over you, because I see that you are of his people, you also!"

Many a time before this had the family listened to the old man's fervent narratives, but never had heard him as now.

And how is it that these narratives of former heroic deeds, the achievements of warriors, operate so refreshingly, so vividly upon us, the children of peace? Is it not because we also must combat, because we all must, sooner or later, either within or without us, have to endure a battle; that we all have to conduct a Narva or a Pultowa? This is the condition of life; it is its nobility, and we must all become heroes.

THE BETROTHED.

THE change which Gerda had occasioned in Ivar was strengthened by Augustin, who came home later in the day.

A conversation which he had with Ivar on his pecuniary circumstances, and his promise to bring these in order, was in the highest degree beneficial to Ivar, and strengthened his belief in his ability to raise himself and his desire to do it, if it were merely to show his gratitude for the affection of his brothers and sisters. The physical exhaustion which was the consequence of his violent although short illness, was welcome to him at this moment, and on the bed where he reposed, surrounded by the affectionate attentions of his family, the thoughts and images which Gerda had awakened, floated through his mind; the sea, the great, swelling sea, the immeasurable—and that future of freedom and song—Ivar breathed anew in it. Nevertheless, it would have had but little power over him had not a new image arisen before his burning fancy, and stepped between him and the former enchantress, overshadowing it;—this was the pure, beaming image of his beautiful sister. She came again and again to his thoughts as he had just seen her. And the most lively admiration took possession of his soul.

But Gerda was still bound; was yet not free from the bond that fettered her. But the moment approached when it must be loosened, if loosened it ever could be. The day before that on which she was to set off, she determined upon for this purpose. Now, or—never, must she speak—resolve. She was no longer uncertain. The thought of Ivar and his future, had made her certain and determined. But her heart, for the moment, still trembled.

Sigurd was gone out to a large dinner-party on this day, and would not return till late in the evening. Gerda resolved to sit up for his return. Through the whole of the day she was incessantly busy for Mrs. Juliana, in packing up her things, putting her caps and bonnets in order, and packing them safely for the journey, in paying bills, and many other things which she, with her usual cleverness, attended to; and she was glad by these means to divert her own uneasy thoughts from the approaching morrow.

Mrs. Juliana, wearied by the day's fatigue, went early to bed.

"Now do you also go to bed," said she to Gerda. "that you may be up early in the morning. Bear in mind that we must set off precisely at ten o'clock."

"The tears sprung into Gerda's eyes when she went to bid her good night, and an inexpressible desire and longing came over her to throw herself in her foster-mother's bosom, and—tell her all. But when she felt her own warm embrace feebly and coldly returned in a manner which seemed to say, "now do not let us have any scenes," and received upon her forehead the customary chilly and chilling evening kiss—her heart sunk again in her breast, she pressed her warm lips upon the hand which thrust her away, and left the room hastily.

She went into the parlor to wait there for Sigurd. The air seemed to her close and oppressive. She opened a window, and the breezes of spring came in fresh and inspiritingly, caressing her forehead and cheek. A swallow flew twittering past; the clouds were driven hastily across the heavens by the winds, and the brightness of the sun-set shone upon them here and there—shone and was dimmed; in the city's great beehive the murmur was still full of life;—it was a restless life out there. It was responsive to that which agitated Gerda's breast.

By degrees, however, it became calmer. The solemn importance of the occasion became more and more clear and momentous before her. She endeavored to prepare herself, so as to be equal to it. She did not know clearly what she should say to Sigurd, nor how she should say it; she knew only in what spirit she would speak to him; she repeated to herself Hedvig's words, and she went into the very depths of her own nature, into the most secret recesses of her being, and to Him who speaks there, to seek for counsel and right strength.

Still she trembled, when she heard Sigurd's steps—those well-known steps!—in the passage. But this emotion was transitory.

"You still up?" said Sigurd as he came in, and seemed a little astonished. "My mother is in bed. Is she already asleep?"

"Not yet, I believe."

"I shall go in and bid her good night."

Sigurd went into his mother's room, and came out a few minutes after.

"And now let us say good night to one another, my little sweetheart," said he: "I have still some writing to do to-night. Do not oversleep yourself in the morning, because we must be up early. Give me a kiss! But what?—your hand is as cold as marble, and you are pale!—Are you ill?"

"No! But I have something to say to you to-night, Sigurd!"

"Well, what is it, then?" said he, impatiently. "Speak quickly, for I am short of time. No?—What is it, then?"

"Sit down, Sigurd. Grant me your patience for a moment; it is the last time I shall try it—"

"Only don't let it be long. Have you got your things in readiness? Remember that we must set off in the morning precisely at ten o'clock."

"Yes, you will set off, Sigurd, but I—shall not go with you. I shall remain here—with my family."

"Aha! Does the wind blow from that quarter? I thought so. But, my little friend, let me escape any farther altercation on the subject. I do not desire to hear the perpetual whimpering about Ivar! He is out of danger; you yourself have told me so. There is actually nothing which can rationally prevent your setting off. And any thing unreasonable, you know—is no affair of mine. Besides, you know that my determination is tolerably steadfast, and is not accustomed to be turned about by any child-hood or woman's nonsense!"

"I know, Sigurd, that your determination is steadfast; that you do not waver. Nor will I endeavor to persuade you. I would merely say to you to-night—farewell; and would thank you for the time when you loved me, and for the good-will you showed to me. I would restore what I can no longer retain. You leave the city to-morrow, and I return to my family, to the home of my childhood. We separate. There is your ring, Sigurd. It was with delight that I placed it on my finger; with sorrow it is that I remove it. But it must be done!"

There was a mournful, quiet determination in Gerda's voice and demeanor, which was very unlike her. Sigurd had often seen in her towering defiance, burning indignation; he was accustomed to these, and to see them go over and change. But this was something new; it sounded—it felt—strange. A cold shudder passed over Sigurd.

He looked at the young woman with an inquiring glance. But her glance opposed his, calm, strong, solemn, but very sorrowful. There was a something in it which penetrated Sigurd's breast, and touched his heart, as if with the finger of death. He looked away, and then again he looked at her; on her pale countenance, on the determined, deep glance. For the first time, Sigurd seemed to have met in her an equal, whose being he could not understand, and against which he could not contend. An increasing astonishment in his countenance seemed to express the question of his soul, and involuntarily he uttered,

"What is this?—Is it serious?"

Gerda laid her marble-cold hand upon his.

"Yes, it is serious," said she, as before. "We must part, Sigurd; but gladly would I that we should part as friends. And, believe me, Sigurd, I am attached to you still, though I say to you farewell!" Her voice trembled.

She leaned her forehead for a moment against his shoulder. Then she rose up, and remained calmly standing before him. His sensations were extraordinary. He still felt the pressure of that marble-cold hand upon his, and it seemed as if an icy coldness went from it up into his breast. There was a buzzing in his ears; his heart beat violently, while he felt that some great change was about to take place between himself and her whom he had governed so long.

"I do not understand what you mean," said he, in almost a stammering voice. "What is the cause of all this! But this you know very well, that I desire your true happiness—your real well-being; and I think that no childish displeasure ought to make you doubt it. What is it that you reproach me with?—what is it that you desire of me?"

"Nothing, Sigurd, nothing; only to be free! It is no caprice, no accident, which separates us. It is the necessity of the thing; it is the dissimilarity between our two natures. More than this I will not say to you. I will not embitter this moment by reproaches. You have believed that you have done right for yourself and for me—but if I should, with the excited feelings that you daily awaken in me, become your wife—woe both to you and to me! Our lives would become miserable. I have felt hatred and bitterness toward you growing in my heart! Thus it ought not to be! No; I would still love you, as a friend, as a benefactor; and therefore we must part before it becomes too late. It can not be otherwise, Sigurd; I have proved it for many years; and have become clear on the subject only within a short time. I highly esteem—I am attached to you; but—we must part!"

Sigurd's head had sunk while Gerda thus spoke. Mild and gentle as her voice was to him, it sounded like the thunder of doom. When she had ended he looked up, and she appeared to him beautiful as she stood there, in her stern gravity, with glances that quietly seemed to flash fire; never had she appeared to him more beautiful—more worthy to be desired.

Love, anger, jealousy, rage, penetrated him, and his eye flashed, as he said in bitter ness—

"You are really rash, Gerda—this is very easy to you;—it is a light matter to you to break faith and promises; and, as a matter of course, it troubles you very little how much I may suffer. It is a small affair for you to give up him who has devoted his life to you for these many years, because you have already, perhaps, given yourself to another; and the whole of this courageous demonstration, and all these great words, may, perhaps, at the bottom merely say, 'I am in love with David.'

"Oh, no," replied Gerda, seriously, but without the slightest anger; "that they will not say; and you do not at the bottom believe it yourself. No, Sigurd; you I have loved, and shall never love any one as I love you. And, if it can alleviate the bitter feelings which you experience, know then, that I have not rent asunder this bond without suffering severely myself; that I, even at this moment, love you above any other man. And yet, yet—yet, Sigurd, we must part.—It is as sure as the judgment of heaven above you and me. But never shall I again be happy as I have hitherto been—neither shall I ever marry. Solitary shall I go on my way—let it be whatever God pleases. Never shall I forget you; never be joyous; never be really easy until I know that you are happy again, and that you can think of me without bitterness. Oh, that I could efface that which you now feel; that I could receive your forgiveness before I go—a little word of kindness—of consolation—of hope, that we may one day meet again, and extend to each other our hands as friends. My friend—my teacher—Sigurd!—Give me a friendly look—it is too bitter to part thus;—a heavy debt will, notwithstanding, rest upon me—the debt of being ungrateful to my benefactor!"

She wept.

Sigurd had clearly understood, by Gerda's words, and her whole behavior, that there was now no return, no reconciliation to be thought of; but his pride rose up, and would not allow her to see how deeply he was wounded; and a nobler feeling also stifled in him the expression of anger and pain. The noble womanliness in her manner and behavior awoke the noble manliness in him—for it existed there, however much it might be held in subjection by ruder powers; in this moment of struggle and suffering it came forth. Sigurd rose up and said—

"Be calm. I forgive you. And, as you feel it necessary for the happiness of your life to separate from me, it is my duty to feel the same. That which I may have to bear in consequence of it, I will bear. You are free. To-morrow I will myself conduct you to your family. May you find in them better friends than I and my mother have been to you."

These words cut Gerda deeper to the heart than the bitterest reproaches would have done. She wept silently but painfully. Sigurd, evidently proud and cold, walked up and down the room. Did he enjoy Gerda's tears? Did he expect some change in her thoughts and resolution? Neither of them said a word for a long, long time.

At length Gerda rose up, and said softly—"Good night, Sigurd."

He stood still and looked at her with darkly inquiring glances.

She went nearer to him and offered him her hand. "Good night!" repeated she, with almost a beseeching glance.

He did not move, but continued gloomily to gaze at her.

They stood thus silent for a moment.

Perhaps at this moment each waited for the other; perhaps Sigurd believed that now the long power of habit and womanly weakness would throw the young girl into his arms, and therefore he stood stiffly and proudly against her, as he so often had done before.

"Well, then—for the last time," whispered Gerda, "forgive!—Farewell!" and she clasped him in her arms and impressed a kiss upon his lips, and—was gone. The kiss seemed to take away his life. He gasped for breath.

"Was that the last?—is it past—past forever?" Thus spoke a mournful sound within Sigurd's soul; life was darkened before him, and the world seemed as if it would fall to ruins. It became desolate and cold within him and around him. He went into his chamber. It became night.

"Is it really possible?—is it not a dream?" said Sigurd, shuddering from time to time, during that long night. "Have I actually been the cause of this? Have I chased spring out of my world? Have I killed the life in my life?" But his pride sustained him, and prevented him from seeking for a reconciliation, which he regarded as in vain.

"To-morrow, to-morrow, I shall be with my brothers and sisters!" thought the sorrowing and violently-excited Gerda, and she placed a light in her window, and thus gave the preconcerted signal to Augustin, who was waiting in the street, and which was to say, "It is done! To-morrow I shall come to you."

After this she sat down to write a letter to her foster-mother, and many a painful tear mingled itself with the words on the paper. Gerda heard through this night an incessantly-moving, restless step, and her heart trembled at the sound. It was a long, wearisome night; it seemed as if it would never end.

But even it passed over.

Some hours after this, Gerda found herself in the home of her family. Sigurd and his mother had, themselves, conducted her thither, but with that silent displeasure, that proud rage which is so humiliating to him who has to endure it.

Gerda, therefore, was in despair.

"Oh! I must once more go to them!" exclaimed she, with tears of anguish; "must once more see them; once more speak to them, soften, conciliate them! Once more beseech of them—throw myself at their feet, and beseech of them their forgiveness!"

"No! now you stay here!" said Augustin, firmly, as he withheld her. "No further attempt now. It would serve no purpose. And you need not any further humiliate yourself. I will not allow it. But do not weep so, Gerda! Do not imagine that all is ruined—that all is lost! Time heals many wounds. The snow must fall over certain impressions and feelings before they can be forgotten. Let the snow fall. In time the spring comes. Wait for it; and—come now and talk with Ivar, and help us to enliven him, both soul and body. He longs for you. You will become his best physician."

Augustin's words were as medicine to Gerda's soul; and the occupation which the restless but warm-hearted Ivar occasioned her was beneficial to her; beneficial also was the familiar, peaceful circle of the family home.

"Shall I ever again be cheerful? Shall I ever again be able to laugh heartily?" Gerda had questioned of herself in the first anguish after the separation, and in the pang of conscience which hitherto she had not anticipated.

At night, however, when she took Engel's place in Göthilda's chamber, and heard Maja's laugh and Göthilda's merry chatter, and saw herself the object of Hedvig's affectionate attentions, the peaceful feeling of home diffused a wonderful joy over her mind. She knew that every thing which she had done was necessary and right; she permitted herself to enjoy the delight of the present moment, and the thoughts of the future came like the beautiful singing birds, which foretold to Columbus his approach to the new world; they came fresh and full of life, bearing upon their wings the words—

"Reconciliation! Renovation!"

RENOVATION.

"CONFIDE to God that which thou hast from him, oh! thou soul weary of wandering. Confide to the truth that which is from the truth within thee, and thou shalt lose nothing, and thou shalt again blossom forth from thy blight and shalt become healed of all thy infirmities, and that which thou hast lost shall be compensated to thee and renewed, and shall be inwardly united to thee, and it shall no more remove from thee, but shall perpetually remain and continue with thee, as God perpetually is and remains to be!"

Gerda read the above to Ivar out of an old book written many hundred years ago, called "The Confessions of Augustin." The words gave rise to much talk and thought between the brother and sister.

Renovation is an old subject, an old chapter in the history of the human race, old, and eternally new as life itself. The apple of Iduna—which was said to have power to renew the youth even of the gods—the cup of renovation from which the Christian drinks to-day new life—bear witness to it.

There are very few people who have not wished some time or other during their lives that they could begin afresh—that they could, as it were, be born into a new life-sphere both inwardly and outwardly; that they might take leave of the old night, and call up anew the rosy tints of morning on their life's horizon.

And in all ages have people made the attempt to do so by a great many ways and means.

They have made pilgrimages to the holy tomb, and later to old Rome. They wish to make an end of the past, and to begin anew to hope and to live.

In our days people betake themselves westward, to the new world. The little light which shone for the first discoverers in the night, and announced to them the longed-for shore; shining nowadays to the children of Europe from the shores of America, shines encouragingly through many a one's night.

Freedom in religion; labor in the young, prolific soil; that rich promise of good which now presents itself in so many forms—that is the light! That it is which entices us to leave our huts to build new ones there, and there—to begin anew.

"To begin anew!—but could we not do this with every new day, with every new sun?" inquire "the quiet in the land."

Calm and strong souls! much may be done by a human being with a pure will and amid a quiet life. But with certain deeper changes in that inner life, and for many a stormy soul, an outward change is almost a necessary means of an inward renovation. There is a power in old places, habits, impressions, connections—as dangerously fascinating as intoxicating liquors; as crippling as heavy fetters, from which no one can free himself—but by flight. But, far removed from them, with a new earth beneath our feet, with new stars above our head, new objects around us, new impressions, new thoughts have birth, and it is much easier for the soul to exert and raise itself. These outward removals are remedies in the hand of Providence for men. They do not supply the good desire, but they support it.

The brother and sister talked of all this between themselves, and it became clear to them, and to the whole family circle, that the remedy for both would be fresh activity under new circumstances, and that rest in the family-home was not to be to them any thing else than the rest which the bird of passage takes on the branches of the tree, to invigorate its wings for a new and a longer flight. For Ivar, however, it was not rest. His native land seemed to burn his feet. In his state of feverish excitement and disquiet, he only longed to be away—far, far away!

A chance circumstance, one of those which occur now and then, and which resemble fate, or the guidance of a higher hand, occurred at this moment, which at once determined the plans of the brother and sister. We have seen their impulse toward the land of the Pilgrim Fathers. Now it happened that a sea-captain, a friend of Bror's, was just about to set sail to Boston, in North America, with the swift-sailing brig Freja; his wife accompanied him, and both of these people were of that kind which one would gladly have for traveling companions through life. Better conductors and friends Ivar and Gerda could not meet with, and on being spoken to by Bror, they expressed the utmost readiness to receive the young passengers, as well as to assist them by every means in their power on their arrival in that foreign land.

Ivar and Gerda embraced, with actual delight, the thought of this voyage to the new world, as well as of making their public appearance together by means of the songs of their native land, which they with certainty believed would take greatly with the people of the new world.

This plan, however, was received with opposition, and a deal of hesitation by the family.

Hedvig folded her hands in her lap, became quite pale, and said, full of anxiety—"So far off! ah! how then can I help you?"

"You have helped us on our feet again!" replied the two, gratefully smiling; now we must be able to help ourselves."

Augustin shook his head. The brother and sister were too young, he thought, to undertake alone such a journey, and such a career. He feared this adventure for Gerda.

"Ivar will be my best protector!" said Gerda; you will see, Augustin, how prudent and good it will make him. And the genius of America will protect me—it is, we know it well, a noble knight who honors and protects every pure-hearted woman! There, more than every other place in the world, shall I find myself safe."

Uncle Herkules set himself in direct opposition, grew angry, and scolded.

"It is folly, pure folly!" said he. "Let Ivar travel. He may need it, it will do him good; especially if he served in a man-of-war, and had a clever captain over him—it would do our young chap some good to taste a little discipline. But Gerda! Gerda, what should she do there? she had a deal better stop at home, and give us some music here, and it would be better than going and crowing before the world, which has lirumlarum enough as it is. I like Gerda—she is a handsome girl! She is worthy of something better than quavering and crowing before the world for money. And to be accompanied by that mad-cap Ivar! and that in America, where folks are all downright fools together!—if it won't all go to the devil—I know nothing. But I will have no hand in this miserable business; I give no consent of mine; I take my finger out of the pie, and wash my hands of the affair!"

And with this uncle Herkules went down into his workshop, and thundered with Thor's hammer.

One person, however (in case the expression is not too strong for the occasion), wore a positively adverse and clouded aspect with regard to this great journey, and that was—the money.

Augustin had no doubt but that the musical brother and sister—and especially Gerda, with her great talent—would be successful in the path which they had chosen, but, in order to accomplish this it was necessary to have—money: money for the voyage, and for the first commencement; money to enable them to travel farther; money to meet any unforeseen, adverse circumstances and difficulties; in a word, there required a sum of money, which no one could see any means of raising.

Augustin, and Bror also, had reduced themselves as low as possible, and had even borrowed money, to put Ivar's affairs in order. It was no joke to borrow an additional sum, neither was it advisable, under existing circumstances; and that which the sisters themselves were possessed of would not go far, even if Hedvig laid her gold spoon in the balance—which was what Ivar would not hear spoken of, neither that his sisters should make any sacrifice for his sake. He would himself borrow the money, which he hoped some day to be able to pay back. But every body who stands in need of borrowing knows very well that a loan is sometimes very difficult to be obtained, especially when people's circumstances are in a bad state. Uncle Herkules had money; the sisters knew that; but uncle Herkules would not hear a word about this journey, because he grew angry only to think of it. And the family knew very well that he held the reins in his own hands, and that you could not get him to do more than he would.

But Gøthilda had also her own thoughts in her head, and had from the very beginning declared herself in favor of the journey; regarded it as "a very prudent step," and as one which unquestionably would be successful to her brother and sister. Now, however, when it seemed likely to be stranded upon a variety of difficulties, and when she saw the anxiety of her brother and sister, she set her head to work to "get the thing afloat."

One fine day she began to bring out all the old bonnets and cast-off garments belonging to herself and her sisters, to sell by auction, to which she would invite all the family and acquaintance of the family. The bringing forth and appearance of these old scarecrows, and Gøthilda's remarks upon them, made the family almost kill themselves with laughter. In the mean time, as it became apparent that the result of the auction would be a deal of merriment with but little money, Gøthilda was seized by another bright idea, and this was—to put herself up to auction. She said nothing, however, of this to her sisters; thought over and arranged the matter with herself, and then walked down on the morrow to General Herkules. Hopp and Hej, the general's two dogs, which were always posted in his ante-room, started up and gave her a clamorous welcome; and after mutual demonstrations of friendship, the three all went into the general's apartment.

He was at this moment in his innermost room, in his chamber. There, in the alcove above the general's bed, hung the portrait of his mother, a mild, noble, womanly picture. He himself now stood in a portion of the room which Gøthilda called his "Pantheon." There opposite to each other, were placed two wooden chiffoniers, not unlike altars. Above the one was hung the portrait of his father, and upon the other altar lay his old "Charles the Twelfth's Bible" in a worn buckskin cover; his weapons, a brace of pistols, upon a silver waiter; the tools with which he worked when he was a prisoner in Solikamski, together with several relics from that old time. Above the other altar, looked down, between two blood-stained banners, the gloomy countenance of a warrior, who, with a threatening, fiery glance, seemed to watch over the remains of fallen warriors during the last Finnish war, which were here assembled. And upon the altar was inscribed by the general's own hand, the following words:—

"TO THE COMRADES FALLEN IN BATTLE."

"They have not fought and died in vain; their bold blood is the seed of future achievements."

It was here that General Herkules was standing. He had carried his father's Bible, in which he every morning read a portion, to its place between the tools of war and peace. And he was just now about to wipe off the dust from the old pistols.

"Nay, is it you, my little witch, my little dainty-foot!" exclaimed he, mildly and kindly, as Gøthilda entered. And he began to take up the old things, first one and then another, and to relate anecdotes connected with their history, and which were not altogether new to Gøthilda. She listened to them, however, as long and as sympathizingly as her patience and her already fermenting plans would allow. At length she said—

"And now, dear uncle, we must leave these old stories for a moment, and go to something new. Because I have something bran new to say to uncle."

"Oh, the deuce!" said the general good-humoredly, "what have you a-brewing, my little Mrs. Leapfrog? It must be indeed something very extraordinary. You must, I believe, be thinking of going to America, to show yourself for money. Ha! ha! ha! The deuce take me, but that would be a very pretty show. Well, have I guessed right?"

"Not exactly dear uncle. But—I am intending here in Sweden to put myself up for auction, and to sell myself to somebody who can and who will give a good price for me."

"What! the deuce!—what are you talking about?"

"I will obtain money for Ivar and Gerda to travel with, and as I can not get it in any other way, I am determined to sell myself."

"Is the girl gone raging mad? And who, the deuce, do you think will buy you?"

"And," continued Gøthilda, with the greatest firmness and seriousness, "as I, however, like you better than any other man of my acquaintance, I first like to know whether you will have me as life-property, and pay me for the bargain a thousand rix-dollars immediately!"

"Are you altogether gone stark staring mad? I think that you have lost your wits!

And if I will not have you?"

"Well, then—I shall ask uncle Urbanus whether he will marry me and pay down two thousand rix-dollars—because I shall make him pay dearer—but he will take me, that you will see; he will not refuse me, that I know!"

General Herkules stood quite confounded, and looked at the young girl, who seemed to be most perfectly serious in her proposal. That Director Urbanus had a little sneaking kindness for Gøthilda, and entertained some matrimonial thoughts regarding her, had been for some time suspected by the family, and had greatly amused them; General Herkules, therefore, did not doubt for a moment but that he would accept Gøthilda's proposal.

"Confound the girl!" said he, "if one could put any faith in your—if one thought you were serious with your folly!"

"The d— take me, if I am not!" said Gøthilda.

"Don't swear, girl!—because then the fiend will fetch you. I believe you will make a fool of me. Can you desire to have for a husband an old selfish fool like uncle Urbanus?"

"No, but I must have the money, and if I can not get it any other way, I shall take him into the bargain. It would not be disagreeable in any way to belong to him, and to be mistress of his house—and then I should invite you, uncle, to dinner.”

“Confound it! no, the deuce take me if I will come, or will see you either, Mrs. Urbanus Myrtenblad! How could any body get such ideas, and how could any one—bring them out?—how can any body be so destitute of brains?—how can they—it is too mad!”

“People may do any thing that they will!” exclaimed Gøthilda, and with that began to weep, and as she sobbed she continued, “and if they have to do with a barbarian, there is no other course than to become a sacrifice!”

“What stupidity is this that you are talking!” said the general, really angry; “never did I hear any thing like it, and never could I have believed that my little witty Rattlepate could have been such a—be silent now, Gøthilda, and be reasonable. Come hither!—be a good child, and do not let us talk any more about the stupid folly. A pretty story!—the deuce is it!”

“Then uncle will not have me, will not give me the thousand rix-dollars?”

“No, the d— fetch me if I will!”

“Farewell, then, uncle—I shall go to uncle Urbanus!”

“That you shall not do!—Confound it!—Are you not ashamed, girl?”

“No, not at all. I know what I mean to do, and I will do what I mean. And if I do not go myself, I know that uncle Urbanus will come this evening. And then!”

The general looked at her for a moment, and then said—

“You are, I believe, capable of doing as you say. Yes, that you really are. But rather than that Urbanus had you, I would rather—have you myself, and yet it costs more than you are worth.”

“Then uncle will have me!” exclaimed Gøthilda, beside herself for joy.

“Yes, then, yes—there is the money-chest, girl; take what you wish for. Less than Urbanus will I not pay for you. You may take two thousand!—such a crazy creature! never did I hear of such a thing!”

“Now I am yours, uncle, in life and death!” exclaimed Gøthilda, throwing herself into his arms, and crying and laughing at the same time.

“But, now, do you know that I have a right to give you away, if I like to do so?” said the general.

“That may be!” returned Gøthilda, “only I shall take uncle with me! because ‘no man can serve two masters,’ as the Bible says, and I will serve no man on the earth excepting you, uncle; but for you, uncle, I would go through fire and water, and every thing that was bad!”

And with this she embraced and kissed him, and sprang away to her sisters, full of exultation, with the much-wished-for sum of money.

The general grumbled and swore horribly at “that devilish young girl,” at himself, at “that great piece of folly,” as he called the journey. In the mean time, he became, to a certain degree, reconciled to himself, when he perceived the heartfelt gratitude of the family to him for what he had done. And, over and above, he proposed to make a new lock to Gerda's traveling trunk. Still he continued to call the journey “that piece of folly,” and he looked sometimes at Gøthilda with a certain cunning mien which seemed to say, “You shall not have done that for nothing.” But Gøthilda held her head aloft and looked very tranquil.

Her brothers and sisters regarded Gøthilda with a sort of astonishment, on account of her clever but strange manoeuvre, and Gøthilda laughed at herself with them, but assured them that she was perfectly serious in what she had done, and we, for our part, have no difficulty in believing her. For the rest, Gøthilda looked upon herself as a phenomenon among women, and her family were inclined to be of the same opinion.

From this time, that is to say, from uncle Hercules's change of opinion, the journey went on with a fair wind. All the family were put in a state of activity by it; and Hedvig dissipated her uneasiness by getting her brother's and sister's wardrobes in order, and in providing every thing which they could possibly need to take with them into a foreign country.

Ivar and Gerda passed the days in a sort of intoxication of music, and plans and descriptions of the journey. Memoranda and maps seemed to grow up around them. Ivar recovered his spirits evidently.

“I can once more see that heaven is blue; that the earth bears flowers, and that the grass is green,” said he.

Often has been sung the delightful growth of a happy love in a human heart, but I have never yet heard praised the delightful departure of an unhappy passion wherefrom, and yet it equally deserves commendation. When a glowing summer day declines, and the evening comes with coolness, dew, the evening song of birds, and the ascending of gentle stars upon a pure heaven—certainly it is beautiful and glorious! and the conquest of an unhappy passion is often the moment for the ascent of true freedom in the hitherto fettered soul. No longer captive to one single object, it casts its glance over the infinite kingdom of life, spreads abroad its wings, and has joyful presentiments of a new “let there be light” in its own existence.

A LITTLE HERE AND THERE, BEFORE THE JOURNEY.

"Do you know, Göthilda," said Bror, one day to her, "I think that they make too little of us here at home. We reckon as nothing beside the other two—and that is merely because we are modest and rational, and don't make any disturbance, or get up any tragedies about our inner condition, or our adversities. And yet there may be occasion of this, if people would only take them up; the deuce take me, am not I very much to be pitied?"

"You pitied!" repeated Göthilda, lifting up her eyes, and gazing at her brother's round, pleasant, merry physiognomy, and perceiving with astonishment that tears stood in his eyes.

"Yes, yes," continued he, "I am actually to be pitied, and so are the others too. Those dear, good girls, the Woltmans—you can not conceive, Göthilda, what a life they lead at home, and—I with them, because I like them, and I would gladly make it a little easier and more cheerful for them; but I myself sometimes am quite depressed with the gloomy atmosphere of the house. And this makes me sometimes so cross with old Woltman, that it is all I can do to prevent myself from breaking out upon him. If it were not for the girls' sakes, I could never have held out. And yet he has good qualities; he is a right-minded, truth-loving, honorable man, as people say; but he is in a high degree avaricious, and has one of the very worst of tempers. One never sees him but in an ill-humor, and one never hears him speak a friendly word. People can not be cheerful, because that makes him angry; and besides that, he goes about constantly finding fault and grumbling through the house at what "goes on," and at what is "broken," so that he puts an end to all pleasure. That is the way he goes on with his daughters, although when they and I are together, we amuse ourselves a little now and then. But if the father comes in, nobody can stir, unless they wish to be scolded, and to have angry looks thrown at them. And the very worst of all is——"

But here Bror suddenly checked himself, crimsoned, was silent, and merely said after a moment's reflection—

"Yes, Heaven knows how it will go on."

"What? what?" asked Göthilda, dreadfully inquisitive; "what will go on? What is that very worst?"

"I will tell you—another time, said Bror; "but now tell me, my little sister, why you look so dark and so threatening sometimes, as if you had something very gloomy on your mind—what can it be?"

"I will tell you—another time," replied Göthilda, a little affronted. "One must in any case fight alone against the Evil One, and nobody can help one in this combat."

"Against the Evil One!" exclaimed Bror, and looked astonished in his turn, and made a gesture of comic terror.

"Yes, yes," said Göthilda, gravely; "it is nothing to laugh at; but I will say nothing." And with these words she sprang out of the room, leaving Bror to guess what she meant, and herself guessing and wondering what could be the meaning of Bror's "very worst of all."

Ivar and Gerda talked about the future, and now and then cast searching glances back to the past, that they might settle their reckoning therewith.

"I have one request to make from you, my brother and sister," said Ivar to Hedvig and Augustin, a few days before the one fixed upon for the commencement of the voyage; "it has reference to a matter which I have upon my conscience, which just now has come into my memory, and which I reproach myself for having forgotten. But I have gone about as if in a cloud of selfish cares and concerns—I have been very foolish." Ivar was silent for a moment, and then continued—

"When, some years ago, I broke my leg at Upsala, I lodged with a gardener's widow, who lived, with her children, upon the income of a little garden, as well as by boarding and lodging students. She was a very agreeable old woman, and she paid as much attention to me, all the time I lay ill, as an actual mother could have done. I wish you had seen her, how really handsome she was, with her bright, gentle countenance, her quiet demeanor, and her pious heart, and her experience of life, from which the most cultivated might have learned something. She had three children; the eldest daughter, a lively, cheerful, and clever girl of about twenty, and two younger children, a son and a daughter, about thirteen or fourteen. Little Karin—so was the girl called—waited on me, and was an uncommonly sweet, intellectual, and thoughtful child. It amused me to give her and her brother (a promising young lad, with great ability for drawing) instruction in different things. The girl was in particular desirous of acquiring knowledge; she had great delight in reading and writing, and wrote verses, which were not bad. She used to bring me up my coffee in a morning, and always brought with her a bouquet of fresh flowers and fruit from the garden. I know not how it happened," continued Ivar, with tears in his eyes, "that this idyl in my life should just now come into my memory so fresh and bright, like a dewy flower; but it is indeed because the dew then lay on my own life, and the tempest had not then gone over it. This family became actually dear to me, and it was delightful to see the understanding which existed between the mother and children, and how, spite of their narrow circumstances, a certain elegance prevailed in their dwelling, and in their manner of life and action.

"After I left Upsala—I sent annually a little sum of money to the mother, to assist the boy, who wished to study, and to buy books for little Karin. I acknowledge, however, that for the last year I have neglected to do this—nay, I had almost forgotten those dear children, who yet deserved to be kept in remembrance. Dear Augustin! will you inquire after this family, and how the boy gets on, and, if it be necessary, supply him with that aid which I have hitherto neglected?—and you, Hedvig, will you take some notice of little Karin—let her have some work to do for you, and a few books? I assure you that you will like her—if I live, and things go well with me, I will soon repay to you this debt, and—if I do not—let it be one more among the many debts which I now owe to you."

Ivar's hands, which he extended to his brother and sister, were cordially grasped by them, and they cheerfully gave him the promise he wished. On this, he gave them still further information regarding the Ollonberge, for such was the name of the gardener's family.

"Ah!" continued he, "what great and beautiful plans I had at the time I became acquainted with them, for the improvement of my fellow-beings and myself;—how did I desire to elevate every thing and every body! But what a failure all this has been!"

"The seed which falls to the earth may in its own time become a large tree!" said Hedvig, smiling, full of consolation.

"God bless you for those beautiful words, my angel sister!" said Ivar; "yes, I believe that it may be so. I feel it—it is not all over with me yet; and that which has been, and that which now is before me—may become the passage to—a higher point of view."

"My ideas! exactly my own ideas!" exclaimed Augustin, as, smiling, he gave his brother a slap on the shoulder, and rose up. "I am not sure, brother dear, that you have not stolen them from me: but be easy, I shall not take you before the magistrate. I make you a present of them—I make you a present of them! Only adhere to them firmly."

The day before they set out on their journey was come; but storm and contrary wind had prevailed through the whole of it. The swift-sailing brig was obliged to wait in port. Toward evening, the wind somewhat abated. The captain of the brig expected it would change during the night, when it would become favorable, and he would immediately set sail.

It was now already late. The brothers and sisters had, for the last time for long, eaten their evening meal together.

The whole family was now assembled, excepting the new-married pair; they had, shortly after their marriage, made a journey to visit Uno's relations in the south of Sweden; after which they proposed taking a longer journey abroad.

At ten o'clock, Ivar and Gerda were to go on board, accompanied to the shore by their friends. David and Master Jarl were among the number.

The wind howled, and the rain beat against the window. Every one in the room was silent and gloomy. Thoughts of misfortune, like lofty billows, arose in the minds of many. Hedvig's glance sought that of Augustin, as if to ask counsel and consolation; but Augustin avoided meeting it, and walked up and down the room. All the more the storm increased without, and deeper grew the silence within the room.

No longer able to conceal her distress, Hedvig at length exclaimed—

"Brother and sister! there is yet time! you can give up this dreadful voyage. Listen to the storm without! and see—here it is calm. Think on all the dangers abroad! Think of our anxiety here at home. Think that we here could live happily together, or near to one another. Ah! consider well whether you can not give up this journey, and remain quiet in your own country, in your own home—with us!"

"No, no, we must travel!" replied Ivar and Gerda, with one voice.

Hedvig concealed her face in her hands and, against her will, an hysterical sob of anguish forced its way from her breast.

Gerda sprang up, beside herself, and threw herself at Hedvig's feet, embracing her knees, and weeping. Ivar did the same. They heaped upon Hedvig the most affectionate names, and prayed her to compose herself. Every thing was in a state of painful excitement.

The old count stood up.

"My children!" said he, in a strong, solemn voice, "let us pray!"

Every one was silent; every heart and every hand was uplifted; every eye was turned upon the old man, who, with clasped hands, prayed in a loud and cheerful voice:

"Almighty Lord God! thou who rulest over the storm and over the hearts of men, hear us! Look down upon these children and their foolish undertaking. Let the end of it be prosperous! And, let it be as it may, do thou give them thy blessing! Take them, Father, in thy powerful hand, and be to them safety in the storm. Conduct them safely to that foreign land across the sea, and conduct them home again in safety to their family, and to the old man who now prays for them. Let them shrink not in the hour of trial; and let thy Spirit, both in fair and adverse wind, and tempest, and in fair weather, on land or on the water, call to them that thou art the true haven, the true pilot, and that with thee no one is fatherless!" Hear us, for Jesus Christ's sake! Amen!"

"Amen!" was repeated by the whole family circle, with strong and tranquilized hearts.

"Amen!" repeated a strange voice, which hastily drew all eyes toward the door. And there, with the black cap drawn over his silver hair, his fine countenance, with roses on the cheek and animation in the eye, and heartfelt kindness in expression, stood little Dr. Lund, the teacher of the young people, "the dear father" of all.

He was immediately surrounded by them.

"Children," said the amiable old man, with grave kindness of tone, "I am come to see you! it was only yesterday that I heard by chance what was going on in this house, and I set off directly to see you, you two vagabonds, before you set off on your long voyage, and to express the thoughts of my heart. Do you hear! Was it right of you to forget your old friend in this way, and to let him sit there like a cipher that was good for nothing? Well! well! reasons? I thank you! I understand! 'not trouble,' 'not disturb,' aye, aye, it sounds very fine. But do you think that I am become so extremely old, that the heart begins to dry up in my breast? Confess, like good children, that you forgot me, and that was all the business. But see, you won't escape me for all that; and I am now come to accompany you a few steps on the way, and to give you something which shall accompany you much further. I know very well, children, that you, yourselves, have thought of taking with you the best of guides, but still it can do no harm if you take one also from an old friend, as the best gift and the best keep-sake which he can leave with you."

And with that he took out of his breast pocket a Bible, expensively bound, and gave it to the brother and sister, shaking hands with them heartily.

"If I were young," continued he with animation, "I would go with you to see the New World, and to make myself acquainted with all those sects and parties, and make a long list of them. Ye—e—e yes! things are not altogether right among the gentry over there! That I can see from here; and I would have preached to them—that I would! in particular about their being quarrelsome one with another. But look you, there is one thing I like them for, and that is the esteem which they have for the Scriptures! I have read in Tocqueville that even the American emigrant who builds his cabin in the wilderness—the poor cabin which hardly keeps out the wind and rain—always takes with him his Bible, his ax, and the newspapers. Look! that is all one needs on earth. It is provision for the inner man and the outward man, at the same time; and to see that, I would gladly sail across the sea. But, ah! I am old, and gray, I have only come up here to say farewell to you! New God bless you, children—sooner or later we shall meet again, and talk with one another about that new world, but that will be only—in the other world!"

Gerda bent gratefully over the hand of the beloved teacher, but he withdrew it, took her head between his two hands, and kissed her forehead.

A messenger came from the captain of the brig with the intelligence that the wind had become favorable, and that he intended, in about an hour, to set sail.

Soon after this, Ivar and Gerda, accompanied by their friends, were walking toward the harbor.

The rain had ceased—the heavens were clear; the wind was still strong, but it was a mild and fresh spring-wind. The stars looked forth from between the flying clouds, and Gøthilda, who, I know not how, had picked up some astrological phrases, saw good omens in the positions of the planetary signs. Every body's spirits cleared up a little. The wind and the weather have a remarkable influence upon us, sometimes.

David walked beside Gerda, a little apart from the rest.

"You take a long journey," said he, in a voice which was neither mild nor firm—"you will, I have no doubt, obtain success and laurels in that foreign country, a long way from us; but more faithful, more devoted friends than those whom you have here, will you never find—do not forget them in that foreign land!"

"Could I ever be able to forget my best friends, my brothers and sisters?" replied Gerda.

"But you have, perhaps, friends who love you more, more fervently than your brothers and sisters," returned David. He paused for a moment, and then continued, "I know some one who might have much to say on that subject, but whose tongue—whose hope is bound by the feeling that—he is not worthy of the object whom he loves; that he has nothing to offer but a heart full of admiration and devotion!"

Gerda's heart became warm as she heard these words, but she answered, resolutely, though kindly—

"Ah! it is beautiful to believe ourselves loved, especially by those whom we ourselves love and value. It is beautiful to live for one another here, in the world, as friends; and I do not know why men and women can not live more for each other in this way than they do. Pure friendship ought to make us happier with one another than any other feeling. I have experienced another feeling, which made me very unhappy, and from henceforth I will have nothing more to do with it. I will only live for friendship, and the fresh cheerful feelings which arise from it. Think on me as on a friend who heartily sympathizes in your weal and woe, who will rejoice to see you again, and to see you happy."

With this she gave her hand to David as if to take leave of him, and then, parting from him, joined herself to her brothers and sisters.

"Friendly and cool," thought the young man, and that cool friendliness wounded him deeply. "It is all one!" said he, talking to himself, "yet I like her, nevertheless!" and that fresh spring-wind in the human breast, the feeling of entire unselfishness and unpretending devotion, raised and strengthened his soul in that moment, and long afterward.

They were now in the harbor. The brig Freja already lay out in the bay; and lights gleamed from her through the darkness, and the waves splashed merrily round her sides, and the wind sung in her rigging. A boat waited on the shore, to take the brother and sister on board.

"Farewell! farewell!" said the deeply-agitated Ivar. "Oh, my brothers and sisters! and you, Hedvig, if I return, as I hope to do, a better and a happier man, it will be through you and for your sake."

The last words of love, the last broken parting salutation was spoken. The brothers and sisters separated. Hedvig and Augustin, however, accompanied them on board.

"Take care of her, take care of her!" besought Hedvig, as she laid Gerda's hand in that of the good-tempered captain's wife, "she is so young, and now, so solitary!"

Shortly after this the brig hoisted sail, and the Freja flew dancing over the waves before the roaring wind. It looked fresh and beautiful.

The brothers, and sisters, and their friends, stood upon the shore and looked after the white, flying sails; but the darkness and the wind soon hid them from their sight, and now storm-clouds covered the heavens; again, violent gusts of wind were heard, and heavy drops of rain fell.

"As they have brewed, so must they bake!" grumbled General Herkules, half aloud, and looked so dangerous, thought Bror, that he did not dare to come within six ells of him.

Göthilda scolded Master Jari, who would say something in derision of astrology, to enliven her—of course.

Hedvig walked silently between Augustin and Dr. Lund, who spoke cheerfully and consolingly to her. He saw how much she needed it, and great was the value that he set upon this sister-soul.

Through the whole night, and for eight-and-forty hours, the storm continued, and great was the disquiet in the Dalberg family. After that, satisfactory and consolatory letters were received from the voyagers, and the weather became calm and beautiful.

In the home it was now also calm, calmer than it had been for a long time. But Hedvig, sister Hedvig, seemed changed, and when Augustin, whose observant eye this could not escape, said one day—

"Now, we ought to be contented; Hedvig, and amuse and enliven ourselves a little. Will you not go to the new theater this evening to see Torslow, and Mrs. Erikson?" Hedvig replied, "Don't be uneasy, Augustin, but I am not able to do it. I fear—I believe that I am about to have some serious illness."

Hedvig's anticipations were right. She had long borne the sorrows and disquietudes of others; long had exerted herself beyond her strength for her beloved ones, forgetful of herself; they now were saved, and she herself gave way.

It is often so.

NEW PAGE AND NEW SCENE.

OH! all ye silent, holy healing powers of nature and the human heart; unseen, unknown fountains of another Nile which swell the eternal flood of goodness and mercy, fructifying the desert fields of life—secret benefactors! how beautiful to have known you, to know you; how pleasant to be able to talk to you, to be allowed, like a bird in God's spring, to sing about this, its liberating breeze, its sun, its odor of flowers!

And this I am able to do to-day.

A year and somewhat more had passed since that moment when the brothers and sisters stood upon the shore, and with heavy hearts had said farewell to the brother and sister on the sea, and sorrowfully had returned into their comparatively empty and silent home in the city, where Hedvig was soon laid on a bed of sickness, which she did not leave for many weeks.

When we again see them it is in the country, beneath a bright blue sky and green trees, in a little open carriage, which rolls easily along the legendary shore of the Mälar Lake.

In the carriage sat Hedvig and Augustin, Bror and Göthilda. By their side rides General Herkules, upon his black steed, at a magnificent gallop.

Hedvig was very pale, and looked weak, and her kind eyes shone brighter than common, while they gazed upon the glittering waves and green trees, and the nodding grass, and the flowers by the wayside, and then again upon her brother and sister, who seemed to have some private understanding with winds, and waves, and grass, and flowers, in order to induce them to revive and welcome most kindly the dear and still feeble sister, and to show themselves to her in their most beautiful guise, and they seemed to have promised to do so. And a dark cloud in the west disappeared at the same time, driven away by Göthilda's dark glances.

Augustin looks diplomatic. It is he who has invited his brother and sisters to take their drive, but has kept its purpose a mystery; and now Bror and Göthilda sit and wonder and guess, while Augustin exhibits an impenetrable mien, which is yet, however, now and then lighted up by a treacherous smile, betraying thus much, that the drive has a somewhat unusual, and—not disagreeable object. Uncle Herkules, Göthilda suspects, knows something more of it than the others, because he is quite in an unusual state of excitement, and makes hostile demonstrations against every old cow, and frightens every little pig which he meets on the way half out of his senses. And when the carriage stopped, because Augustin wished to point out some prospect to Hedvig, he rode up to the carriage, and let Göthilda pat Svartklipper's nose, feed him with bread, and treat herself with some span new names, derived from I know not what dictionary, but not that of the Swedish Academy.

I will, in the mean time, lift up a little corner of the curtain which Augustin has let down before his friends; but, first of all, we will take a little flight, that is to say, I and my reader—N.B. If the latter will accompany me.

Many people have remarked it, and we have remarked it, that the Swedes have a very decided love for country life. As soon as a Swedish man or woman finds himself or herself in easy circumstances, or has any property left them, he or she looks after "a place in the country"—great or small, according to circumstances—where he may enjoy his life, during his days of rest, or likewise live the whole year and ever during his lifetime. And, as if in sympathy with the disposition of its children, Sweden, perhaps, more than any other country, gives occasion for this enjoyment, and affords every where such situations. "The Swedish landscape," as the Countess Ida Hahn-Hahn has observed, "is beauty in detail." Every where throughout this country may be found a large picture in a small one; every where a pretty and picturesque compendium of that which constitutes a beautiful landscape in water and land, mountain and valley, wood and plain. And every where, on the shores of rivers and lakes, at the feet of wood-crowned mountains, may be seen, looking forth, well-built country houses. It is true that there also are often seen proud castles and low, gray cottages, but the rural dwellings to which we refer—the habitations of the middle-class—are quite the most general, and look, as they are seen peeping from amid green leafy woods, which mirror themselves in the clear waters, very pretty and inviting. "There is something comfortable, familiar in it," said a noble Swedish artist, who, after a quarter of a century's sojourn in Italy, returned to his fatherland, and compared the landscape of the two countries. Every such country dwelling resembles a beautiful idyl.

Idyls! We know that there are people who esteem them very lightly. But have they understood them? Every where on the face of the earth, in nature, in history, do the pastoral and the heroic life go hand in hand, and from the earliest days of the world until its latest, flourishes upon life's agitated waters, or in its parched desert, an island, a verdant oasis, in which are fresh, sweet springs of water, shadowy palm-trees, and eternally blossoming young roses. In its shadow stood the cradle of mankind, and its best and holiest joys always blossom there—yesterday, to-day, to-morrow! The joy of parents—the love of brothers and sis ters—that other love: the first kiss—the last repose in the beams of the evening sun! This idyl is family-life. And eternally shall the lamb maintain its place, among the figures of the golden age, beside the eagle and the lion.

We know very well that there are in actual life very wearisome idyls—idyls to make us yawn—idyls to weep over—idyls, in a word, to be prayed against in the litany. We ourselves have written of such, and, which is worse, have experienced them also. These, however, bear the same relation to the true, as—any thing else which is false does to the true, as the world of shadows, or Tartarus, to the Elysian fields; and between these, human beings have, earlier or later, their free choice.

But we return to our family party. Hedvig partook in a high degree of her countrymen's taste for nature, and for rural life; and during her many years' constant city life, she had silently longed, yes, on many a spring and summer day had actually pined, to get out into the country. To live familiarly with nature, as with a dear friend, a sister or brother—to see the flowers bloom one after another, and the butterflies flutter over them—to sit, during the warm summer days, beneath green trees, and to hear the birds twitter and the billows break upon the shore—to see the dew upon the grass, the crimson light of evening—to see the mists steal over the slumbering earth—to feel the freshness of the morning—to see the happy creatures enjoying life in a fresh and peaceful landscape; yes, even those rural occupations which employ and refresh human life in the country—all these were thoughts and images which Hedvig would not and did not dare to think of, because they seemed to her too beautiful, too captivating; because she knew that the circumstances of the household did not allow her such a happiness, and she would not utter a wish, which could only excite in Augustin's mind the regret that he could not satisfy it. She therefore was silent; and when the captivating images arose and visioned before her fancy a charming landscape, she chased them away, and, as it were, roused herself with other thoughts and occupations, which could employ the moment and the day.

Augustin read the depths of her soul, and when, after Hedvig's illness, she continued to suffer from nervous weakness and dejection, and when her own earnest endeavors, and the arrival of a new spring had not changed her condition, and the physician looked at his wit's end, Augustin never rested, but rode out with the general round the city, and looked and sought about till he found that—which we shall very soon see.

The carriage rolled on, and uncle Herkules galloped; the cloud sunk, the sun and the waves shone brightly. Augustin smiled;

Bror and Gôthilda guessed and wondered in company as to what could be the object of the drive, and the probable mystery which veiled it, and said many of those prodigiously stupid things which, among friends and members of a family, excite more hearty laughter than the most select wit can do.

The carriage now thundered over a bridge, and immediately afterward fragrant birches gave forth their odor, and "Now we are there!" exclaimed Augustin, as the carriage drew up before a light-red two-storied wooden house, upon the roof of which green grass grew, and butterflies fluttered around the large yellow stars of the stonecrop; it was an idyl on the roof.

Augustin sprang out of the carriage and received Hedvig in his arms. She was rather pale, as if from delightful emotion.

"Now look around you, Hedvig!" said he, "because this is yours."

It was a beautiful June day, at midsummer. The lilacs were in full bloom, and large bushes of lilac, and white lilacs, surrounded the pretty dwelling—the dwelling with the idyl on the roof, toward which Augustin conducted Hedvig. Their fragrance was delightful.

"Ah, Augustin! What is this?" said the excited and overjoyed Hedvig; "it is like a fairy-tale, so beautiful, so charming!"

"And I fancy that some good genius has got something ready for us to eat, within," said Augustin, as they entered, through the open glass door, into a spacious parlor, where a table was spread with fruit and flowers, and brown earthenware bowls of curds. The good genius, however, stood at the door, glancing in stealthily, and setting out her chest and drawing in her chin, and laughing in her sleeve, with moist and flashing eyes, and—we hope that our reader recognizes her as the faithful sympathizer in Hedvig's sorrow; her nurse during sickness, and the sympathizer in her joy, and the preparatrix (if we may coin this new word), who had cleaned the whole dwelling, set every thing in order, spread the table, gathered the flowers, and prepared every thing for the reception of the new proprietress, our respectable and clever Maja.

And now Augustin laid before Hedvig the contract which made her for five years the manager and ruler of little Birch Island; and acquainted her at the same time with the advancement and increase of salary which placed him, by help of uncle Herkules, in the condition to afford her and himself this increase to the happiness of life.

And then bending his knee, in joke, he delivered to her the contract, and said,

"Your highness will be pleased to regard me as your prime minister; and to accept General Herkules as your commander-in-chief. He promises to defend your feathered subjects from hawks and foxes, and to provide you with prey both from the dominion of the wood and the water. He will settle himself down here as your defender. Göthilda becomes your principal lady of the household; and Bror and I shall come over every Sunday in order to receive your commands, and to provide now and then an assistant corps, to clear away from the garden and the larder all superfluous provisions."

Hedvig's tears fell silently during this harangue, and when it was ended she could only throw her arms around her brother's neck and kiss him with heartfelt affection. And in the same way she kissed them all afterward. She had no words to speak. Her heart was too full. "It was too feeling-full," thought Maja, as she stood looking on, and cried and laughed, and came at length forward, and offered her hand to Hedvig, and turned away her face and laughed, and then set off, like a tempest, to look after the asparagus and potatoes which Hannah was to boil for supper.

Bror reminded them of a collation, which General Herkules swore was the first rational word that had been spoken all the evening, and Hedvig began to exert herself as the hostess. The brothers and sister, however, declared that, in consequence of her newly-acquired dignity, she must fold her hands on her lap, and allow herself to be waited upon by the others; in accordance with which principle, Bror, wherever she went, followed her with an armed chair and her large covered basket, and Göthilda with footstools and cushions. Hedvig was obliged, with laughter, to drive away her attendant spirits; and Göthilda prophesied from this violence much mischief to the future prosperity of the kingdom. In this way the state of mind became considerably less "feeling-full;" and that was good for Hedvig. Augustin quartered the oranges; uncle Herkules produced two bottles of bishop, and enacted the butler. Hedvig was obliged to answer to the toast as the queen of Birch Island.

After they had refreshed themselves, they went to look around the place. Augustin gave Hedvig his arm, while the others, with General Herkules, scampered off with renewed power around mountain and meadow. For there was a high mountain upon the island—a high, proper, and very remarkable granite mountain, upon which was still to be seen the ruins of a castle where a remarkable lady of the Folkunga* dynasty had resided—one of those magnificent ladies which the history of every country can show, among which in that of Sweden, Christina Gyllenstjerna holds so noble and so distinguished a place. This mountain was called Dunder Berg, or the Thunder Mountain, because in the fourteenth century a thundering war had been carried on against the people of Estland, and the lady of the castle, who fought against them boldly and victoriously, was called the Lady of the Dunder Berg. And it was said that people now often saw at night a white female shape, with helmet and spear, stand upon the mountain, and look over the plain; and this they said was the lady of the Dunder Berg, but that she was not dangerous excepting to the enemy; and that she was, even when she was alive, a mild tempered woman, although as strong as a man in the hour of danger. Göthilda determined to take her as her pattern.

While uncle Herkules, with his young companions, clambered up the mountain, Augustin conducted Hedvig along the shore, and let her calmly enjoy the beauty of nature and of the evening hour. The pine-trees and the birches, which in picturesque groups constituted the principal wood of the island, sighed softly to the evening breezes, which seemed to whisper to them "good night," before they themselves went to rest among the shadows of evening. The sun sunk brilliantly below the waters of the Malar Lake; the fishes struck out circles in the clear mirror of the water; the bells which the cows carried were heard from the meadows, and the grasshopper sang its song in the tall grass; the lilies of the valley and the lilacs, wafted their odor; bats fluttered softly through the calm air; cheerful sounds of men and animals were heard now and then across land and water, speaking of a quiet, festive, natural life.

Hedvig had never experienced any thing like it.

"How beautiful it is! How glorious it is!" said she, again and again. "And is it indeed true that so much that is beautiful may be found on the earth? And is it indeed possible that I—shall so often—so constantly enjoy it? Oh, Augustin! I feel myself very unworthy. Have I really permission to become so rich—so happy, while so many, many live in darkness and poverty?"

"And this world's riches ought, and should be possessed by all!"

"Yes; ought, should! I think so too!" said Augustin; "and it casts a gloom over the mind, when we think how far we are from this general good. But the sunny side of the present time shows, however, some tendency to improve this. And we, Hedvig, may, even in our little sphere, be able to do something toward it. Only, first of all, my beloved sister, become healthy, strong, and happy, and we will then think and talk together about the means of making other people happy as well as ourselves. At present, however, your first duty toward your neighbor—which is before all others—to those who are nearest to you—is, that you take care of your health. Look there—under the alders by the shore is an excellent bath—that shall be your pool of Bethesda; there you shall every day gain new strength!”

* This dynasty reigned in Sweden from 1250 to 1264; its founder was Folke Filbyter, a rich and powerful nobleman. Estland is one of the present Russian provinces of the Baltic. Estland, Liffland, and Curland belonged formerly to Sweden.

And now Augustin continued to lay out plans for Hedvig's immediate adoption, during which he reconciled her to her own happiness by glances at the future, and the hope that it also might be extended to others—Ivar and Gerda, Uno and Engel, the whole family circle; and lastly, all mankind came into the picture, which Augustin, with a free hand, and vivid, playful fancy, sketched out.

While the brother and sister thus embraced the human race in their hearts, the evening heaven drew a girdle of flame around the vernal green earth, and the dew began to fall. Uncle Herkules, with his volunteers, returned from their visit to the lady of the Dunder Berg, and begged for supper, because the lady up yonder had made her visitors both thirsty and hungry, and she was a confoundedly stingy old woman, who entertained them only with stones and briars!

They all returned to the house; and just as they entered into the garden-parlor, Stolt, in his own tall person, placed upon the table a dish of splendid asparagus, and Maja stood in the door-way with one of steaming potatoes. With these dishes, new-laid eggs, and curds, the cream of which was just in its most delicate state, they made an excellent meal.

But its very best dish, its best wine, was yet to come. For there are many occasions in our life in which our Lord, like a good housekeeper, pleases himself by heaping up our festive board with unexpected gifts, and leaves the best wine till the last. They were still at the table, when the sound of horses' feet was heard without, and very soon after the kind David hastily entered, quite warm, and gay, and earnest, with letters and newspapers from America.

It was now a long time since any such had been received from the traveling relatives, and as yet they had not been altogether of a joyful character. Adverse circumstances of various kinds had tried the young seekers after happiness, and had exercised their courage and perseverance. They had not, however, given way, but had kept their hope, and now hope had changed itself into reality, and this post communicated the tidings. But before the letters were opened, David besought that he might read something aloud from an enormous American newspaper, and from this something we will communicate a few short extracts, because all readers can not feel the same interest in the whole as the family did.

“Within the last few weeks,” said the American paper, which was already six weeks old when it reached Sweden, “every body here has been talking of a young Scandinavian brother and sister who have sung the songs of their native land in our city. This Swedish brother and sister awoke, as well by their songs as by their own individual character, an interest and an admiration often amounting to rapture.”

Now followed a description of their persons and their musical skill, which we do not think it necessary to give.

“But that which can not be described,” continued the American paper, “and yet which perhaps is most peculiarly attractive in the young artists' appearance, is the fresh cordiality, the affectionate spirit, which characterize their manners and their songs.

“These melodies of theirs go to our heart, before we know the words. They come to us like fresh breezes out of their northern pine-forests, where the linea* blossoms at the base of the primitive mountains, and seems to bear deep legendary memories, and the most beautiful idyls of life upon their wings. These melodies are not the offspring of art and science. They are derived from Nature's own breast, out of the people's own, genuine, loving, foreboding life, and bear the stamp of an inspiration, which, in its original power, purifies and elevates the heart of the civilized world.

“The words of these songs, the young artists say, are often composed by themselves. And it has been remarked, that they never have for their subject love, in its more confined signification, in its transitory revelation as passion or languishment. That which they sing, which they enthusiastically extol, is freedom; love of the human race and of country; family affection; friendship; fidelity; in one word, every pure, lofty, and holy affection on the earth. It is piety, in the highest signification of the word, which they glorify, and which is the inspiration of their songs. And never have more beautiful flowers sprung from a nobler soil.

“Such a song as theirs we should expect from the children of the far north, where, from the earliest times, states and families were free and holy societies; where the word we, in the Swedish tongue, signified at the same time a sacred room and a dwelling house; where the pillars that supported the seat of the parents of a family were adorned with images of the gods.

“But these songs from the old world are not strangers in the new. By no means. They are at home among us; because here also are family ties sacred; and those songs which, with the power of melody, strengthen the foundation-pillars of society, meet, therefore, among us, also, with so warm a sympathy, and revive the feelings of our relationship to the Scandinavian people. In conclusion, we can not deny ourselves the pleasure of presenting here a little poem sung by the brother and sister, to an altogether fresh and heart-touching melody, and with a cordiality of expression which makes us think some dear reality is the foundation for it, and which was encored at the concert of yesterday. At our request, we have been kindly furnished with a copy, to present it to our readers.

"THE SISTER."

On life's pathway calm and silent,
Heedless that the world should gaze;
Strong in love, in love untiring,
On she goes nor seeketh praise.

She is not a wife nor mother:
She bears not a lofty name;
And the world's high seats of honor
As her own she doth not claim.

But saw ye within her bosom
As she goes in stillness on,—
For her brethren's joy and sorrow
Nobler heart there beateth none.

Proud men boast of all their greatness,
Of their honor, pomp and show;
She asks but to be consoled—
She will only good bestow.

And as on she goes in meekness,
Fruits of her good works appear;
And she looks around to question
If she can not dry some tear.

If she can not ease some burden;
Can not give some toiler rest;
Can not light some spark of gladness
In some mourner's weary breast.

She is glad that no man calls her
His within the wide world's space,
That to all she may be kindred,
All within her heart embrace.

Many a wanderer, life-bewildered,
Hath she led from out the maze,
Then returned to household duties,
Where is no reward nor praise.

But say! is not her lot the brightest
On the earth, with soul serene,
Like the snowy-pinioned angels,
Doing good, by all unseen?

Yet! if by her virtues kindled
Who she is you fain would hear,
Know you that it is—a sister;
That it is our sister dear!"

It is difficult—and it is not difficult, under all circumstances—to imagine the feelings of our brothers and sisters during the reading of this, and Hedvig's in particular, during the last stanza when the eyes of all were directed to her, and after which every one embraced her, repeating the last words, "that it is our sister dear."

For the rest, have you seen persons, while they were listening to some relation, become pale, and shiver as if they were cold, while their eyes flashed warm and tearful, and the breast heaved and sunk to the beating of the heart—if you have, you know how the brothers and sisters looked as they stood listening, nay, drinking in with their ears and all their senses, the glad, the happy tidings.

And now the letters were opened, which strengthened them still more, and breathed love and hope and the most heartfelt gladness and gratitude.

Ivar and Gerda were prepared to set out on a long and triumphant career; and proposed not to return to their native land until they had earned sufficient means for a life of affluence.

"If things go on, as it now seems as if they would," wrote Gerda, "we shall return to you in three years."

Ivar sent over a check for money to pay off the debt which had been incurred for the journey, and he hoped soon to be able to send more.

It was late when Hedvig went to rest in her new, excellent chamber, with its view over the lake, and upon the blooming lilacs. And when she lay down, two of those singing birds which fill the summer nights of Sweden with their cheerful warbling, began to sing in the bushes outside her window with their full, joyous, caressing tones. Hedvig thought of Ivar and Gerda, of their words and their songs; she thought of the goodness of God and of human beings, and as an angel in the blessed land sleeps, wearied with love and joy, softly fanned by the wings of sister-angels, so slumbered Hedvig. Her sleep, however, was a light trance in which the consciousness is not lost. It resembled the transparent dusk which spread itself without over the flowery meadows. The remembrance of the evening just spent and the thoughts of the morrow, passed through her soul; her heart swelled softly with a feeling of indescribable satisfaction, which, like a magnetic stream, stole through her limbs with repose, and the invigoration of health. The midnight passed on calm and bright—as is a midsummer night in the north with its light bridge of shadow between the crimson of evening and the crimson of morning; its silent angels strewing dew and poppies over the earth;—and the little birds outside Hedvig's window they sang, sang, sang deliciously through the whole of the night.

Thus rested Hedvig the first night at the Birch Island. And Augustin, the good, warm-hearted brother, think you that his rest was less pleasant?—

"It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Many blessed nights and pleasant days succeeded these calm, beautiful days of summer, during which Hedvig was renovated, both body and soul, and during which, in the quiet, familiar intercourse with nature, she awoke to a feeling of the serenity and happiness of existence, such as she had never before experienced, nay, such as she could scarcely have believed possible on earth. Neither did she long any more to sleep away the time and the years: she will awake; will be right wakeful and lively in order to live strongly—to work and to enjoy.

There are two ways of living with nature. The one is universally known and practiced. People walk among the green fields with their heads high in the air and talk about the weather; they gather flowers, smell them, throw them away; they take their meals in the open air—often with a great deal of trouble to those who have to arrange and tire themselves to death with the necessary preparations for the "fêtes champêtres;"—may go out on the water; fish, hunt, sing; look about them, enjoy themselves, yawn—do I not know? And—people economize; they sow, they reap, they rear calves, shear their sheep; fatten pigs; feed chickens; bleach linen; gather berries; dry vegetables; pickle meat; make preserves, and such like. And all this is good. Honi soit qui mal y pense. I myself have done the same.

But still there is another mode of living with nature, too little known and too little practiced for the happiness of mankind. And it was this in particular which now made Hedvig, as it were, begin a new life.

Her spirit was, like all true northern spirits, of an inquiring and investigating kind. She liked to seek to the origin, to the fountain-head, to the innermost of everything. And in her intercourse with nature, this desire of investigation became a source of delight to her. From this cause there was now a new and unexpected point of union between herself and Augustin; and subjects for common activity and enjoyment. They studied together the life and changes of the vegetable and insect kingdom; and every plant, every flower, every little winged or creeping creature around them, must reveal to them its name, its life, and the history of its development. To see the great in the small became to them a daily delight. The remarkable analogies which they discovered between the life of nature and human life, the little and the great, led them to a still deeper understanding of connection between the two, and to anticipations of the great harmonies of life, those which are and those which shall be when discords cease. Hedvig had a peculiar turn of mind toward this view of life, and she often surprised Augustin by her glances into these depths, while he enlightened her on the subject of the practical sciences.

In this way there arose between the brother and sister a still more inward conviction of reciprocal feeling. They became more and more every thing to each other; and still more happy with each other, while they increasingly became that which human beings ought to be on earth—an intelligent link between nature and its Creator. And not intelligent only. The delight of this brother and sister would have been incomplete without warm gratitude to the Giver. The joy of adoration is to the intelligent the highest feeling of happiness.

General Herkules was in the country, completely in his "esse." He hunted, fished, planted, laid out new walks with Hedvig—taught Gøthilda to ride, and rode about himself and made acquaintance with the country and the country people, who often left their occupations in harvest-field and meadow, to go on the high-road, and have a moment's talk with "the old gentleman on the black horse," who was so knowing and so cheerful.

Gøthilda, who found in the house-keeping business in the country a proper field for her activity, became, through these employments, good-humored; improved in person and complexion; was evidently altered for the better, nay, had become really handsome—"in the arabesque style," Bror maintained. Her greatest delight was in the domestic animals; to look after them, to see them fed, and to tame them. There was in particular a little colony of fourteen young pigs, leaping young things, joyful with the excess of life—every one of them with a curl in its tail!—And you can not believe what lively, amusing animals they are.

When the cadets came out on a Sunday, there was "frisches Leben," on Birch Island. Then was there scampering over mountain and hill, both by land and water; then was there foraging among the gooseberry-bushes—then a raising of intrenchments on Dunder Berg; then a skirmishing, both with little pigs, and human beings, and then—laughter!—General Herkules himself became a boy with "the boys" (Gøthilda reckoned among them), who, however, never failed in proper respect.

In the meantime, the young gentlemen at Carlberg, mounted with prodigious strides from class into another—with actual giant strides.

Uno and Engel—whose estate lay exactly across the lake, probably a mile and half from Birch Island—Hedvig frequently saw them after their return home, and always saw them affectionate, kind, doing good, and amiable in every way. But Engel was not as gay as she had been formerly; and yet nothing evidently was wanting to her happiness. The joy of a mother had also fallen to her share, and nobody saw her little boy without exclaiming, "What a sweet child!" and "how like his mother he is!" or "how like his father he is!" or also, "how like he is both to father and mother!"

Good tidings continued to come across the sea from the brother and sister in America. In a word, every thing went on happily and well for our family. An almost cloudless heaven vaulted the days of Hedvig and Augustin, and in the sketches of their quiet and happy life we have given the principal features of their life for more than four years. Yet—one feature is still wanting.

There is a time in our life when we are almost exclusively occupied by individual endeavors and suffering; when we merely labor for ourselves and those who are nearest to us. Another time also comes when we have in some measure accomplished this, and are in a state of peace, or at least of quietness. It is then the time when the thinking and the good man looks observantly around him into social life, and sees how he can labor in the best way for the great, neglected family-circle there, and make it a participator in the good things which he has obtained.

We have long since seen the inward tendency of Hedvig and Augustin in this direction.

The time was now come when they could put some of their plans in operation. An unexpected legacy increased their property, and they could now still better gratify their desire to assist others, and to make them happy.

Were they rewarded for this? did they not become involved, by the needs of others, beyond their own means? would they not for this, sacrifice much of their own quiet and comfort—much of their faith in mankind, their hope in the ultimate success of what is good?

We have seen writers praise the bliss of “playing at Providence,” toward our unfortunate fellow-creatures, and heard them represent the pure happiness, delight and joy of so doing. But do not believe them, young, warm-hearted, human beings. If thou goest out into the world with this belief, thou wilt find thyself deceived. Rather believe honest Claudius, when he says that, “he who honestly goes out to help his fellow-creatures, must often submit to be himself a man of sorrow.” Believe this, and—go notwithstanding.

Upon this path people have generally three stations. In the first place they start forth warmly and blindly, like a steam-engine, impelled forward by the youthful fire of the heart, and believing that all will succeed, and that every human being will aid, because all, and especially all the poor, are in reality excellent—that every thing that is evil will be overcome, through the power of good, and that man himself has the power to do all good.

The next is different. They no longer believe all this; they have stumbled upon obstinacy, weakness, stupidity, unreasonableness, unwillingness to aid, of many kinds, they have been mistaken in their own, as well as in other people's power;—they have had bitter experiences; and in the first place they have felt painful astonishment, afterward anger, perhaps hatred; and lastly, weariness. Yes, at this station there is a way-mark called weariness (a sorrowful word), and many people stop there.

Many are there, however, who nevertheless travel on afresh; show their courage, their patience as one who never wears out, and with a “God with us!” go forth anew to combat, to conquer, to accomplish their course.

We admire, we deify the world-conquering heroes and geniuses. But there is something greater than conquering the world. It is to keep ourselves pure amid the impurity of the world; amid the daily combats with enemies in our own breast, and enemies without; to go on conquering, ascending, free, giving freedom, and—yet remaining humble. Silent, unknown, unseeing conquerors, whom the world knows not, but of whom it is written that the angels of heaven rejoice.

This is great, divine—perhaps impossible for the children of men. But to approach it, is possible.

And those who honestly endeavor to do so, earnestly labor for this purpose, they—with all their faults—deserve to be called the children of God.

Augustin and Hedvig did this.

We have said that four years rolled on in calmness and joy in the Dalberg family. But as any one traveling through a beautiful though monotonous tract of country would stand still now and then to observe any unusual object, so must we beseech the reader to grant us his attention to some points in the four happy years upon which we intend to direct our telescope. We assure him that they are really every one of them romantic points, and every one of them to be met with in the living-life of every-day existence.

First Point.

One fine day Bror stood before Götthilda, and said quite abruptly—

“I am going—to England.”

The before-mentioned Egyptian darkness was very visible in Götthilda's eyes, as they opened themselves wide—very wide, as she said with astonishment—

“No!—really!”

“Really.”

“In earnest?”

“The most serious earnest.”

“But why?”

“Because I have done—a stupid thing, and must try to mend it.”

“A stupid thing? You, Bror? I can not believe that.”

“Ay, ay, though, it is so. I have let myself be made a fool of by that great folly—love.”

“Ah! then we have ‘the very worst of all!’”

"Yes, and love has fooled me into making a declaration of love."

"Seraphina, Seraphina Woltman!" interrupted Göthilda, and clapped her hands.

"Yes, but, Göthilda, it is only to you that I have told this. And nobody else in the world must—yet awhile—know about it."

"Oh! you know that I am as silent as an Egyptian catacomb."

"I know it. And therefore I tell you all this, and because you must talk with Seraphina, and be her friend while I am away. Yes—I am very fond of her, and have long liked her, the angel-good girl. But it was only within the last few weeks that I became rightly acquainted with my own feelings toward her. I have often puzzled myself about them, and fancied that it was only warm sympathy, friendship. but——"

"And she—was she indeed without feeling?—I know what she felt, Bror. I have read her heart on that subject long since. She was very fond of you."

"Ah! I hardly ventured to think so. But so it is; that good, pure heart is actually—mine. And I assure you, Göthilda, that I never could believe that any woman could fancy me. I don't understand it."

"And I, my brother, assure you that I understand it perfectly. Well, but, so far, I see nothing horrible in this story, nothing to quit your country for."

"That now comes. One day, when my heart was full to overflowing at the sight of that good, dear girl's patience with her father and her aunt, the secret burst out, and I told her all that I felt toward her. Her answer made me as happy as a fool, or rather as a wise man. Because the affection of such a good girl is the highest happiness a man can wish for himself. But old Woltman had heard us. He came out; and there was a scene:—Heaven have mercy! He upbraided me with my poverty, with my feelings towards his daughter, which he considered a piece of folly. I endeavored to preserve myself calm, and to reply without anger, as was right I should do. He softened down, and said a few coldly polite things. We separated without having properly made a declaration of either war or peace; but since that moment my position in the family has become actually intolerable. Seraphina and I are watched and spied after perpetually by the old man and his sister, and I never see Seraphina without her eyes being red with crying. In consequence of this, I have taken my determination, I have given notice to quit Woltman, but have offered to manage for him an important affair with a large English house, with which I am intending to enter into connection. Old Woltman received my proposal very well, and seemed quite pleased to get rid of me in such a respectable way."

"I mentioned the affair to-day to uncle

Herkules, who immediately proposed for me to take young Jarl with me!"

"Le diamant brute!" exclaimed Göthilda, "and what is he to do in foreign countries?"

"Study architecture, to which he will devote himself, and the knowledge of which is very small in this country," replied Bror. "Uncle maintains, besides, that the lad is getting quite spoiled with the home education he receives here with his adopted mother, and that he must go into the world, if he is to turn out good for any thing. Uncle has offered him a very liberal supply of money for his journey and his maintenance abroad for three years. And I shall, at the beginning, be with him, like a sort of Mentor to the young Telemachus. And that I will very willingly be, because I like the lad, and shall find it very entertaining to have him for a traveling companion. And thus we have arranged the whole affair, but——"

"And all that without telling me; without asking my permission!" exclaimed Göthilda.

"I beg your offended honor graciously to pardon. I came just now to solicit——"

"And if I forbid!"

"Yes, then indeed I must run away rather than you should do so. Seriously Göthilda, I can not any longer remain here in this difficulty; I must endeavor to obtain for myself a fair position in life; and, one way or another, sufficient property, so that I may some day offer Seraphina a life free from care, a comfortable home, and for this a chance is offered to me through this English house of business. Perhaps, in a few years I may be able to return! The old fellow may keep his money to himself. I can do without his gold, and provide for myself by my own hand."

"King David was a little man," remarked Göthilda; "Napoleon was a little man; Sweden's Engelbrekt, and Charles XII., and King Sverre of Norway, were also little fellows; and many other good men, I fancy. And I do not at all doubt but that my little brother will get on and become a great man, in his own way,

"But—but"—and here the expression of fun in Göthilda's countenance gave place to one beyond all measure tragic—"but don't you think that it is rather wrong to leave me in this way? Have you only feelings and thoughts for Seraphina?" Göthilda wept.

"You have Augustin, and you have Hedvig here—and you have me also, although I am at a little distance from you," said Bror, consolingly, while he embraced her—"and afterward I shall come again."

"Yes, to be married, and perhaps to desert me for ever!" exclaimed Göthilda.—

"Ah, that detestable love! I hate it from the bottom of my heart. Never did it bring any thing but trouble and misfortune into the world, and takes from me all my dearest friends. I wish that it were hanged!"

Bror laughed at Gôthilda's desperation, and then, taking her hand tenderly—

"But before I set off, I must have one thing cleared up; I must know what it is that my Gôthilda has had on her mind for some time, for something I am sure there is—that I can see."

"Yes—something there is!" said Gôthilda, as she bowed down her face to her hands, and her temples became crimson, and the veins swelled with the ascending blood.

"But what is it, Gôthilda? What is it, my own little sister? I will know it!" said her brother caressingly.

"Ah! I can never—never tell it to you!"

"You must! Else I shall believe that my poor little Gôthilda suffers from an—unhappy love."

"Unhappy love!" exclaimed Gôthilda, and proudly raised her head, and shook the dark curls from her forehead, while her eyes flashed. "Ah, you love-filled—nay, love-crazed men, I will call you—you can not think that there is any other misfortune, any other suffering, than 'unhappy love!' Love!—pretty love it is that I have! No, Bror, that which causes my unhappiness—that which causes my sorrow, is—hatred. I hate—I hate so burningly, so terrifically, so horribly, so immeasurably, so to the death, to—"

She stopped, and Bror, almost terrified at her expression, stepped back, and then burst forth with astonishment—

"But whom, whom then, in heaven's name, whom do you hate?"

"The Emperor of Russia!"

"Are you mad, Gôthilda?"

"No; I am both sane and rational, and it is not worth while for you to look at me in such a consternation. I am sane, and I know what I am saying and what I mean. I hate the Emperor of Russia and all his people; and I wish them all the evil in the world for the evil that they did to Sweden. And never, never will I marry a Russian subject. No, never! I will die first!"

"But you are gone stark mad, Gôthilda. Who thinks of marrying you to a Russian subject?"

"Ay—uncle. I have discovered—no matter how—that he has the intention of marrying me to Jarl Hœrkules. But Jarl I hate, because he is a Russian subject, and always takes the part of the Russians and the Russian Emperor against me. And I believe him capable of marrying me only that he may carry me off to Siberia, and there tease me to death. Now uncle is, as we know, very resolute; and I have given him the power to decide my fate. But I am resolved also—at least in this affair. And you will see, Bror, that some great misfortune will come out of this history. It will never end well!"

It was impossible for Bror to avoid smiling at Gôthilda's hatred, and at her gloomy prophecies; and he joked about the "horrible intended tragedy," till Gôthilda, offended at first, was in the end obliged to laugh with him; and yet she said—

"Yes, yes, you may laugh! perhaps a day will come when you and we all of us shall cry at the intended tragedy."

Bror, however, only laughed, and said, "Be quiet, and forget it. When that time comes, we shall know how to act;" with many more "composing-powder maxims," as Gôthilda called them, and which were nevertheless wholesome to her effervescing-powder temperament.

A few days after this, Bror came, with his traveling companion, to take leave. The traveling companion made his worst journeyman-bow to Gôthilda, and the leave-taking between the two was both sweet and sour.

Gôthilda presented him with a traveling bag, "in order," said she, "that when you shall have wandered round the world as a journeyman, you may have something to cram into your knapsack. Take it for old acquaintance sake."

"And when I return as master," said Jarl, "shall I come and renew my acquaintance with you, and admire you, and let you admire me? I think that we may both of us have changed by that time."

"Yes, that could do no harm, at least for some people," said Gôthilda.

"Precisely as I think," said Jarl, with a significant smile, as he shook her by the hand. And in this accordant state of mind they separated.

The traveling companions set off, and Hedvig and Augustin did their best to console and to enliven Gôthilda for the loss of her very dearest brother.

The same also did uncle Urbanus Myrtenblad, but that we will reserve for our observation under the ### Second Point.

Uncle Urbanus came now much more frequently than was needful for Gôthilda to guess his charades, or for him to accompany her on the piano with his flute; or for him to read to her some extracts from the long letters which he wrote to some of the distinguished men of Sweden—the reader ought to bear in mind that uncle Urbanus had the uncommon good fortune of being acquainted with them all, and of agreeing with them all in their views and modes of thinking—respecting which letters these distinguished men had written back, and said, "You can never imagine to yourself what such a letter," and so on, yes, the reader knows already. Sometimes, also, he merely came to enliven her with his conversation; and somewhat to divert her mind from herself and certain melancholy meditations, which uncle Urbanus having observed, could find no better means of doing than by endeavoring to turn her attention upon himself, his merits, his good qualities, his happiness:—with, now and then, a little hint about his having his “bonnes fortunes,” having had the happiness to please this, and this, and this young lady, and then followed, small-talk, and hand-kissings, and tender glances, and little approaches, which all the more began to annoy Göthilda, when she saw her brothers and sister smile at them significantly, and uncle Herkules began to turn his large, strong eyes in that direction with the most malicious merriment in the world. She had a great quarrel one day on this subject with the old general, in which she alternately laughed and cried, but which did not produce any other effect than that his provoking looks and mien were aggravated by a pretended mysteriousness, as if he would say—

“I see it all, but I shall not take notice of it, that I promise you; I shall not trouble you—not talk about it;”—and so on.

“I wish there could be an end of this stupid story!” thought Göthilda, and began to ponder on the problem which every good young girl, in similar circumstances, is anxious to solve: namely, how she shall dismiss a lover without wounding or dismissing a friend.

“And,” thought Göthilda, “he has nevertheless been very kind toward me, uncle Urbanus, and he is very good; and I do not wish that he should desert me as all the others have done!”

And Göthilda sighed over her gloomy fate, and then decided on her plan of action in consequence of an inspiration, which she thought particularly lucky, and which was obtained from an old funeral oration over the late Mrs. Ulrika Eleonora Myrtenblad, and began to study it with great zeal.

“I wish it was come to an end, and that it was settled,” said Director Urbanus to himself. At the same time, looking at himself in the glass on the right side and on the left; smiling to himself, nodding and saying, “Ay, ay, ay!” And brushing his hat till it shone as brightly as his own face, he set off to pay a morning visit to Göthilda Dalberg.

Göthilda stood just then at the window, watering her own myrtle, which she always declared had a melancholy and unhappy look. (Göthilda considered herself, it was clear, unfortunate in this life.)

“Why, see the myrtle!” exclaimed uncle Urbanus, as he entered, “a young girl who waters her myrtle—that is a sign that she soon intends to weave her bridal crown! Eh? Eh? he, he, he, he! Eh?”

“Now it is coming,” thought Göthilda; and she became quite warm.

“And,” continued director Urbanus, “it occurs now so much better as—hem—as I have just now a little proposition to make. I have—a little charade for Göthilda to guess to-day in these morning hours. Have I your permission?”

“Ah! uncle, I am so stupid this morning, I can guess and understand nothing.”

“Not one single word—love?”

“Least of all. That word; that business I don’t understand, and I will not understand it, because—”

“But if I undertake to explain it, my little dearest—if I teach—”

“Ah, uncle, I am so incapable of learning. But, nevertheless, tell me how you taught it to my aunt Myrtenblad. How you must have loved her—and what an excellent and kind wife she must have been—the late aunt Lona Myrtenblad!”

“Oh yes, excellent! But it was not about that—”

“And her departure, her death—how affecting it must have been! How attached she must have been to you!”

“Oh, it was adoration, adoration! I was her idol, her god. It was almost—almost too much.”

“Do you know, uncle, when a man has been so happy, and has been so beloved by such a partner, I think he ought to be forever faithful to her—even to her memory—and never let another drive her image from his heart. He should always have her and her love in his thoughts.”

“Yes, certainly—yes, certainly, but—but—”

“And he should never,” continued Göthilda, with increasing enthusiasm, “never should he think about marrying again, never risk the taking of another wife, because I would lay ten to one that she would become a Xantippe to her husband, and he would be under petticoat government, which would be altogether dreadful.”

“Oh! Heaven defend, Heaven defend us from such an one! No, a man knows what he is about—a man knows what he is about; and I—”

“Ah! uncle, he outwits himself, you may believe me. Yes, if the late Mrs. Myrtenblad were born again, and—I am certain that you would be glad if the late Mrs. Myrtenblad could come again and offer you her hand.”

“Eh? ay, ay, ay—hem!—ah!—that is to say—”

“And she—she spoke in her last moments so beautifully, and prayed you to think of her, and to live so that you two could again be united in a better world.”

“Ay, ay—ay, ay—entirely. But—but it is now so long since, and, my little cousin Göthilda, I think that we might now talk about something a little more entertaining.”

“Ah! what can be more entertaining, and more instructive, than to talk about the late aunt Lona, and her departure from this world? It makes one begin to think about one’s own, and to prepare oneself, which is so needful, as we become older every day, and the great day approaches nearer and nearer. It would be well to be prepared and ready to die, as aunt Lona was."

And now Gôthilda began to make an oration over the late deceased (the text was obtained from the funeral sermon of which we have spoken), and of the happiness of being re-united with her, which made Director Urbanus gasp for breath; put him into a sweat of agony, and caused him to snatch at his cloak and hat, and make a hasty retreat, altogether thrown back in his wooing, and half frenzied at the thought of a reunion with "the deceased person," with whom, during her lifetime, he had not exactly been in the kingdom of heaven.

But he never sped any farther in his wooing. For every time he attempted to introduce the subject, Gôthilda introduced the late Mrs. Ulrika Eleonora Myrtenblad, her last hours, and her last words, etc. And in the end, it instilled such a horror into Director Urbanus, that he did not go to the house for some time; and when he returned thither, there was nothing he seemed to fear so much as by some dangerous word, such as "love," "marriage," or such like, to call up the dreaded apparition of Mrs. Ulrika Eleonora Myrtenblad. And Gôthilda now again became to him the merry and friendly little cousin, and he was once more the welcome, good and beloved old uncle, and—every thing fell into its old course.

The large intelligent eyes of General Herkules still looked insignificantly, and that vexed Gôthilda considerably; besides which he now and then treated her with the proverb—"You will be so long about choosing the clover leaf till you take the nettle" instead."

Besides which he sometimes significantly repeated the well-known words of the stern Queen Christina (the wife of Charles IX), to Ebba Brahe.

"The one thou wilt: the other thou shalt,
So there will be sorrow in either case."

"Yes, I am to be a sacrifice in one way or another, that is certain," thought Gôthilda, and wept silently over her terrible approaching fate.

But do not thou weep, thou kind young reader, because Gôthilda often forgot her tears altogether amid her present cheerful and active occupations. And amid these, it became more and more perceptible that she had a great inclination toward the "strong women" of the Bible.

Augustin called his two sisters Martha and Mary. But the dearest to him was Mary.

Third Point.

AN EPISODE.

A great deal in our lives is episodic; many things indeed only seem to be so, and are connected by invisible threads with the most important destiny of our lives.

One day, one of the many calm, beautiful days which our family spent at the Birch Island, Augustin received a letter which evidently grieved him.

They were just then sitting at dinner.

Hannah was waiting at table as well as Corporal Stolt; she moved about cleverly and actively, while Stolt, who seemed more than ever to stand merely as a guard of honor behind the general's chair, commanded his assistant corps by glances and silent movements with the hand, and only now and then performed actual duty, or, "for his own pleasure's sake," did some little act of service to Hedvig or Gôthilda. We must, in passing, mention that a short time after the conversation in which Stolt had so gently and so worthily repulsed Hannah's ungarded and impertinent attack, she had come of her own accord to him and asked him "to teach her to wait at table, which it was always a good thing to know how to do, and which might be useful sooner or later." Stolt consented graciously, and had soon both advantage and pleasure in his recruit; and saw with satisfaction her movements according to his will, however little he might make known.

Hedvig soon observed the cloud on her brother's countenance, and looked at him anxiously with inquiring glances.

Augustin said in reply to her looks, that it was about Ivar's Ollonberg family. It appeared to be very difficult to find them out. And that was all the more to be regretted as they appeared to be in want of relief. "B. in Upsala," said he, "who promised me information of them, writes to me that this family, after having suffered greatly from their house being broken into and robbed, sold all that they possessed to pay the rent of that little farm. After that they removed from the place, as was said, to Stockholm, but where, nobody could tell. The family seemed to have lived very much to themselves, and to have no relations in the place. The old woman—the mother—had had a paralytic stroke from the shock of the robbery, and had, since that time, been bed-ridden. The miscreant who committed the robbery—a man by the name of Spets—had been taken into custody with the very money upon him which he had stolen, and the amount of the rent for one whole year, was thus retained for these poor people—when they could be found. What misery had in this case arisen through the misdeeds of a villain!"

A hasty movement in the room caused Augustin to turn round, and all eyes were fixed upon Hannah, who had become pale as a corpse at Augustin's words, listened trembling, and at last sank insensible on the floor.

Augustin and Stolt carried her into another room, and by means of cold water and strong smelling-salts she was recalled to con-sorrowfulness. When she again opened her eyes and saw her master and mistress surrounding her, and watching her with tender sympathy, she became violently excited, hid her face in her hands, burst into a flood of tears, seemed to be distressed by the presence of Augustin and Hedvig, and repeated many times, sobbing loudly—

"I am unworthy! I am unworthy! I have done so much, so much wickedness!"

The sisters, who believed that Augustin's narrative had awoken in the girl painful recollections of her former fault, spoke gentle and consolatory words to her, but as these seemed still more to agitate her, they left her to the care of Maja.

Afterward this faithful servant talked with Hedvig, and said:—

"Yes, do you know, Miss Hedvig, I have been thinking of speaking to you about the girl, because there has been something very strange about her of late. She has, as it were, been sometimes melancholy, and seemed to ponder and meditate by herself, and to read in the New Testament which you gave her, and cry sometimes. But this I must say, that she has been of late much more handy and ready to learn in every way. And, Miss Hedvig—I must say candidly that there was need of it. For you see, it is in this way with poor creatures that fall into evil courses, and have been long in bad company, their very wishes to do right are not good for much, and they have no strength to stand firm and to resist temptation when it comes. For there is such a great levity in them. But then, it stands to reason, that when they come to live among good people, and to have good examples set them, and not to see or to hear any thing but what is good and right, that there should be a change in them, and that they should begin to think more seriously and to wish to do what is right. But then there must be time for that. And do you know, Miss Hedvig—yes, I must say it candidly, though I now like Hannah so much, and hope every thing that is good of her, yet, I say I would not advise any body to take such a girl into their house, if they have not really good-will and time to look after her, and to be like a mother to her. But it is not because such may not become good people, ay, and better too than many other folks who never got into misfortune; I only say that they should not take up such matters as these without due thought. For it has many difficulties. And afterward, dear Miss—they should always be very kind and good themselves, that they may be able to improve others. So that they ought to keep a very strict watch on themselves. And many a night have I laid awake and prayed to God that he would help me, and teach me the right way with the girl. For you see, I never would reproach her with her first fault, or talk to her about it!

No, never! But when I saw her about to fall again, even in little things—because, Miss Hedvig, it is very true, quite remarkable that proverb which says:—

"Begin with a pin and end with a silver dish."

"And then I was obliged to warn her. And, Miss Hedvig!—it is very difficult so to manage our words as that they shall not give pain. And if the girl had not been so fond of the family, and of me too—for I must say that that assisted her good wishes—I don't know how it might have gone with her in the long-run; for she was very much spoiled. But, you see, now it is all well enough, because there is a real change in her. And she, who sometime ago was all for finery and would have whatever she saw, has now become careful and managing, and regularly lays by a little of the wages you give her. And I have told her that I shall beg of you to get her a savings'-bank book, such as I have, that she may put in some of her wages, and increase it every year. Because that is very nice, Miss Hedvig; and then—nobody knows what they may want in their old days, when they can not live in service any longer. For you see, if one lived with such a good family that one should never think of leaving them all one's days, yet one can not be sure that they will always live."

Hedvig remarked that Maja had somewhat of that belief in the earthly immortality of women-servants, which is not unusual with those of this excellent class—(and we would inform our readers here, once for all, that we admire women-servants, at least Swedish women-servants)—and which causes them to believe that all human beings may die rather than themselves. But Hedvig allowed Maja to hold her opinion, assented to what she said, and turned the conversation again to Hannah and her present condition.

"Yes," said Maja, "there is some cause for this melancholy, and I really believe that the poor girl has something heavy upon her conscience, and that it will not be better until she has confided it to somebody. And that I have told her; and I have begged of her to speak and tell her master and mistress what she has on her heart. And you'll see whether she will not do it when she has become a little calmer, poor child; because now she only cries and wrings her hands."

And that very evening, when Augustin and Hedvig were enjoying their sacred leisure moments, Hannah stood before them pale and trembling.

She stood there like a criminal, bowed down by the weight of a heavy conscience; and when Augustin went up to her, and fixed his mild but grave glance inquiringly upon her, she sank down at his feet.

Augustin said, as by a hasty inspiration,

"Hannah! do you know this Ollonberg family?"

"Yes," said Hannah, bursting afresh into tears.

"And you—you were concerned in the house-robbery?"

"No! oh no, not that. But I was nevertheless, perhaps, the cause of it."

"Rise up, Hannah, and tell us every thing. You know us very well! Were you in service with the Ollonbergs when this robbery occurred?"

"No, but my mother had been acquainted with the old lady, and she and the girls were kind to me, and the youngest, who was one of God's own angels, gave me fruit and flowers out of their garden. But when I came to Stockholm, I became acquainted with bad people—the man named Spets, and I said before him, that the Ollonbergs had money, because I knew it."

"And did you do so from a wicked intention?" said Augustin, whose voice and glance involuntarily became severe.

"No, God knows that I did not do it with any wicked intention, but only out of giddiness, one day, when we were talking about such of our acquaintance as had money. But yet my heart was not altogether pure either, that I must confess now. Because some time afterward, when Spets gave me a large sum of money to hide, of which I was to have a part, the thought occurred to me that this money might be the Ollonbergs'; but I drove this thought away, and did not ask Spets where the money was from. I was then so wicked, that I did not care what other people suffered so that I was but well off. But of late, the thought of the Ollonbergs and their money has often come to me, and tormented me, and kept me awake at night, and regularly grieved my heart like an evil worm. And now—to-day at table—when I heard what was in the letter, I understood all the evil that I had done, and became very miserable."

"And now, now I will beg something of you, and that is to find out these Ollonbergs! I will go, I will seek, I will seek in every lane, in every corner of Stockholm, till I find them—yes, if they were hidden in the depths of the earth. Because, after this, I can neither have rest day nor night before I have found them, and begged their pardon, and given them all that I have, and can get hereafter, till they have their own again. If only master and mistress will forgive me and not cast me off."

It is not difficult to imagine what was the answer of the brother and sister. And that they were kind and affectionate toward the sincerely repentant is—still easier to be imagined.

Hannah was now actually changed to the very depths of her nature. For a long time the dew and the sunlight of that good home had fallen upon the soil of her soul, as it seemed, to little purpose. But the moment came when the icy covering melted; and when the good seed budded and shot forth with strength from beneath the clod. At the proverb says—

"What is buried in snow Comes up in the thaw."

"Now, I know what repentance is, Mr. Stolt!" said Hannah one day to him, bitterly weeping. And she confessed to him all that was amiss with her. The hard soldier was much affected by what he heard. He said not a severe word, but merely in a very gentle tone—"Poor child!"

When Hannah, one cold autumn evening, during storm and sleet, was preparing to go out upon some trace which she had discovered of those for whom she sought, Stolt stood at the gate with a large umbrella, ready to give her his company.

"I shall go with you," said he, "because it is not well for a young girl to be going by herself about the streets of Stockholm, in an evening, and into those confounded Stockholm lanes; there are so many wicked people about—and besides it snows so!"

"You are very good, Mr. Stolt, but you shall not give yourself so much trouble," replied Hannah—"I am not afraid. I know not how it is, but ever since I have been so unhappy, and have had this repentance in my heart—I seem as if I was afraid of nothing any longer."

"But I may be afraid for you for all that," replied Stolt.

These words caused such a glow in Hannah's heart, that she scarcely felt the storm and the snow, but walked on lightly, and with more cheerful courage, by the side of her protector.

And many a time did Corporal Stolt go in this way by the side of the young girl, through the dusk of the winter days, and bad luck to them who dared to be impudent to her. This happened once in the case of a sailor, and he received a box on the ear, which knocked him down backwards. Whether he got up again, I know not.

But day after day, week after week, month after month went on, and Hannah had not found those for whom she so zealously sought. Augustin had put an advertisement in the papers, inquiring after the family of Ollonburg; but no answer had been received to it.

Hannah's zeal, in the mean time, did not cool. It seemed rather to increase—she was indefatigable. Stolt began to regard her with a sort of esteem, and Maja remarked that the epigrams which Stolt used to launch out against women, entirely ceased after this time.

Maja, Stolt, and Hannah, resembled from henceforth a clover leaf. The two elder ones took part with the younger, as if her affair was theirs, and Hannah's soul, from this time, lay open before them. With a child-like devotion she attached herself in particular to the honorable but rough soldier, who was now her warm defender, and who sustained her courage. Now and then it sank, and then she said—

"I can't help feeling as if I should go, and go, and go, and yet never find, or else that I should come—too late."

But she went, nevertheless.

THE YOUNG GIRL AND THE ROSE.

CONTINUATION OF THE EPISODE.

WE now remove to a dwelling very unlike that of the Dalbergs. It is in one of the remote suburbs of Stockholm. We enter into one room; it is tolerably large, but very naked, desolate, and cold. The gray-yellow, lime-washed walls are marked with green mouldy spots, which are fed and which grow by the damp. Half-frozen drops of moisture may be seen even upon the panels and doors. It is a desolate, miserable room; still even there are traces of order and care, and there is one little part of the room, where beauty has made for itself a little dwelling, has built for itself an altar. In the recess of the window stands a little chest of drawers of stained birch; it was really a baby chest of drawers, so polished was it, so decorated and elegant. Several books lay upon it, and two small plaster of Paris figures of Tegnér and Thorwaldsen stood there. Above these, however, raised itself a beautiful, green, vigorous rose-tree, which was now bearing—now, in the midst of winter, in the midst of the cold—a full-blown, wonderfully beautiful rose, which seemed to look into the room. It was only a monthly rose, but it was one of rare beauty and perfection of growth. Neither fault nor failing could be discovered in it. And, besides this, there was something so vigorous in its appearance, and in its manner of growing. Every evening it closed its leaves as if to sleep, and every morning it spread them, as if to diffuse its fragrance, and to smile; and it had already done so for several days, and seemed still to be as young and fresh as ever. It was an enchanted flower, really not like common roses.

Thus also thought a young girl—she might be seventeen years old—who stood before the rose, and looked at it, and loved it within her heart; and every morning, when it opened its leaves, she kissed them, and said, "Good morning!" And every evening, when they prepared themselves to sleep, she kissed them, and said, "Good night!" And the rose nodded then so sweetly, and gave its greeting in fragrance. The young girl and the rose seemed really to understand one another; nor was that extraordinary, for the girl was also a rose among her own kind, a very beautiful rose; but she was pale, and the lips which kissed the red rose had the white rose's faint blush color. It was a lovely sight to see the young girl and the rose together in that poor room, in those indigent circumstances.

The girl sat, and sewed the long day through; sewed, sewed, as if for dear life, for low wages.

At this time, also, had she been sitting to sew the whole day till it began to grow dark, and till a feeling of dizziness in her head, and of stiffness in one hand, made her leave off.

She let her work fall; pressed her hands to her aching eyes, and thought—

"I shall become blind, if I go on in this way."

And then—

"I am very unhappy!"

And while she thus sate, with her hands pressed against her poor eyes, she seemed to herself to see pale female figures coming from all sides, from all quarters of Stockholm; some were young, others were old; many were crippled: all of them were silent, and resembled shadows in the light. All of them had those weak, red, dim eyes, which looked sorrowfully upon her, and, as they passed by her, they nodded and said—

"It is with us as with thee; we are the poor seamstresses, thy sisters."

"So many!" thought the young girl, and wept because of the many poor that there are in the world.

When, however she took her hands from her eyes, and saw her rose, and went up to look at it, it did her eyes good, and she felt no longer unhappy.

Something now moved in the bed by the wall, and sighed.

The girl sprang toward it.

"Mother, here am I!" said she.

"My eyes—light!" stammered a weak voice. "Dear Karin! lift my head—higher; so! Lo—o—uise—"

"She is not yet come home, mother dear; but she will certainly soon come."

"E—Eli!"

"He too is away, mother dear, and seeks for work."

"Yes, work—not beg!"

"No, mother, Eli will never beg."

The door now opened, and a fresh, cheerful voice exclaimed,

"Here am I myself, and no other, as the late Madame Westermann used to say. Good evening, dear child; how is mother?"

"Ah, Louisa, how long you have been!" was Karin's answer, as she hastened up to her sister, embraced her, and helped her off with her snowy cloak.

"Yes, but you may believe that I too have had my adventures. Ah! what fools human creatures are!" and Louisa began heartily to laugh.

"And have you got any work for yourself and for me?" asked Karin, anxiously.

"No, not to-day; but I hope I shall to-morrow. I shall go to a few places of which I have been told; but to-day I have, after all, got something for you, which you shall see—you shall see. But, good heavens! It is so pitch dark in here, and so icy cold, too. Why has not my little darling lighted a fire for herself and mother? Your fingers and the tip of your nose are like icicles! Good Lord! what is one to do with you? No, you shall not be frozen to death before my face. In an instant I'll light a fire."

"But, Louisa, it is our last firewood; we have none for to-morrow."

"We must make some shift for to-morrow. With the day comes the help! The day is never without its aid. In some way or other I shall get firewood for to-morrow. Either Eli will bring money, or I shall find a treasure, or else the prophet Elias will come himself in his chariot with a load of firewood. I believe every thing rather than that we should be frozen to death; for God will not permit that, I know very well. Yes, some time or other, there will be an end to the sufferings of the Ollonberg family!"

The broken voice from the bed now raised itself, and stammered forth—

"No complaining—no begging, my children! Work! help yourselves as long as—you can! after—helps—God. Pray—work!—"

"Ah, yes, good heavens! mother dear, we will work willingly, and will pray to our Lord. But our Lord is as if rather hard of hearing sometimes. God forgive my sins! and men are just as much so when the question is about work. One could sooner get an alms nowadays if one would; for you see, beggars are bold."

This was said half to herself, and not to be heard at the bed, by Louisa, a young woman of about twenty-seven, with a somewhat common, round, and rather scorbutic countenance; a nose of an opposite character to the Roman, kind and lively gray eyes, and a mouth with fresh white teeth, which was continually ready to laugh, and that in the most cordial and agreeable manner.

The mother, who lay in bed, had been paralytic for two years, was rather deaf, and had difficulty in speaking, in consequence of paralysis of the tongue. The upright and strong mind could express itself now only in a few broken sentences, as we have just heard.

Louisa kindled the fire, and talked while she was so doing.

"It has been most dreadfully cold to-day. I am of the opinion of the priest who said,

'If, in this cold weather, they preached to the people about the fire in hell, then every body would leap into it!' and, therefore, he preached and said, that hell was ice-cold. And I can very well imagine to-day how it looked. What a scene it was in the streets to-day! All the windows covered with ice; every body as blue in the face as ghosts; and the hair stood upon the horses like icicles. And when people met they complained about the cold, and here and there they were talking about frozen hands and feet, and noses, and ears. And—what do you think? An old milk-woman came to-day into the market, frozen dead, sitting in her cart; yes, actually turned to ice! Only think now, when the people came in their innocence all about her, and asked, 'How much do you want for your milk, little madam? What is the price of your cream?' And she sits there silent as a post, and they ask her again, and peep into her face, and then they see that they have been talking to the dead! Hu! then! It is horrible!"

"But look! now we shall see merrily! Look how it flames, and blazes, and crackles. Piff! puff! Charles XIIth's cannons! I promise that! We shall do grandly! Illumination and fireworks one of these days. Ah! what merry fuel pine firewood is! I only wish that poor Eli were here and could warm himself at our hearth. Ah! how it blazes and warms us, and how beautiful you look in the light, just like an angel of God! Ah! my little doll! my little princess! if I could but see you sitting as you ought to sit, and looking as you ought to look; if every thing were as it ought to be—if I could but see you happy! yes, then I would gladly go as a char-woman round the world, and scour floors, and wash, and carry water and firewood all my days! only that I once in the year would see you sitting on a lofty throne, and see your little white teeth shining as they do when you laugh, and your sweet eyes beaming upon me in gladness! Yes—you try now, but—it won't do; but think if I could help you! Think if I could charm forth that angelic smile! Attend! Look only what I have got here for you, direct from Paradise?"

And with this Louisa brought out of her pocket a large, beautiful, rosy apple, and turned it about, and let the blaze of the fire light up every side of it, while her own countenance shone and beamed with delight as she gave the apple to her sister.

"And you may very well believe," continued Louisa, "that I got that for my eluquence! Respect my talent, I beseech you! Nobody knows what it can do for me!—Yes, I was so vexed this evening to have to come home without bringing any thing besides my increase of experience of the world and of mankind, such as one gains when one goes to seek for service from advertisements; and

I was unwilling to go home, and wandered here and there without any object, till a horror came over me lest the police should take me up for a vagabond, and put me in prison as a person of bad character; yes, indeed, that has been done to people nearly as respectable as myself! so I made me an errand to go to a green-grocer's shop, to a young woman with whom I was a little acquainted, and I went in and asked for—asparagus!"

Louisa now burst into a fit of laughter at the recollection of her own effrontery in asking for asparagus in February, and then continued—

"The woman, as you may think, looked very much astonished, and said, that she 'could not possibly have asparagus before the next month, from Ulriksdahl's hot-house.' It was all that I could do to keep from laughing, and so we fell into conversation, and I told her about some of my adventures in the course of the day, so that she herself was obliged heartily to laugh with me; and she said, 'Ah! that Louisa with her good temper and her everlasting cheerfulness!' and that 'it did one good and warmed one to laugh a little!' and then she gave me the large, beautiful apple which I had from the first set my mind on bringing home to you; and then she asked if she should order the asparagus for me, and how much it should be; and I said that I must consider about it; and that I might not burst out a-laughing, I was obliged to hold down my head and hurry out of the shop. The young woman fancied, certainly, that my nose bled. But I now hastened home, and was so glad in my soul that I had that handsome, rosy apple for you, because I remembered how fond you were of fruit—I felt actually as if it grew in my pocket as I went home. But, heaven help me, child, I believe you are standing there and crying over the apple! yes, actually! large, bright tears! Ah! I, unfortunate sea-gull! What have I now done? The better I mean it, the worse it becomes. It is not worth while my trying. I think I shall jump into the Norrström!"*

"Forgive me, forgive me, Louisa! it was not that I am tired; it was only stupidity in me; but that is over now. You see, that paradise-apple, as you called it, reminded me of our former paradise, our little garden at Upsala, and about the times when Mr. Ivar was with us, and every thing was so happy, so delightful! It came to my mind, how pleased he was with the flowers which I used to bring him, and how he kissed the fruit before he ate it, because it was so beautiful, he said, and how good and how kind he was. Oh, Louisa, and him we shall never see again, nor our sister either. Every thing is quite otherwise now, Louisa; all our goodness is gone forever. Things look very dark for us now."

Little Karin wept bitterly on her sister's bosom. Louisa wept with her, for Louisa was in an unusual degree given to weeping with those who weep, when—N.B. She could not induce them to laugh, which she preferred.

She now comforted her young sister in every possible way; assured her that "the sufferings of the Ollonberg family should come to an end," and that very soon; she knew it herself, because, "when need is the greatest, help is the nearest."

And when, at that very moment, somebody knocked loudly at the entrance door, Louisa sprang up, exclaiming—

"See, here it comes. What did I say? Talk of the wolf, and he'll!"

The door was slightly opened, and a man's voice said, "To Miss Ollonberg."

A parcel was left in Louisa's hand, and the door was again shut.

"What have we here?" exclaimed Louisa, as with haste and curiosity she broke open the parcel before the fire. "God bless me, child! Here is something; but if it is from our Lord or from the foul fiend that knows—"

And Louisa's astonished eyes stared, and the blaze of the fire lit up a bank-bill for a hundred rix-dollars, which was folded in a large piece of green silk. A letter also lay in the parcel directed to "Karin."

Karin took it with a trembling hand, tore it open, cast a hasty glance at its contents, and then threw it impatiently from her, as she exclaimed—

"Don't touch it, Louisa—don't touch it. It is from Count L——"

"From him! Ah, Lord! then we should take care of ourselves. But I must, of necessity, look what he has written. The paper will not burn my fingers, at all events. What can he, indeed, have to say?"

"Very dearest!"—yes, yes, he has not such very bad taste!—hem—hem—"silk dresses every day—your own house—carriage—income for life—if you will." Is he not ashamed of himself, a married man?"

"You hear, Karin, he promises to make you rich; to give you your own house; to assist all your family, if you will. Well, what answer do you give?"

"Can you ask? Rather die. Rather be starved to death!"

"You are my little princess; you are like 'little Karin' in the song; and you ought to sit in my lady's bower! God forgive me, but I hardly know if I could do as you do. I would sell—my soul and my happiness, I think, rather than see mother and you die of starvation. But who would have me?" And Louisa wept aloud.

"But you would see me and mother die of grief, if you could thus degrade yourself, Louisa," said the younger sister, energetic-* Norrström, the lake upon which Stockholm is situated.

sly. "No, no; we must all of us die one day; but let us die honorably."

"Yes, that is easier said than done," said Louisa, "but you are always right, that you are. No, I shall really go and take back this trash, and throw it in the fellow's face. Ah, the money, how beautiful it looks! It would help us out of all our wants—mother, Eli, and you, and——"

"Don't look at it—don't look at it, Louisa! think what it would cost."

"Ah, yes, that is true. I will run directly and throw it——"

"No, not this evening, Louisa. It is too late, and he is, perhaps, not at home. It says in the letter, 'an answer desired to-morrow.'"

"Yes, yes; he will give us time for consideration. But he shall have his answer, the seducer! But what can we now do with this wretched stuff?"

"Take it, dear Louisa, and put it all together, and lay it under mother's bed, just as the foot of the bed. There, I will help you. There!"

And with her little feet she pushed the parcel under the bed.

"And now—now we will just do as if it had never come. Let me give you a kiss, my own Louisa, and let us now think about getting a little supper for mother and Eli."

"Supper?—Yes, if I could take out my eyes and make a fricassee of them; because I don't know how to get any other supper. I would do it, only I could not see very well how to do it without them. And Louisa began to laugh amid her tears.

"Yes, I know a way, Louisa," said the younger sister. "You shall keep your eyes, but—my little statuettes there—we will take them to the snuff-shop, just across the street; the mistress of the shop will buy them both; I know it, because she asked me about it some time ago. And then we will buy us with them a little coffee for mother—and, Louisa, if we could manage a pancake for Eli. He is so fond of pancakes."

Louisa lifted up her hands and eyes. "Your little statuettes—those which you had from Mr. Ivar! your beloved Thorwaldsen and Tegnér!—will you let them go to the snuff-shop, to—Ah! my little Karin, can you stand that? Are you in earnest?"

"Yes—yes, Louisa! Yes, to be sure; but we must make haste."

A feverish vivacity animated her eyes, and kindled her cheeks.

"What—what do you mean?" said Louisa; "I believe you are thinking of going there yourself, now, in this wolf-like cold weather, and in the darkness, when all the wolves are abroad. No, that is not to be thought of. You shall not put the tip of your nose out of doors this cold night; but I shall go. Well, then, give me here the great men. Can any body fancy that Tegnér and Thorwaldsen are now going together to a snuff-shop, to buy a quarter of a pound of coffee, ditto of sugar, an ounce of butter, one egg, and a quart of milk."

"And a three-stiver tallow candle," added Karin, laughing; "bring me that, dear Louisa, if you can, that I may sit up an hour to sew to-night, to finish the pillows, and carry them to the baroness to-morrow, and get the money for them, and perhaps some more work, as she promised. I am just in a sewing humor this evening. I feel as if I could get on famously."

Want is not always a destructive, suffocating weight. It is frequently, and especially to lively spirits, like pressure upon springs of water, which causes them to leap up in strong and lively jets. So was it with the young girl before us. But—too much is too much.

The unheard-of event happened; Tegnér and Thorwaldsen went to the snuff-shop to buy a three-stiver tallow candle and the other things.

And they did buy them. God bless the light they obtained. They sent home to the poor dwelling the candle, and the coffee, and the sugar, and the ingredients for the pancakes.

While Louisa was away, however, little Karin pressed a couple of books to her heart, and said—

"I have you still remaining from him! And thou!" and she looked at the rose-bush, for it had stood in his room; "and he was fond of thee!" and with this she kissed the slumbering rose, which nodded upon its stalk. The leaves shone in the fire-light.

"Here I am with all the glorious things," exclaimed Louisa, as she returned; "open wide the doors. Thorwaldsen and Tegnér have sent you this, and such a many compliments; and they are very well upon their packets of snuff. And, thank God, we shall have a little left to buy something more with."

And Louisa bustled about, roasted the coffee, ground it, boiled it. "Ah! how deliciously it smelled!"—baked the pancake. "Never had any body seen or tasted such a pancake."

And Karin sat and sewed, and laughed at Louisa's delight; when the coffee, however, was ready, she went up to the bed to give her mother some to drink.

The mother, whose life for the most part was spent in sleep, had now woke up, and moaned softly to herself.

But when Karin put the warm, beloved beverage to her lips, she smiled, and said—

"So good!"

Good-hearted daughters! do you not believe that Karin was happy in her self-sacrifice?

And now Karin also must eat some of that remarkable pancake. She, however, will only have a little piece, and drink half a cup of coffee to it. It was "more than sufficient" for her. Louisa must keep the remainder for Eli. Poor Eli, the good lad; he used at night to steal so silently, so very silently into his chamber, that his sisters might believe he had got work, and had had his meals there, and not be troubled about him. And thus he went hungry to bed.

"But this evening he will have miscalculated," said Louisa, "and I shall put this pancake on his pillow, so that he must lay his ear on the pancake when he lays down his head. How astonished he will be!"

Louisa laughed heartily.

"Louisa, will you do me a pleasure?" asked Karin.

"Will I do it? Yes, so willingly, that the will of all the world shall be like chaff before the wind in comparison to my willingness. But what is it?"

"That apple; you have really given it to me, Louisa? It is really mine?"

"Yes, God bless you! certainly it is yours; and I only long to see your little teeth bite into it quite murderously."

"But, Louisa, I should like to give it to Eli. Sweet Louisa, will you agree?"

"Yes, what is it that you will not give Eli? Your very life, I believe. And it will go on, till, in the end, you will take the meat out of your mouth to give him. Now don't look so distressed; do as you like, and lay the apple on the pancake. He will fancy that it is his birthday, the lad, and his head will be quite turned."

"Thanks, dear Louisa," exclaimed Karin; "you can not think how nice the apple tastes."

Louisa went out with the plate to set it in her brother's room.

When she returned, Karin was sitting and sewing industriously.

"Ah, good Heavens! exclaimed Louisa, "there you sit, and spoil your blessed eyes. And what a poor, miserable wretch am I, that can not see to do fine sewing, but take stitches as long as Lunkentus's strides. That is too miserable."

"Well, then, lie down and go to sleep, dear Louisa," said Karin; "you may well want to rest yourself after the exertions of the day, and strengthen yourself for what has to be done to-morrow. Because you must go early with the parcel; and if you are very quick, you shall take my six pillows to the baroness, and get the money for them. I am almost certain that I shall finish them to-night. I have a sewing fit on me, and it will be all the greater when I hear that you are asleep."

"But you won't sit up long!" besought Louisa, whose eyes were ready to close with sleep and weariness. "You will soon come to bed!"

"Yes, yes, very soon. Only I must finish this seam."

The wearied Louisa was soon asleep. The calm breathing of her and her mother was pleasant music to the good young girl. The needle flew more industriously in her hand. The events of the evening, and the warm beverage which she had enjoyed, gave a feverish excitement to her powers. She sewed, sewed till past midnight, till past the first hour of the morning. Then, all at once, she felt that strange dizziness, which she had experienced the evening before; the aching in her eyes; the cramp in her hands. Now, however, her work was finished. She could lay it all together in a napkin, and put out the light. She was not able, however, to undress, but threw herself down, half stiff with cold and weariness, upon the bed beside her sleeping sister.

All was now dark and silent in the poor room. Silent and dark, and cold and damp as the grave.

Still do you not see a little light burning there, in this dwelling of poverty? A little bright flame?

Beneath the mother's bed, at the foot, lies the seductive gold; the seductive words; despised, rejected, trampled under foot of innocence.

She may, perhaps, die, the young creature, die of want, together with all those who are dear to her. But she did not hesitate; she hesitated not. Rather would she die than sell her innocence.

It is the holy flame of virtue which burns in the dark dwelling of poverty. The world sees it not. The world sleeps.

But there is One who wakes, and who sees.

The gray light of the February morning stole in through the frozen window, when Louisa rose up, softly, that she might not wake her sleeping sister, and, taking with her the two parcels, she went out of the room.

A moment after she was gone, a youth entered just as softly; he might be about nineteen—with pale countenance, delicate limbs and features, and large, animated eyes, animated by a fire which would become beneficial or destructive to society—according as it was kept.

It was Eli.

The young brother seated himself to observe the sleeping sister, with an expression of touching, almost of painful tenderness. And as he contemplated the lovely countenance of the being whom he loved more than any thing else, and saw the evident ravages which want and excessive labor had made there, and thought of the fate which seemed to await this young, amiable girl, his feelings became embittered, his eyes wild, his hands clenched convulsively, and his heart rose tumultuously against the laws of society; against such suffering, and against the legislators who permitted it.

Karin opened her eyes, and looked at him. But she closed them hastily again, and murmured to herself:

"It was a dream!—only a dream. But it was a frightful dream!"

"And what then, did my little sister dream?" asked Eli, as he threw himself on his knees by her bed.

She looked again at him, at first uncertainly, uneasily, and then joyfully.

"Ah, it is you!" exclaimed she, and threw her arms round his neck. "It was about you that I dreamed. But you did not look in this way. You looked so dreadful—I was afraid. Oh, Eli! promise me that, happen what may, you will not do any thing that is wicked, either to yourself or to any body else."

But he made no reply. When, however, she continued to beg of him, "promise me that!" he said in conclusion—

"Pray to God for me, Karin! I can bear any thing; I can endure any thing, excepting to see you thus!" He could not go on, and hiding his head in the bed-cover, he sobbed.

She passed her hand caressingly over his head, and said:

"There is no danger for me, Eli! I am very well. You shall see that I am, if I can only see you calm."

He lifted up his head, looked at her, and said:

"Can you smile as you used to do?"

She smiled at him—so beautifully; but, she could not help it, in the midst of the smile, something sorrowful crossed her mind, and interrupted the smile, giving instead a quivering expression of pain, and the brother hastily covered his eyes, as he thought—

"No, she can not smile any longer. It is all over!"

The reader has certainly recognized already in this young brother and sister, Ivar's protégés. Four years had passed since the time when he interested himself about them, and had given to them presentiments of the riches and beauty of life, in which he himself believed. They resembled bees, which an early spring sun has enticed out of the hive; they fly about blindly, believing that they shall find the meadows green, and the earth full of flowers; but they find them, instead, covered with snow; they fly around for a moment, settle down wearied, become benumbed, and—are frozen to death.

And this, likewise, is the history of many young people.

This, perhaps, might not have been the fate of the young brother and sister, whom we see here, had not the crime of one man brought their family to ruin. The forgetfulness of another rendered their fate still harder—and things go rapidly backward with the poor when they once begin to descend.

The family had now been some little time in Stockholm, whither they removed in the hope of being better paid for their work. It was in the middle of the severe winter of 18—. There had been bad harvests in the country; provisions were dear. Every body was economizing, reducing their expenses, and abridging the cost of labor. The creditable poor, who wished to work, and would not beg, suffered severely. The cold was intense, and continued long. Abundant offerings and abundant alms flowed from the treasures of the affluent to the habitations of the poor. (Because to be willingly indigent is not Swedish, and the cold can freeze every thing excepting the Swedish heart.) The Ollonberg family, however, were strangers in Stockholm, and unknown; and incessantly was the magnanimous exhortation of the mother sounded in the ears of her children—"No complaints, no begging, my children!"

With such lessons people may very well die, but they do not sink—spiritually.

The young brother and sister were leaning their heads together, in silent sorrow, the one over the other, when the cheerful voice of Louisa sounded in the room.

"There, then, now it is done!" exclaimed she, not very loud, however, on account of the sleeping mother. "Now he has had his parcel again, and that with befitting thanks. But so angry, and so offended as he was. He called me 'fool' and 'ninny,' and 'goose,' and God knows what; and said that I did not understand what was best for myself; and when I went out, he made a long nose at me. But I could only laugh at that, for he who had the long nose was himself, and nobody else."

"Yes, Eli, you shall, some time or other, know all about this affair."

"And now I've got some money for you, little Karin; money for the pillows; though, God have mercy on us! not so much as we hoped for, because the baronesses beat me down in the price, and said that she could get the needlework done at a lower rate in the house of correction. That I believe, that I do: for the people there have both house-room and fuel, and food, all for nothing. But we—"

"And you have not brought me any more work?" exclaimed Karin, as she raised herself with terror in the bed. And yet the baronesses promised—"

"Yes, but now she says that she shall let her sewing go to the 'institution,' as they call the house of correction, at the lower price. Is it not a sin and a shame to take the bit of bread in that way out of the mouths of honest people, who would perish of hunger and cold rather than do any thing that is wicked, and to give to that sort of people, because they can do it at a little less price. I was really ashamed for the baroness—baroness though she was. But I said nothing, because it, in part, is not proper for a poor needy creature to say any thing to rich folks, and, in part, because I was rather glad that you should escape having to sit and ruin your eyes over that confounded fine sewing."

"But, Louisa, consider; how are we to live? that was our only means! Take that from us, and there is an end of us too!" exclaimed Karin, as she clasped her hands together, almost in despair.

"Merciful father! There is not an end yet!" exclaimed Louisa, in horror. "We have money enough yet to pay for one quarter's rent, and a measure of firewood. We have, also, a little coffee left; and, look here, three French loaves! I bought each of us one; so that to-day we shall have enough, and to-morrow too, I hope. Eli, take one of the loaves, and—but wherever is he gone? He runs away from the breakfast which he would have been invited to; and I wanted to ask him about the supper, and what the pancake said to his ear. Well, now, I will get my things together and make breakfast."

"No work! and mother, and Eli!" thought Karin, as dispirited she fell back on the bed. Hitherto her work had nearly entirely supported them. Now she was without any. The future became more and more dark. She thought of her mother, of her brother; and it seemed as if a thick mist came before her eyes—a weight as of lead lay upon her soul and her body.

"She will be a deal better when she has got a little warm coffee within her;" thought Louisa, as she cast an uneasy glance at her pale sister, and blew up the fire, and ground the coffee, and boiled it.

"Look here, my little darling; drink and become cheerful;" said Louisa, as, somewhat untidy in person, but most kind in manner, she stood before Karin, with a smoking cup of coffee in her hand. Karin lay with closed eyes and colorless lips. "What? you will not have it! not able to take it! not able to take the coffee? What in all the world then will be able to cheer you up, my little heart?"

"A little hope!" whispered the young girl, and two large tears rolled hastily down her delicate, pale cheeks.

"A little hope!" repeated Louisa, and set down the coffee-cup, and clasped her hands and looked up to Heaven. The words seemed to wring her heart, and she asked, "how can I obtain a little hope for her?" She could not see the heavens for the ice upon the window panes; and soon the courageous, cheerful Louisa felt herself without consolation, for a moment, and thought, "there is no hope; but see! the ice melts! see, a large drop runs down the window-pane. The ice indeed weeps for us! and God, who permits the ice to melt, he can also excite the human heart to pity!"

And, once more possessed of a little hope, Louisa again took the coffee-cup, and carried it to her mother's bed.

"Coffee, mother!" exclaimed she, "warm, good coffee; mother will not say no to the coffee-tears, that I know! What? Not mother, either? but what is this? Mother lies with her eyes wide open, and breathes so strangely! Merciful Lord! Karin!"

Louisa's exclamation of terror brought Karin, like lightning, to her side. It was soon evident that the mother was laboring with death.

All stupor and want of spirit were now gone from Karin. The nearest neighbors in the entry, Mrs. Larsen and Mrs. Edelman, and Furubom, the porter, and Furubom's wife, all came in great excitement to get vinegar, palsy-drops, the poor man's doctor, &c. &c., and full of curiosity and readiness to help, as is commonly the case in such circumstances, all standing together in the chamber of the dying, and staring upon her, and whispering among themselves.

"My advice is," said Furubom, the porter, who was a consequential man, "my advice is, that she should be bled, for her ailment proceeds from the blood. I understand it, for I have been in service with many great gentlemen, and have helped them through many sicknesses. And every body who has become well acquainted with me has had more confidence in me than in the doctors. For, in the doctor's art, they go more by learning than by certain looks. Looks are the most to be depended upon. And, as I said, I have cured many great gentlemen, and followed many great gentlemen to their graves. And, therefore, people ought to follow my advice, because I have had experience."

"Yes, yes," said Furubom's wife, who had only one eye, and who was his vis-à-vis, "I say nothing, more than ay-ay!" This "ay-ay," however, seemed in the highest degree to make her husband's wisdom doubtful, and the one-seeing eye stared significantly.

"And I say neither ay nor nay," said Mrs. Larsen, with great volubility of tongue; "But I say, that let people say what they will, and do what they will, there will be a corpse here in this house; yes, that I say, and that I said a week ago, when I saw a great token in the candle. And last night, when I heard a dog howling at the corner of the street, just by this house, then thinks I, there'll be a corpse in this house. We shall see, thought I, whether some old lady down here does not die! and with that I sneezed, and that is a sign that never fails. Well, well; since she is dead, we shall see what ways the girls will take. I say nothing, not I, but I can see enough of men-folks who come running here early and late with parcels. Ay—ay! I say nothing, not I, but I can think for all that, that I can, that that young huzzy need not think herself too good to walk with my Laura in the Hummelgard. But pride goes before a fall."

"Yes!" said Mrs. Edelman, "she has always been lofty in her mind, this old one here, and to take her down from her lofty thoughts would have been about as easy as to take down the seven stars. But she is now lying there because of it. Why should people wish to set themselves up as better than they are; and when people are poor it is best to behave like poor folks. That was what Mrs. Sjögren said, and as she knew me, she said to me, 'Mrs. Edelman, you, who are such a noble-minded and compassionate person, ought to go to the clergyman of the parish and get something for these poor folks, or else put an advertisement in the papers;' for she knew, Mrs. Sjögren, that I had done it before, out of kindness for people who did not deserve it. And I talked about it to this here old lady, but she said; 'No thank you, Mrs. Edelman, dear!' said she, 'I do not wish that any body should put themselves to any trouble for my sake. And there are many people who are poorer and more unfortunate than we are,' says she, 'and I will not go in their way;' that was what she said, and I could see plain enough, that she was too proud in her mind. But you see, it does no good here in this world, for—"

At this moment the sick woman moved in her bed, and said, in a voice stronger than common:

"No complaints—no begging, my children!" She raised her thin hands, and labored as if to bring out something more. But she had power only to utter one single syllable, but that she spoke strongly and fully, and it was—"God!" Then sank the uplifted hands; the head fell back toward the pillow, and the old and respectable woman was dead. The strong spirit had released itself from its habitation of clay.

The daughters kneeled by the mother's bed.

"No, my mother, I will not complain," said the younger, silently in her soul, "I will—follow thee, my mother!"

And then, raising herself, she kissed her mother's pale, but beautiful countenance, and said to her:

"Strong I can not be, but in my weakness I will endeavor to be as thou wilt."

And she did endeavor, poor young creature. It was affecting to see how she endeavored to keep up her spirits, even after her mother, the beloved mother, was laid in her grave. In order to pay for the interment, she was obliged to sell her little birch-wood chest of drawers. The rose-bush had now to stand upon a broken table.

She again obtained a little needlework, and sewed industriously, although her eyes ached, and the slender fingers twisted together for very weakness. One day, however, she had a more violent attack of that former giddiness, and she fell fainting from her chair. When this was past, she was no longer able to work. Her strength was altogether gone.

She, however, lay calmly in bed.

"I shall now die!" she thought, "and the sooner the better. When I am gone, Louise and Eli will manage more easily, and in the mean time I will not consume what they need. I shall soon need nothing more. I shall go to my mother."

Of the food, therefore, which her brother and sister offered her, she took the smallest possible portion, under the pretense that she was not able to take more, and it was not long before she could not bear that which they could obtain for her. She continued quiet and patient. Every day, however, her eyes grew larger, and their hollows became deeper and darker. A delicate, bright crimson—the flowers of the grave—at times lighted up her cheek. But she never complained.

The young brother saw his sister waste away, and could not help her. Of all the pain of earth none is so hard to bear as that of seeing a beloved being suffering undeservedly, and slowly dying. Bitterness of heart people believe is a great misfortune; bitterness against God is the greatest which can befall a human being.

The young brother looked on his sister, and his eyes became wild. They had continually that expression at which Karin had been frightened when she saw it first. A dark fire burned in the depths of his soul, and fed dark, black thoughts.

It was otherwise with Karin. There is a period in sickness similar to hers which is not painful. Karin had entered into this. And in proportion as she became weaker for want of food, and quietly had laid herself down, and given herself up to the embrace of death, a wonderful delight came over her. When she closed her eyes, she seemed to see beautiful, enchanting gardens, where white birds flew among the green branches, and butterflies fluttered over the brilliant flowers. And there she seemed to be, and plucked the flowers and fruits to give away. And there also she seemed to see bright and friendly shapes gleaming forth from the leafy alleys; she seemed to recognize among them her mother and one other also—

She again made verses, and more beautiful than formerly; and as she lay fettered by the weakness of the body, the soul sang like a bird, songs of pure gladness and liberty. Thus was it often with her. But not always. Darker moments came, when the powers of life raised themselves up strongly in her young being, and demanded their own; at such times she felt many an anguish, and death then seemed dark.

On these occasions, she would beseech of her brother to read aloud to her in the Gospels.

This Bible she had inherited from her mother, and it was very dear to her; next to the volume which she had received from Ivar, "The Legends of the Swedish People," and which lay upon the little table beside her pillow. It was from this book that she had first gained a knowledge of the poetical life of her own people, their fantasies and their histories, and from this fountain had her spirit derived its earliest inspirations, and seen the beautiful crimson of morning arise over life.

The rose-tree stood also beside her on the table. The wonderful flower was now withered; but the little plant itself stood fresh and green. It did her good to look at it.

Louisa now took in washing, and stood at her wash-tub in a great wash-house from morning till evening. This maintained the family, and was a great blessing.

Eli spent the greater part of his time with his sick sister; and she knew how to draw him away from his despairing thoughts by occupation. She induced him to paint a picture of the room in which they lived; to represent herself as she lay in bed, with the rose-tree and all. And—delightful to say!—in the midst of their misery the brother and sister were often made quite happy by this work. It cheered the sister to see her brother's ability; to see how one object after another came out, "so like, so natural!" as she said. "Oh, Eli, you would become a great painter, if—" and then came a painful convulsion of the heart and interrupted her. And Eli—when he was animated by work, felt a power foreign to himself; a creative genius open his eyes, and guide his hand, and then he, too, had his visions, visions of beautiful regions in which the genius of art beckoned to him. He felt, that he might grow, ripen, and become something. But then, when he looked deeper into the beloved sister's countenance, and remarked the progress which death was making in it, a vulture seemed to fix its sharp talons into his heart. And then he would start up, and rush out into the streets and lanes; abhorring the light, and abhorring his fellow creatures, who walked or drove by in splendor, laughing, talking, and indifferent about him who went with a bleeding heart and trembling knees. And thus, with every succeeding day grew a deeper hatred toward his more fortunate fellow-creatures

Ah! young man, hate them not. Rather pity them that they are so blind, and can not see into the heart; that they have a difficulty in distinguishing between the worthy and the unworthy; and that they are so often deceived.

Believe me! There are many, nay, a great many, among those whom thou believest to be so indifferent, so thoughtless, who would share with thee their last farthing, if they knew in what condition thou wast—nay, who would deprive themselves of necessities, and in so doing leap for joy, and thank God with tears of gladness, that they were enabled to alleviate the great, the actual want of a really good and pure-hearted human being.

But they know not—can not see—that is the fault; that and theirs, who destroy faith in human virtue.

One evening, after one of these days of violent outbreak, Eli came home. Poor lad! He had thought, "If I could but get her a little wine, perhaps she could take it, and—come to herself!" And for the first time he held out his hand to beg. In reply it was said to him; "you are really a young man! are you not ashamed? go and get work."

Eli withdrew the outstretched hand, and struck it hard against his breast. Through the whole winter he had been seeking for work—he was a painter's apprentice—but he could not obtain it.

He hastened home. As he entered his sister's room he heard a low moaning. He sprang to her bed-side. Karin was still nearer death. Her body was agitated by a violent tremor of the nerves.

He was beside himself.

"Will you die and leave me?" exclaimed he, in despair.

"I will go home—to my mother!" she replied. "It will soon be all over. Eli, light the little bit of candle which is left, and read to me out of the Bible.—Will you?"

"No!" continued he with more violence. "No, I will not read in the Bible—I don't believe what it says. There is no God, no good God who has compassion on his children like a father. If there were, we should not suffer as we do—you would not die of hunger—No, there is no God!"

"O Eli! Eli! do not say so, think of the numbers of people who suffer as we do, suffer and die. What right have we to complain?"

"Are these numbers of people a proof of God's goodness?" asked the brother bitterly.

"Think of him who died in torments on the cross, and who rose up out of the grave that he might say to his disciples: there is a life beyond this present life—a better home, 'where there are many mansions,' and 'I go to prepare one for you.' Think of him, my beloved Eli. Read to me about him—"

"I can think only of you!" exclaimed Eli, in wild despair; "only that you lie and die of want, of misery, and that I can not save you. O my God, if thou exist, if thou hear me, if thou be a father to us, let her not die now, my Father! not die thus! When she is gone, my good angel will be gone; and I shall abhor the world and mankind, and this because thou hast made them—I shall abhor the happy, the rich, and avenge her death upon them. I shall become wicked and hardened."

"Silence! sin not, God is near;" said a voice all at once, as solemn and as gentle as if it were an angel who was come there with a message from the Lord.

Amazement and terror overcame the youth. It was dusk in the room, but still they could discern in the departing daylight, that a tall and handsome man was standing there. His countenance and his hair seemed beaming with light.

The over-excited youth fell on his knees.

"If thou art an angel of the Lord," said he, "save her, and—destroy me, if thou wilt!"

"I am merely a human being," replied the mild voice, "but, perhaps, God may permit me to save you."

A light flashed hastily in his hand; it came from a small lantern, and by its light he looked round the room.

When the light fell upon the young girl, who was half sitting up in bed, and who resembled much more a corpse than a living being, he seemed to be painfully disturbed. He went to her, took her hand, and spoke in a tender and affectionate manner, calling her at the same time by her name.

The girl would not answer. She could only gaze up to the beautiful countenance which was illumined by the light, and which was bending over her; she could only listen to the voice—where had she heard it before? Where before had she seen that expression in a human countenance?—It seemed to her so distant and yet so near!—She could not sustain its influence. It rang in her ears.—she sank down upon the bed. She believed that she should die.

"She has not eaten half a roll!" said Eli.

"Wait a moment!—I will be here again immediately!" said the stranger, and vanished from the room.

"Oh, do not die! live only one little, little moment longer! Live merely one moment!" besought Eli, beside himself, and kissed his sister's cold hands and cheeks. "Do not die!"

She died not. She lived till the return of the stranger. With him came a lady, not young, not old, not handsome, but who looked like a living personification of mercy.

They brought with them a basket containing wine and provisions.

When Augustin placed some wine and water at Karin's lips, she drank it; she swallowed also biscuit dipped in the wine.

"She eats, she drinks! she will then live!" exclaimed Eli, and danced in the room, and kissed Hedvig's and Augustin's clothes, and was, as it were, mad with joy.

When he was a little calmer, Augustin laid his hand upon his shoulder, and said, gently—

"Remember this, remember never to murmur! Never to lose your faith!"

The boy could not reply. He bowed himself, weeping, over the hand of Augustin.

Augustin raised the penitent, and clasped him to his breast. He conceived an affection for the youth.

Outside the door stood Hannah, trembling and weeping; she did not dare to go into the room.

And yet it was she who was the means of sending relief thither. This very afternoon, being out on one of her usual excursions of inquiry, she met Eli, and thought that she recognized him. But he went hastily past her; she sprang after him, seized his arm, and looked up in his face, as she said—

"For God's sake, tell me—your name—"

Her bewildered look made the youth believe that she was insane, and he tore himself away from her without a reply. She, however, followed him from street to street, from lane to lane, to the house where he lodged, and where he entered. She hastened in after him, and soon learned from Mrs. Larsen and Mrs. Edelman all that she wished to know. She had found them whom she had sought for so long, and now hastened home to her master and mistress, but with the deadly anxiety in her heart lest, after all, perhaps she had come too late.

That which followed is already known to our readers. And certainly they can more easily imagine than we describe, how cheerfully this evening the fire lit up this poor home, lit up the countenances where hope once more diffused its most beautiful beams; how busy Louisa was among the provisions; how she laughed; how she cried; how she chattered, and said the most insanely foolish and yet affecting things, so that she herself was obliged both to laugh and cry at them.

And Mrs. Larsen, and Mrs. Edelman, and Furubom, the porter, and Furubom's wife, how they peeped, and how they listened, and how knowing, and wise, and consequential they were, the one more than the other. But, most of all, Furubom's wife, because she merely said "ay! ay! I say nothing more, not I!" and all the while her one seeing gray eye looked like an abyss of knowledge and wisdom. And Mrs. Larsen's tongue leaped certainly twelve miles off and on, in her calculations and her predictions this evening.

How cheerful Augustin was this evening, and how merry, and amiable, and delightful in every way, because he was so pleased to have found Ivar's family, which he called, "a gift from our Lord," "a lucky thing," a real "bonne fortune."

Yes, if thou hadst seen him; dear lady-reader, thou hadst assuredly fallen in love with him, and, therefore, it is a good thing that thou didst not see him—excepting through my weak telescope.

Hedvig enjoyed Augustin's pleasure, but—she sighed a little immediately afterward. She knew how frequently her brother's cheerful anticipations had been deceived; and this very day she had had some partly ludicrous, partly sorrowful experience of how, with one portion of mankind, benefits and kind actions only serve to call forth sad and unreasonable pretensions. She mentioned this in part to Augustin.

Augustin laughed—he was too happy this evening to vex himself, and said—

"Yes, so it may be, and it is sad enough! but you will see, Hedvig, that this family is quite of a different disposition. We shall have to set down these people in the good list, among those whom it is an honor, and a delight to have any thing to do with. And it is our own fault, Hedvig, that we have had such painful experience. We have spread ourselves out too wide, investigated too little, been too easy—especially I—and have given at random. We will now concentrate ourselves more, and Ivar's family shall be the center from which we will begin. Shall it not be so? you would, indeed, wish that this young girl were nursed here, under your superintendence? She must be removed into a wholesome air, and under the care of physicians. And Hannah deserves the consolation of nursing her, and assisting in her recovery. To-morrow we will take a carriage and go for her, we two.

"The boy can remain where he is at present, but I shall try to get him as a pupil into the Academy of Painting. He has really unusual talent. You saw the picture, certainly—the painting which he has made of his sister and the room? And he can have his meals here at home with us. And that Louisa, with her warm heart and cheerful temper, is indeed an actual treasure—really a valuable one! We must have her, by all means, in the house; and as she will not wish or desire any thing better than to be the servant of us all, I think that we might take her into the family as a sort of house-keeper. Or, what do you say, Hedvig? When Ivar and Gerda come home, the family will be large, and you will require an assistant."

"Ah! you good, dear Augustin!" said Hedvig, laughing, as she embraced him, "if you could only help the whole world, there would be no want in it!"

As he had said, Augustin and Hedvig took a carriage, and brought home with them the young sick girl; but she was so weak, that they almost feared she would die by the way; and for a long time even in their home, and under their protection, it seemed doubtful whether life would in good earnest return, and overcome death.

She had, however, near her, both by day and by night, a servant and a guardian, such as could not easily be met with, and not at all for money, and this was Hannah.

In the end, life was the conqueror. Karin was declared to be out of danger!

"Now I believe that God has forgiven me!" said Hannah, weeping for joy, when Karin for the first time had driven out with Hedvig, and smiled, and smiled, and looked like a rose on her return.

"And now I see that there is a good heart in you, girl," said Stolt. "Forgive me for once being so angry with you, believing you were 'without feeling.'"

"Ah! forgive me, Stolt," said Hannah, "that I was formerly so giddy and stupid, even toward you, who now are so very, very good to me!"

"It is extraordinary how that girl has changed, and how agreeable she is now!" said Stolt to Maja, one evening, when they were eating sweet stir-about together, which Hannah had boiled.

"And waits at table, does she, so that it is a pleasure to see her. I need not any longer give myself the least trouble."

"Yes, so say I," chimed in Maja; "she has always been a clever girl at her work; and she does not burn the stir-about either. Hi, hi, hi, hi! It is she who has boiled the stir-about, Stolt. Well, the man that gets her for a wife will not do amiss. Hi, hi, hi, hi!"

"No, but! And if I were not so old, then—"

"God forbid! you are really a very splendid fellow still, Stolt. Hi, hi, hi, hi! And not so old either; only two or three-and-sixty, I should fancy."

"Two or three-and-sixty!" repeated Stolt, abruptly; "not quite fifty-three!"

"No, you don't say so!" exclaimed Maja; "well, then, you are just at the very age to be married."

"Yes, but—women are women, nevertheless; and I can not fancy that any woman would like me."

"And why not? This I know of a certainty—that you look—really very agreeable; and if you would be a little polite and civil—"

"I can not be otherwise than I am," said Stolt, proudly. "Every one has his humor, as the late Glad was accustomed to say; and mine has never been polite and cheerful, especially since Glad was separated from me."

"But think, if a woman, a young girl I mean, should take a fancy to you, such as you are?" said Maja.

"That would raise my esteem for her," said Stolt; "and—good stir-about she cooks, that is certain."

"And when one gets old, Stolt," continued Maja, "it must be very pleasant—I mean for the man—to have his own home, and his own wife, who can cook him good stir-about for his supper, and be company for him—what say you, Stolt?"

Stolt made no reply, but heaved a deep sigh, and for that time the conversation was discontinued.

Göthilda was at first not very well inclined toward the new-comer. She wondered very much what sort of a person she was; whether she was a "Marmæll Nothing," as so many others are; what she would become, and whether "any thing" could be made out of her. And afterward, what she should call her. At first she called her "Ivar's legacy."

"Ivar's legacy" sat silent and industrious over her needle, in the home of the Dalbergs, as soon as her strength had returned. But she laughed so merrily and so beautifully at Göthilda's sallies of wit and nonsense; looked with such grateful, beaming eyes at Hedvig and Augustin, answered so charmingly, and so properly, to what was said to her, and was so surpassingly agreeable, that by degrees her position in the house was altogether changed. She left her office of seamstress to become the pupil of Hedvig, of Augustin, and even of Göthilda, who taught her to sing and to draw; and thus "Ivar's legacy" acquired, unobservedly, the names of "Göthilda's foster-sister," "Hedvig's girl," "The daughter of the house," every body's "little Karin."

Amidst the sunshine of this family affection, and the comfort of this home, the young girl became developed, and bloomed forth into loveliness both of soul and body.

"She is Engel the Second!" declared Göthilda, especially since she had acquired from Louisa the knowledge of certain features of Karin's life, which greatly raised her in Göthilda's esteem, and uncle Herkules obtained leave "to like her a little, if uncle likes me—only I must have the first place, of course."

"That I do, the deuce take me!" said the general. "One can't have too many of this sort in the house!"

It was lucky in this "bonne fortune," that General Herkules was so fully satisfied with the adoption of these sisters and brother in the family.

To help respectable people, who would willingly help themselves, was just what he liked. He took Eli immediately under his protection, and set him to paint his two rooms, in compartments of his own composition, as well as all his old furniture, which could be painted; and for this he paid him good wages.

Göthilda, in the mean time, sang the old song for Karin—

"And little Karin she served within the young king's court; whereupon Göthilda always thought that Karin's color brightened, and she became very beautiful.

"You are right, Augustin," said Hédvig, at length. "'Ivar's legacy' is actually a 'bonne fortune.' I begin to be as fond of the girl as if she were my own child."

"Now it seems as if the sufferings of the Ollonberg family should come to an end!" exclaimed Louisa, when, to her delight, amidst laughter and tears, she seated herself by the kitchen chimney, in the house of the Dalbergs, in the capacity of cook, the only honor and dignity which she would receive; and saw by the blaze of the fire, and the joyful beams of hope, little Karin sitting on the throne of happiness, and Eli driving away toward immortality in the heavenly charity of art, and the sufferings of all the Ollonberg family happily at an end.

And here also is this episode at an end

But we immediately begin a new one, because we feel ourselves called upon to see how things go on at—

EKARNE.

A FINE estate, a loving married pair who live in Idyllic solitude and peace, seem to many a type of the highest earthly felicity, a portion of paradise. And it may be so. But it may also be otherwise. Solitude is a severe test. It calls forth the feelings, it deepens them. Happiness or suffering ascends under its influence to the highest, inmost extent. There is no avoiding, no dissipating, no fleeing from its impressions. They remain, enter into, penetrate, and, unobservedly but irresistibly, change the human being, the home!

Domestic life—that innermost sanctuary of the people—is also a solitude, full of deep mysteries. Therefore the word "holy" is with justice placed over its entrance. There exists within it an undisturbed solitude in which one human being stands alone with another in a relationship which demands that they should become one, if they would become happy.

Place this solitude in an outward seclusion, and then it will reveal its power of introducing into life heaven or hell. It can not, it ought not to be otherwise.

The day of heavy sighs is not passed; and it will not have passed until the last day of the world. But if thou wouldst inquire where they are heaved most heavily, the answer would be, in the most secluded and the most exclusive home.

Holy, dear, beloved solitude! do I complain of thee? No! because I believe that there are many more whom thou deliverest from bonds than thou makest captive; and thy companionship was more beneficial to me than that of any other friend in the world. But one thing seems to me certain, and that is, that no person should dare to live in deep solitude with another human being, so long as there exist any extreme differences between the very foundation of their characters and modes of thought; for these will not fail of becoming disturbing causes.

Ekarne was a beautiful estate. Uno and Engel removed there as a loving and happy couple. And they were happy there. Moments of unspeakable happiness and beauty blossomed forth for this amiable and loving pair. But—something was wanting, nevertheless. There was an impediment to the perfect union of the wedded couple, which, at first, was darkly felt and covered over by the flowers of love, but which by degrees presented itself more and more, and appeared the more frequently, the more distinct. It was that gulf, which had once before threatened to separate them. But now, as then, they turned away their heads, and, stretching their arms across to each other, filled it with flowers. Still it appeared again and again, and Engel's youthful gayety declined more and more. For some time she had suffered from moments of actual melancholy. She then sought for solitude, mostly in the open air, where she was most secure of being undisturbed. Ekarne lay at a considerable distance from the shore of the Mälar lake, in a wild, romantic region. The house stood at the edge of a beautiful and extensive park. A lake called the Deep Lake, lay here surrounded by lofty and almost perpendicular cliffs, here and there diversified by groups of fine trees and openings into valleys. Uno had laid out a footpath along the broken cliffs by the side of the lake, and which ascended by easy steps across the hill to some grottoes and caves in the rocks, which nature and art had united to form. In this path there was one particular spot where a mountain ash and a birch-tree, sown by birds, had sprung up in the fissures of the rocks and leaned against each other, so as to form an archway; there Engel was accustomed to sit, looking out over the lake in the mysterious depths of which, (unfathomable, as was said), she loved to send down her glances. Uno had caused a bench to be placed there, and called the spot "Engel's rest."

One day Engel sat here. It was a day at the beginning of the spring. There was a mist in the air which partially concealed every object; but the air was mild, soft, and full of that inexpressible delight which bursts forth in the northern winter with the first anticipations of spring, when it is felt that "— the earth love-warm, Rests in the arms of spring."

The snow-drifts melted in the wood; black-cocks played among the fir-trees; the rook called his mate. The branches of the trees grew ruddy, and their buds swelled in the moist and mild atmosphere. At intervals, a playful wind arose and invited the waves of the Deep Lake to a dance, and touched the harps of the woods and the cliffs. The heart of nature seemed to swell with the feeling of an approaching festivity.

The young lady of Ekarne saw and heard all this. But her heart did not swell in harmony with nature; it was, on the contrary, unusually oppressed, and, as it were, heavy with unwept tears. There are moments when irresistibly anxious forebodings take hold upon us. Hundreds of such are blown away like chaff before the wind. But some there are which have a mysterious origin. There was, at this moment, a mist in Engel's soul, as well as in nature, through which every object shone forth indistinctly and darkly. She gave it no name; nay, she would not think of it, but she felt darkly that something was arising between her and her husband, which threatened to overcloud their lives—it might possibly be—separate them. Yet no! this last thought was not, could not be hers. And yet there lay so sorrowful a feeling which separation could only give birth to in the depth of her soul, and oppressed it. By degrees her tears began to flow. These relieved her.

She hastily dried them, however, as she heard a step approaching and recognized Uno's. He was talking cheerfully; it was with their little boy.

Uno had come out to seek for his wife. When he found her, he reproached her tenderly with having fatigued herself with climbing this hill, especially at this time. "I believe that I must become a tyrant and fasten you in," said he, jokingly.

Engel smiled at him, but he saw that she had been weeping. He inquired tenderly and seriously after the cause of this, because Uno knew that Engel was not one of those ladies who are given to weeping, and whose tears fall for nothing. But Engel wished not to tell the cause of her tears.

Uno undertook to guess, and suggested several causes, at some of which Engel could not help laughing. At length she said:

"Ah, no! don't seek for the cause in any fault of yours; you are the best—the kindest—you are only too good for me. But yet—"

"Yet! What is it? Now it must come out, Engel, or else I shall be angry."

"Yet I sometimes feel myself so—lonely. Now it is out. Uno, forgive me."

He kissed her, but her tears flowed afresh.

"Lonely!" repeated Uno, and looked inquiringly at her.

"Yes, lonely in my deepest, most inward, and, as I think, best feelings and thoughts. No, do not look so serious, Uno, for then I shall be unhappy. You see, my beloved husband, it is just because I would not vex you, would not give you a single moment's displeasure, that I come here by myself when I am sorrowful."

"And which then are the deep and good feelings which you are obliged to conceal from me?" inquired Uno, not without asperity.

"You know them, Uno," said Engel, as before: "I have often wished to go to the communion table; but I have not been urgent on the subject because you do not feel as I do. Neither have I spoken of it for a long time, because I saw that you do not like to hear of it. Now, however, I long more than ever to go. It is so long since I have been there—and an hour will soon arrive which will be a question of life or death for me. I long before it comes, to unite myself more inwardly to the eternal life. I wish to partake of the Lord's Supper——"

"Well, and who hinders you?" asked Uno, somewhat roughly. "If you wish to go—go."

"Alone?" and Engel looked at him with such a touching glance that he was involuntarily affected by it. He looked down, and bending forward he struck the little pebbles with his cane, so that they leaped from the rocky path into the lake. Engel continued:

"The other day, when I was in the church, I saw wives with their husbands, going side by side to the communion table. I felt that they were very happy, Uno. It looked very beautiful."

Uno replied with a mild but grave voice:

"Do you wish me to act merely for the looks' sake, without an inward conviction?"

"No, ah, no! but—I merely lament, Uno, that it is so; that we, in many things, are different. It grieves me. I can not help it."

A moment of deep silence succeeded.

When Engel again looked up, she saw Uno's looks riveted upon her with an expression of unutterable tenderness. At length he said:

"Unite yourself with your family in those convictions and usages which you love in common with them. And afterward—return to me, and be happy with him who, beyond any thing in the world, wishes to see you happy. Come, my sweet girl! do not let splenetic fancies, which young ladies often have, and so unnecessarily, darken my Engel's clear eye and brow. Look around you in this great temple, where a thousand voices speak of life and happiness—breathe that air which fills every thing with newborn power; listen to the voices in wood, in lake, and air; how every thing breathes, awakes, and moves, that it may love, live, and enjoy! Do you not hear also, beloved one, under your heart, the promise of a new spring, for our home, for our happiness? Oh! thus let your spirit, your life, become one with the great existence around you! Forget the petty troubles of the moment, and lose yourself in that all-vivifying, nourishing, renewing!—"

A weak cry and a splash into the lake at their feet, here interrupted Uno's delightful conversation.

Engel sprang up. "The boy!" exclaimed she, and looked wildly around her. The child had vanished. Engel sprang forward to the hand-rail on the path, which led along the cliff to the lake. Uno would have withheld her, but she escaped from his arms, and in one moment had thrown herself over the rail into the water, out of which she saw her child stretch forth his small, helpless hands. It was the work of a moment.

The boy wanted to see where the stones had gone which his father had caused to fly into the lake, and he had crept under the rail, that he might the better reach the place, and had fallen down the perpendicular cliff. He was just about to sink, when he was rescued by his mother's arm.

It was now evening. Hedvig and Augustin were at Ekarna. Very dissimilar was this evening to the morning of the same day. Engel had indeed saved her sinking child, and Uno had succeeded in rescuing both mother and child from the embrace of the deep lake. But it had, nevertheless, done its work. That was past remedy; the beautiful, beloved young wife and mother must now—die. She felt it, she knew it also, since she had again awoke from severe suffering to consciousness. She was perfectly free from pain, but had not now, many moments to live. These she devoted almost exclusively to her unfortunate husband. Words of inexpressible love; words of consolation, and hope, and gratitude came from her pale lips. But Uno heard them not. He understood nothing of that which went forward. He had as yet not seen any one die; and that his wife, his young, life-enjoying Engel should die, was what he could not believe. He could not comprehend it.

But in that moment when she, after having spoken some words to Hedvig and Augustin, once more turned her glance to Uno, uttered his name, and then closed her eyes, ceased to breathe, and was as one dead—at this moment, a wild, frenzied pain overpowered him. He threw himself upon her, raised her in his arms, kissed her, and called her by her name. "Engel! my wife! Mother! awake!" cried he.

And she—awoke.

She opened her beautiful eyes slowly, and fixed upon him a sorrowful, almost reproachful glance.

And mournfully said she to him :

" Ah, wherefore have you awakened me ? I slept so calmly—dreamed so delightfully ; and now I feel that must again bear much suffering."

She again closed her eyes, and when, after a moment's space she opened them again, their glance was wild and bewildered.

" Why is it so dark here ?" cried she ; " why do you bar out God's daylight ? Uno, beloved Uno ! is it you thrust me out into this eternal darkness ? What have I done to you, my beloved husband ? Forgive me, poor child !—it was done out of ignorance. Allow me to go where I long to go. Not into the deep—it is so cold, so dark there, Uno ! Have mercy. Hedvig, save me—save. Nay, silence !—let it be. Nobody shall come between him and me. Where he is, there will I be—although he will not let me sleep any more."

In this wild, delirious state lived Engel for eight days and nights—when she died. But within all that time she enjoyed no glimpse of light, and no rest. Her soul's light was altogether gone, and her personal beauty also. No one could have recognized her—it was a sorrowful sight.

When the long death-struggle was at length over, and death had again taken his prey, no voice was then raised to call the departed to life.

Her unfortunate husband now sat, as then, by her bedside ; but— It is said that, in ancient days, the unhappy beings who gazed upon the head of Medusa, became suddenly changed to stone with horror. Something of this kind seemed to have taken place with Uno. One thought, one feeling—dark as the eternal night—had fixed itself in his heart, in his brain, and stared from his tearless glance.

" Go to him, Hedvig," said Augustin.

" Talk to him—embrace him ! We must break this state of mind."

" Let us both go," said Hedvig.

They both went. They clasped their unfortunate brother-in-law in their arms—their tears wetted his cheeks. He seemed not to remark it.

Augustin took the beautiful sleeping boy in his arms, and carried him to his father.

He thrust him violently from him.

" Take him away !" exclaimed he ; " he was the cause of it," and he turned away from him and shuddered.

Some days later, when Engel was buried, her husband was seen to totter out, pale and gloomy. A few hours afterward, Augustin found him extended on her grave, in wordless, tearless sorrow. He led him away home. Uno seemed not to be quite conscious, or rather he knew nothing of that which occurred within himself. He spoke to no one ; answered either monosyllabically, or not at all, when he was addressed : he seemed insensible to all consolation, all tenderness, all hope. Sometimes he sat with closed eyes for a long time together, and when he again opened them, there was in them an expression of such deep, such boundless suffering, that Hedvig was obliged to turn away from him and weep.

One day they took to him a bouquet of beautiful flowers, out of his hot-house. As the first moment, he snatched them with a species of gladness, but immediately afterward threw them hastily away from him, and rushed out with a cry of agony, and shut himself in his own chamber ; nor was it possible again to induce him to leave it. This sorrow altogether assumed the character of misanthropy. He never went out, let his beard and nails grow, and very soon looked terrific.

Thus went on one week after another. An old faithful servant was the only human being he could endure near him, and the brothers and sisters confided to him the guardianship of the unfortunate brother-in-law.

Uno's unmarried sister, Bertha, a woman physically weak, but of a strong mind, who had hitherto lived with her married sister, was now called upon to become a mother to Uno's child, and to watch over it while near to him, and to await the moment when the father's feelings should awaken, and possibly again conduct him to life and society.

Friends, physicians, clergymen, attempted for a time all that friendship and science—all that reason and religion could do—to alleviate Uno's sorrow ; but he seemed not to hear what was said to him—he seemed merely tormented and distressed by it. By degrees people desisted from their attempts, and gave him up as an incurable patient.

Hedvig and Augustin, however, left him not ; although the physicians had declared that there was but little probability of his recovery, and that the only change which might be expected in his condition, was the change from this silent melancholy to raving madness.

But the brother and sister did not lose hope—did not lose the belief that it might become otherwise with their beloved Uno, and continued to visit him several times in the week ; or, if he would not see them, he was seen by his sister Bertha, who attentively watched over the father and child—the child which, under her care, bloomed forth as beautifully, as gayly, and as frisk as if no sorrow with black wings had hovered beside his cradle. Bertha gave the brother and sister exact information as to all that concerned Uno. They wished to take advantage of the slightest change in his condition. But, ah! from day to day it continued the same, excepting that his sleeplessness seemed to increase; and when Bertha sometimes listened at his door, she heard rapid, unequal steps, and a sound as if hands were wrung in despair.

General Herkules said, grumblingly—

"I don't understand this young generation—the men of these days. But all this proceeds from these modern theories. In former days, when a man had to bear sorrow, or when misfortune came over him, he shut himself into his chamber, and read his Bible, and received strength and consolation from its word; and then he dried his tears, and went out into the world again—and was a friend with his friends, attended to his vocation as formerly, and bore his griefs before God in patience. Great King Charles behaved in that way. When he, by mischance, shot his friend, General Hard, in the breast, so that he died, he lamented him in the depths of his soul; nay, he often shut himself up in his tent, and prayed to God, and wept: and the same did he also, when, during the Russian campaign, he received the tidings of his beloved sister's death. But he was not the less generous and good-hearted for that; nor was he less brave against the enemy, or less cordial toward his friends; and never once did he disturb a human soul with his complaints. Now, on the contrary, people trouble heaven and earth with their misfortunes, as if they could not bear them themselves, and as if there were neither God nor heaven. But this is all the consequence of their confounded modern theories."

And General Herkules was vexed, shook his head, and let Thor's hammer thunder so loudly, that it resounded through the house, and he sang the while—

"The good old times to me are dear,

The times of Charles now left behind," etc.

But we will continue with the present, and talk about—

UNO.

THE spring was come with its garlands and its songs; summer had followed after with its ears of corn; its fullness of beauty and of life. But the recluse of Ekarne knew it not, had not seen it. He sat altogether in his darkness.

The Dalbergs, with uncle Herkules, had removed to the Birch Island, and made thence visits to Ekarne. Across, the lake it was but about a couple of miles there.

One day Augustin returned thence.

"Uno has spoken!" said he to Hedvig. "But I know not, nevertheless, what to think of his condition, or what is to be done with him. I felt myself so unusually cheerful to-day when I went to him, I had determined, that let it cost what it would, I would talk to him, would endeavor to force myself to his reason, would arouse, or at all events shake his powers of mind. I took him quite unawares: reproached him with his excessive grief; talked with him about that evidence which the human conscience, human knowledge, in all ages have borne to a life after death, to the individual resurrection, and thus endeavored to lead him to that light, which Christian revelation affords us as a perfecting, a strengthening, of the loftiest anticipations of human reason. I made an attack even upon his heart; I touched the painful wound. I asked him if he did not believe that Engel would suffer from his sorrow, if even her heaven would not be darkened by it? I reminded him of the presentiment of this connection between loving souls, which is expressed in that beautiful old pagan poem of Helge and Sigrun, how he, "the dead," complains that his breast is frozen by "the dew of sorrow," penetrated by the tears, which she, the wife that remained behind, sheds. I, myself, became quite affected by that beautiful poem. I became so fervent in my earnestness, that an immortal being should not allow one dark, passing moment to swallow up, to darken a whole life; to let death overshadow love, which is the one strong power, and which, indeed, conquers death. Yes, I can not understand how I should not move, and affect Uno! Still he listened to me silently, indifferently, coldly. And when I ceased to speak he said, "I thank you! I understand your good intentions, but—not your words. There is, as it were, coagulated blood in my heart, and in my brain, which prevents me from feeling and thinking about any thing excepting my misery. Thanks, Augustin! but—it is not worth while. Human beings can not help me. There needs something stronger than they. Death is a strong man. He alone can release or—calm forever, and—I do not understand why I still live." After this he relapsed again into silence, and I saw that my presence only distressed him. "What shall we do, Hedvig? How shall we be able to help this unhappy man? Do you consider whether you can think of any means, any course?"

"Ah, no," said Hedvig, "I can not. But—that which is impossible for man may be possible to God."

And in this hope her calm soul rested, and Augustin's roused itself anew; and both of them continued to make use of every means which could be thought of.

One morning—it was about midsummer—Hedvig drove to Ekarne. Thoughts of her unhappy brother-in-law dulled her senses toward the beauties of nature which surrounded her. The woody islands, which lay like islands of bliss on the mirror-bright bosom of the Mälar Lake, over which light mists were driven and in which water-birds bathed themselves, were all merely seen by Hedvig as if through crape. She was completely dejected this morning. Her sensitive soul was brought into deep sympathy with every species of suffering as well as of joy. But now the former was the nearest to her.

She found Bertha in the apartment which led into the one occupied by her brother. She was restless and excited.

"I fear," said she, "that something unusual is about to happen. I have heard Uno moving and walking about violently."

"Do you think that I might go in?" inquired Hedvig.

"I scarcely know. I feel myself to-day so unusually apprehensive. The physician, who was here to-day, dreads the worst, and he begged me to keep the child carefully from—its father. Ah, Hedvig!"

"I must, nevertheless, attempt to go in—to talk with him." And pale, but resolute, Hedvig went toward the door of Uno's room.

But at that very moment it opened, and Hedvig, in terror, drew back a step or two, for it was Uno himself who stood there before her. Uno, with his wild, disordered hair and long beard; it was the former unhappy man, and yet not quite the same; for the gloomy, dead expression in the hollow eyes had now given place to a fire—was it indeed that of joy? or was it of madness? There beamed forth from them a light which was not like any earthly joy, and which diffused, as it were, a brightness over the emaciated countenance.

When Uno came out into the strong daylight, he staggered, and shaded his eyes with his hands. In a little while he dropped them.

"Is it not Hedvig? Is it not my sister Bertha?" said he, in a voice which sounded strange in Hedvig's ears.

"Yes, Uno!" said Hedvig, going up to him and taking his hand, and looking at him with her mild, clear eyes.

He embraced her; he embraced Bertha, and said:

"Thanks, you beloved ones! I have given you uneasiness. Forgive me! Fear nothing more. I am well—all is well."

He went out from them and into another room. He seemed to be seeking for something. He then came into the room where his child lay and slept in his little bed. The nurse sat beside him at her sewing and sang:

"The squirrel went into the meadow and worked With four of his little men-servants."

The father fell upon his knee beside the child's bed, looked upon it for a long time and kissed its cheek, which was wetted with his tears.

After that he went to the window. It stood open. A bird sang in the lilac tree outside. Uno listened and smiled. He looked out over the landscape and perceived that it was summer. He went again out of the room; went through the hall and down the steps. He walked silently and without looking around him. Hedvig and Bertha followed him, full of anxiety, hesitating between hope and fear as they looked one on the other with questioning, uneasy glances.

When he had gone down the steps outside the house, into the open air, Uno stood for a moment, breathed deeply many times, extended his arms, and uttered a cry—a cry of the utmost delight—and rushed out into the park.

The sun shone over the green, dewy fields; the birches whispered and diffused their fragrance; the larks sang in the sky; the heavens, blue and lofty, vaulted the flowery earth; the freshness of the morning breathed through the air; every flower opened itself; nature seemed to celebrate its resurrection; and the inexpressible joy of a human being united itself thereto. Uno's steps became quicker; invisible wings seemed to carry him along; and as he went onward he embraced the trees; kissed the leaves; kissed the flowers; clasped the cliff to his breast, and seemed to talk with birds, trees, flowers, to every thing in nature; saying—

"Praise and thanks be to Him! she lives! she lives! Every thing shall live. Sing! sing! rejoice!"

It was as if he had united himself to all life, all existence, ascending in love, in adoration.

And the birds sang and rejoiced; the trees bowed themselves; the flowers diffused their odors as if in obedience to his words.

"It is too much. I can not outlive it!" said he. "Oh, this love; this bliss!" He lifted his hands to heaven, and threw himself down upon the earth as if he would embrace it.

A torrent of tears relieved him, and calmed his violently-excited state.

Then it was that Hedvig and Bertha found him.

He laid his head on Hedvig's knee, and there he wept.

"Do not be uneasy," said he to them; "every thing is well. She lives. Thank God! Be calm. I shall also be calm."

The two sisters sat quietly on the sun-warmed grass, watching over the brother with tears of silent gladness; for they now understood that he would soon be well. Above them the lark warbled his ascending songs; the flowers wafted abroad their fragrance; the breezes fluttered around them and they felt that the spirit of God was there, was in that which was now occurring.

Uno became altogether quieter; he seemed to sink into a slumber, but at intervals a thrill of joy passed through him, and he spoke the name of his wife.

Here they were joined by the old servant, who, with indescribable anxiety, had missed, and now sought for his master.

With him and his sisters Uno returned home. That state of enthusiastic excitement was over, but happiness still abode in his breast; his voice was weak; his eyes were bright, but with a calm and steady brightness.

It was not long before Uno's outward appearance became the same as it had been previously to his misfortune. But those who were most intimate with him could remark that some great, inward change had taken place in him.

What had been the cause of it he never mentioned. He avoided, even with Augustin and Hedvig, speaking of it, and seemed to wish to keep this secret entirely to himself, as a precious treasure which should not be exposed to the light of day. If, however, on this subject he continued to be reserved, he showed himself all the more open, all the more cordial and conceding on every other. He willingly talked with them about Engel, and always as though she were a living and happy being whom he should some time see again. He willingly talked with them on many subjects, which formerly had been banished from their conversation. His beautiful child became his dearest delight.

His dependents received from him a more fatherly care than before. But this did not entirely bear reference, as formerly, to the advancement of their outward condition. He became careful about the cultivation of their souls. Among other institutions for the advancement of this object, he established on his estate a circulating library, which he furnished with good, useful, and, at the same time, entertaining books and journals.

Little Dr. Lund, whom we already know, became now a constant guest at Ekarnø, and Uno studied and read with him daily. This learned and amiable man belonged to that portion of the clergy of the Evangelical-Lutheran church which, attached to it in many important particulars, yet in others go beyond its point of view. He had deeply and independently made himself acquainted with, and searched into, the Holy Scriptures, and had found that no other church, no other form of religion on earth, had been able fully to establish and diffuse that light over heaven and earth: that kingdom of grace and happiness, over all spheres of existence which are comprehended in these writings. He was one of those who believed the time to be at hand when this light should dawn; when a higher, a more universal church should arise on earth, and he rejoiced in the light of a spiritual heaven, in which he saw prefigured the advent of that new day.

He communicated to Uno the light that he had found. Uno had seen a light, even he, which had miraculously opened his eyes, and had given to him new clearness with regard to life and death. They understood one another, these two men, and had great joy in so doing.

In this new and happy faith, however, which Uno had received, he saw that the path of doubt had not been without advantage to him. Honest, serious doubt, never is. Through its shadows had he arrived at light, which he, excepting for this, never would have sought and never found. Uno now felt that not merely a new day, but a new life's career had spread itself before him.

In the park at Ekarnø, by "Engel's rest," on the shore of the deep lake, Uno caused a lofty cliff to be hewn into a monument to Engel's memory, and ornamented with emblems of immortality. Here, upon the stone bench that commanded a view over the lake, he loved to sit alone, or with his friend, and here sate they many a beautiful evening, and conversed together on the doctor's favorite subject—immortality, and the state of the soul after death. This amiable scholar was full of beautiful ideas and speculations on the subject, and no one could hear him without his mind becoming animated and his heart warmed, although many of his hypotheses appeared somewhat bold, and Götthilda would remark doubtfully—

"But, dear father, where do we find that writt'n?"

But the dear father stood very firmly on his ground, demonstrated his argument so fervently, was so kind, and at the same time so merry, that no one could help being heartily attached to him, although they might not perfectly hold with him in opinion. In great measure, however, every one must hold with him, and, in great measure, heaven seemed to come nearer to earth during these celestial conversations.

And Götthilda, who still could never "forgive our Lord" (it was her own expression), for the death of Engel, felt herself, after these conversations, reconciled to it, and in the end—almost—inclined to die herself.

But Götthilda loved life too well—that is to say, earthly life, and now seemed to have a great deal to do. And we can not do otherwise than be of her opinion; for, independently of there being much in her own soul which was unfinished and in a state of disorder, with which she must occupy herself, she foresaw various occurrences in her own family—and we foresee more than she knows of—which will demand all sorts of preparation and arrangement, as well as a great deal of sympathy. And Götthilda could not conceive—neither can we—how, in all these, they would be able to do without Götthilda.

We will now proceed to one of these occurrences, to—

THE GREAT BROTHER-AND-SISTER-MEETING.

It was nearly five years since the day when Ivar and Gerda had gone across the sea to a foreign land.

They now were expected back, and Bror with them, from England.

Already had the telegraph at Stockholm announced that the Gauthiod had passed the castle of Delard.

Augustin just then came home, quite warm, and bringing the news of this. By five o'clock this afternoon, they would—that is to say, Ivar and Gerda, would be in the harbor of Stockholm, “would be here at home.”

It was not yet five o'clock in the afternoon, and hark!—cannon shot thunders from the broadside of the ship.

“There we have them! There they are!”

And uncle Herkules, and Göthilda, and Augustin, and David, and Stolt, set off altogether, march, march, down to the harbor.

Sister Hedvig, however, stayed quietly at home. She will there receive her brother and sister, her beloved. She is not solitary. Who do we believe that she is, that young girl in the white dress, who is kneeling before sister Hedvig, while she places a beautiful living rose, with its green leaves, in her rich, light plaited hair—who looks so affectionately sweet as she gazes up to the motherly friend, and blushes and smiles, while the other, with motherly delight—we might almost say pride—looks down at her. Do you recognize her?

I hardly think you do. It is difficult to recognize the pale, half-prostrated being who, three years since, entered the family of the Dalbergs, in this blooming and healthy young girl, whom we see here.

But I assure you that it is one and the same. And the rose-tree which then removed with her, now stands there also before her. It is from it that the rose is gathered which now shines so beautifully in her hair. And the tree stands, nevertheless, full of buds.

If you will not believe me that it is the same girl, yet you must believe it when you see the loving eyes, which every now and then glance into the room to look at the young girl, and which are full of tears—difficult to say whether of laughter or weeping, and probably of both, because those eyes are Louisa's the housekeeper's (for she has risen in rank), who is busy in the hall, setting out the table with all sorts of good things, and who, from time to time, delights her eyes with peeping in at the parlor-door, and smiling and nodding.

Little Karin—for it is actually she—knows who is coming, whom she shall shortly encounter, and, therefore, she blushes, and smiles, while her heart beats restlessly. That poor heart! it always comes into play when young girls are in question, and always does it suffer.

The girl and the rose, in the mean time, constitute a very pretty picture. And when Hedvig noticed them, she could not help smiling, and again she smiled when she thought how astonished a certain person would be, and then she smiled a third time, and that at herself, and the thoughts—romantic thoughts, we acknowledge—which peeped up and basked in the sunshine of her soul. But she said nothing, not a syllable. And the young girl was silent also. But she kissed the kind hands which had placed the rose in her hair, and wept and smiled. It is a silent conversation. But it becomes otherwise. Noise; sound of footsteps; leaping up the steps, in at the door; cries of welcome; one name shouted on another; embraces; kisses; tears of joy; protestations of joy, playful, affectionate, foolish. Ivar and Gerda, they who have come from afar, they who have been long absent, are once more on their native soil, in the home of their brothers and sisters.

And Bror is there, also.

“Home! home!” How it sounds, how it feels to those who have been away for a long, long time.

Many things have to be asked—many things to be said, to be talked about. Many changes have taken place. They will come out by degrees, when the first tumult has subsided.

Engel is gone! that the absent ones knew already. She has left a vacancy. Angels are always long regretted. But about Engel the second, they know nothing. They at home had carefully withheld all knowledge of this.

Aunt Queen Bee was gone to her fathers. Aunt Queen Bee! Ah! many regretted, aunt Queen Bee. But nobody so much as uncle Herkules. And where, indeed, is young Jarl? Still on his travels, maintained by uncle Herkules.

The millionaire is also dead. Who grieved for him? Not I. That I know of a certainty. Bror showed me the betrothal ring on his finger; and then congratulations were shouted. I congratulate you! I congratulate you! the lucky fellow to get a sweet wife and a million! I should be very much pleased with only half.

“The home has become beautified!” said Ivar to Hedvig, beside whom he was sitting, as he fixed his eyes upon a young girl with a rose in her hair—the reader and I know who it is—who stood beside the table, busy in helping to refreshments. “Who is that Iduna-figure?”

“Let me introduce you to her,” said Hedvig, smiling from the bottom of her heart, as she rose up and went from her brother to the Iduna-figure and said :

"Little Karin, my brother Ivar, your former teacher and friend, wishes to renew his acquaintance with you."

"What?—who?—how?" stammered Ivar, so astonished, so confounded, so almost thrown off his guard, that America certainly would never have applauded his songs if he had not been more self-possessed. That a girl should be able to do that which the whole of America could not do—make a young man lose his command of himself!

But surprise can do strange things.

"And little Karin—she spilled the fruit and the milk on the cloth: she blushed, she turned pale, looked up to Ivar with deep-blue, silently-speaking eyes, looked down again, did precisely what every young girl would have done in her situation.

Hedvig continued, "she is called now the daughter of the house, the child of all. We are all of us father and mother to her. And I must confess that there is not a better child in the world. But, as her foster-father, Ivar, you must also assist in her bringing up, and must consider what you can teach her. Music, for example, she has an uncommon talent for—"

Hedvig was called away at this moment. She was obliged to leave the two.

Ivar had difficulty in recovering himself from the surprise he felt at finding the gardener's thin daughter, in this nobly and beautifully developed young woman. And whether it was that he was thinking about his fatherly character, or whether he was pondering upon what he should teach the young daughter of the house, certain it is that he became almost dumb beside her. And this, his dumbness, operated in producing the same in the young girl, and caused her afterward to shed painful tears.

And when Ivar, later in the evening, spoke about the women of America, about their virtues, beauty and agreeableness, she felt herself so completely a nobody, such a "Mamsel Nothing," that she would have liked to vanish out of the world.

What Ivar, however, thought of her, we shall not say for some time.

Ivar was himself not much less changed, even outwardly, than the young girl, but in another way. Hers was the harmonious change from the bud to the flower. He had passed through storm, and the violent struggle between two opposing natures, through the painful severing from a beloved illusion, and the awakening to a new life.

But the scar which remains after the endurance of painful suffering may become a brilliant characteristic of the healthy soul, and thus was it in Ivar's case.

What part the influence of his home, or the genius of the New World, or the noble young woman whose protector he became—an office which always ennobles a man—had in this change I will not determine; enough to say that it was there, great, brilliant, and beautiful. "The savage" had vanished. And if the enthusiastic, intellectual youth was somewhat subdued in him, there was instead a man, grave and mild, in whose countenance, paler, but more significant than formerly, was all the more clearly to be seen that heavenly genius, the features of which Lagertha had seen long ago. And how beautifully did it shine forth now in that expression of countenance with which Ivar regarded his brothers and sisters, in that voice with which he spoke to them.

And Gerda, good young lady reader. If I should now tell thee that she had lost one of her front teeth; that all her beautiful hair had fallen off, and that she now wore a wig, that she had lost the beauty of her smooth skin, and was in every way much plainer in person—thou would'st assuredly never forgive me, and therefore—and also because it would have been quite an abominable falsehood—I do not say so. The pure truth is that Gerda had become considerably handsomer than formerly, that she had grown in every way excepting in length and breadth, and that was not requisite; and quite in accordance with the nature of things, for she had lived in affluence, and her life had been active and happy; she had felt her soul expand, become greater and better, in one word, grow. From such a cause the countenance always becomes beautified. The expression as of a noble independence elevated the pleasure of her existence. The unequal-tempered, capricious girl had entirely disappeared in the gentle and nobly independent young woman.

I hope, my lady-reader, that thou art satisfied.

If, for the rest, I could but make you rightly see how uncle Herkules went on;—how he swore, and was abusive, in his joy at seeing Gerda and Ivar well and happily returned from "that great piece of folly;" and now that he has all his youth again assembled around him, how he clapped, and squeezed, and swung round with Ivar, "Vidfamne," with the "Valkyria," and with Bror, and with all the others too; how affectionately and joyfully Hedvig looked on all;—how Augustin smiled and talked;—how Bror and Gøthilda joked;—how Louise and Maja sprang one round the other, and were at the same time out of breath;—how all "great ones and little things" in the house trooped forth, to contribute to the entertainment—even the favorite cups, favorite dishes, favorite phrases, etc. etc.; and how all this was received, and what an animated scene was this home of the brothers and sisters this evening! Yes, if I could make you see this, it would be charming both for you and me. But I can not do it, and that is quite a pity. But you shall help me with your excellent power of imagination—you shall fancy it all to yourselves.

One of Gerda's first private questions from her elder sister was with respect to Sigurd. But things had not gone well with Sigurd—an unlucky star seemed to have pursued him of late. Shortly after Gerda's separation from him, he became involved in a lawsuit regarding that property which had come to him, by which, owing to the ill-will and low-cunning of his adversary, he had been brought into many difficulties. Sigurd came out of the affair with honor, but with the loss of the greater part of his property. This he bore like a man, and afterward merely worked all the harder, in order once more to place himself and his mother in easy circumstances. One day he was hastily summoned to his mother, who was now the only being in the world whom he appeared to love. She had had a paralytic stroke, and could no longer speak when Sigurd entered the room.

She only took his hand, grasped it firmly, and—then died. After she was dead, it was with difficulty that the living hand could be separated from that of the dead. And this living hand was alive no longer!—it had become paralyzed. It was the right hand.

It was now about a year since this had happened, and spite of all the means with which science is acquainted for the relief of similar paralysis, it had only increased—had extended to the whole arm, and even down the body, so that it became difficult for Sigurd to walk. For the last few months, he had been in Stockholm, to try if any benefit could be obtained from gymnastic exercises, but hitherto without any visible effect. He bore his misfortune without complaint, but his temper had become gloomy and misanthropic. The oppressive state of inactivity in which he lived contributed to its gloom. Augustin had called upon him a few times, but his visits had not been received.

Such was the information which Gerda received of her former betrothed. Sigurd unfortunate, ill, and lonely! Tears flowed forth from Gerda's eyes at these thoughts, and a warm sentiment rose in her breast;—it said, "Go to him!"

SIGURD AND GERDA.

GERDA had not observed it; she had not observed that when she stepped on shore, on her native land, greeted and surrounded by relations and friends, that a hired carriage was standing near this rejoicing group; and that at its window appeared a sorrowful countenance, half hidden by the wide cloak-collar, but whose gloomily-flashing eyes were riveted upon her, the blooming, beaming girl, with an expression which would have darkened those beaming looks had she perceived it. But she was occupied by love and joy; and the figure, which gazed so darkly upon her, did not wish to be seen;—that was evident.

It was the same which on the following day sat alone in a gloomy room, in a dark lane, in Stockholm. He had not slept through the night; he had alternately lain down, and alternately walked about, tormented by anguish of soul and body. This might be seen in his wearied and mournful countenance. Wrapped in his dressing-gown, he now sat, sunk in an arm-chair, with his head bowed over the arm, which, as if withered, hung in a black scarf upon his breast. The picture of yesterday arose before his sight. He again saw that beautiful, vigorous young woman (whom he had at one time called his own), blooming with happiness, with conscious strength and goodness. He followed her in thought into the circle of her family; saw those beaming glances—heard those rejoicing voices—saw those beloved beings form for each other a world of kindness and joy. And he looked around himself. Every thing empty, dead, joyless! Persecuted by fate—misunderstood by mankind—deserted by his friends—here sat he solitary. But it might have been otherwise, that he knew—many things might have been otherwise, that he felt; that he knew of himself, and this was the most painful of all. But—"It is my own fault," said he, sternly, to himself, and permitted no complaint to come forth, but hardened himself against his fate.

And as he sat there, sleep came over him, and in the sleep a dream.

He dreamed that he found himself combating on a field of battle. He stood alone against a superior enemy; he felt himself wounded, but still fought on unvanquished.

He then heard a rushing through the air, and looking up, he saw coming, upon her winged horse, the Virgin of Death, the "Valkyria," she who carries away the combatants to Odin. He saw her, with her black hair streaming in the wind, beneath her helmet—pale, but beautiful, with grave but flashing eyes. Those glances he had seen once before.

A spear was in her hand;—she hurled it from her, and it whistled through the air. Was it her lightning glance, or was it the spear which penetrated his heart? Enough—he felt himself struck. An icy coldness paralyzed his limbs, and lay like a weight of lead upon his breast. He sank down.

"I shall die!" thought he; and turned toward Death a firm brow of defiance, because thus should the bitterness of death be received. Then again he heard the rushing in the air, and she stood quite near to him—she whom he had seen before. There she stood, beautiful and terrible, and bending over him—she kissed him. That kiss took away his breath; and yet he lived!—wonderful!—lived through a mystic relationship to her, whose cold touch had sent ice into his blood, and who now took him as a child in her arms, and held him clasped to her breast. He felt himself borne with her upon the winged steed, through the paths of space; he felt a freer air rushing around him—he seemed to himself to hear the joyful tumult from the “lofty halls”—from the Halls of Odin, where life is an eternal combat, and the combat a daily victory.

And through the veil of her closed eyelids, he seemed to know her glance, which with magic power had overcome him. A desire to awake then came over him, a desire to see more clearly that beautiful countenance which he now saw as through a mist, to return to life, to himself. He struggled with the death-dream, and he—awoke!

He actually awoke. But he believed himself to be still dreaming; because she, indeed, still stood there—the “Valkyria,” with that beautiful pale countenance bending over him, she stood actually there! But was this indeed the Virgin of death—the terrible, the cold? No, it was a living maiden, warm and affectionate. He saw her eyes beam with love—he felt her tears fall upon his brow. That dew was life-giving. His eyes opened. He recognized her! He spoke her name:

“Gerda!—is that you?”

“Yes, Sigurd!” and she looked at him deeply and sorrowfully, and said:

“Sigurd, you have suffered a great deal!”

He replied not. He turned away from her, closed up his soul!

She continued, cheerfully:

“I returned yesterday to Sweden. I then learned that you had suffered a great loss—your mother. I came to you to—how is your arm, Sigurd? It is paralyzed, I have been told. Let me see it. No—you will not refuse me. It is on your mother’s behalf, in her place, that I am here.”

“Your mother!” At that name, which was sacred to the son, he was subdued. He became as a child in spirit. He let Gerda do with him what she would; and in that dear, affectionate determination, which now inspired her being, she was irresistible.

She loosened the black scarf; she took off the dressing-gown.

The paralyzed arm fell as if dead in her lap.

She took it, however, between her hands; pressed it against her burning cheek, wetted it with tears, rubbed it with her beautiful hands warm with life, so that the will, the sentiments which fired the heart, flowed from the tips of the fingers, and through them to the dead limb. She breathed upon it, and—kissed it.

And this—it felt. Its pulse throbbed—a feeling of life streamed through the veins!

Old Ling! if thou hadst seen that the strong will of love here accomplished, in five minutes, that which thy gymnastics could not accomplish in five months! then—yes, then thou wouldst have said:

“The gymnastics of love are the first in the world; but next to these, come mine.”

Sigurd had intended to have been proud and reserved toward Gerda; but, at the sight, at the feeling of this tenderness, this life of love, all the bands which confined his soul were loosened, and the frozen, bitter spirit dissolved in pensive joy! And when that new feeling, which thrilled through his heart, was also communicated to his body, when he felt his arm thrill beneath Gerda’s hand, when he felt the blood flow through the benumbed veins, and when he saw her on her knees before him, so humble and so powerful, all at once he exclaimed:

“Miraculous girl!—thou givest to me new life!”

And so it was. Yes! Denier of miracles; yes, she did so. And that which was begun by the gymnastics of love, was followed up by the widow of Ling (now Branting), until the effect was completed, the paralyzed arm was restored to its full powers.

Greater, however, was the miracle which was wrought in the inner life. That began also at the same moment, but was perfected during the days, weeks, months, in which Sigurd still was a sufferer, and while Gerda was his daily companion—his reader—his secretary—and, beyond all, his sympathizing, affectionate friend.

And the woman, who had formerly set herself up in defiance of Sigurd’s commands, who never could induce herself to act in compliance with his desires, was now attentive to his slightest wishes; she endeavored to read in his looks those which his lips refused to utter.

But the truth is, that Sigurd was now quite a different man to what he had been formerly.

The connection between the two was a wonderful, a mysterious one. They never by a word touched upon the past. They were parted as betrothed; and yet they were now nearer to each other than they were at the time when they were united by this bond. Their souls were now united;—they felt, thought, and conversed together, as they never had done before. Not that they always and on all subjects agreed. Impossible and not entertaining, either. They now often thought differently; but their voices, and their modes of speaking, sounded very unlike what they used to do; and the effect also which was produced, was very unlike that which was produced when they were raised by the spirits of command and defiance.

What might not come out of all this in time?

We shall see in a while. Now we will return to—

THE BROTHER AND SISTER HOME.

It was an active, merry, restless, strange life which prevailed there. There were now together young, powerful human beings, who upon different paths had developed their different talents, and who, by means of them, had attained to clearness and stability even in the outward life. They had arrived at a certain station in their life's career, and now a pause occurred, or rather a moment of rest. Most of them felt that something new must now take place, a higher, a more perfect development of life. This in a particular manner had reference to Ivar and Gerda. The professional life which they had hitherto led was not sufficient for them; therefore, either their professional talents were not sufficiently great to satisfy this, or this was not sufficiently large alone to satisfy their souls. They longed for something else, for something more.

And all the brothers and sisters, and their friends, became, as it were, infected by this longing. But the word, the originating thought, was still wanting to them.

They were all together every day, in particular every evening, these warm, struggling souls. There were they all alive with news from foreign lands, thoughts about mankind, the times, life, both the inward and the outward; then did heart and brain open their chambers and give and receive new light. Drop fell to drop; fire kindled fire.

And the household gods of home guarded and watched it, while all the winds of the world blew up the flames.

Beloved reader! That wind which caresses thy brow, or which whistles at thy window, is indeed the child of the same great wind which roars around the globe and which journeys over all the lands of the earth. Thou hearest in its voice, a voice of the universe.

So is it also with the wind of the spirit—and more so than ever in our days, when steam is united to mind and loosens its fettered wings for an altogether freer flight round the world. And dost thou not hear how it speaks from coast to coast, from land to land, from city to city? Dost thou not hear feeling awake to feeling, thought reply to thought, tone vibrate to tone, and the little islands echo back the accords of the great hemispheres? Dost thou not hear the spheres rush on in altogether purer harmonies, in more inward melodies, altogether more powerful and loftier? Dost thou not hear it?—then bewail thyself. For thine ear is not pure, and thou art deprived of a great enjoyment.

But if thou dost hear it—and knowest of a certainty that thou dost—then must thou also hear, at this time, a certain melody, a certain song which goes through every other, and in which peoples, remotely separated peoples, sing harmoniously together.

It is the song of union, of fraternization on earth, of a great brother-and-sister-life, in which all mankind shall recognize each other as children of the same father-house, born to divide with each other the same inheritance of goodness and joy.

Yes, in this great recognition mankind will be united. It is caused by the spirit of Christianity.

Societies are formed, both small and great, to carry out into life what this spirit desires. Weak human beings give to each other their hands, and thereby they become stronger. The electric stream of the power of God's love more rapidly penetrates them all.

It was a spark of this fire; it was a wind from that wind of which we have just spoken which one day moved among the members of our family circle and united them in one will and for one purpose.

One evening, when Ivar and Gerda had just been speaking of their visit to the celebrated American Manufactory of Lowell, and all had listened with the warmest, the most joyful interest, Augustin all at once sprang up and exclaimed—

"Listen, my friends? We are now many of us, and we ask, what shall we do? what shall we undertake? Why should we not unite ourselves and establish a Swedish Lowell? a community on Swedish ground, with Swedish customs, in which we might endeavor to elevate the work-people to the highest possible improvement, freedom, and happiness, and where every one of us might give his talent to the common weal?"

That was the word—that was the thought—that was the point of union of which there had been an undefined presentiment, and for which all had sought. All at once it was felt by the whole family circle, and as the brooks roar with the unbinding of the fetters of spring, and rush forward to carry their waters to the river, so now hastened gladly brothers and sisters, and friends, with their consent, their gifts and powers to aid in the new work.

This tendency was not, however, new to the greater part of the brothers and sisters. We have long since seen in Hedvig, in Augustin, in Ivar and Gerda, in Uno, and in every one of them in their own way, that lovely tendency which leads man out of his own private I, and his own individual circle, to diffuse generally the good and the happiness which he has himself obtained.

They were all of them in this way children of the very best spirit of the age. Augustin's proposal had merely opened the way by which good desires would make them—selves available; had shown a central point, a definite object around which they could gather.

In the light of enthusiasm this now grew and became more and more beautiful and significant. Patriotism and Christian sentiments give birth to great thoughts, to beautiful institutions.

Ivar was again a fanatic—but this time in the light of a corrected understanding, for that Utopia which was the most beautiful dream of his youth. Gerda sang aloud in joy because she should be able to introduce singing into the life of the people; she divided already the work-people into choruses—the boys' and the girls' choruses—and taught them beautiful, ennobling songs.

Hedvig sat with her deep, loving eyes full of tears, and her heart full of maternal thoughts. She already clasped all the children of the young community in her embrace. Bror undertook to establish a library; he would the very next morning hasten away to three book-auctions to begin the collection.

There is a peculiar kind of joy which a person feels in great and good undertakings in which he is a participator. We do not believe that there is a nobler or a better on earth. It is a joy which elevates his consciousness, and strengthens all his powers. That spirit of the life of the community which permeates his individual life; that sentiment that has united him in thought and action with the noblest interests of the age, give to his existence a higher importance and a greater purpose. Now he knows himself to be one of God's instruments on earth, and more joyfully and more freely he lifts up his eyes to Him.

Sweden has more than once seen spring forth from its bosom, associations, the offspring of a noble thought. That so-called Gothic Association is of this kind, and we all know what beautiful fruits it has borne.

Its object was to regenerate and develop the arts of the fatherland. And it did so. That brother-and-sister unity which is now founded, will form that perfect association, and through and with this, develop the perfect human being.

Will it succeed? The result of it is uncertain. But it is beautiful to attempt that which is great. And we are not without good anticipations; because we see in the association good desires; good heads, and large capital, which is a capital thing in carrying out great ideas.

We see little Bror—thanks, little Bror—with his young bride, stand with their mill-ion ready to employ it in the common enterprise.

We see Mina, the millionaire's second daughter, animated by the same spirit, stand ready with her portion. The young girl has had a clear insight into the blessing of wealth.

We see, in the end, many other persons, out of our family circle, induced to take part in this enterprise, with heart, head, or capital.

Because all enterprise founded upon noble and true principles, has the power of attracting human beings. The noble-minded hear in them a heavenly voice. And they follow it. Others follow with the stream; and thus it grows.

A little deliberative society was formed, to bring into shape the proposal for this new association. The whole conduct and management of the business were confided to Augustin. Even uncle Herkules went to the assembly—for even he was warm for its plans—although some of the members entertained doubts as to the harmony which would subsist between him and the others.

But at the beginning all went on well. All was life and gladness, and brisk activity in the circle of family and friends. And the following winter promised to be lively and active also, for during this time the great plans were to be concerted in readiness for the following spring, when, with the first song of the lark, they were to be carried into operation.

Göthilda merely wondered whether or not "the architect" would come home in time to assist in the buildings. And for the rest, she confined her participation in the general movement, to the "wonder how it would go on." The spirit of community was weak in her. This she acknowledged, with her nose turned up, and smiling and joking lips.

Very much more lively was this spirit in the rest of the family circle. But while it governs them, and while during these winter months a whole new Flora of feelings, thoughts, views, and institutions bloom forth, and life goes forward rapidly, we see a couple of small, private matters going backward, or turned upside down, which we must pay attention to.

1.—We see young Mina, now the heiress of a large fortune, surrounded by a large troop of lovers, who very much resemble the lovers of the late Mrs. Penelope, of Ithaca. And the whole world talks about it, and the whole world expects that she will take that step, make that choice which people, ever since the Jewish dispensation have accustomed themselves to regard as the only one capable of giving happiness to man, and especially to woman; in a word, that the young girl will get married.

But the young girl, who was gifted with a strong mind and a kind heart, had early seen life from any thing but a cheerful point of view, and she had made her own serious reflections on the condition of the world, on life and happiness. And now, when the great troop of lovers rushed all at once toward the heiress, she—retreated backward, made a courtesy, thanked them, but declared, as to that matter, that she wished to remain unmarried.

Her serious proposal was this; that she would become a sister in the association, probably like sister Hedvig, and live happily, simply by employing her talents and her property in making others happy. The cordial and friendly relationship into which she had now entered with many amiable persons, and the views which opened before her for her future life, made her, in the mean time, earnestly and inwardly happy.

The world talked a deal about the strange choice she had made. But whether it was a step forward, or a step backward, which she had taken, they were divided in opinion. And—

What thinks the reader?

But the second is, beyond all question, a turning upside-down of affairs. It is quite a turning upside-down, that Ivar should become the pupil of his former pupil! Yes, but so it is, nevertheless.

Every thing that he thought, every thing that he wrote, of and for the new association, he must involuntarily tell and read to little Karin, and it is extraordinary how he listened to every thought, nay, to every feeling which she had on the subject. But yet it is not a wonder. Little Karin had herself grown up out of the poor working class. She knows its position, its sufferings, its temptations, and needs. She has the deepest sympathies therewith, and that and her naturally correct and fine tact, enable her to throw light on these subjects which can direct even the learned in their principles.

Augustin also listened as attentively as Ivar to the thoughts of the young girl, in particular, as they referred to the condition of young women without money in Sweden, and especially in Stockholm, what it is, and what it ought to be.

It was also to this class—which in this Swedish scheme, as well as that at Lowell, would constitute a great portion of the work-people—that the brothers and sisters turned their attention independently, and to which they would give an especial guardianship. One day Augustin said: "Yes; and if we should never carry out our plans so extensively, that people could walk in our manufactory—as President Jackson did in Lowell—three English miles and a half among rows of young girls in silk-stockings and with parasols, yet still we may come to see that no person shall sink into a bond-slave, but shall elevate himself every day in the week; that no young Swedish woman, the future mother, educator, and fellow-citizen, shall feel herself to be a mean, despised, and despicable being."

Many also of the institutions at Lowell, for the intellectual and moral advancement of the young workwomen, were to be introduced into the Swedish association.

And how happy did this prospect for her poor sisters make little Karin!

We will not conceal the fact, that amidst the upside-down-turned relationship which took place between the former teacher and his pupil, we can see a little malicious divinity, who laughingly shakes his wings above them, because he can see that right through this, the interests of the society, and the interests of all the factory-girls, there is another also which has become important to the young couple, and which, in time, may lead them to—

And he, the ill-natured one, has had from ancient times, a delight in quizzing and confounding people.

Sister Hedvig, however, was much pleased to see the increasing and beautiful affection of the two young couple. They were, indeed, her children.

It was during this cheerful and gay movement; amidst these growing anticipations, that, all at once, there arose upon the vernally-bright heaven—

A DARK CLOUD.

HEDVIG had been awake, several nights, with a dull sound, which she seemed to hear in the house; and, with a disquiet of mind, which was inexplicable to herself, she lay and listened to the sound of footsteps pacing about, and which she thought she could perceive to be near at hand, although their sound was always soft, and nearly always regular, so much so, indeed, that she often could believe they were not human footsteps, but strokes of a hammer, which worked during the night. Her heart, however, seemed compelled involuntarily to beat more violently at this sound, and uneasy thoughts were excited by it.

Hedvig thought of Augustin, and that for some time he had not been quite like himself. Not that he was less kind, less affectionate, or friendly; but he was less gay, and more abstracted. He often was sunk in thought, which did not appear to be cheerful; and when he observed that Hedvig's glance rested inquiringly upon him, he would assume a hasty liveliness, which was not quite natural to him. He had also avoided, for some days, being alone in the evenings with Hedvig, which otherwise was so great a pleasure to him. He assigned as the cause, "having a deal to write," and went early to his own room. Hedvig had indeed endeavored to attribute it to  thought that was required for the colony and the new association, as did Göthilda; but still she felt clearly that this occupation of mind was guiltless of the melancholy in her brother's silence, because these thoughts had always enlivened him, and made him happy. There must be some other cause.

One night, Hedvig heard the footsteps more distinctly, more decidedly than common, and it appeared to her that they were in the general sitting-room, which was below her chamber, and near to which was Augustin's room.

Impelled by an irresistible anxiety, Hedvig arose, lighted a candle, dressed herself, and went down the little staircase which led from her room to the lower story. She listened at the sitting-room door, but she no longer heard any step within; every thing was silent. She softly opened the door, and entered.

It was all dark within—dark and silent. A watch only was ticking, and that showed the hour of midnight.

Hedvig looked attentively round the room, with a peculiar feeling of somebody having lately been there. She thought that she could perceive that the books upon the table, near the sofa, lay differently to what they did in the evening. One volume lay open. Hedvig looked into it. It was a portion of Atterbom's "Swedish Seers and Bards," and it was open at the beautiful sketch of the Life of Frese. Some passages were underlined, and Hedvig read—

"My thoughts stood at the goal from which no one can return. I then considered with myself, whether, in contemplating my own death, I could find pleasure. And, behold! it seemed to me that from the frost of death would proceed the food and sweetness of the strong. I perceived that the bitterness of death could change all my sorrow into joy. This I locked up in my heart as a treasure greater than all the riches of the world!"

In another place, the following words were underdrawn:—

"I will praise thee, my God, my hope, with the lips of light or darkness."

And again, in another place:—

"Let God manifest himself, that the afflicted may meet where an eternity makes them again young and happy!"

"Oh, my God! what does this mean?" thought Hedvig, while an anxious foreboding of some approaching misfortune oppressed her heart; "and who has here during the depth of the night sought consolation?"

At that moment her eye fell upon a blank paper book. She knew it well: it was Augustin's diary, in which he was accustomed to write a few words every evening. It now lay open upon the table, and beside it stood the ink-stand, with the pen in it, which seemed to show that he had just been writing. Hedvig's eyes were involuntarily riveted upon some lines which seemed still moist, and she read the following:—

"I have spoken with M——. He leaves me no doubt as to my condition—as to what I have to expect and to fear. Thus far and no longer!—

"It has come on singularly; unperceived—like a thief in the night. And now it is there, and must be met—must!"

"I have scarcely been willing to believe it. I have thought that it must be other wise, must pass over; but the long continuance of the suffering, and M——'s word, have convinced me.

"It is hard for me. It is difficult to me. I will acknowledge it, because it is so. I was too happy—I was too much attached to earthly life, with my beloved, my friends, and those plans for the future, which would be the means of happiness to so many!!!—And now—now, all at once, an end—an end!—An end! Nay, good God! Not an end; that I do not believe. But still—farewell to so much, to so many—and—

"My Hedvig—my beloved Hedvig!"

Hedvig could not read any farther. A dimness came over her sight, a cold sweat bathed her forehead, and her knees trembled.

"Where is he?" asked she half aloud. "I must see him—must know!"

And as she looked up, and was about to rise, behold!—there stood Augustin, and extended his arms toward her.

He stood there like an angel of consolation and love, ready to take the bitterness from the cup which she had to drink.

And how affectionately and mercifully he now informed the trembling Hedvig of his condition and of his danger, with, at the same time, a possibility of his being restored—a possibility in which, however, he himself did not believe.

Augustin's malady was of that terrible kind, which remains for a long time deeply concealed, and which steals upon the constitution without any forewarning, and which, when it exhibits itself, is considered fatal, as nothing besides a painful operation can save life.

Such was Augustin's condition; but, when he saw the terrible effect which this communication produced upon Hedvig, he endeavored only to soften the danger and recall hope.

"I have," said he, "frightened myself by not communicating this matter to you, and by allowing it to weigh only on me. You have spoiled me, Hedvig, by always bearing half of every thing that was oppressive to me. And now, I know, that after I have talked about it to you, it will seem to me much less dangerous; and it will, in the end, not be so at all. But, should it become otherwise, should it be the will of God to separate us for a little time, promise me, my Hedvig, to help me to bear it, to support me with your heavenly mind; raise up your too worldly brother! We know, indeed, Hedvig, after all, that we shall always have each other—that we shall always continue to be united. This is a divine joy and a certainty which nothing can take away from us. And this I know, Hedvig, that if I can but see you cheerfully and courageously meet whatever may happen, that I also shall meet it with cheerfulness."

Thus talked he nobly and kindly; and Hedvig, she wept much and painfully, but the admiration and love which her brother caused her at this moment to feel, was to her so delightful and so invigorating, that her heart had power to lift itself above misfortune. She will deserve his confidence; she will become to him what he wishes her to be. She dried her tears, kissed him, and said:

"I will endeavor."

"Thanks," said he, with a cheerful look, and kissed her hand. "If you only knew how good and strengthening this is to me! Ah! I feel myself quite light and cheerful again. I feel that you were given to me as 'a help' in life. God bless you! And now away with dejection and gloomy thoughts; now fresh to life again, and to our plans for the future. Now I shall work right zealously for them, and we shall divide pleasure and pain as we did formerly. We have still two or three months, Hedvig, before the question of my life comes in operation; before M—— can help me, and till then we shall have important work to do."

From this moment, Augustin devoted himself with more lively activity than formerly to the carrying out of the work which he had proposed. And Hedvig now sate by his side, during the hours of the night when he was not able to sleep, and made the labor easier and more cheerful. And while Augustin felt the progress of the malady would destroy his earthly frame, he felt, with a certain sublime joy, how his spirit emancipated itself, and was able, during the decline of the temporal being, to labor for eternal purposes. And while his body became weaker, his soul became stronger and greater.

As Augustin's illness soon made it difficult for him to go out, the friends of the association assembled in his room, and here it was that the consultations took place.

And here there was life, life! There often was no one in this assembly who bore it in mind that he who conducted it, he whose living thoughts and living words animated and held all together, bore in himself the seed of an approaching and painful death. Yes! One there was, however, who never, almost never forgot it; there she sate, with her brother, at her frame or her needlework, and listened to the others, and even occasionally took part in the conversation. One there was, whose warmest feelings were thrilled through by this thought, as by an ice-wind; it was a loving soul—and you know who it was.

A great deal was brought forward during these conversations; many, many thoughts and proposals, enough to fill large magazines.

Preserve me from having to give an account of them all! Some few grains, however, fallen out of the sheaves of thought, have I picked up—and the reader may either pass them by or glean them up according to his pleasure. I present them now as

SUNDRIES.

AUGUSTIN had a little difficulty sometimes to keep the balance equal between two of his friends. The one would give too much, and the other altogether too little:

To the first Augustin said—

"Softly! Nothing for nothing! We would gladly provide our work-people with every good thing; but they must themselves obtain them. We will, therefore, place them in a condition to acquire them by their industry and good behavior. To deny ourselves, to give up, does no harm in the beginning. Nay, it is beneficial. Have not most of us begun with it? I remember very well how I many a time, at the University, went out at dinner time, and wandered about the streets, to dissipate the hunger which I had not the means of satisfying; and how many an act of self-denial, my young comrades and I were obliged to submit to. But we knew that we were laboring for preferment, and for a certain after-advantage. This supported temper and courage, and enabled us cheerfully to bear the renunciation, which was, at the same time, a good teacher. Nay, we should not be frigid with our work-people, but should give them the best that we have for ourselves; a position in life in which they can, from year to year,—nay, from month to month—make an advance onward; in which they can improve themselves, lay up something for their children, and prepare for themselves a calm old age. But we must firmly establish the principle—to every one according to his merits.

"Yes, this must become the law.

"But in order that justice may here become perfect, we must judge of the merit and reward it according to the Gospel. And here allow me, my friends, to read you a portion of the Gospel, which I confess was formerly a stumbling-stone to me. Now it is a source of pleasure, because I believe myself to understand its deeper meaning. And this is applicable also to our proposed scheme."

And Augustin read aloud the following from the Gospel of St. Matthew, chap. 20.

"For the Kingdom of Heaven is like unto a man that is an householder, which went out early in the morning to hire laborers into his vineyard.

"And when he had agreed with the laborers for a penny a day, he sent them into his vineyard.

"And he went out about the third hour.

and saw others standing idle in the market-place.

"And he said unto them : Go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is right I will give you. And they went their way.

"Again he went out about the sixth and ninth hour, and did likewise.

"And about the eleventh hour he went out and found others standing idle, and saith unto them, why stand ye here all the day idle ?

"And they said unto him, Because no man hath hired us. He saith unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is right that shall ye receive.

"So when even was come the Lord of the vineyard saith unto his steward, call the laborers and give them their hire, beginning from the first unto the last.

"And when they came that were hired about the eleventh hour, they received every man a penny.

"But when the first came, they supposed that they should have received more ; and they likewise received every man a penny.

"But when they had received it, they murmured against the good man of the house,

"Saying, these last have but wrought but one hour, and thou hast made them equal unto us, which have borne the burden and the heat of the day.

"But he answered one of them and said, Friend, I do thee no wrong ; didst not thou agree with me for a penny ?

"Take thine and go thy way : I will give unto this last even as unto thee.

"Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own ? Is thine eye evil because I am good ?"

"And now," continued Augustin, "I will apply this to our enterprise in this way.

"Merit shall be estimated not merely from the consideration of advantage. The honest endeavor, the good-will must also have its rank, and its value ought to be reckoned as merit.

"And in this way we enter into the kingdom of heavenly justice.

"You see, my friends, I am so arrogant that I claim for us in our society that we should take the place of the great husbandman—should represent God the Father ! And this would be an unpardonably bold word, were it not spoken with a heart in the dust ! In short, we must, beside the usual money-reward of labor, introduce a new one, a reward for industry and good conduct.

"From this, at the close of every month or quarter of a year shall be advanced the wages of merit, equally great for the unskillful workman as for him who is the most dextrous, when it is merely proved that the former as well as the latter did what he was able to do, when honestly commanded to work.

"I know that many land-owners and others, who have servants in their employment, act toward them in this way. And I wish merely that what is done accidentally and imperfectly elsewhere should become a principle in our association, and that moral-wages of merit should be given to its members. And thus in this small way the great husbandman's will might be done as in heaven so on earth.

"And that this heavenly justice added to worldly prudence would, in the long run, conduce to our greatest worldly advantage, it is not difficult to foresee."

To the other—the one whose views were contracted—Augustin said :

"We are very careful about our own enjoyments ; we consider it of the highest importance that every day should have some moments of refreshment and pleasure. And it ought to be so, because it is conformable with our nature and our needs. And I maintain that our Lord desires that it should be so ; his wish is to see us all happy and cheerful. Has he not made the communion of love as the very heart of his church ? Nothing is more certain to me than that Christianity is a doctrine of happiness, as well as a doctrine of wisdom for this life, and the one which is to come ; that it gives a blessing as well to our work as to our repose, and will that water should be turned to wine. And when we thus act toward those who are dependent upon us, give them opportunities for that enjoyment which we wish for ourselves, we only fulfill our duty as Christians. Even the heathen acknowledged this duty, and had days—for example, the Roman Saturnalia—when liberty was given to all their slaves, and even to their animals, to enjoy the festival of life. But it was merely for a few days. We will infuse into the chalice of every day some drops of the enjoyment of existence, and give pure pleasure to the members of the association.

"The work which we have in hand is, in reality, nothing but that we meditate, in an amicable spirit, a change in society, which, sooner or later, in its despite, will be brought about. And in doing this we benefit ourselves, quite as much as those whom we seek to benefit. Do not let us, therefore, call it doing good. Let us call it doing what is right. Let us call it pure, human pleasure.

"And as a means of pleasure in our society, we must have entertaining societies, with dances, music, games ; and we must be there ourselves also ; we must take part in them ourselves."

"Take part in them ourselves ?" Many people thought this would not answer.

"But this would be precisely the thing," said Augustin, "which would be important and highly advantageous. That personal, cordial relationship between the more cultivated classes, and those which are less so—a relationship which ought to extend to all classes of society—is precisely that which is peculiarly beneficial, and the best lever of society. And since the Highest descended to us, in order to raise us to himself, that is, to the highest movement-power of society; descending on purpose to elevate; He has shown us the way. For the rest," continued Augustin, with his beautiful smile, "it is, after this condescension, almost ridiculous to talk about condescension among human beings."

Lectures were also, as a matter of course, to be given in the society. Lectures belong to the arrangements of the day. A good arrangement, I think, most certainly. And Ivar, Uno, and David, they would all of them read lectures in the lecture-room.

When little Dr. Lund inquired, "What were to be the subjects on which they would lecture?" and was told, in reply, a number of different subjects, he exclaimed with animation—

"I could not have thought it! You will lecture on every thing except the most important of all—that is to say, Theology. And in particular it is of the very highest importance nowadays to endeavor to make it popular and comprehensible to the unlearned. It is high time that the reason of Christianity found its way to the reason of the people, that it may counterbalance all that unreason or half-reason, which endeavors to confound it, and in order to teach them how they may acquit themselves in the questions which will arise, and to be able to defend their holy belief against the attacks of infidelity and doubt.

"It makes me angry, yes, both angry and grieved, when I hear people who otherwise mean well toward their fellow-creatures and Christianity, preach against reason as an enemy to faith and revelation.

"Is it not to set them down as something irrational—to set enmity between the reason of God and the reason of man? Just as if the latter were not the offspring of the former, created to conceive and to comprehend, and comprehending, to adore its highest revelation on earth.

"Nay, I say; take reason, and understanding, and science, to help you, and when you, by their aid, have endeavored to conceive and to understand the height, and breadth, and depth of God's wonderful revelation, so that you can see its whole connection—behold! as is quite right, man stands there as a child in the presence of the great and good father, believing and adoring; believing precisely because he understands; believing even where he does not fully understand, because he now, for the first time, properly understands the Divine; because he now knows in whom and what he believes. Yes, first of all enter into the child-like spirit, and with this we then enter into the kingdom of heaven. Is it not so, sister Hedvig?"

"Right! right!" said Hedvig, with beaming eyes. "But talk about this to the many; do you, yourself, give the lecture you speak of."

"Ah! how gladly would I do so, if I only could!" replied the old man warmly. "But I am not capable of it. I am old; my voice is weak and broken; and an old school-fox like me can scarcely express himself in a sufficiently popular manner. The old scholastic phrases lie continually on my lips and in my way; and I might say the very best things, and the people would believe, nevertheless, that I was talking Arabic, and wished to lead them into some new paganism. No, take in preference another teacher. The limits between learned and unlearned, priest and layman, exist no longer as formerly, and I know a few of my young friends here who, far better than I, could accomplish the important work of making Theology, or Christian Philosophy, popular. Uno—a great blessing has been conferred on you. Go, and communicate its fruit to your brethren!"

As regarded the internal administrative regulations of the Association, Augustin laid the highest importance upon the establishment of a savings' bank, to the prudent management of which he devoted particular attention. For this purpose, he adopted the most celebrated economic calculations of the time, which a prudent and benevolent guardianship of the wealthy might apply for the benefit of the indigent in the Association.

For the rest, Augustin satisfied himself with connecting the prosperity of the work-man with that of the institution for which he worked. The first ought, as a matter of course, be bound up with the latter.

They talked about dwelling-houses. Augustin wished not to have any great Phalanstrian establishments. "Where they have been erected they have not answered," said he; "and least of all would they answer with us in Sweden. Because in the Swedish disposition exists the desire for each man to have his own. There is for him no comfort except in his own home, and upon his own spot of ground. I will, for our work-people, erect small dwelling-houses for two, or, at most, four families under each roof. Every family ought to have two rooms and a kitchen. I know that this will be more expensive than a common kitchen and a large common dwelling-house. But we should gain in the comfort and fidelity of our work-people what we expended in money. And the advantage which we look for is not mere-of that of sordid interest. These dwellings shall be of wood, simple but tasteful, with variety in their design, and roofed with red tile. By every dwelling we will plant a few trees, and, if possible, let every household have a little garden, or at least an inclosure where they can sow and plant something. I know how these little pieces of their own ground attach men to the places which possess them.

"I wish very much that we could obtain one thing for our work-people, and that is a large park where they could have an opportunity of enjoying life in the open air, and the innocent pleasures which would thence accrue—where they would, during spring and summer, be able to recreate themselves every holiday with the freshness of rural life and the beauties of nature. For autumn and winter evenings we have the great hall of the school-house, where they would assemble and where we must also take care to have beautiful works of art which may develop the sense of beauty, and where reading and music may agreeably employ, give pleasure, and, at the same time, ennoble."

One arrangement within the Association which was warmly advocated by the brothers and sisters, was the establishment of a Tribunal of Peace, a union of that which is public in Norway and of the patriarchal great village-law in Dalecarlia. Before this all quarrels and lesser offenses committed within the Association should be brought, and, if possible, adjusted or reconciled. The work-people themselves should every year elect the members of this court, and each one should possess the right of voting and sitting in it.

"And we should endeavor so to regulate ourselves," said Augustin, "that no prison or house of correction should be enriched from our Association!"

"And one of the first laws which our court of justice shall inculcate and be observant of," exclaimed Uno, "shall have reference to the treatment of domestic animals. England and France have established fines and punishment for the ill-treatment of animals. Why should the Swedes be behind these people in humanity?"

"No! let it not be said of us, that we thoughtlessly abandoned to the heedless or the cruel those of our workers who are dumb, and who are deprived of the power of demanding their own rights, or of presenting their complaints. No! let us ourselves become their spokesmen, and not permit that the most hard-working and the most faithful of our servants should suffer an injustice. Not so! we will have around us happy human beings and happy animals!"

The motion was unanimously and warmly adopted. And Göthilda informed of this by Bror, promised purposely for this paragraph in the Legislative Book of the Association to design a vignette, representing the Holy Family, with the ass, which should have a remarkably interesting physiognomy.

But Göthilda felt in this only half of that which was affecting and deep in the thought—which the popular sentiment* and the genius of art long since appropriated to themselves—that the animals have their place by the manger of the Saviour, and that they belong to the picture of the Holy Family.

"Yes!" exclaimed Dr. Lund one day, "now I see nothing further to be done than to christen the new town which I see springing up with the red-tiled roofs and the green trees—and sister Hedvig shall do that; she who sits there and is silent, but who secretly has kindled all these operations by the fire of her love and her good-will—for all. Sister Hedvig shall give a name to the new town."

"Nay, nay!" said Hedvig, "that you yourself must do, my dear father, otherwise the christening will be good for nothing."

"Well, then," exclaimed the doctor with vivacity. "I baptize the new town by the old Swedish name of Birka! It is indeed on Birch Island that it will be situated, and we will plant birches beside the houses of the workmen. It was in that old Birka in this region, that Christianity was first preached. It is a grain of that seed which now is growing up in the old ground, with harvests for the seed time. No! not for time merely, for eternity. Not for earth merely, but for Heaven."

"Long live the new Birka."

There was a joyful murmur in the company. "Long live the new Birka, and Birch Island, and the birches and all of us together!"

"For we also are workers," said Ivar, "are workers every one according to his power. And the work of the head ought not, indeed, to be considered as meaner than that of the hand. Who here has labored for the whole Association like brother Augustin?"

"And, therefore, we must drink a toast, and get up a ball, and have a song at it," exclaimed Bror, "and we must invite uncle Herkules to it. He will not refuse to get up a ball with us; that will be for the christening of this young child, Birka."

General Herkules had otherwise already withdrawn his countenance from the assembly of the Association.

There had, as a part of the members had foreseen, very soon arisen differences between the old and the young, in their way of viewing affairs.

* Thus, in Sweden, the peasants are accustomed to give their animals a feast at Christmas, to shine a light in their eyes, so that they may see "the star;" and then they say to them, "Now it is Christmas!"

General Herkules wished the well-being of the people, but he wished to effect it by being their continual guardian and dictator. He wished to govern it in a paternal manner, but—he would govern.

Augustin, as the head of the younger party, wished to prepare the people gradually for improvement, as well inward as outward; he desired to work through education, through influence and example, but for the rest, he desired to let the people—govern themselves.

"It will never do—it will go to the d—l!" exclaimed uncle Herkules.

"It will, it must succeed, and will go to Heaven!" answered Augustin, "so far, as independently good and thinking men belong to it." And he endeavored to prove his statement.

General Herkules replied with violence. Augustin answered and explained, but neither could move the other from his position. At length, the old count grew angry, struck his clenched fist upon the table, and said:—

"Go to the d—l as you like. I will not trouble myself about your schemes; I have told you the truth, and you will one day find it out. The d—l take all manufactories or republics. But we shall continue to be good friends for all that, Augustin! shall we not?"

And immediately across the gulf, or the boundary which divided them, they cordially gave their hands to each other.

Strong-minded characters do not allow differences of opinion to separate them. They might stand on the two opposite sides, and yet remain friends, and yet work together for the common good. And General Herkules showed this strong-mindedness when he afterward took upon himself the direction of the new Association Savings' Bank, and the management of this difficult and responsible concern.

"But then I know, at least, that I do good," said he. "I know that something is accomplished which is for the advantage and the use of all."

We now leave the assembly of consultation, to talk a little privately about—

GENERAL HERKULES AND GOTHILDA.

LIFE is a state of warfare, and nobody knew this better than the old count. Many who, like him in the days of their strength, have boldly fought with the enemies of their country in grand armies, have to fight in their old age with a troop of dwarfs, who are called ailments, bad humor, sleeplessness, indigestion, and so on. Walter Scott calls this the little war. And for many a one it is more difficult than the great war.

"Old age jokes with me sometimes," said the great Oxenstjerna when he felt infirmities of old age seize upon him and would not be conquered by them, as the strong Thor with the feeble old woman Ella.* Neither would our noble old hero. It was true, however, that for some time the strong body had begun somewhat to bend under the infirmities of years, and the temper had become more irritable and harder to please.

"It has been so uncommonly wearisome in the family of late," grumbled he sometimes. "No commotions, no 'stormy dance' does one see any longer; no Bellman does one hear nowadays. That confounded philanthropy has driven all merriment out of the house. And just for rationality and human love one can not any longer be comfortable or merry. We do nothing but sit and lay our heads together in committees and conclaves, and fancy that we are to renovate the world. Stupid talk! no! much rather would I go out into the woods and meadows and see how God has done it. And then I can see also that every hare has its time. But the d—l knows where the hares are gone to of late. I fancy, on my soul, that they too are holding philanthropic committees. They are learning to manage their affairs; considering whether it is advisable to make the wolves members of the association. The world is getting so wise and so humane that it is getting quite unbearable."

Another time he said to Hedvig, "My child, I am beginning to get old. I feel it. I get peevish, and bad-tempered. You will be tired of me. D—l take me if I am not tired of myself. I am good for nothing any longer down here. I would that our Lord would quickly order me above. Remember, Hedvig, that I will not have any pomp at my funeral. I will only lie on fresh pine twigs in my coffin, and old soldiers shall carry me to the grave."

A few days after this, however, the old man was again out in the open air, and came home cheerful with the first spring-flowers, which he presented to Hedvig.

"A glorious morning!" exclaimed he, "and there have we now spring again. People should go out into the world and not shut themselves up all in a crowd within doors, like Kettil o'Christen. Out into the world, people should go out into life! God is after all, most mighty, and rules over every thing, and governs every thing for the best."

And merrily thundered again Thor's hammer through the house, as if it would crush all the imps.

The general proposed at this time to build upon Birch Island a house for his servant Stolt, to which he was to remove after the general's death, with the old trophies of war. And he now busied himself with all the various matters which belonged to this arrangement.

* Old age.

Göthilda, who was not altogether entertained by these philanthropic conclaves, occupied herself now more exclusively with the old man; found means of assisting him in his work, and amusing him continually with her fancies and her comic discoveries, called herself his "journeyman," and was his daily companion.

"You do not go away from me as the others do," said the general sometimes affectionately to the young girl. "You will remain with me, you will!"

"In life and in death!" replied Göthilda, energetically.

And the old man became with his new work and his merry "journeyman" once more young and cheerful, in spite of rheumatism and philanthropy.

And when Bror came with his proposition about the ball and the toast, he did not say no. Merely that he must be permitted to sing his own pleasant tune.

And to this it was not advisable to say no.

THOUGHTS OF DEATH.

"MAN is bound by a thousand threads to humanity, although he may not observe them until he is about to leave them; as the spider-web is not perceived until the frost is on it," says Von Unge, sorrowfully and truly, in his interesting book, "Walks in the Fatherland" (of which we could wish for a new edition).

Haast thou, however, observed, during a beautiful autumn morning, fine, glittering threads floating in the air, sprinkled with tears of dew, and lighted up by the sun? They are called "Mary's silken threads;" and they beam on such mornings like little rainbows, which attach themselves to the leaves and flowers of earth.

And when a beloved and esteemed human being is threatened with death, and is about to take his leave of this world, we then see beaming around him these silken threads, which are illumined by the tears and the sun of affection.

And that was now the case with Augustin. Now, for the first time, he discovered how much he had made himself beloved; and that from far and near the threads glimmered.

Lagertha Knutson had of late—since Augustin's illness—been a more frequent visitor at the house of the Dalbergs. Between herself, Augustin, and Hedvig, there had long since been formed a beautiful and cordial bond of friendship, founded on mutual esteem and admiration. It was a source of grief, therefore, to the brother and sister, that Lagertha, within a short time, must leave them, in consequence of letters which recalled her to her native country and her family.

One day, when she came, an extraordinary dejection was apparent in her usually so determined, serene, and even proud demeanor. Augustin, who received her alone, immediately observed it, and said, half jestingly, as he took her hand—

"What is amiss with Miss Iceland! Why so misty and dark? Where is the bright midnight sun?"

"It has set," replied Lagertha, as she endeavored to smile. It is so painful to me that I must leave you and Sweden, without having given you any pleasure. My great work remains incomplete—that I know. For some time I have been growing benumbed, unable to work as I wish to do. I shall not be able to complete the figure of the last of my Fates, 'Skuld.'"

"The Fate of the accomplished work!" exclaimed Augustin. "Ah, that is a pity! That beautiful group of the Fates! I had pleased myself so with the idea of seeing it complete! Oh, yes, Lagertha, it must be! Why should it not? And what is there that can become impossible to one who can do every thing that she will?"

"Those were presumptuous words," said Lagertha; "and they have been punished. No, I would, but I can not. Courage and serenity of mind are wanting in me."

"But will they not return? Will not they again awake? Think that they will—and how they might."

"They might do so; and I know how. A joy, a sunbeam—but they will not come, and he who prevents it is—you, Augustin Dalberg!"

"I?" exclaimed Augustin, disturbed, and looked at her inquiringly.

Lagertha turned her countenance half away, as she stood there before him; it was pale, and the eyes were filled with tears. She trembled, and upon her lips trembled the words, "You are in danger—are dying!" but they were not uttered.

Augustin, however, heard them in her soul, and, greatly affected, he seized her hand, and said—

"Lagertha!"

She looked up to him, and his warm, beaming glance met hers. A living spark flew from the one to the other; and this expressed what no words could fully utter.

Augustin was a man without self-love; but the consciousness of a noble and a proud woman's devotion made his heart beat warmer and with increased animation.

He drew her hand to his heart, and said, "But if I recover—if I again live for my beloved, for my friends, will not then your statue succeed?"

"Yes," exclaimed Lagertha; "yes, because then the expression will be that of a song of praise."

"Oh, Lagertha!" said Augustin, with affection, and pressed her hand to his brow and to his lips, "make not life too dear to me! do not make it difficult for me to die. I must indeed wish to live, when such friends set such a value on my life. And," continued he, with his angelic smile, "I shall indeed become that which most of all I detest in a man—I shall become—vain! but"—continued he, with sudden and joyful impulse—"I have then a desire to be so to some purpose. Lagertha, if you love me, give me a proof of it. I have rejoiced so much over your great work—nay, I have been proud of it, as the product of northern art, and as a work of my friend! And now, you must not leave it imperfect Lagertha. You must successfully finish also the last, the most difficult of the Norna figures; I demand it in the name of our friendship. Noble, beloved Lagertha! I desire from you this delight!

"Completion! perfection! you will derive your strength for this statue from a thread of human life. Ah, away with it! Do you not feel in your own soul a higher image of completion than this? Did you not hear it in the songs of the swans in your native island? Did you not see it in the crown of the northern lights? Do you not feel it in that which is taking place this moment between yourself and me, in the relationship which this moment completes, and which eternity shall not dissolve? No, no, Lagertha, your statue of the Fate shall speak of completion and perfection even in death, and in defiance of it. Then shall be sung the praise of the spirit's victory over all weakness and all death! and therefore does this follow the combating Fate. Go, beloved Lagertha, accomplish your work. That which I desire, is desired also by the spirit of Scandinavia, which demands from you your own spirit. Perfect the work, and then come and let me rejoice with you. Let us rejoice over your work together."

There are moments in life when the human being has great power over his fellow. They are moments of inspiration when he utters that which no learning, no science, no art could utter, but with which he can only be inspired by the fire of divine feeling. And as "fire kindles fire" so can he communicate his own feelings, his own power, to the breast of another. And thence arises an independent flame.

Thus was it with Lagertha. Tenderness, astonishment, admiration, woke up the benumbed spirit of life—the thoughts which Augustin expressed were kindred to her own. They now arose out of their grave.

She returned home, animated by renewed will and in a few hours perfected that problem, which she during years had in vain endeavored to solve. And she saw that her work was good, and her soul exulted over it.

"It shall become his! my work shall adorn his work!" thought she, in the joyfulness of a proud humility. "And then—whether he lives or dies—I shall in a while visit my native island, my cradle; shall behold the sea, the strong and the great; shall behold the northern lights form their crown in the night, and hear the song of the swans, and again become strong! But—was indeed—is indeed this feeling, which elevated my power—weakness?"

It is not a difficult thing for solitary, strong souls to liberate themselves from the bond of sorrow. That problem, that work of completion in life is the power which releases and lifts them up. It is otherwise with sister-souls on earth, whose life is to love, to share, to suffer, to bear, who live more in another, than in, or for themselves.

Is was otherwise for Hedvig than for Lagertha.

Hedvig had long put from herself the thought of Augustin's danger, the thought of the moment which should decide his fate and hers; she had endeavored to remove it from her, as a person in sleep endeavors to defend himself from an approaching, horrible specter. She will not believe that the noble, beloved brother, the joy and support of so many, her all on earth, should now, in the prime of life, be torn away from them. Now, however, as the time and the moment drew nearer when the question should be decided, when she saw the preparations made; when she saw every thing assume that character, as when some event was about to happen, she was at times seized upon by a feeling which resembled a panic dread. Her heart felt an anguish of death, she cast her eyes around her for help, and day after day she became paler.

"But could not her piety, her fear of God—?"

Dear child! talk about that when you have gone through a trial such as hers. That steadfast glance on high may preserve you from complainings, from murmurings, but not the soul from being "afflicted unto death," nor the body from sinking beneath the weight of the cross.

Hedvig's state of mind was also participated, more or less, by all in the house. In proportion as the dark cloud which rested over the head of Augustin approached nearer, sank lower down, did a mournful and anxious silence fall upon the family. Nobody was cheerful. All glances, betrayed disquiet. Uncle Herkules no longer sang at his work, and Gôthilda had no more any merry sallies of wit and fun.

Augustin himself was the calmest of all. He liked to see his brothers and sisters, and his friends around him, and to converse with them on all passing topics with cheerfulness and without reserve.

Sometimes he shut himself within his own room. And when, after a short time, he returned to his brothers and sisters, they could see in his eyes, and on his countenance, a splendor which seemed not to be of this world.

And thus approached the appointed day and moment.

VISIONS AND APPARITIONS.

It was evening—the evening before the dreaded day—the rain beat against the window, and the spring-tempest roared wildly. Before an open, crackling fire in Augustin's room, sat himself, Uno, and little Dr. Lund. The room looked most comfortably, and all the more so as, by the fire-light, they could see in the outer room sister Hedvig busied in the preparation of tea.

The three friends before the fire were talking confidentially. Dr. Lund's favorite topic was now the subject of discourse. And we know that he loved to place himself on the dark boundary between two worlds, and to search after the lights and the sounds which come from the unknown—over to us into that which is more familiar, to that in which we move and have our every day being.

Rational people wondered at this peculiarity in the wise and deeply learned man, and that he could be so irrational, etc. Others, again—people of genius—did not wonder.

He was this evening more than usually engaged in questions regarding the connection between the spirit-world and this.

Augustin said—

“That which appears to me singular and almost melancholy is, that among the many narratives which have come to us, from all times and all countries, about spiritual appearances, and such-like revelations, so very few are of a lofty and really spiritual character. Many of them are insignificant and trifling, or are some way connected with deeds of murder and revenge.”

“Yes, I must say,” exclaimed the little doctor, smiling, and pulling himself by the hair, “that many of the spirits which come again are only a sort of downy, misty spirits, just a sort of mongrel race which have their home neither in heaven nor hell. And it is certainly melancholy, as far as it is not exactly the contrary. There is perhaps a very excellent and edifying lesson which people may derive from this, namely:—that they should take care that they do not become misty or mongrel while they are here on earth, lest they should come again as such after death; and that the good and blessed spirits go into a region too high for them to feel any drawing toward the earth; and that they have a knowledge with regard to the fate of their beloved survivors which annuls the necessity of direct communication with them. Because, that they at all events work for them, and in the end operate upon them, is beyond all doubt. It is in accordance with the ordinances of spiritual nature, and therefore there exist numberless historical proofs of it. But neither are there wanting immediate meetings of higher character between people who loved one another, and became separated by death. We see that under certain circumstances such revelations have been permitted. And here sits a man”—and he nodded at Uno, while he riveted upon him his vivacious and benevolent eyes—“here sits a man who could, I am sure, if he would, relate us something very remarkable on this subject. Dear Uno! you have sometimes hinted that a revelation was the cause of the happy change which passed through your mind. Will you not now relate to us what you experienced? I have long wished to know it, and longed to ask you about it; although I refrained from doing so because I saw that you did not like the subject to be touched upon.”

“And the same with myself,” said Augustin.

“And now, at this moment, it would be most welcome to me to have some light thrown on the subject of the relationship between friends separated by death, and to know whether they are able to communicate with each other, under unusual circumstances, as in your case.”

Uno was silent for a moment, as if considering—and at length said:

“To you, my friends, and to Hedvig, I can very well relate my experience; because with you I have not to fear that suspicion—that half-derision, with which the greater part of mankind would bear my story. It has been, and it is, the most valuable treasure of my life—and its highest delight, and no person can take it away from me; still I should feel it to be a profanation to reveal the sanctuary of my soul to an unworthy one. And therefore—but, once more, my hesitation has no reference to you.”

And with a low and almost inaudible voice Uno now related as follows.*

“You all of you know what was my state of mind after Engel's death. You know, at least, that I was as if dead to life, and to all the pleasures of earth. I can not describe my inward unhappiness. One single form and horrible thought had taken possession of my soul, and tormented it night and day, like an ill spirit! My wife had died—died, unfortunately, through my means. And now, we were separated forever. The whole world was to me a dark grave, where death had his unhappy sacrifices; and, above and around, I only saw a horrible, empty space—an infinite gulf, where brooded the eternal nothingness. But, no! I can not yet speak of that without dread. I do not understand how it was that I did not go mad! How long I sat in my darkness, I know not: but this I do know, that one day it became light—light forever! All at once, I saw—her, she who was my continual thought, and my sorrow! Her form became clear by degrees, and came, as it were, out of darkness; her beloved, beautiful countenance smiled as she looked at me, clearly, brightly—actually it was she; she stood there before me—but rather above me—beaming in youth and beauty, and so affectionately, with such inexpressible grace and tenderness. Oh! if you had seen—if you could imagine it; but you can not! Yes, it was she—my wife, my Engel, as in former days, only more beautiful and glorified; and I heard her say:

“Sorrow not, my beloved! sorrow not for me. I am happy. I am unspeakably happy!—but thy sorrow I could not bear; and, therefore, have I come to thee, although it has been difficult. And now, beloved, I shall not again come to thee: but thou shalt come to me, where I wait for thee, never to be separated more!—”

“After this she vanished from my sight, softly as she had come. I seemed to myself to hear the most delightful music; a bright light remained for a moment. But that felicity which sprang up in my soul, no words can now describe.

“Oh, my friends! the whole world, life, had changed before my sight. They ascended before me out of the grave, and that you know. She, my wife, have I never seen again, as then. But an unceasing certainty, an incessant joy, has arisen like a bright light in my breast; and I know that they will conduct me through life, through death, to her, to my partner, in our Father’s house!”

Not a sound was heard in the room after Uno ceased to speak. The flames of the fire were reflected in the beaming eyes, which were thankfully fixed upon them.

Toward the close of the relation, Göthilda had unobservedly entered the room. Uno’s low, mysterious voice, the words which she picked up, and which had reference to some supernatural occurrence, some spiritual appearance, all this produced in Göthilda an indescribable sadness, and with a shudder through both soul and body, she went out of the dimly-lighted room to order in candles.

In doing this, however, she had to pass through the hall, where she stopped all at once, as if riveted to the ground, and with difficulty prevented herself from uttering a cry of horror. There stood in the hall, in the deep twilight, a tall and silently dark figure. And we must acknowledge, that our little heroic Göthilda was nothing less than bold when there was certain danger. In particular, she had an awe of ghosts which bordered on the ridiculous, all the more so, as she did not properly believe in them, and had never seen one. But the words of Uno’s narrative, which she had just heard had excited her imagination, and at the sight of the dark, silent, immovable figure in the hall, her first thought was, “a ghost.”

As soon as she was able to move her paralyzed limbs, she retired with speed, and rushing by another way into the kitchen, she frightened every body there by a hasty story about ghosts, fiends, robbers! and then went back with a light in her hand, followed by Louisa, who was full of curiosity, with Maja, Stolt, and Hannah, who kept near to her protector.

Göthilda, at the head of this troop, had recovered her courage, and went again to the door, which she partly opened; and, putting her head half through, she observed the dark figure, which stood immovably there, and upon which she threw the light of the candle. The figure bore a much stronger resemblance to a thief than a ghost, as it stood there, wrapped in a large cloak, and with a green morocco cap pulled down over its eyes. But yet it did not precisely resemble a thief, inasmuch as it stood so perfectly quiet and calm.

“Who are you? What do you want?” said Göthilda at length, who was now become much more courageous.

“My noble Mamsell,” replied the figure, “I am a poor traveling journeyman, going about in search of work, and would gladly be employed by my noble Mamsell!”

The voice which thus replied was gruff, and quite human. It seemed to Göthilda also that it was not altogether unknown to her. But she thought the figure very bold, and she replied:

“I have not any work to give you. Go down stairs, and inquire for General Herkules, perhaps he can give you information about some.”

“But I would much rather work for my noble Mamsell!” said the obstinate journeyman.

“I have told you that I have not any work for you!” said Göthilda.

“Well, then, give me a little supper!” said the young fellow in a much more insolent tone.

“Not that either, this evening,” said Göthilda; “perhaps another time, when you ask more politely.”

“Well, then, give me a drop to drink!” said the journeyman, in such a gruff voice, that Göthilda hastily stepped back, and revealed the troop that was behind her; and, at the sight of all the countenances which now pressed in through the door, the journeyman burst out into a loud laugh, hastily threw off his cloak, took off the green cap, and stepped forward as a well-dressed, well-made young man, with a very weather-beaten, but gay and frank countenance. He extended his hand to Götthilda, and said:—

"Oh, give me your hand, and let me renew my acquaintance with Götthilda. Shall I not shake hands with you as a welcoming—well?"

When King Olof Tryggveson, of glorious memory, went incognito to visit his beautiful Queen Gyda—as we read in Heim's Kringla—threw off his "bad-weather cloak," and shewed himself in his actual, kingly person, he could scarcely have made a greater sensation than was caused at this moment by the same manœuvre of the so-called journeyman.

"Jarl Herkules!—the architect!" exclaimed Götthilda, astonished, terrified, glad, angry, kind, offended, amused, all in one.

And Jarl, the architect, now stood there, laughing so heartily; shook Götthilda's hand, kissed her cheek, and was so brotherly, friendly, pleasant and cordial, that it was purely impossible not to make much of him. Over and above this, le diamant brute had obtained a certain style of diamant taille, which Götthilda, even at the first moment, was perfectly aware of.

The return of the young relation was soon known to all the house, and he was quickly surrounded by his relations and friends.

"But I am not come alone," said he to them, "I have a comrade with me; who, no more than myself, I can assure you, will be satisfied without something to eat, and he has something in his knapsack which can do miracles. Yes, you will be surprised. He will be here in a moment—but see, here he is!"

And at the opening door appeared now a small, agreeable gure, whose countenance expressed kindness and animation in an uncommon degree.

"Ludovico!" exclaimed Hedvig, in a tone which thrilled through the hearer's soul and body. Hope and joy trembled in it.

And hope, inexpressible, heartfelt, trembling hope, lay in the glance with which Hedvig approached the one who now entered, grasped his hand between hers, as she said—

"You bring help; you bring with you the means of salvation?"

"Yes; by the blessing of God I do so! Yes, I hope so!" replied Ludovico.

Hedvig clasped her hands together; she trembled violently, and her eyes beamed almost wildly in that pale countenance. She was ready to faint. This happiness was too great, and had come too suddenly.

With the first knowledge which Hedvig had of Augustin's malady, she had written to her absent friend. This letter reached him at Smyrna, busied in arranging and packing that rich treasure of life-preserving, medicinal plants which he had collected in the East, among which he had discovered many hitherto concealed and unknown powers.

There are human souls which I will call flower-souls. These have a peculiar gentleness, and a captivating beauty; harmless, credulous, in the most beautiful meaning of the word, they suck in the sun's beams; behold of all life's figures principally that, and endeavor only to return to the world that light, that goodness which they have obtained from it. They are sun-worshippers in the best sense. When such a human soul turns itself toward nature, and with that lovely glance searches into its depths, then those depths open themselves; then flowers diffuse their fragrance; then trees and herbs divulge the secrets of their life as they do to none besides. Because to this soul, patient and gentle amid its fervent inquiries, an inward deep relationship attracts them.

Ludovico—Professor Ludovico, gentlemen and ladies, had such a soul as this, and Flora was, at an early age, his beloved, his bride. She had loved him in return, and to his humane inquiries, after the means of remedying, without extreme pain, and of alleviating the pain which no art can remedy, she had given him many a gladdening response.

Now it had so fallen out—but some seeds fall to the earth from the birds of heaven—and they always produce individual happiness—it had so fallen out, that among the new beneficial remedies which Ludovico had discovered in the East, and had made available, was precisely one for that fearful malady which threatened Augustin's life.

We need not say how much Hedvig's letter had hastened his return to his native land. He burned with a desire to try the efficacy of his remedy while there was yet time; with a desire to save the brother of his beloved Hedvig. Such a desire as this has the impulsive power of steam.

Ludovico came; he saw; he—

There was yet time. The remedy could yet be tried; the benignant remedy which, without danger, and without severe suffering, could restore the beloved one to health and life. If it succeeded.

Augustin's two physicians were summoned and consulted with. The one dissuaded; condemned it as a "chimerical, charlatan, attempt." He advocated amputation. The other advised them to try the mild remedy before the severe one was resorted to. The first could not do any harm, and might possibly do good.

Augustin himself had, from the first moment, been determined to try Ludovico's remedy. And if he had not himself had faith in it, he would have given it a trial for Hedvig's sake.

The trial was made, and—it succeeded. Within a few weeks its beneficial effects were seen. In the course of a couple of months, Augustin's condition was so much changed, that the time might be determined when his disease would be perfectly cured.

And as we sometimes see a dark threatening cloud raise itself in space, and by degrees become dissipated into the serene blue of heaven, so raised itself and vanished the danger which had threatened Augustin.

For a long time, however, his sleeplessness continued through the first hours of the night, and now, as formerly, Hedvig still sate up with her beloved brother. But how unlike the former were these nocturnal hours! How delightful was it to Hedvig to take to Augustin, every half-hour, the medicine which constituted a part of Ludovico's remedy; how delightful were her feelings and thoughts, as she sate there beside her brother, at her knitting or needlework, while he wrote, or while she assisted him in his labors. And for Augustin, how cheerfully, how joyfully, did his work now go on. Never before had he felt himself so lively, so clear, so powerful, as at this time.

One night he gave Hedvig his diary to read. He had just been writing in this—the same blue book in which, half a year before, Hedvig had read the tidings of his death.

She now read therein:

"With every succeeding day I find the return of health and strength. And blessed thoughts visit me.

"My late malady has merely left behind it one effect, that of gratitude even for suffering. When the ancients called misfortune 'the holy,' from its power of improving the heart, they were right. I now find it to be so. And it is not merely an improver, it is also an elevator of the pleasure of life and of enjoyment.

"If there be one thought which I, in preference to all others, would impress upon the heart of every sufferer, it is this: 'that suffering is a great kingdom;' that it is a power which introduces the mind into the depths of life, and elevates the intensity of the feelings; that it is a power of development.

"And if the three men of whom the Scriptures speak, had not had to pass through the seven-fold heated furnace, they could not have lifted up that excellent song of thanksgiving, in which they call upon day and night, sun and stars, fire and frost, lightning and dew, mountain and herb, sea and river; all creatures and all men; all angels and all purified souls; all the unhappy and all the afflicted, to praise the Lord and his power, which is, and which works eternally—his love!

"I also have gone through a fiery furnace, and am saved. And now, my friends, my beloved Hedvig, teach me, help me rightly to give thanks."

THE THANKSGIVING FEAST.

Is there a sentiment more delightful, more elevating, more subduing, more strengthening, more full of a bounding, joy-giving life, more truly heavenly, than that of warm gratitude?

The cherubim know it well, in that home where resounds an eternal song of praise. We also, upon our little, low earth, know it, feel it, when sorrows clear away, when the burden is lifted off, and every thing becomes pleasant and easy.

From the innermost of all history; through the course of eighteen centuries, shines out to us from beneath the shadows of the palms of Bethany an image of this. It was in a brother-and-sister-home, that the sublimest guest of earth loved to linger. One happy sister poured upon the head of the Saviour of her brother a balsamic unguent, the odor of which filled the whole house, from which death had been expelled. The most joyful sunbeams of life now rested upon it. Congratulating, grateful friends surrounded the happy one. A picture full of light!

And here, beneath the birch trees, by the Mälar Bay, we find such a one. Here also is a brother-and-sister-home; a brother who has been restored, a loving, happy sister, devoted, grateful friends. And joyfully murmured the birches around the brother-and-sister-home; joyfully murmured the wind and the blue waves; brightly beamed the sun, as if in sympathy with kind and happy human beings upon a beautiful September day.

For on the little Birch Island was celebrated to-day a festival in which several other festivals were combined, as when the little brooks of the spring all leap together into one great flood.

But how shall we manage to give an account of them all, the great as well as the lesser? We who would willingly do justice to them all. Patience, ye little brooks; patience, great flood; patience, kind readers; patience, my own warm blood!

But we must begin at the beginning; we must take the day by its beak, that is to say, early in the morning.

Why does Eli, the young lad, bound forth at sunrise into the garden; why does he throw himself down on the grass and kiss the flowers; why then spring up and look toward heaven as if he would bound into its embrace; why does he look around him with such bright and beaming glances on the earth, where threads of "Mary's silk," glittering with dew and golden sun-light, softly float around and fix themselves to tree and bush as if they would weave a web for the queen of the fairies' wedding! Why does he drink the morning air, the sunlight, the fragrance of flowers as Brage might drink mead, and clasp together his hands and shout for joy, and behave like somebody out of his senses? I will tell you why. The youth is intoxicated, intoxicated with happiness! He is gone out to gather myrtle, and to pluck flowers for his young sister's wedding. Yes, so it is. Little Karin will this day be the bride of Ivar "Vidfamne."

Did you expect that?

The youth had not long believed it. But now it is so. And the thought of his sister's happiness, of the joyful prospect for his own future; the sense of the goodness of God and of man—it is too much. It knocks him down; it plucks him up; it overcomes him. He hardly thinks that he shall survive it. But he will, for all that. But perhaps it was Louisa that saved his life by going down into the garden herself, and mingling her tempestuous joy with his, and smoking him at the same time because he was such a long time in getting the myrtle.

There, up in the hall, sits Hedvig, with the faithful hand-maiden, Maja, and they are weaving garlands for the brides. Yes, because there is more than one on this occasion. Maja sang merry songs and talked about the festivity, and the beautiful weather, and the brides, and the bridal-crowns, and "Mr. Augustin," and the talking choked her, and the laughter as one knows—burst forth, while her eyes filled with tears, because, "you see, it is so feeling-full!"

Every thing is now quiet in the brother-and-sister-home; pleasant and low is the murmuring of birch-trees around. But, at some distance there is a stir. At some distance, there, upon the slopes of the hill; upon the wooded heights we see the wood cleared away; the timber felled; stone brought there in great quantities, and the building begun. And look! there stands a large erection on which the roof is already placed, and upon the roof-tree hangs a huge, huge garland of leaves, sunflowers and dahlias, which is seen at a great distance, and indicates that now, according to old Swedish custom, the work-people are to have a feast, with speeches, and toasts, and music, and dancing, in honor of the new house.

We see that the "New Birka" is now in full progress. Bror, little, magnificent, practical, clever Bror, urges it on like an old giant with six pair of arms. And it is the school-house which we now see building.

We have already mentioned three causes of festivity, three feasts in one feast; two weddings and one school-house. But there is yet another deeper cause, the hidden veins of which swell warm from the heart filled with gratitude, and which in the outer festival seeks for an outlet. And, besides, we have still one which may be first mentioned!

In America there is annually celebrated what is called the Thanksgiving Festival. It occurs in the Autumn when the harvest is finished. The families then assemble to rejoice together, and to distribute the earth's best wealth amid praises of the giver.

"Oh, what beautiful Thanksgivings!" writes a lady from that distant land, "have I not spent in my father's house. How like was he to a patriarch as he stood there surrounded by his children! and with what smiling, joyful countenances stood we round the table of which he was the host, and entertained us with the best that the house possessed. When the meal was ended, we had songs and merry stories told. They were happy times."

Beautiful is this popular custom, and worthy to be adopted by all people. Beautiful, that after harvest time, when the earth has stripped herself of all her riches, that therewith her children might be fed, clothed and gladdened, such a feast should be celebrated as if for the completion of the year.

The idea of a festival similar to this entered into the design of the great feast which was this day celebrated on Birch Island; for it was now Autumn, it was September, and the harvests were already housed. The innermost cause, however, the principal object of this solemnity, was Augustin. It was his restoration to health and life which the brothers and sisters desired to celebrate. And, as he stood foremost in the affection of all, and foremost as leader of all the plans for the future, with which now so many persons had bound up their future hopes and joys, they had chosen his birthday as the uniting point for many other joyful solemnities.

Augustin knew himself to be the principal occasion of the festivity, but he had besought his brothers and sisters to keep this to themselves, and had promised to be on that account all the more active in the celebration of every thing which ought to be celebrated. And, as we have said, this was not a little. For a whole week had preparations already been made for the occasion.

Uncle Herkules had certain private business of his own upon Dunder Berg, with which no one was acquainted excepting Jarl Herkules, whom he took up with him as his adjutant. Göthilda joked uncle Herkules about his "meetings" with the lady of the Dunder Berg, and prophesied misfortune. Jarl assumed the most mysterious and the most solemnly important countenance when he met her in the course of the day.

But Gôthilda had herself too much to do this day for her either to be inquisitive or offended. There was to be a great feast, as you know, at Birch Island, both for gentle-folks and the work-people. And though there was not as much needed on this occasion, as for a Swedish wedding in the thirteenth century, and for which, as the chronicle relates, there were required seventy-four oxen, eighty sheep, one hundred and fifty geese, two hundred hens, eighty casks of salt meat, besides great quantities of fresh meat, game, and fish. Of spices: twelve pounds of ginger, seven of pepper, and the rest in proportion: one hundred tuns of ale and mead; twenty hogheads of wine, &c. And though our brothers and sisters entertained a proper contempt of every kind of excess in viands, and for many meats and drinks, yet it was not a little which would, in a respectable manner, fill two great tables, and satisfy two hundred stomachs. Therefore Gôthilda, Louisa, and Maja had enough to do to look after these affairs.

The motherly sister, Hedvig, who was preserved in peace from all these Martha's troubles, quietly took charge of her foster-daughters, and arranged the inner part of the solemnity.

So well was all arranged, that we will at once remove to the dinner-table. It is brilliant with flowers, and in the center stands a great ornamental dish of flowers and confectionary of Gôthilda's arrangement, which was to represent the pleasure-garden of happiness.

At the head of the table sits General Herkules, magnificent, in full uniform and adorned with all his orders, in the midst of which shines a northern star, set with diamonds. On each side of him sits a blooming young wife, in elegant attire. The one—she on his right hand—looks somewhat Chinese; so, at least, maintains Gôthilda. And she was, it is true, born in Canton, but of wealthy English parentage. This is the wife of Ludovico, who is come with him to Sweden. Good young lady-reader, your pardon! I know that you think it ought to have been otherwise. But, I can not help it. And sister Hedvig has taken a very great liking for the young wife, and has promised to make her acquainted with Swedish housekeeping, and Swedish customs. And Gôthilda is very much bent upon a Chinese dinner, which she has been promised by the young wife, shall, at an early day, be given to the whole family, a dinner with Chinese dishes, with Chinese cookery, and which shall be eaten in the Chinese manner, with Chinese chopsticks, and with Chinese music on gongs.

The young wife on the general's left side is very pretty, and has the very sweetest of little caps, trimmed with roses and rose-colored ribbon on her head. She looks decidedly like a young Swedish wife. And I assure you, my good foreign friends, that that is something particularly charming. It is Bror's young wife, Seraphina. Young lady-reader! forgive me once more, that I did not say any thing about this wedding, but let it take place in silence. But I assure you that it was not all remarkable, but like many another wedding, which has nothing extraordinary about it.

The young wife looks, in the mean time, exceedingly happy, although somewhat bashful and embarrassed by the glances which uncle Herkules, from time to time, fixes upon her, as if he would try whether there is any spirit in her. Pale she certainly is not any longer. That is evident. She blushes like a rose, and rivals in tint the roses in her cap. In order to gain courage, she looks at her husband, whose self-possessed and friendly countenance has in it something heart-strengthening. And it was helpful to the young wife, for as uncle Herkules sat and looked at her, she began to find favor in his sight, and he thought that there might "probably be more in her than he had fancied;" and it came into his head to make an immediate trial of this. In order to do so, he took a glass of water and hastily emptied it over—yes, the clumsy old man! over the young wife's head, over the Paris-cap, the roses, and all. At this unexpected ordeal by water, the young wife looked instantly at her husband. He nodded to her, and smiled. And with a quick and happy inspiration, she took the water-bottle and poured it over uncle Herkules' own head, at which he was altogether delighted.

"Bravo!" he cried, sprang up, shook himself, lifted up the young wife, who likewise laughed and shook her wet head, kissed her on the forehead, and exclaimed—

"That was a deuced little body! Could one have believed it of her? The d—I take me! Here's to your health, Bror! You've got a proper one. My soul! she won't be put on. I have respect for her. You must take care of yourself, for there is some spirit in her, by Jove!"

And with that, the general spoke aloud to the whole company, and proposed a skål for the new-married pair. After this followed the skål for the new bridal pair, Ivar and Karin. She was very beautiful, the young bride, and looked very happy, when she returned thanks. Eli who sat just opposite to her could hardly control his emotion, Louisa could not do it at all, and therefore, she for half a minute merely put her head in at the door, saw "little Karin" sitting in the place of honor beside her delighted bridegroom, and then sprang overjoyed down into the kitchen, where her exaltation could only be allayed by whipping up a cream which threatened to boil over.

Among the guests at the wedding-table, we observe one who does not, so fully as the others, participate in the general joy. It is Gerda; it is true she rejoices, the kind, warm-hearted sister, but it appears as if her soul sometimes were absent, and as if the tears which now and then force themselves from her thoughtful eyes, are not tears of gladness. Where then may be her soul? Perhaps with the only one who is excluded from the family festival, less in consequence of lingering indisposition than from an attack of melancholy, which Gerda was not able to overcome. Did her soul flee from the gay and varied scene of the festival to his dark and silent room? Wonderful, but possible, and to me very probable.

Augustin and Hedvig remarked Gerda's absent look and communicated it to each other by a glance. Gerda in the mean time was roused out of her waking dream by being called upon to lead a song which had been written in honor of the occasion. And a genial and a gay song it was, that I can promise you, and was sung in chorus with full hearts and thundering voices.

After this, uncle Urbanus read a poem. It was an imitation of the Epithalamium of the sixteenth century which had been read on a similar occasion, and in which the names of most of the guests present, and in particular the principal persons, figured in a more or less happy manner. Uncle Herkules played a somewhat too ludicrous part, and how "Dalberg" and "Ollonberg" came "together" was beyond the comprehension of the hearers. However, that uncle Urbanus himself crowned the work in consequence of crowning the brides as Myrtenblad (myrtle-leaf) was quite clear to all, and was a stroke of genius which was very successful. And upon the whole the poem was very successful, and won great applause; although mostly from the author himself. And he cast from time to time intelligent and half-admonitory glances at the cadets in whom he must have foreboded a couple of secret critics, and who, as graduates, had not lost their former great passion for laughter. Uncle Urbanus was, as we know, hard of hearing, but he fancied, during the reading of his work, that he heard something which sounded like an "Iliad of Homer," and it seemed to him to sound unpleasantly.

Augustin somewhat hastened the conclusion of the dinner, which uncle Herkules would have been capable of extending until evening with his songs and his toasts—because he wished to give the company an intellectual entertainment as a dessert. And, therefore, as soon as they rose from the table, he led his guests out into the park, to a new erection in the Gothic style, which was surrounded with tall ash trees.

This was the Hall of the Norna, or Fates. Within this building, and lighted from above, stood Lagertha's group of the Norns with the swans. Below these lay the fresh waters of a chalybeate spring. The beautiful group was mirrored in the crystal fountain and produced a very ennobling effect.

Augustin, who besides the guests, had assembled here a great proportion of the people of the new works, drew their attention to the different figures and expression of the Fates; upon the fervent, inspired life in Urda; the noble, powerful struggle in Verdandi, and lastly, the peace of victory in the completed life of the divine Skuld. The same features were recognizable in her, and the same countenance as in the other two Fates, but in Skuld they were seen glorified and filled with a higher sublimity.

Of all the figures of the three sisters this betrayed the loftiest inspiration. It seemed to be executed in some great and blissful moment, when the artist had wished to express her own exultation over the spirit's power of conquest. Augustin said that this conception of the Norna, or the Fates, was applicable to life, to the great, the small; to popular and individual life. He spoke of the Urda-fountain, which is situated at the heavenly root of the world, and the waters of which are so holy that he who plunges into their waves becomes pure, cleansed, and, as it were, renovated; and how this crown of the tree of the world becomes again verdant when refreshed by its waters. As he spoke, the more fervent, the more eloquent became his words.

Göthilda, however, interrupted him.

"Dear Augustin," besought she, softly, "let them now digest what you have given them as they may; and let them come to coffee and cigars, else you will talk yourself into a fever, and I am afraid that they will get cold or sleepy, or inattentive in some way. Come!"

Augustin, who understood his sister's anxiety on his account, kissed her brow and smiled, but continued to talk: And—thou wast wrong, Göthilda!—because nobody became cold, or sleepy, or thought about coffee and cigars until Augustin himself turned the thoughts of the company in that direction. Thank God, to-day were forgotten both coffee and cigars for the holy Norns's fountain!

Coffee was served in the Hall of the Norna; and Göthilda was the Coffee-Norna (as Bror called her), and distributed the Arabian beverage while she wondered whether the art of telling fortunes in the coffee-grounds had descended from these goddesses of Fate.

The cigars were smoked in the open air, in the alleys, and on the benches of the park.

It was propitiously beautiful weather this September day. If they had bespoken it for the occasion, it could not have been better. And it is incredible how the presence of the sun increases the delights of a festival, especially one which is three parts rural, as was this. Add to this that the air was bland, and the wind as quiet as a good child. The table for the work-people was spread under the trees by the water-side, and was calculated for one hundred and fifty guests. For them it was intended to be a supper. And a tremendous supper was it to be. There were three tables, and one of them was for a wedding entertainment, adorned with garlands of leaves and flowers. For what bridal pair? That we shall soon see.

The sun descended, and then a cheerful and festal bridal-march was heard, and they saw the bridal company slowly advancing along the flower-strewn path toward an altar which had been erected in the open air, and beneath tall trees, through whose verdant and living arcade the blue heavens glanced forth.

This altar in the open air was by Dr. Lund's own direction, "Because," said he, "though the church is beautiful which has been raised by the hands of man in honor of God, still better is that which he himself has made, with its immense dome, and where sun and stars and all the angels can look down upon us!"

All thought as he did; and as it so happened that no envious clouds of earth dimmed the lofty and clear dome, it was as he and they all wished. The marriages were to take place in the open air beneath the lofty vault of heaven.

Dr. Lund himself now stood before the altar with the book of the church-service in his hand, with his silver-white locks trembling in the evening air, and his kind eyes and benevolent and expressive countenance turned toward the advancing company. Here now came each couple after the other. Ivar and "little Karin," and Stolt and Hannah. After these, bridesmen and maids, relations and friends.

And now, surrounded by loving and well-wishing people, caressed by a breeze, so delightful that it resembled the breath of a higher love, the two couples were joined in that divine union which the Swedish marriage ceremony speaks of in divinely consecrated words. And above the earthly verdure of the whispering leaf-woven canopy arched itself the heavens' eternal blue, and seemed to glance down a blessing.

After this, the minister was silent for a moment, during which he seemed to be collecting his thoughts. And then lifting up his clasped hands and his beaming, tearful eyes, he raised his voice before the assembly in a new address. And it became a thanksgiving.

A friend and pupil of Pestalozzi has told me, that in his out-of-door addresses he always took his subject from the day, or the occasion with which he knit up the eternal truths which he desired to proclaim. These he felt fervently himself, and therefore he warmed his auditors. And hence the impression which he made, and the power which he had over the hearts of his hearers.

So also did the old, warm-hearted teacher before us. He spoke about the occasion of the festival; the beloved brother who was saved; of the affectionate hearts which here, in the name of heaven, had been united; of the associative social design which now stood before the eyes of all full of good promise, itself a work of good and sacred intention. And then he broke forth into fervent thanksgiving for the harvests of the earth and of heaven; for every good thought; for their accomplishment; for all power and goodness; for all sanctifying sorrow; all pure delight; for every thing, for every thing!

The new-married couples, nay, all the assembly present, he consecrated to a new union, to a life of noble courage; of combat against deceit, and falsehood, and injustice. He bade them become Vikings in the spiritual world, and to imitate the example of their ancestors, but in the paths of peace and with the sword of the spirit.

He threw a bright sunbeam glance upon the most beautiful endeavors of the age of which the new association was the offspring, and demonstrated that they were founded in the very spirit of Christianity; called down on the assembly the blessing of the All-powerful and the All-good, and closed with the prophetic words:

"Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall inherit the earth!"

The sun in its descent, glanced forth, like a large, divine eye, over the assembly at the concluding words of the venerable teacher. His silvery locks shone in its golden light, and profound and strong was the impression on all hearts. All petty thoughts and all petty affairs were forgotten in this moment by every one. They would willingly have lingered long in this state of fervent feeling, amidst these solemn and joyous thoughts.

But the time sped on; the sun had set, and the moon ascended amidst the rosy clouds of the east and began to shine. The lamps were lighted at the work-people's table, and dishes upon dishes, filled with meat, were carried out to the tables. The guests were speedily seated. Augustin himself sat at the head of the bridal table with Master Dalerin at the opposite end; and here neither poetry nor prose, neither toasts nor songs were wanting. Stolt sat proudly in the place of honor beside his Hannah, who looked pretty and modestly happy. At the head of the other tables were Ivar and Bror, that they might properly open the entertainment, and set the ale and mead cans in motion. They also had their assistants, who after a time took their places, so that later they might go whither their hearts drew them. At the commencement, their young wives were with them; carried round the woad cane and filled for the guests. Göthilda was very active, both in filling and drinking with them.

Where was uncle Herkules, in the mean time? Up with the lady of the Dunder Berg with his adjutant and two officers of ordinance (the cadets). And just as Augustin had given the toast for the royal pair, Oscar and Josephina, and it was responded to with hurrahs and military music, behold! there ascended a rocket from the Dunder Berg, and rose like a white shining dove over the festive crowd on the shore, and immediately afterward the lady of the Dunder Berg began to talk, and talk with cannon, I beg you to understand!—four-and-twenty shots were fired from the Dunder Berg, which were replied to by threefold thundering echoes among the hills in the bay round about.

After this there ascended from the Dunder Berg great red and white flowers, by the light of which people could see not only the lady of the mountain but uncle Herkules himself, with his yellow belt à la Charles XII., and with Thor's hammer in his hand, together with his three young assistants, with crimson sashes and torches, upon the mountain among the ruins. Suns and crackers, and burning names were seen to ascend thence into the air, blazing and crackling. Every new explosion was answered by shouts from the shore.

It was a surprise to all to see this spectacle returned upon the water, where from little boats decorated with flags, which had rowed unobserved toward the island, shots were fired and fireworks displayed. It was the Svearne society, which having heard of the festivities about to be celebrated, now wished thus to testify their joyful participation in them. Other little boats put out from the shores around, with grown people and children, who were enticed out by the splendid spectacle, by the lights on the water and in the air, and by the calm and wonderfully beautiful evening.

Yes, wonderfully beautiful was this evening, and it became still more beautiful, if possible, as the night came on, the bright serene night. For when the noisy, spluttering fires were extinguished, there stood the moon high in heaven, high above the Dunder Berg, and smiled like a gentle, pleasant maternal countenance above the sports of her children, and the air was so delightful and calm, that the children of men breathed in it, as in an atmosphere of motherly love.

"I feel myself in particularly good tune this evening; in such a particularly cheerful state of mind!" said uncle Urbanus. And so they all felt. It was a moment when the beauty of nature and of the hour alone, fill the overflowing the cup of human enjoyment.

The greater part of the company had during the display of the fire-works dispersed themselves through the park, and they might be seen wandering in separate groups, three and three, two and two, sometimes one and one, while all around them, foliage, air, water, softly glimmered and shone as if in silent, inward happiness.

My reader! shall we, thou and I, also take a walk in the park, in the moonlight? But first a word with thee in confidence.

Where can not love and romance find their way? "From Nova Zembla's rocks to the burned-up valleys of Ceylon," over all the world we see its traces, and hear its pleasant gossip about a cottage and a heart. And I have heard it related by trust-worthy people that in Grålsmakergränd (Quarrelers' lane) in the south of Stockholm, there was heard in the last December, during a stormy night, a melodious melody played upon a melodious flute, to which was sung a song to the same melody by a beautiful male voice; and this in the street below the window of a young girl in the Grålsmakergränd, in the south of Stockholm, during a cold, stormy December night.

Such things happen. But I can assure thee that I have been out during the most beautiful moonlight, in the most romantic regions, during the most beautiful evenings, and seen other people wandering out in them without any thing in any way romantic having happened either to them or to me, without having heard any other sighs than those of the wind in the trees, without seeing any other love glowing, than those of the moon and stars. And it is my private conviction that love, in the usual signification, haunts the world very much less than people in general believe, and that nowadays, people much oftener risk their lives to take a buffalo's hide* or a bear's skin, than to obtain the hand of the most beautiful girl. Thus, although I concede that the romantic lives, and may be met with every where on earth, and proceeds from every thing, yet—let us now—my reader and myself—go and take a moonlight walk on Birch Island, and I request that whatever romantic adventure we may experience may be regarded rather as a miraculous occurrence than as one of an every-day character.

And now, forth into "the moonlight night!"

How the water glimmers; how enchantingly beautiful is the landscape with its mystic lights and shadows, with its leafy groves and open spaces, every thing, in the gentle brightness of the great lamp of night; thou mayst easily distinguish every object; thou wilt certainly not hear more about it.

Thou wilt probably prefer hearing what the brides say; they in their misty white veils wandering by their husbands' side, arm in arm, down the quietest alleys. It is a pity that they whisper so softly, the loving ones, that I can not hear them. Perhaps, however, they say nothing with their lips. Perhaps it is sufficient for them that with full warm hearts, they wander hand in hand, side by side, in the bright and beautiful night, and silently converse with glances, with that unspeakable language which loving human beings know, and which they understand so well. Hist! let us not disturb them, the happy ones. One moment's fullness of pure bliss on earth is sacred.

Let us rather accompany that solitary one whose figure is so noble, whose carriage is so graceful, although she moves slowly, and as if full of thought. She removes herself from those who are happy, she separates herself from those who are conversing and laughing in company, and seeks the lonely, dark tracts, the part of the park, where grow the pine woods, where all is more silent and more gloomy.

It is Gerda. She thinks upon Sigurd. She is solitary, and feels herself very much so this evening, because all appear to be happy. Ivar thinks merely of his young wife, nor has any need of Gerda. And he who needs her is not here. The parting between herself and Sigurd was unfriendly. Circumstances had occurred between them which were to be expected in the relationship in which they stood to each other. The dark fire in his heart for her, which had never been extinguished, again burst forth, and she—did not return it, which had wounded him. Proudly, but not with severity had he withdrawn into himself. She, however, was severe, and had—left him. Yes, this had occurred two days before, and since that time she had not seen him. She was now sorry for what she had done; she repented of her hard-heartedness, and grieved over him. And rather a thousand times than to be here among their rejoicings, among their festivities, would she be with that solitary, gloomy man, who sits in darkness, making his room bright and his soul calm and joyful. But she is now far from him; he is perhaps now still further from her, because his soul may have become alienated, embittered. And Gerda seeks the shadows, while the sun and the stars ascend from the Dunder Berg.

Gerda, however, does not go alone into the shade of the pine woods. A manly figure has walked past her, then turned round and come toward her, as if he would recognize her, and not desirous of encountering the unknown person, who was closely enveloped in his cloak, in those desolate paths, she determined to turn round and seek for the rest of the company. She turned back, but lo! there stood the unknown again before her. Gerda stood still. At that moment ascended from the mountain a blue-white, flaming Bengal light, which illumined with a clear brilliancy even this woody region.

In this light Sigurd and Gerda recognized each other. There they stood, looking as pale in the blueish light as if they had been apparitions. It was with painful delight that they recognized each other. They seemed to each other almost like the dead arisen from the land of shadows.

Gerda was the first to speak. The fountain of her womanly heart overflowed.

"Ah, Sigurd, is it you?" said she, and smiled beamingly, although her eyes were filled with tears.

"I was seeking for you," replied he: "I have been seeking for you long—and now I have found you." But he did not look happy.

"Thanks," said she, and extended to him her hand.

He did not give her his. He looked at her quietly and gloomily. They were again silent, and looked at each other in that white flaming light.

"You are pale, Gerda," said he, at length, and his voice was as gentle as a child's.

"Am I? That is, indeed, from this white fire—and—I have been thinking about you. But you are also pale, Sigurd!"

"I have come to bid you—farewell."

"Farewell! You will—"

"I shall set off early to-morrow morning, to my native place again."

"But you are not yet quite recovered! But it might be injurious to you all at once to change your—"

"Better that than to stay here after—better that the body suffer than the soul! My future is to me perfectly indifferent. It will be happy enough for me!"

"Ah, Sigurd! do not talk so! Why—why can not we live together as friends?"

He answered not. His glance rested upon her with a dark flame. The brilliant fires upon the mountain had become extinguished. But the beautiful night-lamp of heaven arose now above the wood, and lit up that dark region with its calm, illuminating beams.

Gerda continued, with still greater animation—

"Does not the brightness of God beam without us, and within us? Can not we be united in it, and thus united, work for his kingdom, and for that which is good and beautiful on earth? Can we not, as friends, extend to each other, our hands during a peaceful and confidential life of friendship, undisturbed by selfish feelings? When God created the human race in two halves—man and woman—he willed that, in becoming united, they should perfect life. The one half shall be the other's helper. But that heavy, that restraining bond, is not unconditionally necessary for it; for the great part, it is unnecessary. There is a higher marriage than the common one—a spiritual marriage. Oh, Sigurd! could we not give to each other our hands in this, and be happy together as brother and sister, as friends—as the angels of God in Heaven? You do not answer me, Sigurd."

"What shall I answer? Farewell, Gerda."

"And you will go?—You will not!"

"I wish to thank you; but—I can not do it—not, not now! Beg you to forgive—but neither can I do that. May God's best blessings rest upon you, Gerda!"

"Oh, no! You can not think of leaving me thus, Sigurd; not separate from me thus. I could not bear it!—Oh, no!"

"What will you, then? The day before yesterday you rejected me, Gerda."

"Oh! reject me now! Only be not weary. Reject me, Sigurd!"

And she clung fondly to him as she said—

"Reject me!"

And he rejected her not. He clasped her to his breast, closely, fervently, and wept. Both wept. Every bitter memory, every thing that was gray and dark, was washed away by the water of tears.

Their souls became serene and pure.

Holy fountain,
Urda's fountain,
Fountain of purification,
Fountain of renovation,
For all of us,
In all of us,
Let thy pure waves well forth!

The fires upon the mountain had burned out: but the gentle light of heaven rested over the two, who had much to forgive each other, and to whom it was needful that they should love much.

Sigurd was the first who raised himself from the deep embrace. He said—

"Thanks for these moments! It will be less bitter to me now. For the last time, Gerda, one kiss! Oh! that we must separate!"

"And why must we?"

"Because I love you too much!" exclaimed Sigurd, with passion. "Because I can not, and will not, live near you, if I may not clasp you to my breast in an earthly and heavenly manner, and call you mine in the meaning of men and angels—because you fear me. Oh! do not, do not, and then I might say to you, forget the past! There are, indeed, graves for the spiritual dead; they are found in the abysses of love. Let manly love atone for the offenses of manly arrogance. Oh, Gerda! my bride! give yourself to me as my equal. Let me teach you that the bond which you dread may become the wing of a lofty freedom. Let me—oh! let me love you as I now will, and now can do; and—fear—nothing! The sword which formerly lay between us is now broken. You, yourself, have knit new bonds. But they ought not to be broken; let us not loosen them; let us complete them. Oh, my beloved! confide yourself to Him who can complete them—to Him whose hand has led us together at this moment—to Him who has designed that the closest union should lead to the highest freedom and the highest happiness. Or are you too proud to give me the means of reconciliation and atonement? Oh! be not so! Be noble, Gerda, as you always have been. Take the hand which was dead, and to which you gave animation, and let me conduct you to your brothers and sisters, and beseech of them to receive into their alliance your husband. Gerda—beloved! are you yet afraid of me?"

"Then did frost receive life from warmth," says the old Northern Legend of Creation. And the same thing happened here.

Gerda was not of a cold nature. That we who know her, knew well already. But there was a something which had frozen and stiffened within her—the result of Sigurd's former treatment; and something there was which now came forward, and gave new life from the beautiful fire which glowed through his whole being, and infused itself into hers. Whether she now thought much about her own happiness, her own satisfaction, I do not know; but—I do not believe it. I do not believe that she thought of herself at this moment; but she thought sufficiently, and felt something great and divine in now extending her hand to Sigurd, and saying, with candor and tenderness:

"No, Sigurd, I am no longer afraid of you. Let it be as you will!"

And she took his hand; that one which had been dead; and to which she had given life, and clasped it faithfully in her own.

And beautifully now stood they there, man and woman; no longer pale; eye to eye, hand to hand, as equals, as partners in the light of heaven.

And thus went they to their brothers and sisters.

The elder portions of the company had, in the mean time, sought within the house for an atmosphere less likely to produce colds and coughs than that out in the romantic moonlight. They now sat there—General Herkules with them—and yawned and experienced a little ennui, because their animal spirits had somewhat begun to abate. It was therefore a very welcome and enlivening sight, when the door opened, and a figure stood there in a fantastic dress, a blue short jacket, a yellow cap, and a tall staff in her hand, and which offered (the figure, that is to say), to tell the gentlefolks their fortunes.

The fortune-teller, who looked quite witch-like, with a pair of large black eyes, and a countenance which was worthy of the Northern Wala, was received with great delight; and they hastened to lead her in, and offer her a seat at the table where she could lay out her cards.

The Sybil looked gravely round with her dark eyes, and did not allow herself to be disturbed by General Herkules' exclamation, "Nay, the d—! My little rattlepate! Such a witch!"

She shuffled her cards during a profound silence, blew upon them, muttering, at the same time some mystical words, and then laid them out very attentively, while the deepest silence still prevailed. When she began to speak, she described the fate of the new Association, and its originators, in something like the following words:—

"The Association will become a model association, will grow up and flourish in every way, as well in its many habitations as in its many inhabitants. Among the latter we remark the young Pepparkorns, who three months after the great wedding, had become bankrupt, and who here again make a beginning, in a new spirit and with better luck.

"Augustin and Hedvig's greatest trouble will be, that they must stand in the place of parents to all the little fellow-citizens and citizenesses who are born within the Association, because their fathers and mothers, consider that unless they do so, they can not become right good members of the Association. For the rest, the two live there as patriarchs among children and grandchildren. They are like the Judges and Judgesesses in Israel; and in their old age they will be seen visiting the dwellings of the work-people, or sitting in the shade of the birch-trees within their porch, and there saluted by the people to whom they give counsel. And the older they grow, the handsomer, the more cheerful do they become; yes, indeed, so much so, that all other countenances become bright in the reflection of theirs. They will attain to a great age and great wisdom.

"Ivar becomes an editor. He will publish a large newspaper, which will spread far and wide the doctrines and the modes of cultivation adopted by the Association. His wife is his fellow-laborer. In company they develop and apply, according to the Book of Wisdom, the important doctrine of educating, in community, all the members of the Association to a certain age; by which every one acquires something like a chance of success and advancement in the world, every one according to his talent. This is the communism which is advocated in the newspaper.

"All the factory-girls write in the feuilleton, which obtains an incredible number of readers, and especially of readeresses.

"Gerda instructs the members of the Association in melody and harmony. She will discover a new instrument, which will be called the Concordium, and will play continually upon this, with her elected husband, so that both men and angels will admire.

"Bror and his cara sposa will people the world. The children will be very like father and mother, and aunts and uncles. And the people in the Association will say that there never can be too many of this excellent generation.

"Uno will become a clergyman in the Association, will preach powerfully both by precept and example, and will convert many heathens. His son, under the guidance of his father, and his excellent and exemplary aunt—the virtuous Göthilda—will undertake to remove into the Association a garden, which formerly lay in the land of Mesopotamia, called Paradise; and then will people see sheep and goats kissing, and the dog playing with the cat in the most cordial bond of friendship, and Adam's sons and Eve's daughters, who have not the least desire for the forbidden fruit.

"The Architect will very nearly kill his affectionate wife, while putting up a roof, which will fall down upon her, and which also will strike his leg. If they survive this danger, they will live many years, and very happily.

"Göthilda will strive boldly against her fate, but will fall finally a sacrifice to it, and will be deeply mourned and regretted by the friends, chickens, and little pigs of the Association. A monument will be erected to her with the inscription, 'Fate became her lot.'

"David participates powerfully in the battle against the Goliaths and the Philistines of the age; obtains high rank within the Association, and lives long there happily, amicably, and peacefully.

"Mina, more fortunate than the late Mrs. Penelope of the Island of Ithaca, need not have any anxiety about her wooers, because not one of them will kill himself or will be killed by any insane Ulysses. She will be in all respects considerably happier than the Queen of Ithaca, because her pantry will never be empty, let her give out as much as she will. As the sister of the sisterless, she will enjoy great esteem and love in the Association, and will diffuse among them new doctrines about the blessings of wealth.

"Many weddings appear in the future. Baskets and broken hearts seem not to be heard of. Bror's seven sons go out as wooers, altogether like the Princes of Coburg, and meet with good luck. Uncle Urbanus and Master Dalerin have hardly time to prepare all the wedding poems and songs. Uncle Urbanus makes himself regularly famous by these, and will be talked about both in Europe and America.

"The Island-lady Lagertha will make a journey to visit the delightful home of her childhood in Iceland. Hecla and Krabbla are so pleased that they get up an explosion, and throw out such a deal of fire and ashes as terrify our young lady, and make her set off again in haste and never go there again, but settle down in the new city of the Association, and beautify it with one statue of the gods after another. Hecla and Krabbla are so vexed at this that they will not speak nor move again before the Day of Judgment.

"The young Protectors of the Fatherland, No. 31 and 32, will march—"

Here the sybil was interrupted all at once by Bror, who whispered to her—

"Uncle Herkules, Gôthilda; you have entirely forgotten uncle's place in the Association."

"Yes, that is true," said Gôthilda, almost embarrassed; "but I forgot it only because the best comes last."

"Don't give yourself any trouble on my account, my good girl," said the general, who was particularly quick of hearing, and who now stood near; "I shall altogether take care of myself. Build and live as you like best in your new institution. I shall keep to my Svecia Antika, and shall choose my own place there."

As the general said this with cheerful good humor, he lifted up Dalberg's great work which lay on the table near the one of which Gôthilda laid her cards.

The place at which he opened exhibited the interior of a mausoleum, ornamented with banners, helmets, and arms.

The general's countenance assumed, at this, a grave expression, and a certain degree of astonishment came over every one who saw the open page and heard the general's words.

Gôthilda turned pale, and tears flowed from her eyes.

The general stood silent for a moment, and contemplated the page on which was represented the mausoleum, and his grave expression brightened to a quiet smile.

"Well, and why not," said he, "this place is as good as any other, yea—better than any other, when people have arrived at a good old age. Nay, not so my little Gôtha, my little journeyman!" continued he, affectionately, as he laid his hand over Gôthilda's eyes, which, tearful and warm as the dew of a summer night, were turned toward him; "nay, child! people should not shed tears over the old who die, but merely over the old who survive themselves. And I am not frightened at death; only at dying slowly, at a long sick-bed, with doctors and nurses. God preserve me from that!"

"No; it is good to die as great King Charles did, and beautiful too. He died bravely, died as he lived, fighting against foes, with cannon, intrenchments, and towers before him, ready to make the attack; alert, awake, and cheerful in the middle of a cold winter night, with his breast to the danger, and his head erect. Then came the ball. And then he sank; it was the will of God. So died King Charles. So died also the other great one, our Gustavus Adolphus. So ought every brave soldier to die. People talk about time for preparation! But nobody rightly prepares himself for death who does not do it every day of his life. That is the duty of every one. Yea, children, if I were worthy of it, I would pray our Lord for a sudden death. No long sick-bed to torment myself and others, but that he would call me to himself, one, two, three! By all means—he might then command me when he would!"

"Brothers and sisters," said Gôthilda, as with suppressed emotion she drew back among them; "on Sunday week is uncle's birthday. We must then have an entertainment, a festival for him. We must regularly amuse him. We must hit upon some merry scheme. I have my own ideas—we will talk about them afterward. This hideous fortune-telling dress quite confuses me."

And she threw it off with impatience.

"There will be a regular high-tide of festivities!" said Bror. "First of all, to-day's feast, which may be called the mother-feast; then, there is the feast after the wedding, which our dear brother and sister, according to old custom, must give us, and which we must not give up; and then there's uncle Herkules' birthday, and then that Chinese dinner, Gôthilda's feast! Now, if we happily survive these, we may hope to live long and—"

Here Bror was interrupted by the strong voice of General Herkules, which was heard through the whole room, as he exclaimed in a lively and cheerful tone,

"But I have yet something to settle, before I have closed my account with the world. And I have just now a confounded grave piece of business to conclude—Gôthilda."

And with this he threw his strong glances, like eagles', down upon Gôthilda, who, spite of her known bravery and presence of mind, felt herself now seized upon by a power, which at this moment she was unable to resist. She had a presentiment of the approaching danger; turned pale, and felt her knees totter under the effect of that fate, which she felt would overcome her.

The general continued to fix his eyes upon her, while a delicate, almost imperceptible smile passed over his firm, determined lips. It seemed to say,

"Yes, yes! Now I have thee fast. Now we shall be quits. This will be enough for thee!"

After he had waited sufficiently long to turn all eyes in excited expectation upon himself, he continued:

"Göthilda! You have given me the right—you must remember it—to give you away to whomsoever I will. I assert at this moment my right, and give you, my sister's daughter, Göthilda Dalberg (Göthilda gasped for breath), in marriage to my brother's son, Jarl Herkules, who desires to have you for his wife, and whom I herewith declare to be my heir. Göthilda, give me your hand, without ceremony. This young man will have you; and I will marry you to this young man. Have I a right to do so, or not?"

"Yes, uncle, you have a right!" exclaimed Göthilda, resolutely, at length, as she came forward, and gave the general her hand. "But I have a right also in my life, and that—I will make an end of, if I am to be taken to Russia, a long way from you uncle, and all whom I love. Die I should very soon there, and that I may as well do at first as last. Well, then!—now, uncle, you can do as your conscience will allow!"

"My own d—h good girl!" exclaimed the general, as he lifted up Göthilda, and kissed her; "my witch, my little baggage, my Götha-princess, my rattle-pate! You are and shall be with me, in life and death! Satan's son! could you believe that I would send you to Siberia? No, the d—l and all his race! And that young chap there wouldn't have taken you, if he had been ten times my nephew, if he were not Swedish in soul and heart, and now a Swedish citizen, and my own lad, as you are my own lass. Now—what have you now got to say? Have you any thing to say, perhaps, against this young man who loves you, and wishes to have you, and whom I know that you like—yes, that you do! That I have seen. And what you have not done, that you can do. Depend upon me. I know the lad. He is a good fellow; and can be silent like a man. That I like in him; and it was at my desire that he was so long silent on the wishes of his heart. Well!—Now, if you have any thing to say against him, say it—sing it out!"

"No—not precisely; but—" stammered Göthilda, now somewhat perplexed.

"Wischli, waschli! Talk Swedish. Yes or no," interrupted the general.

"Every thing or nothing, Göthilda!" said Jarl Herkules, and he looked at her with such a cordial and merry countenance as was irresistible to Göthilda.

"Well, then, every thing!" exclaimed she; "let it be as uncle will."

And she extended her hand to Jarl, but we strongly suspect that the heart had already sprung half way before it, spite of the Emperor of Russia, and that hatred of which we already know; and in the gigantic palm of General Herkules was her hand united to that of Master Jarl, who grasped it with Herculean power, and held it firmly.

General Herkules looked round at the company, and, with a cheerful voice, challenged them.

"Is there any body here who has any thing to say against the betrothal of my niece, Göthilda Dalberg, with my nephew, Jarl Herkules?"

"His father ought, at all events, to have a word in the business," now said a voice, which sounded strange, and which could not have occasioned more surprise if it had come from heaven; and into the room stepped an old man, of a handsome exterior, with an upright carriage, fresh complexion, and gentle, though grave expression. He wore the dress of a civilian, but upon his black coat shone a gold medal of bravery, like the one which General Herkules wore. Immediately after him came, but stood in the doorway, a man about fifty, likewise wearing the dress of a civilian, with a pleasant, round, and very jovial countenance.

The elder of the two, who seemed to be the other's master, and who was accompanied by Augustin, advanced, with slow steps, up the room, with his eye fixed on General Herkules, who stood nearly in the middle of the room, and whose stately figure in his military dress, was moreover a very striking object. The general, on hearing the voice of the stranger, had hastily drawn himself up, and turning upon him his eyes, continued fixedly staring at him, while the other approached nearer.

When within a few steps of the general, he paused, offered him his hand, and said, in a voice of deep emotion:

"Do you no longer know me, brother Wolmar?"

The general turned pale, pale as if from fear. His eyes seemed as if they would start from their sockets, while they were fixedly riveted upon the other. He looked confounded, and an uncomfortable feeling oppressed every one who was witness of this scene. At length, the general raised his hand, and pressed it to his forehead; he then extended it toward his brother's breast. It was seen that he trembled.

"It was there!" said he, as if to himself, as he opened his shirt front, and revealed upon the naked breast a large and deep scar.

"It has grown up, Wolmar!" said he with the scar. "Do you know me now?"

"Yes," said General Herkules, now violently overcome by his brotherly feelings which had been concealed for thirty years.

"Old boy!—brother!—is it you!" exclaimed he, and clasping the new-comer in his arms, he kissed him with tears.

"Old boy!—brother!—God forgive thee and me!"

It was affecting—it was actually "feeling-full," as Maja would say, to see the two brothers thus.

"And you are come yourself," exclaimed the general, "thanks for that! Thanks, brother!"

"I wished indeed to be at my son's wedding," replied the brother. "It was not enough for me merely to send consent and congratulations. And so I would see you once more, Wolmar—would see whether you could always continue angry with me!"

"The deuce! That was true!" exclaimed the general, warmly. "I had nearly forgotten that! And now—the d—l knows what has become of that thorn which I had in my breast against you. I don't feel it now. But—the deuce take such subjects! why did you remind me? Now I remember it all! Yes, brother, how could you do so? how could you act so!"—

"I have acted according to my conscience and my convictions, Wolmar!" returned the other, calmly but firmly. "But," added he, with a sorrowful expression, "that you would not believe, that it cost me more than I could tell that you should be my enemy; and that you thus felt and thought; and that you would not listen to the letters that I wrote to you—in all this you have done wrong, Wolmar!"

"The deuce take me, if I don't begin to think so myself!" exclaimed the general, uneasily.

"Yes, you have done wrong!" continued the brother. "After I ceased to bear arms for Sweden, I never bore them more. I have lived as a peaceable citizen upon my paternal estate, cultivated the soil of Finland, and have sown the seeds of cultivation in Finnish hearts. I have been faithful to God and my fatherland, and have peace with my own conscience."

"Peace, then, my brother; peace in eternity between us!" exclaimed the general, with fervor, and shook his brother's hand. "And if I can not see things as you do in all respects and can not share all your convictions, yet I can honor them. I know that they proceed out of an honest heart. Man sees piecemeal, God sees the whole. He judges! Enough—but your son—him I shall keep! On that we are agreed: You have six besides him—is it not so? and girls also. Jarl remains, therefore, my son and my heir. He is a good lad, and will become a good man. And a very d—l is he for silence! He has been as silent to this girl here about his love, and to me about your coming, as a wall. But hark you now—the deuce, it was almost too much. And there is his sweetheart, Arthur! Göthilda, my own girl! A good girl, you may believe. There is spirit in her, and heart too. I give you leave to kiss her, brother."

He did so. And now came forward a young Master Herkules, and a young Miss Herkules, and yet a little Miss Herkules, who had accompanied their father to see "that dear Sweden," and to be at brother Jarl's wedding, and who now represented the whole generation. General Herkules embraced and kissed them all, and took the youngest in his arms.

She was a sweet little girl of about seven years old, the delight of her father's heart. She looked both serious and glad—with bright, dark blue eyes—upon the gray-haired warrior; and then looking attentively at his order, took hold of his medal of bravery with one hand, and exclaimed, as she pointed to her father with the other, "Papa has a fellow to this!"

"You are right about that, my child!" said the general kissing the girl so fervently that she distorted her face, and then setting her down, he continued, while he laid his arm on his brother's shoulder:

"Do you remember, brother, when we got them? Do you remember the day at Kymmeneelf, 1789? As long as I live, I shall never forget that day. We were wearied by the day and the night's march. The enemy stood on the heights with their cannon; we down upon the plain among the morasses. But the king rode forth, and asked us whether we would fight this evening. And we all answered 'Yes!' And we fought. Hot was the fight, as hot as h—. But in a few hours we stood upon the heights, and the enemy fled across the plain! You and I, brother, had received some severe wounds. But we had gained possession of an ensign. We were young lads, then. Do you remember, brother, when we stood by the bloody banner, bleeding ourselves, with joy in our souls? 'Do you remember how King Gustavus rode up to us, and talked to us in the face of all? Then it was that we gained these, and our lieutenants' epaulets. Do you remember that evening, Arthur? Do you remember how the western heaven was bright with sunset-flame, and our hearts sang 'Te Deum' upon the battle-field? Did we then feel our wounds?"

"We were young then!" And the general looked upon his brother with bright and tearful glances. He was silent for a moment, and then resumed:

"Yes, it was then. It was a beautiful day, that first camp-festival. In such a state of mind as I was then, I have not been since, excepting many years afterward, on another—another greater day."

The general again paused for a moment, while some brilliant warlike memories seemed to arise before his sight. His eyes flashed, and all eyes were now fixed upon him, bright with expectation. It was so silent in the room, that the buzzing of a fly might have been heard. But no fly buzzed. General Herkules continued:

"It was in the great people's war. It was at Leipzig. It was the day when Ne-poison was beaten by the nations whom he would subject, and who now had risen up to crush him. On that occasion, the Swedes and the Russians made common cause. "One for all, and all for one." That was our watchword. And the crown prince, Carl Johan, led on the Swedes. The command was given at day-break. I wish that you could have seen him, my friends, when he galloped along the line on his snow-white horse, as handsome and proud as a god of war, and looked upon us with glances which would have kindled fire in our breasts, had it not been there. But it was there. It was burning there as high as heaven. The cause of the people's freedom had called it forth. It was for that which we were combating. Heaven and earth! what a day that was when we stormed Leipzig! For three whole days did the fight continue, and now it was coming to an end. Half a million were drawn up for battle, headed by the most powerful monarchs and the greatest generals in the world. It was on the nineteenth of October. From early in the morning was heard the thundering of the cannon, and the city was attacked by force of arms. That went on till noon. We were then within the city. Napoleon fled, and blew up the Elster bridge, after crossing it in his flight, with a thundering crash that shook the earth. We, Swedes, were among the first who stormed the city; many of us had fallen; many were clad in bloody shirts for the cause of freedom; but we cheered and pressed on, and many of the enemy's best men fell by our hands. Those were hot hours. We knew that we lived. The 'storm-march,' the beating of drums, the sound of the bugle and firing were heard every where. Every where were we fighting or pursuing the enemy. At two o'clock there were no longer any French in the city, and now rode in peacefully as conquerors, the Emperors Francis and Alexander, the King of Prussia, and the Crown Prince of Sweden. Children! I had seen him when he sat upon the sheaves of straw at Gross-beeren, calm and assured as a god, while he issued his orders and dispatched his officers, and I then saw what a great general is. I had many times been near to him in the tumult of the fight, and admired his courage and presence of mind. I was now also near to him in the moment of conquest, and saw him calm, gentle, magnanimous and generous toward the conquered, and—I loved him. We stood upon the spot, where formerly Gustavus Adolphus had combated for the liberties of the people, and been saluted as victor. And so also were we saluted now.

"Nearly a hundred thousand dead and wounded lay upon the field of battle. But shouts of exultation, blessings, and tears of joy saluted us. The windows were thronged with rejoicing people. A thundering 'Viva' filled the air. Yes—that was worth living for! The cause of justice, of freedom, and of the people had triumphed. And we had triumphed for them. The world was about to be renovated. A fresh life-stream seemed to flow through our breasts. The d—l take me if it were not so, although thousands of dead bodies lay around us, and death stood still before us. But it is a good thing to have lived through such moments—to have been an actor in such things. Thus something great is seen; and on such occasions it is also seen what is human greatness. We understand, we know that men are merely instruments—work-tools in the hands of Providence. We have seen the power of the great, we have also seen their fall. Yes, children, and we must all fall—to dust, to dust! But—God Almighty lives!"

Overcome by his feelings, the general abruptly paused, put his hand to his eyes, and brushed away the tears, so that they glittered in the air like diamonds in the sight of the others. Angry at his own emotion, the general stamped upon the floor, and exclaimed—

"Nay, it will never do, we have something else to think of to-day. Hurrah for fatherland, the king, and ourselves! Now let fiddles and bassoons sound for seven hundred thousand. Let us have a right good polska. Now children, set to in right earnest!"

And they did set to! Every body was in motion. General Herkules danced with young Miss Herkules. Ivar danced with his young bride. Bror danced with his young wife till his hair flew wildly in the air. Every gentleman danced with his lady. And in the adjoining room might be seen Corporal Stolt swinging round with Corporal Glad, the friend whom he had again found; while Maja, in the joy of her heart, danced round with Hannah, and Louisa hopped and swung about with both chairs and tables.

Thus danced they till after midnight. And thus was the festival danced to an end in the merriest and most satisfactory way in the world. And he who says otherwise—I should like to see!

Bowing, courtesying, smiling, congratulating, thanking, kissing, hand-shaking, so departed the guests. Arm-in-arm, cheerful and warm, marched Stolt with Glad to the new dwelling of the former. General Herkules took his brother with him; he had had a bed made for him beside his own. The brothers would now, as in the vernal green days of youth, sleep in the same chamber; they would talk about former times, and now in each other's opened and reconciled hearts they would again become young. But not all in this one night.

In the mean time every thing had become still and silent in the little Birch Island, and Augustin and Hedvig found themselves alone together in the festive hall.

"At last we two have met!" exclaimed Augustin, as he hastened to Hedvig, after accompanying the last departing guest to the gate, "now one may have a moment with you."

"But are you not very much tired, Augustin?" inquired Hedvig anxiously, as she took his hand.

"Tired? I?" repeated Augustin and smiled—that angelic smile. "Hm! I think that I could dance again before you. I feel so light, so gay, and I—love you so inexpressibly. And now we two will enjoy ourselves together. This day has been rich in many ways, and how well every thing goes on in every way. And how encouraging and hopeful every thing appears for us all; for our plans and undertakings. Of how much good achievement; of how many good beginnings has not the foundation been laid to-day. I only need one thing to make the accomplishment of all easy."

And Augustin's glance rested with affectionate inquiry upon Hedvig. Hers also upon him, as she said, "And that is?"

"It is to be fully certain that you also feel yourself entirely happy and satisfied. I have long wished to ask you about this, but I have hesitated, have feared. Yet now, Hedvig, I must know. Tell me, Hedvig, this your youth's beloved, this Ludovico—could you see him without any regret, without any pain, without to another?"

"Is it not any thing else? Oh, then, be happy, my Augustin!" exclaimed Hedvig, smiling. "Yes, Augustin, I can with truth say that I now see him without a lingering wish that it were otherwise than it is. On the contrary, I am glad and thankful that it is as it is—that Ludovico is happy with a beloved wife, and that I am freed from all temptation, all grief, which might have arisen had he returned unmarried, and with the same feelings for me as formerly. You see, Augustin, that my friendship for you, and the delight which I have in your society, have so entirely and completely extinguished all other feelings, excepting those which I have in common with you, for Ludovico, for our little and our great family circle. I desire, I wish for nothing higher than a life by your side as hitherto."

"Well, thank God!" exclaimed Augustin, and clasped his sister to his breast in the fullness of his heart. "Then our wishes accord in the very happiest way in the world. But how delightful it is, my sweet Hedvig, that you can love me so dearly. I shall be very fond of myself for that cause. Hedvig—between us also a completion takes place! Do you see the planet there, just above us? It is 'the family-house'—it is the twins which rest in each other's arms silently traveling through space with their beautiful double stars. The legend says, that the one shared with the other—the mortal—his immortal spirit, and therefore that the gods translated them both to heaven. It is our planet, Hedvig! I remember an evening, long since, when we watched them, even as now, above us. But then we were sorrowful, uncertain regarding ourselves, regarding the future. And now! I think that we are as certain and as clear as those children of heavens above! And as much united!"

Hedvig had quietly laid her head on her brother's shoulder as he thus spoke, and he had laid his arm around her. She said nothing, but the fullness of heavenly peace lay upon her pure brow and in her clear eyes.

From the window where they stood they had a full view of the hills on which the dwellings of the work-people were erected. They were bathed in the light of the full moon. The heights shone brilliantly. The air also was as mild as a summer night, and the crickets sung in the dewy grass.

Augustin's glance rested upon the rising dwelling-houses, and he clasped still more affectionately the beloved sister as he said—

"For all! Hedvig, did you not wish it thus? And how glorious it is that the most beautiful happiness of life may be possessed by all! Freedom, certainly, a quiet sphere of operation, peace of mind, peace at home, and therefore—a friend in heaven, the highest and best! And a friend by our side on earth—a friend like you!"

THE BIRTH-DAY.

A NEW festival was again in full bud at the little Birch Island. It was uncle Herkules' birthday. On this day he was to be treated with pure surprises and merry schemes, all of which were "Göthilda's ideas." On this day the bans were to be published in the church for Jarl and Göthilda; and early in morning the whole house was bright with garlands and crowns, and more cheerfully than common sounded the church-bells in the clear frosty air.

The floor of the garden-parlor was strewn with fragrant juniper-twigs, and already the breakfast-table stood spread out in profusion, with "wafers and biscuits and coffee remarkably good."

Early in the morning stole Göthilda and Karin, with a garland of fresh laurels, mingled with immortelles, to the door of the old man's chamber. Göthilda had chosen for her purpose the time when the general, after having read or worked for a couple of hours, commonly indulged himself with a little nap, sitting in his tall arm-chair. She pressed softly in at the door, and—yes, she was right—General Herkules sat at his work-table, leaning back in the tall gothic chair, and was slumbering soundly, with his head bent down to his breast. Upon this table before him lay his Charles XII.'s Bible, open, and beside it lay Thor's hammer, and his hand rested on its handle.

Ivar's young wife and Gôthilda stole in and placed the chaplet upon the old man's head, cautiously, cautiously!—and then retired with stealthy footsteps, not a little delighted at the whole having succeeded so well and that the general had not waked.

They now joined their brothers and sisters and friends who were assembled in the outer room, where Augustin held in his hand a large drinking-horn, richly mounted with silver, which was a present from the brothers and sisters to uncle Herkules.

All now struck up that cheerful song which was so dear to him :

"Swedes in the old times drank from the horn!"

At the cheerful, beloved sound, the old count should have awoke and been pleased; that was the intention. But he awoke not.

Beautiful was it to see that old head, with the green laurel chaplet on his silver-white hair. The morning sun now threw its golden beams upon it. The flowers of the immortelle shone out like stars.

The song was sung to its close.

"It is remarkable that he does not awake! Shall we sing the song again?" said the brothers and sisters.

"The coffee is getting cold!" said Hedvig, a little troubled.

"Go and kiss him, Gôthilda!" said Augustin. "He will not be displeased at being woken in that way; that I promise you."

Gôthilda went up to him, and pressed her coral lips upon the old man's brow. But she shuddered as she did so. The brow felt so marvelously cold.

With the movement that Gôthilda made, the general's right hand fell down from the table, and the hammer with it, making a loud noise on the floor. The head sank on one side, so that it rested on Gôthilda's breast.

Gôthilda looked inquiringly upon the slumberer. And with that she began to tremble violently, and large tears fell from her eyes upon the old man's head.

The others approached nearer.

"Dead! dead!" was whispered sadly and anxiously through the family circle.

It was so. General Herkules would wake no more on earth.

"May we all be thus removed!" said Augustin, as he grasped the hand of the sleeper.

And all the children whom he had loved and had cherished, went up to him, and kissed him affectionately with tears.

But Gôthilda lay down at his knees and embraced them in violent and bitter grief.

"It is his birth-day, Gôthilda!" said Jarl Herkules as he raised her up; "his birth-day, in the highest and best sense of the word. His last prayer is now fulfilled. He will bless us from his bright heaven, and we will gladden him with an earthly life!"

And he kissed away her tears.

General Herkules was buried according to the directions which he had given. In his coffin he was laid upon fresh, fragrant pine twigs; his hands clasped, as if in prayer. Fresh and green rested the laurel wreath upon his open brow. He was still beautiful in death. Old soldiers—poor Stokt among them—bore him to the grave. And around his grave stood a large family of brothers and sisters, and around them a crowd of people of the working class, men and women, with their children.

And the childless old man was attended and lamented like a father.

None sorrowed and lamented, however, like Gôthilda. Every thing which had been most dear to him, she took under her own charge—his riding horse, his dogs, his cloak, his old Bible, his war reminiscences and "Thor's hammer." It was her delight, in familiar moments, to talk about him with her brothers and sisters, to keep alive the remembrance of his peculiarities and adventures in the family circle when he was among them. Her husband has in him a great rival, and from time to time he hears :

"You are very agreeable, and I like you very much; but so agreeable as uncle Herkules will you never be!"

Gôthilda herself never became so perfectly agreeable and good as her name required; she never became a pattern of woman in her perfections. But she became, with all her imperfections, her tragic and comic fancies and whims, a very excellent, intrinsic, and amusing person, and, upon the whole, a great favorite in the Association, both of men and creatures. She became perfectly reconciled to her fate, although her husband continued to provoke her now and then, when she wished to make rather a magnificent appearance, by combing his hair down over his face, and looking very miserable. No greater occasions for her to sacrifice herself occurred.

What have we further to tell of the fate of the New Erections and the New Erectors? We refer to the wise predictions of the fortune-teller for this; because, strange to say, it was actually regulated according to these, to the utmost.

That which she forgot to add we now add here, with respect to Louisa and Eli.

Eli became a celebrated artist, seizing upon nature and truth. He never traveled to Rome, but obtained prizes in Rome, as the most faithful delineator of northern life. Louisa kept his house, and was happy in his and her dear little Karin's happiness; grew much stouter and better looking, in consequence of good living and good humor, and now shines like a sun among house-keepers, and still relates, both laughing and crying at once, "the sufferings and the good fortunes of the Olssonberg family."

This sister and brother deserved also their good fortune, because they always continued to be attached to the Dalberg family by the noblest and—perhaps—the most rare of all virtues—gratitude.

And now, good friend and reader, I have not forgotten that I owe thee, and Gøthilda, and the whole family, still a feast—the Chinese dinner!—but to speak candidly, I do not feel any appetite for it, and I hope that you do not either; I believe that we now must separate for this time!

But I must yet say one word about our honest Maja and her fate, because the Sybil did not leave us any information about it.

The faithful hand-maiden she was, and continued to be called in the Dalberg family, through the whole of her life—and that extended above a hundred years—and never sought any other honor or dignity (I know not whether a higher can be found). She lived to experience great honor and joy from her foster-child, and her masters and mistresses—our brothers and sisters—and from all their children, who had for her a particular affection. In her old age, Maja became rather too much given to boasting of the power of attraction she had with children. And true it is, that one almost always saw her surrounded by a whole troop of little children.

And we ought also to speak of her Hannah, and how excellent she became, and how proud and glad Corporal Stolt looked as he nursed his own little son on his arm, and of the verses which were so "full of feeling," with which the poetical Mister Dalerin celebrated his birth, in which both Mars and Venus figured, together with Cupid, and where our respectable and clever Maja appeared in a remarkable manner to be mixed up with Jupiter, the god of thunder, and how these verses were framed and glazed, and hung up above the cradle, surrounded with a garland of whortleberry twigs—but, kind, dear reader, I actually fear that this is becoming too "full of feeling!" too sentimental. And, therefore—farewell.

PREFACE BY THE TRANSLATOR.

---

OLD and tried friends are welcome at all times. But at Christmas, when the hearth is swept and the table spread for the reception of guests, they are ten times welcome, especially if they come unlooked for. Here, then, dear English readers—old and young, rich and poor, learned and unlearned—is your old and beloved friend, Fredrika Bremer, come quite unexpectedly to sit down among you by your Christmas fires and at your Christmas boards. She comes, as she ever does, in that spirit of love and good-will, which, nearly nineteen centuries ago, was promulgated by angels. At this season, then, make her cordially welcome. Receive her with a warm Christmas greeting, for with her comes a worthy company, by whom your Christmas fire-sides will be made brighter and happier.

THE MIDNIGHT SUN.

CHAPTER I.

A MIDSUMMER JOURNEY.

THAT which I love, that which I have loved from my childhood above all created things, has a beautiful face. Not of a Grecian beauty. No. Its features are far from regular. Not smilingly beautiful. No. Though the most lovely smiles beam there, its expression is solemn, and it has dark glances, and uncomely wrinkles and scars. But I love even these. Why? I know not. Love is of a wayward nature, and delights to kiss the very disfiguring scars, and adorn defects with the flowers of tenderness. My beloved's form is tall; great the contrasts which it presents: from his feet, which are bathed by the Baltic waves, which are caressed by carpets of flowers, up to his very crown, on which sits a diadem of wedge-like ice-rocks, and over which flame the northern lights.

At his feet I will sit, and hang upon his words as a child upon its mother's.

And lofty are thy teachings, Swea,* mother-land, native land! The sea is less deep, the beams of the sun are less warm, roses less sweet than they: or what testifies the Wala song, sung in "the morning tide" of the world's birth; of its conflict and fall; of its second birth through generations nourished on morning dew; of the judgment of the dead; of lofty Gimle and the abyss of Nifelhem? And the achievements and the graves of our fathers, what testify they?

And when the first is past, and over the old mythology of the songs and Sagas, of mound, and tombs, the new goes forth and scatters abroad the seeds of immortality—what spring up in the popular opinion? What says the legend, weaving silently its garland of Sagas about the woods, and lakes and mountains? What sing the people of the mountains, the mounds, the streams—all the harps of nature? Resurrection! renovation! And baptized in the life-streams of love and Christianity arise the legends; sprinkling with living water, encircling with imperishable blossoms all the living and the dead—the old man sinking to the dust, the mouldering stem, the whole of humanity and of nature.

But all that she—our mother Swea—knows of these things; of the world's creation and the world's object, she has not yet spoken. Unexhausted and inexhaustible is the treasure of wisdom which she preserves in her silent woods, and in her soundless deeps. And perhaps the Creator placed her so aside on the earth, so far up in the north, that longest of all countries might she husband her original strength, and where her sisters of the south have grown faint with the conflict, with the over-stimulus of culture, she may breathe upon them a renovating spirit of life; and the new World arising from her cavern of snow, sing for the world a new prophetic song, profound as the old—

Wonderful wisdom
Which most early she taught.

When was it sung by the cradle of Swea? We know not. Darkness covers the most ancient time. Long was the north a land of shadows and of Sagas. Of a country above the north wind, above the "people of the shades" near "the motionless sea," where the sun never sets, where the Hyperboreans, the most upright of mortals dwell, spoke the old, dark traditions of the people of the East. And the earliest native traditions of the north speak of these races of gods, giants, and dwarfs, and of their strifes. These are the first dawnings of the day upon the northern peninsula. When the light breaks—the light of history—over the gloomy Saga land, we perceive blood stains on the young earth—the first traces of man; we hear the songs of woe and the lays of love—his first language. Amid woods of eighty miles' extent, and mirror-bright lakes, we behold altars and huts, council-places and graves; and the people, a warlike people, stand on the council-place and elect a king, and pass laws. By degrees, the provinces distinguish themselves by their own peculiar natural endowments, genius and expression. First in the south, then more and more northward, where still, at the present day, cultivation advances toward the uninhabited regions.

Scania—sea-surrounded, genial, fruitful Scania, has perhaps, of all the provinces of Sweden, the most remaining of the primeval and original features. Mists hover over the low, far-stretching plains, which gently rolling up from the sea-coast, shroud the country; and when the wind, driving over the champaign, chases away these fogs, you behold, far away on the horizon, an azure border of ocean or forest, drawing its dark boundary round the landscape.

* The ancient mythologic name of Sweden, and used like our Britannia.

Masses of beech-wood stand here and there on the little hills, and ever and anon a small streamlet winds murmuring through the plains on its journey to the sea: the Viking's home. Along the level coasts stand most ancient towns: Malmö, Skanör—the flower of the sandy waste—Ystad, Lund, Helsingborg, Länshärad, Cimbrishamn (Portus Cimbrorum). The age of most of them no one knows, and the Danish rhymed Chronicle says—

When Christ willed to be born Stood Land and Skanör in the corn.

Moist, but mild; rich in the power of the sun (though often hidden), its cloudy sky broods over the soil of Scania, and renders it fertile and productive. The plain is for the most part now converted into a billowy corn-field, and on the green pastures wander glad some herds of dappled cattle, and white flocks of geese. Surrounded by splendid woods of beech, amid the corn-fields and sandy heaths rise proud castles of the lords, with their legends of goblins and specters. Their traditions of the Scania nobility, and the quondam mighty families—proud, powerful, splendid, and rich, in singular and striking individuals, both among the men and women.

Beneath the castles lie villages surrounded by scanty willows, built of branches of trees and clay; of a more recent date of framework, and of late of good stone, where children and geese dabble in the eternal mud; and linking together the castle and the cottage

Like spirits amid the trees
Glance the white churches forth among the corn.

The nobility of Scania are no longer what they once were, either in rank or riches. They have gone down, and the peasantry have ascended, and continue to do so to the present day. The new consolidation of the farms, which cut up the village, has been the making of the peasant. Upon his lonely acres, in his house inclosed like a castle, he has easily become rich and possessed of estate. But arriving at affluence, he has not seldom become slothful and aristocratic; often more so than the present lord of the castle, count, or baron. Attached to the land he possesses, and proud of it, the wealthy farmer who holds of the crown, will not give his daughter to the tenant of a freeholder, but regards a connection with his family as a gross mésalliance.

The peasantry of Scania are well known for their gravity and ponderosity, but less so for the intelligence and energy which have enabled them to work their way up from a low position to one of considerable prosperity and consequence, and for the public spirit as regards the affairs of their native land, which they develop more and more in proportion as they rise above their physical oppression. But this is nevertheless true. The constitution of the man of Scania is in general heavy; heavy in his conception of matters beyond his daily life; his speech is drawling. Heavy is his bread, heavy his porridge, heavy his dress, but yet peculiar and handsome. The dress of the women of Scania is particularly handsome, and the Scanian cloth* adorns tastefully their round and comely faces. In a word, the usual heaviness of the dweller of the plain, presses upon the farmer of Scania. For so it is, and can not be otherwise; men take their stamp from the circumstances in which they live. And the more flat and earthy is the character of the country about them, the more are they bound to the soil. Love and genius alone enfranchise them from it, and lift their pinions with equal freedom and equal brilliancy over the plain and the mountain, over the sandy wastes, and over the most paradisaical region. Profound thinkers have issued from the peasant class of Scania, and in the Swedish parliament, none has with more effective eloquence advocated the cause of enlightenment and freedom, none has spoken words which come from the heart, and reach the heart again, with more electric power than the peasant, Nils Monson, of Skumparp.

Scania renders to Sweden of all its provinces the most corn. It has given Sweden, too, what is greater and better: it has given her one of her greatest lawyers, David Nehrman, and two of the noblest painters, whom even Europe admires. Must they not be born in the country which the sun loves?

And warmly beams the sun upon the plains of Scania, on which the snow lies but restlessly and not long, chased by the wind, where the buckwheat ripens, and the mulberry tree and the sweet chestnut bear fruit, where the night-ingale sings in the groves, and the lark often the whole year round trills its lays, over the town of Soxo†—the town of old memories and young men—the youths of southern Sweden, who there study and sing in the close of the Cathedral and Lundagård; and where many a thought, many a song has arisen which already resounds through the world.

Scania is Sweden's outstretched hand toward Denmark, formerly extended in bloody combat, now in brotherly alliance. Long and bitter was the period of hostility; but in Copenhagen and in Lundagård arose two Skalds,‡ struck their harps and sung of the common memory and common life in the maternal embrace of the Sagas, of the gods and heroes of the north, of the first times and the first love, and the eternal bond of union of the people of the north. They burst the bonds around the hearts of the combatants—they began to remember and—to forget!—to remember the first brotherhood, and forget the times of discord. The frozen streams broke up, and enchanted, exulting, the people fell into each other's arms, recognizing each other as brothers and friends.

Between Helsingborg and Elsenaur, formerly hostile fortresses, now pass over the Sound only the greetings of peace and love.

Halland and Blekinge, both maritime districts, lie to the east and west of Scania. Once the haunts of the Vikings, they are now the homes of an agricultural population: Blekinge more wild and beautiful; Halland more ill-favored and poor. Halland, so named from its numerous mounds and hills, has still in its remoter parts scenes of wild beauty, great umbrageous woods, where the northern Bramble throws its luxuriant shoots around the stems of the trees, beautiful with flowers and berries. But, for the most part, the heath has usurped the place of the felled woods, and the ling abounds on the stony and sterile fields. The people of Halland, who usually are divided into the slavish, the independent, and the dissipated classes—distinctions that would very well suit most communities—are nevertheless a people poor, laborious, inventive, and active, and have raised themselves to great eminence in cattle-breeding and handicraft arts, especially in the manufacture of woollen cloths, to which a lady resident in that province gave the most effective stimulus, both by example and exhortation. Along the coast runs a chain of small towns, daughters of the sea, which supports them. The Swedish small town may be studied in them. Perhaps they are the meanest and most despised in all Europe. The Swede does not willingly adorn the outside of his house. His porch, if he have one, is not clothed with green branches, or flowers, as in southern countries. He has, and with good reason, no great confidence in the sun—in Nature's genial powers. And for all unnecessary trouble, as well as for many of life's comforts and pleasures, he has a wholesome contempt, which only goes—somewhat too far. The interior of his house is properly his home; you see that in small towns more than any where else. The street is empty, and in the market-place, in front of the Town-hall, promenade mostly four-footed things. The grass grows between the ill-laid stones. But, in the low house's low window, the passer-by sees between the white curtains, among geraniums and balsams, interesting and inquisitive faces of old and young, cats and pug-dogs, peering forth, all on the look-out for something new. And in the evening, when the candles are lit, he may discern through the windows, which no jealous blinds obstruct, a gallery of little domestic scenes, not devoid of comfort and attraction.

All is silent in the little town. The coffee-parties and the club make but little noise. Only when there is a ball, a carriage or two rumbles along the street, going to bring to it the ladies. The little, quiet, indigent town has, however, not seldom a great advantage over London or Paris, I will say nothing of Stockholm; in that it is neat, and has in it no paupers. The poverty of the little Swedish town is a poverty without pauperism. Halland possesses among its heaths, some landscapes of wild beauty, with rocks and waterfalls; among its recollections, some events of historical importance. In Sweden generally, no one knows much about these; but who in Sweden does not know, at least by report, Halland-salmon?

Beautiful Blekinge! Thee ought the poet and the painter to describe—to describe how, in the shady and delicious creeks, the Baltic sea ascends to sing its drapa* by the groves of the Vikings, which in hundreds of piles of stones stand along the shores, encircled with oaken woods. In these dales, where song-birds build and dwell, where the silvery brooks run murmuring, amid this people of fine forms, of beautiful dress, and open, cheerful dispositions, who are only too fond of strife, and in strife become wild, and betray the Viking blood, in this vision of beauty, Hokon Spegel dreamed himself into Paradise, and sang "God's Work and Rest," and composed hymns to the Creator's praise.

The whole of Blekinge may be compared to a park, with Carlshamn and Carlskrona as noblemen's seats; Carlskrona, with the fleet of Sweden, with Kungsholmen and Drottningsskär guarding the land; with cannon pointed east and south, and westward too, defending the Arpö Sound.

Larger than these provinces, and lying between them, is Smoland, a country finely alternated with hills, dales, and small lakes; northward more gloomy; southward, toward Blekinge, more cheerful, with a people quick, lively, contented, and so industrious and inventive, that it has given rise to its own proverb: "Put a Smolander upon a roof, and he will get a livelihood." This character is strongly imprinted on the remote forest regions of the country. The forest, which is the countryman's workshop, is his store-house too. The juniper and cranberry bush give him their berries, which he brews into drink; he makes a conserve of them, and mixes their juices with his salt, dry meat, and is healthy and cheerful with these, and with his labor, which he makes a pleasure of. At his solitary charcoal station in the forest, he sings his songs while it burns and chars, and when he is going to "tar the dale," as it is called, he makes it an occasion for a great entertainment.†

They honor their priest highly, converse gladly with him; on Sundays they bring him presents, and the women at the "cheese-meeting" are anxious that he shall have his dues. If he be unmarried, the elderly women take charge of his house, furnish him with fork and spoon and the supply of his larder, of which they will not allow themselves to taste. "No, thank you," they say, "you will want it yourself." A romantic enthusiasm runs throughout the Smoland people, and is conspicuous in their traditions, their temperament, and their history.

The town of Kalmar, the districts around Vettern, Jönköping, Grenna, Visingssö, Östnabe, have all witnessed times and circumstances more romantic than any romances relate. Smoland's poor soil has been prolific of great men. In Smoland, Linneus was born, the king of flowers, who when the scepter of war fell from the hand of Charles XII., arose to confer new glory on the name of Sweden, and diffused its honor over the globe, but with a scepter of flowers. Here the peasant Hörberg painted altar-pieces, which are still prized, in the intervals of making his hay and sowing his fields. Ling, the modern Goth, the father of Swedish gymnastics, the reviver and elucidator of the old mythic Sagas, fencing-master and Skald, was born in the ancient Gothland. So also Odman, the interpreter of the Scriptures, Lehnberg, the eloquent preacher, Botin, the historian, and Hoken Sjögren, who, a poor peasant's son, by extreme diligence and prudence, raised himself to the high rank of college professor, and published books of education, which are still highly valued, and who, through exact economy, acquired a fortune, of which he made the noblest use—who, old and gray, resembled a mossy image of stone, yet retained a heart full of warmth and life, and with his money-box under his feet, collected around him a troop of promising but indigent youths, whom he assisted with its contents—himself a faithful representative of the popular character of Smoland, a living lecture on the greatness which may be attained by a faithful attention to the little in time, in labor, in money, in every thing.

The women in Smoland have their own Sagas, and this its own living monument. The district of Wärends and the county-court of Wärends preserve these in the law, which, from the most ancient times, gives to women the right to inherit property like the men, to wear the warrior's belt, and to cause the drum to beat before them as they go to the church as brides, as the reward for the bravery with which they rid the country of invaders when the men were away in the war. The tradition regarding it is dark, half reality and half myth, an illustration, nevertheless, perhaps, of that which has pervaded all countries and people from time immemorial, of the exploits of Amazons, and of the people and land of the Amazons. Where are the Amazons? Where is the land of the Amazons? It is nowhere, and it is every where. Wherever a noble race of people dwell in a land. It is found in Sweden. The Amazon, the Sköldmön,* the Valkyria dwell there—in the silent bosom of the Swedish woman. Still at home, unassuming in society, the loving heart's deep world, she has never feared, and does not fear, in the hour of danger, to adventure her life; to battle and to die for what she loves, for her native land, for freedom, for truth and right. Blenda, Emerentia Pauli, Christina Gyllenstjerna, and many others, have with the point of the sword written their names in the history of Sweden. The Sköldmön, of whom the ancient Sagas speak, sleeps also in the gentlest heart. Awake her not, if not in love! . . .

The life of the islands around was well worthy of their song: its islands on the Smoland coast—Oland and Gothland, rich in the poetry of nature and in remains of antiquity. Sea-birds swarm around them, and in the clear moonlight nights of autumn and spring, the conflicting cries of the swans are heard; clanging sounds echo around the coasts.

Oland, with its rare flowers, its orchises, its Adonis Vermalis, its beautiful groves where the nightingale sings. Oland is worthy to be the cradle of Stagnelius. The ocean which rocks it, which from every corner of the island is seen in its greatness, is a perpetual image in his song, deep as the sea, and bright and beautiful as its calm mirror bathed by the sunbeams.

How much and how little, at the same time, is the life of the poet! No poet's life has shown that more than that of Stagnelius. The poet of Pleroma was born and grew up in the unromantic personage of Gärdlösa, perhaps the most prosaic point of Oland, with an awkward stooping figure, a plain countenance, from which merely, now and then, the ordinarily downcast eyes flashed lightning, and appeared altogether a very common personage, ate cakes—Oland's heavy, favorite dish; played three-handed whist with his sisters late into the night till the cocks crew, and died, worn out with bodily suffering, in his prime, an inferior clerk in an office in Stockholm. No matter! Pleroma's poet will live forever: and the "Lilies of Sharon," more imperishable than all the flowers of Oland, will bloom in the Swedish bosom with the fragrance of an eternal spring.

The prose of Oland are its wind-mills. They stand on the heights. Below are its groves, the poetical ruins of its royal palace, with the memory of the gentle Duchess Ingeborg, who lived here, as widow, to weep, and do good; and of the ambitious Prince* who here lived and built, glancing seaward toward Stockholm, and waiting for a crown. He received it from Christina, but was often afterward heard to exclaim amid the anxieties of a crown: "My good Oland, my good Oland, how happy was I on thy strand!"

Gothland, called the eye of the Baltic, a mountain table-land, raising itself above the sea, remarkable for its proud reminiscences of the past, its beautiful rivers, its flowers, and its antiquated customs, is at the same time the pedestal to Sweden's greatest mechanical genius, Christopher Polhem. The child which grew here betwixt the waves and the mountains, pierced at a later day a road through the rock, and taught the billows to advance thence, and form a path between two seas.

We return to the main-land. North of Smoland commences Ostro-Gothia, one of Sweden's greatest and most fruitful regions, and with Westro-Gothia, the heart of the ancient Göta-land, where, in former times, petty kings emulated and strove with each other. Deep, dark woods meet us here : Tiveden and Kolmorden. In Pagan times, and even long after in Christian times, the traveler who had to pass through these forests, commended his soul to God. Monuments of murders of stone and branches rise along the way ; and the loneliness and silence of the wood, and the long distances betwixt inhabited spots, awaken gloomy thoughts. But arrived on the summit of Kolmorden, you are astonished at the most magnificent view over the fields of the fertile country, intersected with its lakes, rivers, and canals.

The Ostro-Goth is proud of his country. Grave, honorable, and hospitable, he is satisfied with his land, and satisfied with himself, and will enjoy his rights without, however, violating those of others. "When the Ostro-Goth has got his fill," says the proverb, "set him at his post, and he will not give way to the devil himself." The Ostro-Goth may be proud too of the men who have issued from his country : Rydelius, Sweden's oldest philosopher, the poets Leopold, Gyllenborg, Jacob Wallenberg, Dahlgren, and the natural philosopher Berzelius, whose name is honored through Europe : we name here only the great dead.

In Ostro-Gothia we meet with the Göta canal, "Sweden's blue ribbon, which unites the Baltic with the North Sea." On the shore of Motala, on the margin of the canal, lies a grave at which travelers pause, and princes lift their hats as they go by. There rests the accomplisher of the giant labor which Polhem and Swedenborg began—

"The man with the strong mind"—Baltzar von Platen.

The Vettern, the sea with the romantic shores, with crystal clear, but restless waves, divides Ostro-Gothia from Westro-Gothia.

In the primeval times Westro-Gothia was a land of Sagas : where elves and spirits were said to dwell. Here where Trollhattan formerly roared solitary in the desert, had Starkhotter fought with the goblin warrior, Hergrim, and won the lovely Ogn Alfafoster, who would rather die than belong to the six-armed conqueror. The enchantment of nature has not been subdued even to the present day, but by its side genius has forced a way through the mountains, and Trollhattan with his foaming masses of water, his wild and beautiful fall, Toppö, Gullö, and Helvetesfall, contribute now to the pleasure of the canal voyagers.

Traveler ! Heaven grant you a bright day, when, in view of Hunneberg and Halleberg, you plunge forward out of the narrow canal into the living and mighty waters of the Götha river, and sail on the stream between enchanting shores, past Trollhattan, and then the wider stream down to Göteborg. This I wish you.

In Westro-Gothia live old families with ancient memories and patriarchal customs, as well in the houses of the peasants as the lords. The West-Goth loves these ; loves Sagas and songs, and a care-free, easy life. He tills his ground ill, neglects his advantages, and grows rather poor than rich. The contrasts of nature are great in the country. You behold the Vettern with its wreath of beautiful castles and parks, and the wild Trollhattan, the fertile plains of Westro-Gothia, the rich Guldskroten, and the heaths called Svälterna, down toward the borders of Halland, where you see no habitations, and find no living creatures except little, ragged, sunburned lads, who spring up here and there out of the heather, tending some lean sheep, and blowing on their horns some melancholy tones, always the same. Great are, likewise, the contrasts in the nature of the men whom Westro-Gothia has fostered for the common country ; men of the Forstena race—the brave warriors Anders Lennartson and Lennart Torstenson ; Ahlströmer, great in the affairs of peace ; Torbern Bergman, the forerunner of Berzelius, who, when a child, sought to arrive at the principles of things, and burned bodies to examine their ashes ; Kellgren, the perspicuous writer and critic ; Lidner, with his heart-rending but grand poetry ; Swedenborg, the seer of spirits, remarkable for his learning and his visions ; And by Axevalle heath lately sate a muse so charming, and composed with startling power, playful yet melancholy images of human life. Many know the genius of Sophie Zelow, the Baroness Knorring ; few have known her heart, and how beloved and amiable she was, as wife and as friend. Upon her untimely grave I wished to lay a flower, but I find it only a tear. She herself was one of Westro-Gothia's most beautiful flowers.

Bohuslän, formerly "Alfhem," the home of the Vikings, stretches itself northward from Westro-Gothia along the North Sea, up toward Norway. Of old the inhabitants were called Vikväringar, the defenders of the creek, and further down toward the Götha river, "Elfvargrimar," and were in evil repute. Sigrid Storröda planned her scheme of vengeance against the petty kings, her suitors ; and the severity in the disposition of the people has its counterpart in the nature of the country. The nature is severe. From the restless azure waves the granite mountains rear themselves like a sea in uproar that at once has congealed upon the land, and forms of it a rocky pile. Giants' caldrons and caverns are found in the mountains. Between the cliffs lie tracts of heath, and here and there, like oases in the desert, some green, fertile valleys. The sea is the country's real wealth, the field where millions of glittering ears are annually gleamed. Upon the shores of the Vikings now stand the cabins of fishermen. While the husband contends with the waves, the wife gathers moss from the rocks, or cultivates the potato-plot in the bosom of the crags, about which children and goats are clambering. So hard, so stern, so joyless is nature ; but the people are free-spirited, open, and active, and fear no peril, and know how to endure want. Such was Thorild, the intellectual Viking ; born on this rocky fortress, and advancing with his splendid genius upon it in the Viking campaign against all the wretchedness in the world, unsparingly and fearlessly; could he avoid his reward—the martyr's fate? In prison he composed his "Songs of the Goths," and he died a fugitive from his country. Proud was his spirit, and not free from rashness, but his contempt was of the true kind, and his love was of the true stamp, too. An angel might have kissed the page which he wrote.

Dalsland, formerly called the Marches, eastward from Bohuslän, has a more kindly nature than it, and much farther north, are lovely romantic dales, lakes, and mountains; but the people resemble the people of Bohuslän in their restless, combative spirit. The March-men and their wives had formerly no good repute for quietness; and here still live peasant families who boast of their descent from the Giants, and even betray the giant character and lineage in their forms and dispositions. Such is the wealthy, proud, huge-limbed, red-haired, quarrelsome race of the Holbollingars. In other parts of the country, education and industry have softened the manners; and the cloths woven here are, as in many districts of Westro-Gothia, an honor to the women of the country.

Dalsland, Westro-Gothia, and Wernland, surround the Wener, the largest of Sweden's lakes, so important to the internal traffic of the provinces, proverbial for its beauty, and the vast cataracts on its shores. In the east, over the frontier between the provinces of Swea and that of Gothia, stretches around the great forest of Tiveden, with its lofty ridge, Getaryggen, by which people formerly divided Sweden into South-wood and North-wood; and here, in North-wood, north of Westro-Gothia, we find Nerike.

We ascend now—for upward goes our course—to the old province of Swea, the "people-land," the proper Manhem, where, according to ancient tradition, the Swedish original race dwelt, as the Goths did in southern Sweden.

Nerike lies in the heart of Sweden, a little excellent country, the smallest of Swedish provinces, but rich in all that constitutes the utility and the comforts of life. You see this in the market of Örebro, in the cheerful town, where the thrifty, industrious country-people bring the produce of their woods, their fields, their meadows and mountains, for sale, with a variety of manufactures. You see it, too, in the charming, well-kept dwellings, which cover the well-tilled country. Here it seems good to be, for those that are quiet and gentle in the land—good to build and live, to think and to write. Different avocations demand different environments; for the pursuits of the Viking, the stormy sea; for the still-thinker, the peaceful country. Nerike's verdant and quiet country fostered for the country at large the brothers Olaus and Laurentius Petri, who wrote the Chronicle and translated the Bible, under the powerful protection of Gustavus Vasa.

But in this pleasant country I still see a bloody spot, which not all the waters of the Hjelmar lake can ever wash out! In the Hjelmar lies Engelsbrektsholm, where the Saviour of Sweden, the courageous and noble Engelbrekt, sick and propped on a crutch, was basely murdered by a Swedish nobleman. The grass, say the people, will never since grow upon the spot where the noble blood flowed beneath the murderer's hand. "Natt-och-Dag," Night-and-Day, was his name; but the day vanished thenceforward from his soul, from his escutcheon, for nocturnal was his deed, perpetrated in the night, and his life henceforward was a night. In the castle of Göksholm, situated on the shore of the Hjelmar, over against Engelsbrektsholm, long afterward was heard the cry of remorse; and misfortune pursued his family.

In Nerike begin the mining districts. A girdle of iron surrounds the middle part of Sweden, from the Baltic to the rocky ridges of Scandinavia. This includes the great and noblest mining tracts of Södermanland, Upland, Westmanland, Nerike, Wernland, Dalecarlia; the deep mines of Utö, Dannemora, Sala, Kopparberget, and many others. Every where has iron first broken up the country. Innumerable sepulchral mounds, stone monuments, and antiquities, testify to the age and importance of the country. It is a land of graves, but it is also a land where life continually flourishes in freedom and strength. It is a land of reminiscences, but also a land of men. It is Manhem—the home of men.

But the labor and toil here demand the strength of men. The granite, the primal rock, in the southern part of the country, covered by a rich mold, here protrudes every where, from its layer of earth to the light of day. The iron stratum is the ground on which the houses stand, from which the springs flow, on which the cultivated fields lie, often sterile and poor. Poor and scanty, therefore, is frequently the sustenance of the people, and pale poverty is found to dwell under the turf roof of the lowly cottages. But, no matter; out of the poorest countries issue the strongest men: Westmanland, Dalecarlia! So great is the power of the spirit over nature; so little can the earth, the old giantess Ymer, prevail over resolute and contending man.

Forward lies the noble Mälarn valley; the provinces of Södermanland, Upland, and Westmanland, inclosing Mälarn, the lake affluent in islands and legends, into which, according to an ancient Saga, all the running waters in Svithiod fall. And thus, at its outlet into the Baltic, in the border of Upland and Södermanland, stands the royal city of Stockholm. As you approach Stockholm from the side of the Baltic, you come first to a coast of many miles in length, abounding with rocks and islands. Innumerable greater and lesser islands and holmes form on all sides creeks and passages. You see every where new views open themselves. Charming, inviting bays glance full behind, while there lies something that you would fain see nearer, but which is soon forgotten in a fresh object. The holme is often a sweet, green meadow, cast on the surface of the waters, more frequently a conical rock, but seldom ever a naked one. Fir woods clothe the heights, and groups of deciduous copes shine out with their light green foliage from the bosom of the rocks. At the feet of the cliffs stand the cottages of the fishermen, neat and good, on the green coast; and in front of them, on the water, rocks the little craft with furled sail, resting in the snug port. Higher up on the upper terraces of the mountain, glances forth from clumps of deciduous trees, the elegant country house, the suburban villa. The nearer you approach the city, the more handsome become the inns, higher and more closely thronged become the mountains. There is finally a castle, a fortress of granite, with pine woods on its rounded summits. At once this opens, and there lies Stockholm, in a splendid amphitheater, with its royal castle, its churches, its masses of houses, in a crescent round the wide harbor, where are the flags of all countries, surrounded by eminences crowned with bright-looking villas. "Here," says the chronicle, "was formerly much wood."

In former times—on the spot where Stockholm now stands, once took place a bloody banquet—a wedding, at which the carried-off bride, the royal Princess Skjalf, murdered her bridegroom, King Agne, thus revenging the murder of her father. The spot where the mead and the blood flowed on the night of the wedding, is thence called Agnefist, Agnes-point. There Birger Jarl built the royal city of Stockholm, on seven holmes, rivaling the finest capitals in the world, excelled by none. But the first wedding night has given the city a baptism which can never be effaced; and so long as the bitter waves of the Baltic, and the sweet waters of the Mälara mingle, never shall the beauty of the holmes, the splendor of the festival, and the hum of carousals eradicate the traces of blood, and the eternally active revenge. For there go still, at the present day, the apparitions of the past, the plunder-loving Agne, the revengeful Skjalf, the drunken bridegroom, and the pale bride; and the bloody memory pollutes the streets and squares of the city.

But beautiful and great memories also hover, like protecting genii, over the seven islanded city of the north. Here have the great rulers of Sweden swayed the realm: Birger Jarl, Sten Sture, Gustavus Vasa, Gustavus Adolphus the Second, and Sweden's great Charleses. The history of the earth has not got many greater characters, none nobler than the woman who defended the Castle of Stockholm against the tyrant Christian, when the men gave way, or fell—Christina Gyllenstjerna. And Queen Christina, even thou, fallen morning-star, but beautiful in thy arising, thou too hast cast a glory over the regal city. The love of literature and art which thou didst kindle, did not perish with thee. This didst thou give to Sweden, and Carl Gustaf as king; thy medal with the terrestrial globe and the inscription, "non sufficit," and the celestial globe with its inscription, "sufficit," were and are the watchwords of all great souls. "Thou wert also the daughter of the great Gustavus Adolphus."

Many cities have larger palaces and churches, more beautiful bridges and buildings than Stockholm; none have more beautiful environs, or a more varied, rich, and gladsome nature. Konungadotter, the daughter of kings, still stands nobly, enchanting in her bridal array of blooming meadows, crystalline seas, and silent, shadowy banks. The artist loves this scenery, at once fascinating and dangerous for him. Bellman was inspired by it, and sang here his dithrambic song; on its holmes, Hedvig Charlotta Nordenflycht composed her warm and beautiful idylls. Sergel, the poet in marble, the creator of Cupid and Psyche, of the Fawn and the Dying Gladiator; Hjelmar Mörner, the master in the art of coloring; Mörk, Sweden's first romance writer, whose own life was a gloomy romance; Nikander and Vitalis, two noble, fiery geniuses of song, but extinguished in a melancholy night; all these first saw the day at Stockholm, and lived in its enchanted circle. The first wedding night was repeated for them. They were intoxicated and strangled in the enchantress's arms. She bound them with a golden chain; they drank from the same hand, mead and death. And for all ardent natures she is still bewitching and dangerous. But over the waters of Lögare* the wind blows freshly, and entices the people out of the sultry, restless city. They obey the call with alacrity, for the Swede is no city dweller, loves not city life, but willingly seeks life in the open air; and every holiday in summer sees the inhabitants of Stockholm, by land or water, pouring forth on a pleasure trip. The romantic coasts invite to it. More than two hundred castles and royal residences with their parks lie upon them; and among these many with historic, gloomy associations, the prisons of kings, scenes of long sufferings, of fratricides, as Gripsholm, the castle of Nyköping in Södermanland, Orbyhus, the castle of Upsala in Upland. Södermanland has the most beautiful islands, the most woody, legendary shores, with the holds of Vikings and runic stones. The pleasant Wingöker, which is supposed to derive its name from the Vikings, betrays little of this descent in the peaceful pursuits which enrich the country, which plant its orchards and hop-gardens, or in the quiet, strikingly handsome people, who in an elegant costume, long, white homespun coats, the women in bright-red striped cotton head-dresses, wander through the country selling their hope, their woollen cloths, and sieves.

North of Mälarn is Upland, the oldest royal residence, where Sigtuna formerly stood with silver gates, where religions, preached in the kingdom, first struck root; where Odin established the first worship of the gods, built the first temple, and Ansgarius, the apostle of the north, five hundred years later, erected the cross, and built altars, before which the old faith fell. The past and the present seem near in this place. Upsala, the city of the lofty halls, the city of Odin, still stands surrounded by the mounds of the dead, with the walls of the old temple of the pagan deities within the new churches, with Odin's, Thor's, and Freya's mounts, and Sweden's blooming and manly youth in its bosom, environed with the ancient faith and the new time. For the ancient faith is not yet dead in Sweden, not yet sunk into the earth. Remains of it still continue to survive all over Sweden in the popular belief in spirits and hobgoblins, in the people of the mountains, the cairns, and the streams, in the wonder-working and divine powers of nature. Offerings are still made at sacred wells on the hills; spirits are still invoked with secret arts; still strive the false gods with the only and great God. The Uplanders have, perhaps, of all the country people of Sweden, the least remains of this superstitious belief; but what remains to them in a high degree of the nobler mind of the pagan, are pride, steadfastness, the power of enduring much labor, of surmounting much, bearing and suffering much without complaint. The Stures, Gustavus Vasa, the great Oxenstjerna, Anders Celsius, Johan Baner, Nils Bjelke, were, even in all this, Uplanders. And a strong and enduring spirit even she * possessed—the mysterious being who went forth from Upland, was canonized in Rome, and alternately praised and blamed by her cotemporaries, and is still not at all understood, yet who sought an honor which was not in the award of men; but said, as she resolved on her journey to the holy sepulcher, "I have neither begun, nor do I aim at concluding this for your sake. I have determined in my soul to pay no regard to the remarks of men."

And the joyous Upland lady, "not one of the eighteen,† but one of the nine," whose poems will live through all time, and gladden every Swedish mind—the old man's and the boy's, the mature woman's and the young girl's, the engaging poetess, the noble, sensible woman, Anna Maria Lenngren, in many things unlike St. Brigitta, yet possessed, with her and great men, steadfastness, strength to endure and suffer without complaining, and manifest this in a life which expired amid many troubles. For that is also a noble art, and well worthy of being practiced, that of well concluding a well-spent life; and, as the great Gentile said, "to make death not a suffering but an action."

Westmanland has rich mines, the greatest silver-mine of Sweden among them; but also desolate and poor regions, still more woody and desolate northward, toward Dalecarlia. In those remote parts, among mines and fir woods, and a population that has little intercourse with the world, men are strong and original, but putting too much faith in the infinite and indestructible doing of this little world and its work. Thus Rudbeck, the author of Atlantica, Ehrensward, the architect of Sveaborg,* Ridicule and the Russians, have pulled down both these great works. But Sweden honors in these twin two great spirits, and has not permitted mere outward accidents to darken their memories.

Westward of Westmanland is Wermland. It breathes warmly from this tract. It is true the country rises with seventy or eighty miles of woods toward the ridge of the snow mountains, and winter is severe and long. But it is Warm-land notwithstanding. With fire King Olof Trätälja opened up the country: fire flames every where out of the earth, blazes in the smelting furnace, glows on the hearth, gleams out of the iron forges, while the snow covers the fields. Fire lives also in the temper of the people, in their life, their song, their dance. True, the polska—Sweden's national dance—goes briskly in Upland and Södermanland; true, it has its peculiar character and variations in every different province of Sweden, and for the Nerike polska it requires a steady head; but the polska of Wermland, but the polska of the Jösse district, could originate only in Wermland, can only be danced by the man and woman of Wermland. He supported on her arm, swinging himself up to the roof; she carried in his as in a whirlwind: there is the spirit of the Vikings in the dance. And rapid and spirited is the music to the dance, like a clear winter-day, when the pine trees roar by the foaming waterfall, and the hammers of the forge beat time. There is fire—and was formerly more than now—in the social life of the province, where hospitality and entertainment are the business of the day. The kind of amiable ladies of Wermland must never cease to welcome and to entertain. There exists a fiery, youthful, and poetic life in the nature of this country, which Geijer calls a "akärgord† flung up in the middle of the forest," or these islets and promontories where the birches sigh; and on the shores of the lakes and rivers love and song appear at home there. And there had Sweden's two most fiery and noble poetic geniuses and natures, Geijer and Tegné, the home of their childhood. They were born in Wermland, as flowers developed by this life and nurture. They carried fire thence around the world with the name of Sweden. They kindled it in their countrymen's hearts toward the memories of the past, toward the eternally beautiful, toward all that is great and good. Like the Klara River, which ascends from concealed springs, streams through the land, and now in waterfalls, now in calm, delightful waters, still extending itself onward and seeking the sea:—such were their lives in different paths it is true, but with the same goal. That which gave to the genius of these men its beneficial power, and at the same time enchanting and ennobling forms, was the strong heart. This they received from their mother-Swea; for she has a strong heart. It is her strength. But out of the heart—the center of life—proceed the streams of life.

S. G. Hermelin is also one of the names which Wernland pronounces with affection. He, too, bore fire from the furnace of his heart into that of the fatherland, and continued in the north the work of Olof Trätälja in Wernland—to his own loss, but to the gain of his country; and was, therefore, more honored and esteemed in his misfortunes than many others on the summit of their prosperity.

The Wernlander is warmly attached to his country, to its beauty, its peculiar customs and character, its rural, fresh life; and, though far separated from it, as bishop or counselor of state, the Wernland peasant is still the same at heart; and dearer and more touching than all the world's most exquisite music, is to him that single song:—

"Wernland, thou noble, thou beautiful land!"

Gloomy heights, deep, smiling dales, calm lakes, rapid rivers, a still, powerful, populous country—Dalecarlia, we approach you!

The name of Dalecarlia is great in the history of Sweden. Freedom always received thence her most powerful champions. Engelbrekt and Gustavus Vasa there found their men. They who would see the real popular life of the province and its character, should behold in the parishes around the Silja lake, the people on holidays, in their holiday costume, streaming forth to church, from wood and dale, or racing in their boats with ten or twelve pair of oars on the lake. They should listen to the great but homely village courts, where the morality of the people is maintained by the people's own moral power. They should visit the dwellings of the people on week-days, and see beside the plow and scythe the implements of the watch-maker or the general mechanic, and the Bible, and Luther's sermons beside these. They should see how the Dalecarlian man and woman, husband and wife, labor together, while the black-rye porridge boils in the kettle, and the child sleeps in its lambekin, hanging swinging by a rope from the ceiling.

The levity of the Wernlander is not found here. The seriousness of mind often becomes gloomy. The women are gentler than the men, their countenances more cheerful; but in love of their native land they have alike distinguished themselves. Profundity of mind, and diversity of genius and art, have distinguished the men who have gone hence for the honor of Sweden.

Engelbrekt Engelbrektson, at once statesman and general; Stjernhöök and Stjernhelm, whom Queen Christina called her stars of Dalecarlia; Benjamin Höjer, Hans Järta, the peasant Nils Pehrson, and Johann Olof Wallin,* the David's harp of the north, reflected faithfully the genius of the dales' people, even in its point, wit, and satire. It is playful on the surface, but is serious at the bottom. Thus it is in Stjernhelm, and Wallin, and—the points of the dale arrows* are sharp at the present day.

Beautiful is the scenery of Dalecarlia, sweet and grand by turns. But over the grand, as over the pleasant, there hovers a solemn genius; and the minor key prevails in the songs which arise from the dales and woods, prevails ever in the music of the polska, brisk though it may be and attractive. The northern spirit makes itself felt. The winter is bitter and unrelenting. The frost lays waste the scanty harvests; the quicksilver freezes in the northern part of the country, and gardens remain a mere experiment. The desire to embellish and beautify existence seems to decline with the warmth and nature's southern life. The beech reaches in Ostro-Gothia the boundary of its growth. North of the Silja the oak is no more found. The pine, dark and solemn, prevails in the woods. The song-birds, which in southern Sweden fill the groves with delightful music, often the night through, do not come so high as here. It grows more hushed in the wood where the north-wind howls. Flowers become rarer, mosses more abundant. The bear shows himself. We approach the northern, the youngest Sweden, Norrland, the ancient giants' home—Jotunhem—Norrland, the land of mountains, birches, rapid rivers, and great river dales.

Surrounded on the west by Alpine ridges with their pyramids, their cubes and cones of ice, their glaciers and caverns, through which dark streams rage, with Sulitelma, the Festival Mountain, as their queen, at whose feet primeval forests murmur; to the east by the sea, to the north by the polar circle and its Laplanders; above it a crown of rocks, and beyond the icy ocean and the unknown and uttermost boundaries of the earth. Norrland lies in beauty, with the pole-star over its head, a land of contrasts, where light and darkness, life and death, the beautiful and the repulsive contend and conquer by turns, and in the conquest display their highest powers. Rapid and clear, the rivers spring from the bosom of the rocky mountains down enchanting dales, to which they give their names—as the rivers of Indal, Ljusnan, Uman, and Ongerman. The great rivers known through the world—the Tiber and the Thames, the Rhine and Seine, the Elbe and Danube, even father Nile himself, I believe, have muddy and yellow waters. But Norrland's diamond-clear rivers dance in maiden purity down the snowy rocks, through the country, into the sea, at once gentle and strong, to ameliorate its bitterness and bless distant shores. Roaring and furious near their cradle, they become more and more tranquil as they approach the ocean; and more majestic, but always equally clear, they go, like good Norrlanders, to bear the products of the country to the market of the world. These are multifarious. In wedge-like shoals the salmon ascends the rivers. The forests are rich in game. Black cocks and ptarmigan crow over the bear's den; the beavers build by the brooks, and from the exhaustless forests along the mountains the rivers bear floats of timber and boards to the coast, where commerce hoists its waving flags, where the ships lie awaiting their cargoes which the land sends, and, before all, its flax—for most beautiful is the flax of the north. And glorious in beauty, and reigning with the enjoyment of life, gallop herds of horses, free the whole summer in the fields abounding with grass, delighting the traveler with the sight of Norrland's strong and beautiful horses. Further north, the productions of the fields are rarer, the soil is more sterile, the vegetation more diminutive. Even the pine rears a thin and as it were frost-bitten scepter in the woods, and the birch becomes a dwarf on the margin of the eternal snow. But still up in Lapland the potato is cultivated, and at Enontekiö, under 68½ degrees of latitude, still corn grows; for the Scandinavian peninsula is the cultivator's most northern home on the earth. East and west of us in the same latitudes the circumstances are very different. In Siberia all tillage ceases at the 60th degree, and in Canada at the 51st. Why Sweden and Norway have been the most favored among the world's polar lands, science has not yet been able to explain. I say—"Our Lord has made it so, and what he does is well done."

Nordmarken is inhabited for the most part by Finns. The east of Norrland, and also the whole of the eastern coast of Sweden leans toward Finland, as a mother leans toward her severed child; and for many of her most beautiful geniuses Sweden has to thank Finland. Creutz, Adlercreutz, Calonius, Freese, Fransson, the Hornes, Laureus went from Finland to maintain the honor of the mother-land with sword or pen. And there still Runeberg enriches the Swedish tongue with splendid idylls full of freshest nature.

Young yet in Sweden's history, Norrland has not been able to give and to be what it yet will. But among the men it produces we recognize the popular character of Norrland—strong, sagacious, practical, cheerful, and prudent. Thus Norberg, the Orientalist, as great in learning as simple in manners; Johan Liljeorantz, the Minister of Finance: the naturalists, Arctid, Gahn, and Sefström; and the warm patriot George Adlersparre.

The scenery of Norrland resembles that of Dalecarlia, but is grander, broader, and more genial. The great rapid rivers go through the dale districts as if to rival each other in beauty. Height ascends above height in immeasurable amphitheatres, as if to look down on the spectacle of the dales; on that population of the peasants, who, handsome in form, pure in mind, clear in thought, pious in heart, glad in disposition, build by the river, free, comfortable, happy; on the smiling beauty of the meadows, where the northern flora, poor in species, but liberal in their abundance, lets the flower of the arctic raspberry, and cornels, and cloudberry vie in beauty; on the tall birches, which, from Nyporna, along the shore resembling an old, moldy sepulchral mound, toward the river, bow their green crowns; and, finally, on the river—the center of the picture—in whose mirror, they, the hills, see themselves and all the splendid region afresh. Splendid, especially when over it the Norrland summer night stands clear, without a shadow, with a magic splendor poured over every thing which there lives, breathes, loves and enjoys. Should not every thing love under this heaven where the evening-red and the morning-red kiss each other triumphing over midnight; and the summits of the ice-rocks send flaming glances down into the valleys; during their short summer hour, where the life of earth is born in dithrambic joy, blooms and bears fruit under the light-life of a few weeks, where life itself seems a feast, which knows no darkness nor night. Soon is it past. Quickly come cold and darkness; the long winter and the long night, in which all nature's life dies, and sleeps under the great winding-sheet. But round the snow-clad earth the northern lights go wakefully, conduct the silent nightly dancers; and in the peasant's house sparkles the pine-wood fire, and the flax is spun by men and women, amid the sound of songs and legends.

Thus it is in the populous dales. Farther up it is more silent. Soest thou, in immense and desolate forest tracts which bound the horizon, huge columns of smoke ascend here and there to heaven? That is the spirit of the cultivator who advances toward the pole, who with fire clears away the forest for the plough. It is the trace of the colonist, who wanders in the wilderness, driving before him the Laplander. Instinctively he gives way. More and more the nomadic people are pushed upward toward the icy hills with their herds; more and more are they melting down and dying away before the conquering power of civilization.

But up there he is king still: the king of the desert; constrained by no one; and feels himself free and happy; rich in his herds and his few needs; not seldom rich in trinkets and silver too; mystic in his faith, poetic only in his songs and dances.

Up there it is a land of mysteries. Enormous iron mines; vast beauties of nature lie guarded by the dragons of cold. But there are also hideous marshes, immense fens, over which, in summer days, the cloud of mosquitoes hangs like a thick, continuous fog, till the first autumn night scatters them on the ice-like ashes. Much regarding these regions remains yet to explore and ascertain, but the polar spirit stops the inquirer's breath. He will not here be disturbed. Therefore, the further man ascends, the more silent it grows.

And often, in the midst of Norrland's most beautiful regions, is felt his oppressive hand. Here near the mountain ridges are found tracts of which a traveler truly says: *

* Arvidsson's North and South.

"Nature smiles indeed, but it is a sorrowful smile. It is as if the geni of the country mourned over their poverty, and wept over their hard lot among happier brothers and sisters; as if they cried to the lord of nature: 'We too feel courage and the pleasure of life; we too love wood and lake; over us too shines thy sun, but it warms us not. The chains of cold bind our wings; no bird sings in our woods, and seldom does a living creature mirror in our lakes its black and dwindling form. We live and grow, but we ripen never.'"

And yet, with all this severity and this gloom, with its pictures of darkness and death, Norrland exerts in the mind I know not what secret power of attraction. It lies in the very contrasts of this life and scenery, in this desolation and this beauty; this sad greatness and this sweet charm; in the witcheries of its short summer—that enchanting festival of light—in the magnificence of its winter night, when the stars shine with extraordinary luster; it lies in the power of this earth, which in virgin vigor of youth bears the cultivator seven-fold richer harvests than the longer-tilled lands of the south. It lies finally, for certain minds, in the very mystic scene itself, which the midnight sun illumines, around which the mountain ridges keep watch, and the northern light flames in winter, but which man has not yet made his own with his laws and landmarks; in the silence of this fence-free, primeval forest, which nameless streams traverse, and beasts and plants, not seen in the rest of the world, alone inhabit; in the remoteness from the civilized, restless, laughing, crying, world—before all in its solitude!

Swans fly thither; they seek the most lonely lakes, those farthest removed from man, in order, in peace and freedom, to enjoy their brief life of love—to raise their melodious songs.

Spirit, who lovest and sufferest! Burning heart, thou singing-swan in the human breast, wilt thou not do like these? Wilt thou not away thither to rest thee, to refresh thee, to taste of solitude, to anticipate eternity? There, in that silence and greatness, it shall be well with thee, and thou wilt better conceive how—"God's spirit rests upon the northern land."

And now, for one brief moment, let us stand up there, in this northern land. Let us sojourn in Norrland!

THE MIDNIGHT SUN.

MIDSUMMER was at hand. For more than a week had the spirit of summer already burst forth with power in Norrland, and changed, as by a magic stroke, the hitherto dead landscape, clothing the trees with foliage, calling forth the flowers, and filling hill and valley with songs and fragrance. Land and water beamed with her splendor.

There had been rain in the night. It was new morning. Light and shadow combated among the clouds—the eternal symbol of human life and temper—and threw changeable lights upon the landscape. At length his majesty the sun ascended from his bed of cloud, and put an end to the combat. He joyfully shone upon the meadows wet with the rain; upon the broad valley, with its wide, blue, glittering river; upon a mansion-house, with its surrounding estate, which lay upon a height, and commanded an extensive view over the whole neighborhood.

The wind, like a giant in a bad humor, arose murmuring to himself in the pine woods on the mountains, and betook himself—not yet quite awake—down the valley, with a prodigious bustle, breaking as he went, a few old and obstinate trees, which opposed their gnarled twigs and branches against his course, and advanced onward, like a bully, over the tops of the birch-trees, which bowed submissively as he went by, waving their long, green tails; and then, with a rushing sound, he came down over the little flowers of the plain—anemones, and arctic bramble blossoms—as if he would annihilate them altogether. But the little flowers did not take any notice of it; they nodded and gave way, brightened and smiled, and cast forth fragrance and pearls of dew to the wind, and took all in play: it was not possible for him to be angry with them. Perhaps the old fellow from the mountains—we knew him to be as old as the deluge, and that he helped to dry up the earth after it—was put in a good humor by this. For it is a certain fact, that he appeared quite mild and gentle when, bringing odor from wood and meadow, he passed almost caressingly over an elderly, but noble human countenance, which, from the balcony of the house—the mansion with the fine estate—gazed upon the landscape around, and seemed to enjoy the freshness of the morning.

This was the countenance of the lady of the mansion. It was Mrs. Cecilia Nordenhjelm's. She was a lady of lofty stature, whose figure was somewhat bending rather than thin. She was dressed in light-colored and ample garments; a snow-white linen cap covered the silvery hair which, parted on the forehead, lay in soft waves on the temples. There was altogether something very agreeable and dignified in her appearance; the countenance, with its stamp of noble gravity and kindness, seemed to be almost without a shadow. And yet sometimes it looked very aged. At such times there was something heavy on the brow; and in the wrinkles around the eyes and the mouth might be read the expression of long sufferings; at times, also, her carriage was more stooping than at others, as if she had a burden on her shoulders. She then might readily be supposed to be sixty and upward. But in her better moments, and especially when a fine, clear crimson tinted the cheeks, and the upper lip was curved by some merry joke, or the head was elevated in cheerful humor, she would scarcely be supposed to be fifty. She was a handsome old lady, that is certain.

Whether she was a native of Norrland or not, I am not going to tell you, because—I don't know myself; nor has it any thing to do with the matter. Neither shall I tell you whether she was countess or baroness—whether her husband had been senator, doctor, or any other dignitary; because neither has that any thing to do with the business. She was a Swedish woman, a Swedish lady, such as are many in this country; and on her estate she was called the lady; and—I shall not say any more about her for the present.

But with regard to her thoughts this morning hour, I must say that, although varied like the coloring of the woods, still the sunshine evidently preponderated in them, while the mild blue eyes wandered from the flax-field, which, in its tender greenness, shone beautifully, like a representation of hope, to the white, newly-woven linen, of which from fifty to a hundred ells were spread out on the hill, basking in the sun, while the vapor ascended in light steam-clouds above it from the heated grass, and the wet clothes dangled and wavered merrily about on long lines, in the increasing sunshine and in the increasing wind; and while old Lisa, the washerwoman, stalked about between bleaching linen and wet clothes' lines, in greater bliss for the moment than if she had been taking a walk in Elysium; because every kind of business on earth brings with it its own peculiar trouble and its own peculiar happiness, and the washerwoman's pleasure in good drying weather, is as great as many another's in "this vale of tears." This by way of parenthesis.

Any body might have seen that Mrs. Cecilia thought how the flax grew, and the linen bleached in the sun; how the clothes were drying in the increasing wind, and how her old Lisa was enjoying herself. It was not at all extraordinary, therefore, that the salutation of the wind came to her like that of a good friend; that while with both her hands she pushed back her hair from her brow, she inhaled the fresh, invigorating morning air with pleasure, and thought, as she looked around her—

"God's spirit in the northern wind."*

She had, however, deeper thoughts and feelings, that might easily be seen upon her expressive countenance—feelings which fluctuated between anxiety and joy, such as find place in the deepest recesses of the soul, and which shun expression and light, at least outward light, because they do not need it; and expression, because they can not be expressed. Such are the thoughts and feelings of the loving human heart.

* The motto of the arms of Norrland.

But now they were all dispersed by a new object, and Mrs. Cecilia laughed merrily.

It was at the "little Sprig," as Mrs. Cecilia called him on worky-days—Frithiof, on high days and holidays—who, dressed in a sky-blue tunic, was bounding about the court; and now, in a whim of bravery, took upon himself to tyrannize over a couple of crows, which were leisurely marching toward a little pool formed by last night's rain, and in which our excellent little Sprig looked at himself, and therefore regarded as being his own especial place for splashing in. With stern puissance he lifted up his little cane, and called out to the crows, "Wait a bit! I shall teach you, never fear—only wait a bit!"

The crows, however, did not wait, but flew up, merely flapping their wings over the little Sprig, who, quite startled by their "Croak! croak!" stepped backward in astonishment, and was near turning head over heels into the very puddle from which he had chased the crows.

"Well, how is my little Sprig?" exclaimed Mrs. Cecilia. "Are the crows going to teach him to stand on his head?" and with that she laughed.

Her laughter was repeated by a faint echo, and just then a young woman, dressed entirely in black, and with an expression of affection in her countenance, joined her on the balcony.

She was very unlike the elder lady, this younger one, for she too was a gentlewoman, but still she was beautiful in her own way. She was of a slender and delicate make; her large dark eyes spoke of strong feelings; the carriage of her head was proud, while a hectic crimson kindled her pale cheeks, and on her rosy and beautiful lips was an expression of scorn, which seemed as if it would defy the whole world. The cherub, the morning star, which fell through pride, from its allegiance to the Creator, might have looked as she did. Yet, nevertheless, the eye rested with delight on that countenance, because it was beautiful, and its expression testified of a strong and suffering spirit.

"Ah, well! good morning, my dear Mrs. Sola!" exclaimed Mrs. Cecilia, as with motherly affection she stroked the rich black hair of the young lady. "How bright your hair looks in the morning sun! and your eyes also! but every thing shines, and is bright in this blessed morning hour—even tears. Do you see how they shine in the grass after the night rain, and are like little suns. Every thing will be lovely and magnificent to-day—even our little Sprig. Look at him galloping about there on his little cane, and fancying himself one of the lords of the creation, although he has just now been nearly standing on his head because of the crows."

"He resembles his sex; the whole race are alike!" said the young woman bitterly. "Love of dominion and selfishness are the principal characteristics. If I were our Lord, I could not bear to let the sun arise upon this race. Men do not deserve to be loved; they are ungrateful and stern."

"Ah! you poor child, are you at that already?" exclaimed Mrs. Cecilia, casting a glance of commiseration on the young woman. After a moment's silence, she continued—

"People have generally three epochs in their confidence in man. In the first they believe him to be every thing that is good, and they are lavish with their friendship and confidence. In the next, they have had experience which has smitten down their confidence, and they then have to be careful not to mistrust every one, and not to put the worst construction upon every thing. Later in life they learn that the greater number of men have much more good in them than bad, and that even where there is cause to blame there is more reason to pity than to condemn. And then a spirit of confidence again awakens within them. You, my poor Ida, are now in that second difficult stage. But I hope that you will one day arrive at the third—the calm and consolatory."

"Where you have arrived, dear mother," replied Ida, smiling, "is it not so? But I shall never get there. I have had too bitter experience for that; and I can not forget! The Bible speaks about a star, the name of which is wormwood, and which renders all the fountains of the earth bitter."

"Does not the Bible also speak of some herb, or some tree which makes the bitter water sweet?" said Mrs. Cecilia.

"In the Bible, perhaps," replied Ida, "but where can it be found on earth? It is choked by the thistles, slander and severity."

"Most of us have to pass through good report and evil report," said Mrs. Cecilia, mildly; "but those who hold by the right, and endure faithfully, will in the end be justly estimated, even by others."

"In the end!" exclaimed Ida, impatiently; "and when does the end come? And, in the mean time—"

"Time sets many things right," said the elder lady, mildly, and with an expression of gratitude; "and, in the mean time, we may become better and more patient. Yes, time and self-discipline, because they make us humble. And to the truly humble is given the peace of God, and frequently his power."

There was a something unspeakably lofty and beautiful in the old lady's expression as she said this, as if from inward and deep experience.

The young one shook her proud head impatiently, and a smile hovered over her lips, which seemed to say,

"I have often heard humility preached up, but to practice it?"

She silently cast her eyes over the flowery, sun-lighted earth, and the bitter spirit within her whispered, deception! illusion!

Poor young woman!

The old woman had other thoughts.

"How green the flax field looks after the rain!" said she, cheerfully smiling; "and how the corn has filled! It looks as if we should have a good harvest. And if the flax turns out a good crop this year, we shall be spinning and weaving in the winter till we are quite merry. You should learn how to spin, Mrs. Sola," continued she, in a cheerfully joking tone. "I must get you seated at the loom, and then that restless, fermenting spirit of yours will allay itself. You are a beautiful Eolian harp, dear Mrs. Sola, only too much exposed to the winds. If the trembling strings could be touched by regular housekeeping affairs, they would produce a very different sound."

Ida could not help laughing; she now almost laughed as merrily as Mrs. Cecilia herself.

"Ah!" said she, "if I were to begin to be a good housewife under your teaching, dear mother, I should turn out something one of these days. But, that never can be. I shall this winter be a long way from here, upon the troubled ocean of the world. I must now soon leave you, dear mother, and the beloved hills and dales of Norrland. That must be!"

"And why must it be? Shall I tell you why, Mrs. Sola? Because you are too proud, too proud to accept a home, and a shelter even from your mother's old friend, from her whom you called mother in your childhood."

"No," replied Ida, "not too proud to receive any thing from her, but because, when I married I covenanted with myself and my proud relations, never to require the help of others; because it is necessary that I obtain not merely bread for myself, but also for my child, and provide for its future. The harp must sound while its strings are thus stretched. The teacher of music must work while she can do so. And you, dear mother, do you wish that I should do otherwise?"

"No," replied Mrs. Cecilia, "I do not wish it, because I know that you are doing right. I will, therefore, not prevent your leaving me, although it is so painful to me, especially as it must be so soon. But your little girl, dear little Naïma, I shall fetch from Torneo before that, and I shall keep her with me the whole winter. I can not be comfortable unless I have little children about me. And my little Sprig now really wants a playfellow and a companion at his book. Your little girl must console me for your loss; for your music has made me more cheerful than I have been for a long time. But, before you go, I should like you to make a nearer acquaintance with my children, who will now so soon be all assembled here, my son Adolph, whom I know that you have already seen, among the rest. He is only my son-in-law, but my own sons are not dearer to me than he is. The little fellow there cost the life of his wife, my Virginia, and his grief for her loss has made him still dearer to me. He will now soon return home from a long journey, and then soon afterward all my other children come here, and there will be a merrier life than at Bragesholm than you have ever seen."

"But all that liveliness does not suit me," sang Ida, half playfully. "Before all this happens, I shall be beyond Torneo, on the way to Uleoborg, and afterward to Petersburg—"

"The post is come!" exclaimed Mrs. Cecilia, as she listened to a heavy step outside the room. She went out, and speedily returned with the post-bag, which she opened, and took out letters and newspapers. She handed two letters to Ida and two she kept to herself, broke them open hastily and read. Ida looked at her as she did so, and saw that her countenance brightened as if with joy. When she had finished reading, she laid her hand on Ida's arm, pressed it, and said: "Ah, Ida! to be able to do justice to every body. For this have I labored to my old age, and now the moment is just at hand when I can say I have done it. If I had not done this, I could not have lain straight in my grave. But now!—And my children!—I can see their future secure; I can now leave them a property free from debt! and Adolph, my son Adolph, is coming this very evening to remain with us. I must go and tell Ina."

And Mrs. Cecilia, with the letters in her hand, hastily left the room.

Ida looked after her. "How young she still is in soul and body!" thought she, "and I?" She looked at her letters and opened them with a proud and careless expression. She read, and her glance flashed with rage. She crumpled up one of the letters in her hand with a look of extreme anger. In a few minutes, she went out the same way as Mrs. Cecilia.

She passed through a large hall, called the "great joy," since the days of Mrs. Martha Orrhane, who had formerly possessed the estate and built the house, and who, in this hall, celebrated all her family weddings, and gave all her entertainments—and these were many—and who had with her own hand painted on the walls of this hall sky-blue pleasure-gardens, in which were wonderful temples, and in which goggle-eyed shepherds and shepherdesses cast the most terrific glances at each other, and where Mrs. Martha Orrhane herself, of joyous memory, sat the size of life, and in a large hoop, and looked amazed and joyful at all her masterpieces, and at the rhymed moral sentences which she had inscribed with her own hand over the four doors of the great hall, and from among which we select the following:—

"Love God and love your native land;
Be brave, be zealous for the true;
To industry and friendship's band,
Virtue and love show honor due."

Ida went, as we said, through the "great joy," and afterward through many other rooms, all christened with their own names, from the days of Mrs. Martha Orrhane, and thus came to the one called the "little joy." Here dwelt Ina, who was also called in the family the innermost. And in this room she heard the sound of joyous familiar voices.

"How beautiful it is that our affairs are going on so charmingly, and that the business will so soon be done," said a young lively voice, "and that Adolph is coming this very evening. How delightful it is!—Ah, but we must see to the fisherman that he gets us some salmon for the evening; it is Adolph's favorite dish!—And we must also take the life of our fatted calf, and then—will you, mamma, send Helena up to me that we may talk about the stores? We must be well provided, now that all the brothers and sisters are coming. Ah, how merry that will be!"

Ida entered the room just as Mrs. Cecilia was going out of it. Her countenance bore witness to the struggle within her soul. The joyful expression of Ina's countenance changed hastily to one of uneasiness and pity as she saw Ida's face, and the letters in her hand.

"What is it?" said she, "something annoying?"

"Merely a new attempt on the part of my relatives to humiliate me," replied Ida; "they offer me a maintenance for myself and my child. It sounds grand, but I know them; and they—shall learn in time also to know me."

"Can I see the letter?" said Ina.

Ida gave her the crumpled letter. Ina read it attentively, and then said—

"It is not kindly written; it might have been more agreeably done; but, after all, it looks well that they are willing to provide for you and your little girl."

"Yes, out of charity!" burst forth Ida; "but upon such charity as that I set my foot and spurn it from me. Charity—I neither desire charity nor gifts of charity; I will have none of them; I will never receive them. Rather die—rather starve to death with my child. The men of my country have forgotten themselves," continued Ida, with flaming glances, and with indescribable pride in expression and bearing; "but the women still preserve something of the strength which they showed at the battle of Venden, when they allowed themselves to be blown into the air rather than ask favor from the cruel Iwan, who had ignominiously treated their husbands. For five days had he fired upon the castle in which they and their children were inclosed, and now they could no longer hold out. Its few defenders had either fallen, or were taken prisoners. Thus three hundred ladies, with their children, the flowers and buds of the nobility of Leifland, the descendants of the old Crusaders, assembled in the knights' hall, beneath which they had placed four casks of gunpowder. Dressed in their best attire, adorned with their most valuable jewels, and leading their children by the hand, they entered the hall. Here they engaged in divine worship, and partook of the Lord's Supper together. When the enemy was heard to approach, they assembled in a circle around the minister amid prayers and the singing of hymns. And, just as the Russians were seen above the walls, one of the ladies gave a signal to a servant to light the powder. He took the burning match; the ladies clasped their children to their breasts, and all were blown into the air. The Russians found a heap of ruins, among which, however, was one living child, the daughter of the lady who was first in the enterprise. She was my ancestress. She yielded neither to pride nor to power; neither shall I."

"It was magnificently done by her and by those ladies of Leifland," said Ina warmly, with that beautiful paleness of countenance which the relation of noble and vigorous actions calls forth in sensitive minds. "But," continued she, while a faint trace of good-humored pleasantry played round her smiling lips, "I do not see that there is any occasion for such heroic actions. They will not make a prisoner of you: they will only make you more free through gifts."

"Gifts of charity," interrupted Ida, hastily; "they will bind me by charity, humiliate me!—I know them. I know the spirit which breathes in that letter. But I shall answer them so that they shall feel themselves humiliated!—Yes, that is as I shall answer them!"

"Ah no! do not do so, Ida! You may be mistaken. The letter may be, nay, in all probability it is, well meant. And, in any case, what purpose would it serve? Merely to irritate—to embitter! If you will decline any assistance, do it in a friendly manner. Do it so that it may not wound your relations, so that they may still think of you as having maintained your dignity. Would that not be the best, Ida?"

"You are a little, gentle spirit of reconciliation, Ina, and prudent at the same time," said Ida, after a moment's silence. "And that would, indeed, be the most prudent. But—"

"But do not send an immediate answer. Give yourself a little time. Look closer at the letter; let a few days pass, perhaps you will then see it in another light. Let mamma read it, and—"

"I have not much time to wait, at least not here!" said Ida, with a sigh. "I must set off from here this very night, my husband's relation, Colonel G——, will come to fetch me in the Ornsköld steam-ship—will accompany me to Torneo, and from there drive me in his carriage to Uleoborg, where I promised to spend a few weeks before I set off to Petersburg. I must accept his offer, and hold myself in readiness. But do not let us now talk about me. Talk about something else, about that which just now made you so merry."

"Ah, so vexatious!" exclaimed Ina; "that you should set off just now, when all our brothers and sisters are coming, and when we shall all be so merry here! Ah, Ida! what a pleasant thing it is to have brothers and sisters!"

"Is it so pleasant?" said Ida, with a distrustful smile.

"Oh, yes! And now we shall be right glad altogether, because we have good news to talk about. Through the sale of a small property, which mamma first put in condition, and has now an unlooked-for chance of selling to advantage, we shall be able to pay the remainder of our debts, and we shall now possess Brageholm entire and unincumbered, as mamma has desired and labored for so many years. This purchase will be concluded at the beginning of July, and by that time all the family will be here. Mamma will then render up the account of her stewardship of the property, and consult with them about some new measures and plans for the future. Adolph probably comes to remain here altogether, and to assist mamma in the management of the estate for the future, and of that we are all very glad. He is so good and kind. But you know him already!"

"Only think," said Ida, "if now the right heir, the eldest son, Erik, should come back and present himself at this great family-meeting, and, like Banquo's ghost, seat himself at the table with the others in the 'great joy!'"

"He!" returned Ina, "yes, if he came, then we should all of us be poor, and then there would be an end of all the gladness, at least for us who never knew him. But mamma would be very glad. But poor Erik! he will remain away sure enough. He has been dead many a long year. I never saw him. He must have had an unhappy temper; but, spite of that, there was something very kind-hearted about him; so much so, that he never could keep any thing for himself, but gave away all that he possessed. And he would have got rid of the property also, if he had had his own way with it. But we will talk about my brothers and sisters. The eldest is Fridolph, a very estimable man in office, the best and the gentlest man in the world, only somewhat fierce in politics, and dangerous to talk with on that subject. He has, spite of his forty years, and beneath his grave, official demeanor, a secret passion for dancing, which sometimes regularly shocks sister-in-law Amelia. Then comes Charlotte—Virginia was between Fridolph and Charlotte, but she is away now."

Ina was silent for a moment, and then, suppressing a rising emotion, she continued—

"Charlotte is very good, very kind, a regularly splendid girl. She requires a great deal to do, a great deal to look after, a great deal to bustle about after. She would become a right excellent little wife and mistress of a family, if she could get a good husband. In the mean time, she thinks a deal about establishing a manufactory or some other great institution, but few can see how it is to be managed. And then come the youths, as we call them, Yngve and Arvid, my two youngest brothers, the one a young man in a government office, the other a young student of art, both very good, although very unlike each other, and both of them sing so delightfully, that it is a pleasure to hear them. And then I come, who am good for nothing, excepting to love all the rest."

"Then you can do more than many another, who can not love any thing," said Ida.

"Ah! but who can not, if they will?"

"But many, perhaps, will not. To become attached to, to love, is the same thing as to suffer, to become dependent on others, wounded, deceived! Better to have an ice-cold heart, and to stand solitary and alone."

"Solitary!" exclaimed Ina. "Ah! I could not live solitary. I can never be happy unless I can say we."

"And I," said Ida, "I see merely in that a fetter. The heart's captivity, the worst of all!"

"Oh! no! no!" exclaimed Ina, "you are unjust to yourself; you must alter and improve yourself. And you so handsome, so gifted—"

"I so handsome, so gifted," interrupted Ida, ironically, "am beloved by no one, and love no one; and do not wish that it should be otherwise. But," continued she, with a hastily altered expression, "yet, after all, if I were to choose, I would rather be Ina than Ida."

"Me!" exclaimed Ina, in amazement. "Ah! you do not know—" and her eyes filled with tears; "no, you do not know," continued she, cheerfully; "you do not know rightly what you will. You do not know all that you have to thank fortune for, you bright, accomplished being! And to-day, when it looks so beautiful, surely you have been out on your beloved hill?"

"Yes, I have been out."

"And the fragrance of the birch was very delicious? And the flowers in the green grass, and the butterflies that danced over them—were they not all indeed very beautiful? Every thing comes out so rapidly when warm weather once comes; and the birds, the free, happy birds, which fly about wherever they list under Heaven, how they must have been singing in the leafy pastures, and in the unfettered trees, which wave and murmur in the summer wind! Are not they happy who can see and hear all this, who are not confined?" And the cheerful eyes flew like captive swallows toward the window, longing to be out in open space.

There was a very dissimilar expression in this pair of eyes to that in the dark, orientally-beautiful and gloomily burning pair, which looked also into space, into the blue heavens.

We Swedes have generally no noses to boast of. They are of all sorts of shapes rather than the regular, and not unfrequently are potato-formed. But eyes, look you, we have eyes to take the whole world with, and something beyond that! Ina's eyes were not, however, of the usual Swedish kind, large and clear blue; but their form was beautiful, and their color gentle as the sapphire, and their glance fresh and inspiriting as the spring-heaven, while they were at the same time so especially affectionate and observant, that they seemed to press into the innermost recesses of whatever they fixed themselves upon with earnest tenderness. But then they were so gentle, that they never could be considered either troublesome or pain-giving; and their joy, their roguish laughter, was irresistibly infectious.

Ida's flashing eyes repelled or kindled. The strong but imprisoned fire which revealed itself there was counteracted by the coldness and by the pride of her character. It operated repulsively, as Ina's attractively.

Does not this lovely and caustic-tempered woman appear enigmatical to thee, dear reader? A word about this enigma, because there are many such enigmas, although few in so handsome a form.

Thou hast seen sometimes a bright crystal drop, which smilingly mirrors the light of heaven, change into a sharp-pointed crystal of ice. And why?

Because a bitter north wind passed over it.

When people meet with such an embittered drop in a human form, it generally happens that they shake their heads over it and pass by, or cast a scornful smile, or a keen word at it—salt upon the frost!

But thou, kind reader, do not so. Pause for a moment, and think that this embittered drop is a petrified tear, the child of bitter sorrow, and disdain not for a moment to take upon thyself the part of the sun, and shine upon the petrified drop to warm it. Perhaps it may be released thereby from its enchantment; perhaps it may again become that which it was in its childhood—a beautiful eye, smiling toward Heaven. Perhaps it may thank thee by its beauty, and then, and in any case—blessed be thou!

But we will now return to Ina's last words, "Happy are they who are not confined!"

The subdued, mournful tone in which she said this, changed quickly as she added with a smile, "But we must not take things in such a melancholy way, but as the old man Noack says, philosophically. Will you sing with me that merry song, that philosophical song, I call it, 'It's all one to me! It's all one to me!' I long for a little music just now."

Ida smiled, took her harp, and they soon both sang—the two dissimilar young women, both of them in a sort of merry, fool-hardy way, the philosophical old song—

"It's all one to me, it's all one to me,
Whether I'm a beggar, whether I'm a king;
If I am a king I can spend the money,
If I am a beggar I can leave the money;
So it's all one to me, all one to me,
Whether I'm a beggar, whether I'm a king!"

"It's all one to me, it's all one to me,
Whether I'm a gentleman, whether I'm his man;
If I am a gentleman, I sit in the carriage,
If I am his man, I stand behind the carriage.
So it's all one to me, all one to me,
Whether I'm a gentleman, whether I'm his man."

"It's all one to me, it's all one to me,
Whether I am old or whether I'm young;
If I am young, why, I can go a-dancing,
If I am old, why, I can leave off dancing!
So it's all one to me, all one to me,
Whether I am old, or whether I am young!"

During the singing of this gay song, particularly suitable to time and place ("the little joy,") we will leave the singers, and accompany Mrs. Cecilia.

Mrs. Cecilia sat in her writing-room as counting-house, where she for many years had done the business of a book-keeper, as well as received there her dependents. This room was furnished with the most simple and unexpensive materials, its only ornament being the portrait of a handsome man, which hung upon the wall before the writing table. Mrs. Cecilia was sitting on the sofa; and, opposite to her, in a cane-chair, by the door, sat the old overseer, born in the same year with herself, and who had been in service thirty years on the estate, having held his office under the late possessor. —The old overseer was a man of herculean frame, particularly as regarded the breadth of shoulders and chest. One of his legs had been twice broken by accidents occurring during his service in the family, and the last time had been so badly set, that it became shorter than the other, and the old man limped in consequence. But he found himself very well off notwithstanding, because, as he said, "his leg lodged so nicely" when he drove into the fields. Mrs. Cecilia had obtained for the faithful old man a medal for merit in servitude; but he did not like to wear it, because "it looked so absurd," he thought. His strong and still rosy countenance had an expression of honesty, firmness, and that quick shrewdness which is peculiar to the Norrlanders.

Mrs. Cecilia had spoken with her servant about the state of the property and the approaching changes, as also about sundry plans and measures which should be taken and decided upon, when all the various members of the family met in the beginning of July. Mrs. Cecilia did not conceal the pleasure she felt at the prospect of her affairs, which had so long been involved, being soon set straight, and in seeing herself and her children possessed of property wholly free from debt.

"Yes," said the old overseer, "that is all very good and excellent, that is, if every thing were but right in the business."

"How right?" inquired Mrs. Cecilia.

"Ay, I merely mean if every thing were but right."

"How right?" repeated Mrs. Cecilia; "what do you mean, Hans Ernst?"

"Ay, I mean that every thing is not right and just, which has been done."

A faint crimson rose to Mrs. Cecilia's cheeks, and even flushed her brow; but she had long ago curbed in herself those fermentations of anger and impatience in temper and manner, which are so common both with men and women, and which distort so greatly, especially in the latter. She regarded it as very much below the dignity of the human being to allow himself to be carried away by them; and, whenever she felt the impulses of passion within herself, she knew perfectly well how to control them; and, excepting by a slight trembling of the whole body, no one could see at such times that she was inwardly excited. This trembling occurred even now, as that obstinate but honest servant continued—

"I mean that there is a somebody who ought to have a share of all this, and who alone has a right to the property."

"You know very well," said Mrs. Cecilia, "that the two sons of my husband, your former master, are dead long since."

"Yes, one of them. That I know. Him I saw with my own eyes a corpse; saw him laid in his grave. I can not have any doubt about that. As for the other, Mr. Erik, who took to the sea so many years ago—you see, I never could persuade myself yet, that he also is dead. No, that I never could."

Mrs. Cecilia was very pale, as she replied—

"You know very well that for many years we endeavored to gain intelligence of him, and that upward of ten years ago we received the positive tidings of his having been killed in the war in South America."

"Yes, but you see, I don't believe it. And the other night you must know, my lady, I had a very remarkable dream. I thought that I saw young Mr. Erik standing all alive before me, and he said—'Give heed. They are unjust to me here, because I am the heir, and every thing here is mine!' And since then I have thought more than I did before, that it is both a sin and unjust, that young Mr. Erik's property should go to strange children, and he not have his own. He was a wild young fellow—quite like our late master sometimes—but he had, for all that, a heart as good as gold, and then he was mad for riding and traveling—it was a passion of his. He had no fear, not he!" And the old overseer smiled as if to himself. "Yes," continued he, "I can not say any thing else but that I was fond of the lad, and that I believe he had not right done to him in his childhood, either by the late master or the lady—and it grieves me that injustice should be done to him now also."

"Dear Hans Ernst," said Mrs. Cecilia gravely, but without anger, "it is you who are now unjust. Do you wish that I should act toward a dead man as if he were alive? After the death of the two elder sons, according to their father's will, the property belonged to me and my children."

"Yes, but if he, Mr. Erik, I would say, is not dead," persisted the obstinate overseer, "and I mean that people should not make themselves so certain!"

"Dear Hans Ernst," said Mrs. Cecilia, "make yourself contented. If the improbable should happen, if Erik should return, he shall be welcome to me and mine. But, until this happens, you must pardon me for acting according to that which I myself know with certainty, rather than according to your presentiments and dreams, and manage the estate as if it were the property of myself and my children, which is in accordance with law and justice."

The old overseer looked down upon the earth, and merely said in a tone of grief—

"Yes, yes; our Lord directs every thing for the best, and no one knows what is to happen."

Both were silent for a moment. Afterward, Mrs. Cecilia said somewhat sharply—

"Hans Ernst, let that timber be taken as soon as may be to Innerstalund; I wish the buildings there to be ready before winter. When our Lord shall call me away, I wish that my daughters should have their own little home to flee to. And, at my time of life, people should hold themselves prepared. If Charlotte marries, Innerstalund shall belong to Ina alone; and it will just amuse me to put it in order for her; and that, indeed, the sooner the better: for you are right—no one knows. Yes, Hans Ernst, as I have said, we will push on with that work. See that the smith is soon ready with the locks. One of these days I shall drive there and see how the work gets on. Good morning, Hans Ernst!"

The old overseer bowed and retired. For a long time after he was gone, Mrs. Cecilia sat with depressed head, as if deep sunk in thought. She sighed, and the burden seemed to lie heavy on her bowed shoulders. But her eye fell upon the opened letter which lay on the table, and her countenance brightened, and her head raised itself. She fixed her eyes on the portrait of the handsome man, which hung above her writing table. She gazed long at it, and spoke to it inwardly in this manner—

"Yes, thou mayst now smile; thou mayst now rejoice in me, my poor friend! No shade rests now upon thy memory, no debt against thy paternal estate. Thy good name and thy property are once more reinstated!—Yes, thou mayst smile now!"—And a tear forced its way from her eyes as she thus addressed that husband with whom she suffered much, endured much, but to whom she was deeply attached, especially through that suffering which she, during the latter years of their marriage had helped him to bear.

After that she took up one of the letters and read the last words—

"I come to you then, my mother, to remain with you and with all who are most dear to me on earth!"

"My dear Adolph! thou art coming!" whispered Mrs. Cecilia, "and Charlotte, my Charlotte! she shall be happy!—Adolph and Charlotte!"—And Mrs. Cecilia smiled. She saw in spirit "the great joy," blazing with a hundred lights, and heard the sacred words of the marriage ceremony, and afterward the gay sounds of the wedding within. She rose up, went to the window, and opened it to let the fresh air enter. While with her glance she embraced the vast and glorious landscape, and clasped, as if in her soul, that which she had watched and improved, and now loved best on the earth, she exclaimed, joyfully, and at the same time thankfully, "My child! my beautiful Bragesholm!"

CHAPTER II.

WHILE they thus talked and acted at Bragesholm, we see at the distance of many hundred miles, the stately steam-vessel the Ornsköld, heavily laden, plowing the blue deep, while the waves of the Baltic Sea foamed and roared around the stamping paddles.

The deck was now tolerably empty, because the sea heaved heavily and most of the passengers were sea-sick. One gentleman, in an ample but worn blue cloak, with hair and appearance somewhat resembling a German student, sat in the saloon and wrote a letter of many pages. We see that he has now about finished, but we hope that he will not take it ill that we begin with the beginning, and in doing so, we must go back three days.

"On board the Ornsköld, 17th of June.

"BELOVED FRIEND—

"Your 'knight errant' is now on the midsummer journey, the journey to the land of the north wind, the home of the midnight sun. But what a midsummer journey!—Cold and misty, and now and then sleet! And on board a hell of crowded people; tobacco-smoking and jeering gentlemen, silent and suffering ladies. One can not get a breath of fresh air. If it should be thus the whole way! Is this a presage of the result of my journey?—I half regret that I have undertaken it. I am ill, uncomfortable, depressed in spirit, half desperate. 'The people of the shades,' I know them well, already encompass my path; they have followed me through my life; they follow me even now; I can not escape from them any where, not even into the grave. No matter! I will wrestle with them, I will travel to the end of my journey! I will consult the oracle, become certain of my fate, and then, whether it be night or whether it be day—I shall be calmer, better. The sorrow which has so long gnawed at the root of my life will give me a last wound, or be laid under a spell forever.

"Do you know that worm, my brother? Has not every body a Nidhögg, which secretly or openly gnaws at the root of their heart. At the root of the world's tree it gnaws indeed forever!# How then could its trembling leaf, the throbbing human heart, be free from it, although amid happiness, during the days of prosperity, it perceives it not, because it then sleeps!

"But there are people who have never known such days, who, already, in the so-called elysian fields of childhood—But listen! I will tell you a true story. Once upon a time there were two brothers, the only children of their parents. They dwelt up in the north, not far from the mountain where the sun never sets at midsummer. They dwelt in an old house, full of old memories, and surrounded by mountains and streams. Near to it was a pine-wood, of many miles in extent, with tall columnar stems and a green vaulted roof, one of those natural temples in which the northern spirit speaks to the soul of man about the mysteries of life, and inspires him to worship. When the storm roared above it, one of the brothers, who often wandered there, seemed to hear, 'the spirit of God in the north wind.'

"This brother, the younger of the two, was not beloved by his mother; and yet he loved her beyond every thing. But he was not a lovable child. Perhaps he might have been so had he been beloved. The sunbeams of love are so beautifying, so ennobling. But from the time of his birth he had not been so. And beside him stood his elder brother, beautiful as a spirit of delight. He was the favorite; and he deserved to be so, because he was lovely and good. Even the other was capable of loving him, but that unjust treatment poisoned his mind, and in many ways the elder became spoiled. The other was also spoiled, but in a very different way. Rejected by his mother, he was ill-treated by his father! Thus awoke Nidhögg in the breast of the youth, and spit forth its venom. Sufferings of childhood! sufferings of the rejected heart of childhood! Can any bitterer be found? Years went on. Spring, summer, autumn, winter, came and went. But every thing within the family remained the same, excepting that it became still more oppressive, still more bitter. The parents loved gay society and the splendor of life. The unbeloved son was like a stranger in his home. He was not handsome, not affable, not docile, could not become so, could not behave as other children did. His love was too violent to be controlled by discipline, or bounds. He was never good in the every-day sense of the word. Nobody understood him—and, ah! he did not understand himself. Strong feelings early caused his heart to beat, and his head to dream—wonderful things. They drove him out from that oppressive home, out among the wood and the mountains, where the rushing streams had their source. There he was solitary, and sometimes happy—happy in dreaming about adventures which should befall him, and about great actions which he would perform. Mighty billows passed over his mind. But adventures and great deeds were not the only subjects of his dreams. There was something beyond these which he longed after; he himself knew not what—he knew not himself. But, if he saw before him a mountain he must climb it, although he should fall many times in the ascent, and tear his clothes and his hands, and run the risk of falling down precipices, still he must up, up, until he had gained its summit, and saw the earth beneath his feet, and only the heavens above his head. Then he became calm; then he felt himself well, and he cooled in the wind his burning breast, his flushing cheek. And if in the deep wood he fell in with a winding path, or a rushing stream, he could not rest until he had found their source. In this way he would wander whole days and whole nights seeking for fountain-heads. A search of this kind had an extraordinary power over him. And within his own nature he met with these mountains and these streams. He seemed to himself like a dark forest-stream rushing along from a gloomy depth, the mysteries of which he must search out and bring forth to day. And in this depth moved, strangely dark shapes, some horrible, unsightly, others of a divine stature and beauty. He saw them whether sleeping, or waking; they lived in his dreams, and caused him unspeakable torments, or the most delightful enjoyment. Oh! how often did the stately tree-stems in the depths of the wood seem to him beautiful white figures beckoning to him from the entrance of a temple. He bent his knee before them, and they laid their hands in benediction on his head, placed a garland upon it, and clothed him in white garments. Thus they led him into the temple, and initiated him into the service of the holy mysteries. Strange, but at the same time delightful, sounded their words, although but half understood. But, oh! how his heart burned at that holy speech, how the thoughts of his brain were agitated. Wild and noble were they at the same time, urging him to rush into the great strife, and thus to press onward to the hidden depth, the fountain of life! Oh! my friend, my tears flow at the recollection of those waking dreams, at the recollection of that which I sought for and of that which I found, at the thought of what I might have become, and of what I now am! Pale reality, I return to thee. People of the shades, I again belong to you.

"Years went on. Summer, autumn, winter, spring, came back. The brothers were thirteen and fourteen years old. At that time their mother died. The rejected son threw himself into the rushing stream; he wished thus to die. He was saved, however, by a faithful servant, the only person, with the exception of his nurse, who showed him any affection. Blessed be their dust, for assuredly they are dead! All must be dead of that old home, excepting the one who wishes to die.

"Again twelve months passed over, and the father returned with a new wife. She was a handsome and a stately lady; and her glance rested on the half-wild lad with an expression that might have tamed him if he had not fancied that there was guile in it. He would not love this new mother, who took the place of the former one; he hated her, and soon became suspicious of her; and, in so doing, he was probably right.

"With her, however, came a girl, almost still a child, not more than twelve years old, but lovely as a newly-kindled sun. Her complexion was bright, pure, and deep, at the same time, a wonderful sight. Proud and cheerful as a cherub, she stood before the two brothers, and fascinated both.

"And both of them kindled for her their offering.

"And Abel's offering was accepted; not so the offering of Cain. Neither was he now to be beloved.

"One day a quarrel took place between the brothers, the cause of which was the beautiful child. The elder was in the wrong, was the one who made the attack; but the younger struck the heavier blow. The elder complained of the younger. Called before his parents, the younger told the truth; but, when he saw himself disbelieved, he became insolently silent. He saw himself condemned beforehand. His father, in a fit of passion, drove him out of the house. The new mother was pale, but she allowed this to be done.

"The outcast solitary lay in the pine-wood, and wetted the turf with his burning tears. Tears more bitter never flowed from youthful eyes. He thought:—

"Shall this life of injustice and violence thus continue?"

"No! and he fled.

"He fled during the night to the sea-coast, and wetted the turf with his burning tears. Tears more bitter never flowed from youthful eyes. He thought:—

"Thus came he out into the world. Courage and good luck gave him success. He obtained for himself promotion and money. He was able to satisfy his desire to see the world, and his thirst after adventure. During the many years that he wandered about, there was no position of life, no form of life and enjoyment, which he had not tried; danger and pleasure, quiet study and tumultuous society; love and hatred; life in the world, life in the retirement of the convent, every one had he tried, and many of the mysteries of life and of the soul had been revealed to his gaze; but how was it? The most innermost, the mystery of mysteries, the key of life and light, he had not yet found, and 'the people of the shades' never left him. He always found them again around him, within himself, after every glimpse of light and gladness. Every evening they were again there, casting a dimness over every thing. The origin of these was often his fate, oftener his own soul, its darkness, and its want. He could say with the great bard:—

'Many, many were my fallings; all my folly no one knew.'

"The reverence, however, for the beautiful and the holy, which I always preserved in my heart, saved me from gross crimes and sins. The bright and glorious shapes which I saw in the dreams of my childhood had never entirely darkened before my eyes. And still, still, when I hope so little, when I expect so little from life, from myself and from others, still I see them, but—as if beyond a grave.

"I see that unconsciously I have for a moment made myself the actor, and he has become I. But let it remain so. You have long since understood it. It is of myself that I spoke and speak.

"Ten years after my flight from home, I discovered that my father and my step-mother had set on foot inquiries after me, and had gained some traces of me. I again altered my name, and removed to another country. Amid changing fate and changing fortune, I again lived many years; saw the deserts and the pyramids of the east, and in the west the perpetually blooming life of the West Indian Islands, but no where could I find that for which I secretly sought every where—

"At length, a weariness, a fatigue, came over me.—And whether it was physical sickness, or over-excitement of the mind, but it became within me like an oppressive, sultry night;—I lost the desire to live.

"Then, in the feverish, anxious nights, came, like a fresh breeze, memories from the rocks of my native land; from the waterfalls; from the woods; from the northern lights in the star-bright, snow-cold winter; and then a longing to go thither seized upon me. I inquired after tidings therefrom, and learned that my father was dead; so also was my brother, and that my stepmother and her children, by a former marriage, were masters of my father's estate. I determined to go there, to see again the mountains, the streams, the columnar woods, where I wandered and dreamed in my childhood. A desire also seized upon me to travel up to the mountain where the sun never sets, to see the midnight sun. The passion of my childhood re-awoke in me, and with it again the desire for life. For once I would ascend, ascend above that dark life, above that eternal gray, above the dark Hades of my own being.

"Ah! the land beyond the north wind, beyond the people of the shades and the portals of eternal darkness, the land where, according to the beautiful old saying, the pleasure-garden of the sun is situated, by the fountains of night, near the restless sea, where upon the islands of bliss, upon eternally green meadows the Hyperboreans, the most righteous of the dead, live in uninterrupted peace in the society of the gods, beneath the most delightful heaven, and amid holy, nocturnal feasts, at which the god of light himself presides—thither now tends my longing, my hope!

"Enthusiast, thou sayest! But, dear friend, such an enthusiast, and such a seeker art thou also in reality;—yes, indeed, and so are all men!

"This home beyond the north wind, this light which never sets, this life with gentle, righteous spirits, in the society of the gods, beneath eternally bright heavens, this Walhalla, where combat, the combat of every day, is sport, and every night a feast of victory, is it not the perpetual longing of the whole human race, the eternal goal of the whole world, the outward and the inward? Thence the stormy billows of migrating peoples centuries ago; thence now, and at all times, that restless, seeking, striving life in every human breast. Yes, as long as a human heart shall beat upon earth, so long will exist that dark tradition, and that deep faith in a free and blessed existence in a glorious and holy land, above the north wind, above the people of the shades! And so long will continue the secret pilgrimage of every soul thither.

"I return to my earthly home poor as when I went out from it, but preserved from the lot of the beggar by a noble and a beloved art. With my knapsack on my back, with my pen and pencil in my hand, I shall come as a stranger from a foreign land. I will see and learn before I act.

"If my stepmother be the crafty, artful woman which I have reason to believe her; if my exile and my brother's death are the foundation of her plans and her wishes, then—woe to her!—The hand of an avenger is over her!—

"Be still, Nidhögg! Away, thou dark Nidhögg, spitter of poison! I am, indeed, away to the home above the north wind—to the home of the righteous! Leave me in peace!"

While our young gentleman, whom we call Theodore, because he himself writes and calls himself so, wrote the above in the saloon below deck, some gentlemen above deck were talking about him.

"Do you hear!" said Colonel G——, an elderly gentleman with a handsome but somewhat sickly countenance, but with a thoroughly honorable expression, a roguish twinkle of the eye, and a cigar in his mouth, "do you hear! can any body tell me who he is, that virtuoso that we have for a traveling companion, and who flies and goes about like a dry skin every now and then in his blue cloak, and makes a high wind on the deck, and tramples on people's corns.—Ay, ay, curse me, but I'll know;—and then he goes and sits down, and draws caricatures of us all, as I imagine. Who is he?—Does nobody know?—No, neither do I! But this is certain, he is either a poet or a fool. Well, it will be coming out, never fear. There was he yesterday telling me a long romance about all the glorious things we should find up in our good Norrland, gods and goddesses, and sacred feasts, and holy virgins, and heaven knows what! Yes, I know nothing about it, that I would say. But this I do know, that there is deuced good salmon; and, if I can get good fresh boiled salmon and a slice of real venison, and a regularly good bowl of curds, and some delicate gaffes, or pancakes, with raspberry or cloudberry jam to them, all the gods and goddesses may be left in peace for me. And then he said, the Greeks or Romans believed, that when the people up here were tired of their lives they made great feasts, placed garlands on their heads, and then leaped from the top of some high mountain, to put an end to their lives. And that he thought was so deucedly fine and beautiful. I know very well that it is not so, say I. I think that it's a great deal better, after dinner, to lie down upon one's sofa, and take an after-dinner nap, and to keep one's life till our Lord is pleased to take it. And that, I think is a great deal more rational and God-fearing than the other, tumbling head over heels. But I could see plain enough that my poetical gentleman looked upon me as a stranded, prosaic crabfish. But I can't help that!"

And the colonel set his cigar in his mouth, and puffed and smoked with immense satisfaction.

"He is an interesting looking man," said one of the colonel's auditors, and it is pleasant to hear him talk, in spite of many singularities. How it may be with his head I don't know, but as for his heart, that is in a right place enough. I confess that he made me feel quite ashamed that night, when he gave up his bed to the old professor who could not get one, and laid himself down to sleep on the floor, with his knapsack for a pillow. I confess that I was sorry to see a sickly foreigner—for he evidently is both—so much more kindly disposed—so much more humane, than we Swedes."

"Yes, a foreigner he certainly is," said the colonel, "one can hear that by his way of talking, and see it by his mustaches and beard. We Swedes are wiser than to carry our heads so up and down."

"He has pleasant eyes," said another of the speakers, "but a very restless and often gloomy expression. A troubled soul!"

"And so thin, besides," added the colonel. "If I had him at my house, by my soul, I'd make him eat salmon and curds till he got fat upon his bones, and looked like other people, and a little less in the condition to throw himself headlong from a cliff."

"It would be a good thing for him to get into a good house," said the other with a smile, who was a young man, with a remarkably manly and agreeable exterior, and of calm and simple manners, "because I have no doubt but that he is very poor, a poor artist, who—"

"A poor artist!" exclaimed the colonel. "Do ye hear, young woman, dear young woman, Christina, Maria, Carolina, Helena, Kunigunda—one of the eleven hundred—young woman, come hither! I see that she has genius!—Now can you tell me who that gentleman is with the long beard, who walks backward and forward like a tempest, helps the sailors, overturns the passengers, or treads upon their corns, and looks rather crazy?"

"You mean, sir, no doubt, that gentleman—the gentleman—yes, now what is he called—with rather an outlandish look."

"Yes, to be sure, it is the very same. I saw that you had genius. Tell me something about him? What does he eat? He looks to me as if he lived on air and wind."

"Not on very much more!" said the young woman Maria, the female attendant on board the Ornsköld. "Yesterday he had nothing but an egg and some bread and butter."

"An egg!" exclaimed the colonel, "God have mercy on him! Do ye hear, my good young woman; now as surely as you mean to be happy, do you tell him that it belongs to the laws and regulations on board that every body shall eat at least three portions of hot meat for dinner, and drink a half bottle of wine to it, not one drop less. Tell him that it is the captain himself who requires it; and that the captain is a dreadful fellow and strict in command, and will put any body on shore who will not attend to his orders. And tell him that three portions of meat at dinner cost no more than one, and that the price for dinner is one and the same for every body, and that it is the captain who has fixed it. And you must afterward show the young gentleman's bill to me before you show it to him. Do you understand? And now go and do precisely as I have told you, and see that he has his three portions of hot meat, and his half bottle of good wine as certainly as you wish to be happy hereafter, and to have a good fee in the kingdom of Heaven!"

"Yes, to be sure!" said the young woman of the Ornsköld, smiling, and evidently amused by the charge.

"One must be the poor fellow's guardian," said the colonel, well pleased with himself, and with a prodigious puff of the cigar. "I think that it will do, and that I shall have given him a fright of the captain. Such a spindle-shanks as he, and our magnificent captain are no match. Look at him as he stands there on the paddle-box, with his trumpet in his hand, and shuts out half the horizon; is not he a sight to frighten the heart out of the breast; regularly terrific, the deuce take me!"

Adolph Hjelm, for such was the name of the younger of the two gentlemen, laughed, and the colonel continued, "However, I shall invite that spindle-shanked artist to visit me at Svanevik. He can make a drawing of the place for me while he is getting fat there. Yes, God grant that I should soon be there. This sea-life does not at all suit my plexus." And the colonel laid his hand on the pit of his stomach.

"Then you are not one of the travelers to the sun; not intending to go up to Avaxaxa?—"

"No, what should I go there for? To look at the sun? It shines enough into my face, both night and day, up there, to my torment. I can't sleep in peace for it. It shines upon me in bed at one o'clock in the night. But I will sit up this year on that account, and have boards nailed before my window. The sun gives me a fever the whole of this time, when the air is clear. I should be at my beloved Svanevik this midsummer night, if I were not obliged, out of politeness and a feeling of relationship, to escort across the Russian frontier a niece of mine, whom I am about to fetch from Bragesholm for that purpose."

"Indeed, ah, yes, indeed!" said Adolph Hjelm, with a sudden expression of interest.

"Yes," continued the colonel; "and I shall at the same time transact a little business with the old lady of the place. But I intend to stay there as short a time as possible, because she is one of those deuced bitter and keen old beldames that—I have no great respect for."

"Indeed!" said Adolph Hjelm, again evidently greatly amused; "is she actually so very bad?"

"Yes, quite inhuman!" said the colonel; "I have heard incredible things."

"It would be amusing to hear some of them," said Adolph; "I also have heard various things, but merely unsubstantiated reports."

"Yes," said the colonel; "I don't remember any thing just now particularly; but that she neither allows herself nor any body else enough to eat, is a certainty."

"Oh!" exclaimed Adolph, with an expression of amazement and horror.

"Yes, and that she even measures out thread by the yard to the tailor, who makes the clothes for the servant-men, and marks out herself the soleing leather for the shoemaker, I have also heard; and that she keeps up such a persecution in the house, that all the servant-girls must stand like lighted candles."

"It is really unheard of!" said Adolph.

"I do not remember every thing," continued the colonel, "but that the devil of niggardliness entered into her as soon as her husband was dead. He was quite of another sort, quite an honorable man, a tonjours fellow," thought about 'living and letting live;' yes, a little too much so, perhaps. But, since his death, seven devils at least have entered into the lady; and now there's a hell at the place. Yes, God defend a man from a niggardly wife! I should positively murder such a woman, before I let her starve me to death. Apropos—pardon my question—are you married?"

"No!" replied Adolph, "I am a widower." And a cloud, as it were, passed over the dark blue eyes.

"Good Heavens!" sighed the colonel, "and so am I!—and it is a very wearisome condition when a man is getting elderly, and lives alone in the country. One never can have any thing comfortable in one's house—never have one's victuals nicely dressed, when there is no lady there. And the servant girls, they don't stand like lighted candles; thank God! if they don't turn every thing upside down, when there is no mistress to keep them in order. Yes, I am now an old man, and am contented with my lot; but you, who are young, I hope you'll get married as soon as you can. A man has not any comfort in this world who is not married. Yes, you may believe me. Don't delay it any longer. Get married."

"That I probably never shall," said Adolph; "because I only know, in the whole world, one woman whom I love and esteem sufficiently to wish to have for a wife."

"No!—and she? She is surely not inflexible? A young, agreeable fellow, like you! Surely she is not married already!"

"No, but she is—my mother-in-law. Precisely that miserable old beldame—who is possessed of seven devils, according to your expression—Mrs. Cecilia Nordenhjelm, of Bragesholm, the most excellent, the most estimable lady that I know. I am at this moment on my way to her; and as we shall be going together, allow me, colonel, to offer you the use of my carriage."

"Oh, your humble servant. Oh! I beg a thousand times—Ei, the devil! No, that was confounded—I—I— Ah, good heavens!—upon my word—Oh!—"

Our poor colonel was in the highest degree confounded by this unexpected turn: he was regularly to be pitied. The perspiration streamed from his red forehead.

Adolph, however, laughed so good-humoredly, and looked so waggish and so kind at the same time, that the colonel was, before long, somewhat reconciled to himself, and especially when the former said—

"I am convinced, colonel, that if you will only spend three days with my mother, you will discover that all the absurd reports which have been circulated about her housekeeping redound, in reality, to her honor; and in order that you may be fully convinced of this, do not leave Bragesholm for at least eight days; and if you will make them fourteen, it will be so much the better."

"Thanks, your most submissive! Oh, I am convinced—I am already convinced. Yes, it is horrible how people may be misunderstood in this world. And how the world can lie! yes, it is really horrible!" answered the colonel, still out of spirits, and unhappy about his mistake.

But now, however, a deliverance came for the colonel, in the form of a lady's head, wrapped up in a red shawl, which made its appearance at the top of the saloon steps, and turned hither and thither a pair of large, dark-brown eyes, with a most lamentable expression. The countenance that bore this stamp was at least fifty; the complexion was dark, the features were sharp, any thing but handsome; still the large, dark-brown eyes, and a something. I know not what, cast an extraordinary brightness over all. The head, with its red shawl around it, had something oriental in its look. And if it had now been the beautiful Cleopatra herself, who stuck her head up from the stairs, it would have been impossible for our colonel to have been more obedient to the summons which was addressed to him, and which was thus expressed—

"Ha! ho! Ah, good heavens! Oh!—ho! It is quite dreadful! Colonel—dear colonel! If you are a human being, come and give me your hand! Ah, ah!—oh, ho!"

"Here I am! here I am, my most gracious lady!" exclaimed the colonel, and sprang off with the alacrity of a youth. "What is it? How are you? What can I do for you?"

"Ah! give me your hand—nay, your arm! This blessed steam-vessel! It rolls about like a ball. Ah, how ill I am! Never, no, never will I take a journey in a steam-vessel again."

"A most sensible resolution, which I highly approve. But now take fast hold of my arm, my dear lady, and let us march—to that bench, see, thus! allons, enfans de la patrie! In this way; 'It heaves and rolls,' says the captain, the while his boat was stranded. Yes, this is the way. 'Under Sweden's banner, heaven conquers with us!' Now we are happily arrived. And just at this moment our captain says 'stop!' and we are still."

"Ah, ah! oh!—now then one begins to breathe. Now one can begin to live again. If I had only my snuff-box! I fear that I have forgotten my snuff-box down there. Yes, that I have. I have forgotten it. So miserable! Dear colonel, you must get me a pinch of snuff. I shall not rightly recover myself till I get a pinch. No, don't go down! Ask some of the gentlemen there, whether, for pity's sake, they will not lend you a box. See, there is my friend, Adolph Hjelm, ask him."

"Ask him? no, not for all the snuff in the world. I would rather run up and down the steps seven times."

"Stop, stop, by all means. Tell me why you will not talk with Adolph Hjelm, one of the most agreeable and honorable fellows in Sweden. I must of necessity know. Sit down here, and tell me directly. It will be as good to me as a pinch of snuff."

The colonel seated himself, and related the conversation which he had just had with Hjelm, and his fatal mistake. The lady laughed so heartily, that it almost offended the colonel. Afterward she said—

"My dear colonel, have you been really possessed by the evil one, that you could believe and tell such things about Mrs. Nordenhjelm, one of the most magnificent women in the whole kingdom, and my very dear friend?"

"Yes, good heavens, how could I know it? I have said only what people have told me. But I shall, after this, suspect all my fellow-creatures of telling lies."

"Only not me. Because I know the whole affair, I will tell it to you. It is thus. When my friend accepted the addresses of Nordenhjelm, he was considered to be a very rich man, and she did so principally for the sake of her six young children, because her former husband, Colonel L——, had left his family in very narrow circumstances. Besides, Nordenhjelm was a man who could make himself liked, and who could inspire confidence. He had only lately lost his wife, and he wished to find a good mother for his two sons. And when my friend married him, it was in the belief and the thought that she gave a good father to her fatherless children, as well as that she should become a tender mother to his two motherless boys. But it was not long before she discovered that Nordenhjelm had an unhappy and a stubborn temper, and besides, that his affairs were in the utmost state of disorder. I wish that you could have seen her at this time, and how she conducted herself through her hard fate; how—by kind attention to that exacting husband, by the most scrupulous compliance with all his wishes, forbearance toward his peculiarities and whims—she by degrees won an extraordinary power over that wild beast: I can call him nothing else, because he was horrible when his temper was excited. In the intervals, however, he would be noble-minded and generous. By her good sense and her kindness, my friend won by degrees the entire confidence of her husband. He could not bear her out of his sight; but her days were not much happier for that. How often have I seen her pale as a corpse, but silent, during his savage outbreaks, so still that I could have believed her to be turned to stone, had I not seen her frame softly tremble, and thus perceived how her soul was shaken. But if the question were about any injustice, if he would ill use the people, then would she stand up against him like a man, and would not yield even if he threatened to shoot both her and himself. No, I can not imagine how she endured it, how she got through; but that she did with honor. Her hair turned gray, and the strong neck was bowed more than once. But she raised herself up again. And when Nordenhjelm's affairs became so entangled that they threatened to come to a crisis, he left every thing in her hands, and went abroad. He had a paralytic stroke, from which he never fully recovered. The house was at the same time almost bankrupt; but Mrs. Nordenhjelm called together the creditors, talked with them, succeeded in inspiring them with confidence, and determined that, with God's help, she would endeavor to support the family, put the affairs in order, pay the debts off by degrees, and give to every man his due. This now became her sole aim and study. But you should have seen how she managed, how she bore all this. Not one complaint, not one expression of ill-temper. Gayly and merrily she joked the children and herself, even her most intimate friends, about sitting on shabby sofas, and using shabby plate, because it belonged to the creditors. But I know that many a night at this time, she never slept a wink, from pondering upon how she should get money to pay the servants, or for other necessary expenditure. It was needful, also, at that time, to reduce the scale of living, and to put in practice great retrenchment. And however judiciously Mrs. Nordenhjelm did this, she could not avoid awaking censure and scandal, all the more so as she was not deterred from enforcing in the every day expenditure for meat and clothing the most rigid frugality, which she has persisted in ever since the affairs, by her prudent management, have begun to improve. And I know that people told absurd stories about her and her housekeeping. She herself knew it, and laughed at it. She felt it very much more keenly, however, that people considered her to have been a cruel stepmother; for one of the sons, who was a wild and singular lad, ran away from home a few weeks after her arrival at Bragesholm, and the other died a few years afterward, and people dared to say that it was through her means. But such things are not worth answering: Such miserable slander must die of itself. And it never would have originated at all, had it not been propagated by a wicked old woman in her family, who had been nurse to the two boys, and who, from the beginning, seemed to have taken a hatred to the new lady, because she put an end to all her old disorderly goings on in the family, and introduced regularity into the household.

Amid all the talk and scandal, Mrs. Nordenhjelm went on in a steady and quiet course; tended her sickly husband, brought up her children well, and managed alone the whole house and its affairs. She learned book-keeping, became her own book-keeper, and together with an overseer managed the whole large estate. Besides all this, she was and is like a mother to her dependents. And I can tell you that if she measures out thread by the yard for the tailor, and marks out the soleing leather for the shoemaker, she makes also every year two or three dozen garments and pairs of ankle boots for poor children. And more than this still, she has a school for them—yes, and she herself every year prepares two or three of them for confirmation, and has them taught a trade. And there is nobody, old or sick on the estate, who does not receive hope and consolation from the lady of Bragesholm. You should have seen, as I did, how she, in the depth of the winter, went and visited the sick, regardless of weather; often went late in the afternoon in storm and snow, alone, with her lantern in her hand, to visit those who lived near her; how she cared for them—how she thought for them. You should see how, even now in her old age, she thinks and acts for them; how she lets the children gather herbs and flowers, useful in medicine, and bring every year great baskets full to her; and then how she fills the baskets for the children to take back with victuals and articles of clothing; and of the herbs she herself prepares medicines. I once said to her that her apothecary's bill must be very considerable every year; but she showed me with what simple means, principally from herbs and flowers on the estate, she was able to benefit the sick poor so greatly. But this, after all, is only a small matter in comparison with the rest of her usefulness. Yes, she is a regular model of a person, "a gentleman of a lady," as the people there say, and yet she is as gentle as the gentlest woman.

"During the last several years, since she has managed every thing, the affairs have changed so much that she will soon have gained the goal for which she has been so long striving—that of paying every man his due, and seeing the large property free from debt. The hope of this time has sustained her under all her sufferings and her sacrifices; for I assure you that life has been no dance upon roses for her either formerly or latterly. But unquestionably she has become happier, and every thing has become easier for her since the death of her old, ill-tempered, and sickly husband. Of late years, it is true, he was not so bad, and she would make use of what I called a love-trick to put him in good-humor when he was either out of spirits, or irritable : she would 'beg his pardon.' But for what? neither he nor she knew, nor did that ever come into the question; but it always put him into a good temper. And she would smile so kindly at it. Yes—it makes me angry, and I could regularly cry for vexation when I think of that woman, of all that she has borne, and what she was, and what she is, and how little people in general understand her, or can do her justice!—Yes, it is precisely this lady—precisely this same Mrs. Cecilia Nordenhjelm who is possessed by seven covetous devils, as you say."

"Sancta Cecilia, ora pro nobis! I will not say another word about her. I will not open my mouth any more, and I know not what I shall do with myself!"

"But," continued Miss, in her zeal, "what is the use of troubling oneself about the world's judgment. It knows and understands nothing, and is not the highest judgment-seat after all. And my friend has had her joy in life, and that has been in her own children. They have all turned out well, and have good prospects in the world. It was a great sorrow certainly, when the eldest new-married daughter died, but then she has her little child to console herself with, and her son-in-law, that very Adolph Hjelm has been like a real son to her. And now there is going to be a great family-meeting at Bragesholm, to which Adolph Hjelm is going, and there all the children will assemble at the beginning of July. I am also going thither to be there at the feast, and I shall have great pleasure in inviting you to go too, if it be merely for your sins' sake, and that you yourself may see and become acquainted with the lady whom you have so slandered. You must know that it is almost worse than high treason."

"Sancta Cecilia! I begin to feel my head quite loose upon my body, I must actually take—a pinch of snuff!"

And with this the colonel rose hastily, and went down the steps. When he returned, he placed himself before Miss —, and while, with an air of the utmost indifference he took one pinch of snuff after another, he looked up into the air.

"Well, but," said Miss —, "but if I never before saw an egotist, I see one now. You plant yourself just before my nose, and take snuff without ever thinking of me!"

"Why should I?—It would be impossible, my gracious lady, that you could condescend to take snuff out of the same box with a person whom you have sentenced to lose his head."

"You shall have mercy, if I can only get a pinch of snuff."

"And you will repent of your cruelty toward one who is already humbled?"

"Yes, to be sure, yes! Only give it here! I would not very willingly lose you, dear colonel. A little quarrel with you now and then is nearly of as much worth to me as a pinch of snuff."

"Infinitely flattering—delightful!"

"And so we are friends, then!"

And they took snuff together.

"Seriously!" said the colonel, "I am vexed to have made such a blunder, and to have talked so in the dark. And you must promise me not to betray it, and to be my faithful confederate, as I now actually—probably for my sins' sake—shall go to Bragesholm."

"No? really?" exclaimed the lady, amazed; "well, that delights me."

"But it does not delight me, because I have nothing entertaining either to expect or to do there. I have a little business to arrange with the old lady, for one of my friends, and I have to bring away a niece of mine, who is too handsome to travel alone, and so proud—so proud, that she might fall backward; she I shall escort to Torneo, and so on to Uleoborg, for the sake of old friendship to her late husband, who, between ourselves, was a great good-for-nothing."

"I know, I know," said Miss —; "I know also that the beautiful Ida R. has now been at Bragesholm some weeks, and is just about leaving. But I am not very well acquainted with her history, and should like to know something about it."

"It is thus," said the colonel; "she was born in Leifland, and was of a high and rich family, a family of such amazing pride, that they considered themselves to be descended from Pharoah, King of Egypt, that is to say, from the very Egyptian darkness. The beautiful Ida was a great heiress. And arrogant was she also and proud, but in a different way to her relations; she talked about the nobility of human nature, and the dignity of human nature, and the emancipation of human nature, and the emancipation of woman, I fancy, as well, and so she fell in love with a young man, utterly devoid of worth, my good brother in arms, and friend, and cousin, a rash and handsome young fellow, but nothing more, and hardly of noble birth, which was his greatest fault in the eyes of the relations. But she had faith in his human nobility and in his human dignity, and so she threw her relations' nobility and money overboard, and married her beloved and traveled with him abroad. He took to gambling, spent every penny she was possessed of, lived carelessly in every way, and died in a duel, leaving her solitary in the world, with one little daughter. She came back to her native country, and found there only cold and hard hearts. But she asked nothing from them. I fear that her own heart was nearly broken in the shipwreck which she had suffered in her first faith and love. But she behaved honorably, beautifully and honorably one must say. She refused the assistance which a few relatives offered her in a manner calculated to wound her feelings, and began to give lessons on the harp, upon which instrument she played divinely; and thus in the sweat of her brow, she gained a maintenance for herself and her child, besides paying some small debts which her husband had left. That, according to my opinion, was beautiful and estimable in a young and handsome lady. And if she were not so confounded haughty and high-bred, I could kiss the toe of her shoe for it. But as it is, I shall not bow my old back so much for her. But she shall have a protector, and what else she wishes in me, because she is a proud and a stately woman, and her offense is to have had such a husband, and to have come of such a stock, and to be obliged to earn her bread as the teacher of the harp, she who was born to and accustomed to all that was great and magnificent in the world. But—tu l'as voulu, George Dandin! and she is much too haughty;—there is too much of the old Pharaoh and the Egyptian darkness in her, for her to be willing to accept any thing, more than a servant's help from, for example, such a one as my poor self!"

"It is a very interesting story," said Miss —, "and I shall look at the beautiful Ida with quite different eyes to what I have hitherto done. I saw her some years since, when she was newly married, on a visit to Mrs. Nordenhjelm, who had been a friend of her mother's, but who was then displeased with the daughter, and with her imprudent marriage. She—Ida, I mean—was so unspeakably lovely; yes, so lovely, that I shall not avoid laughing when I see her, it seemed so amusing; and even in her childhood she was so, when I saw her at Bragesholm, where she was for a few years, in charge of my friend, after her mother's death.

"Well, it has been very refreshing to talk for a few minutes in peace. Now, a pinch, my good colonel! Ah! now I feel quite in condition to enact the prima donna, and amaze our dean's widow with a bravour-aria."

While Miss — and the colonel talk and take snuff together thus agreeably, we will, in the most hasty manner, become acquainted with the just-mentioned dean's widow.

We will, in the first place, beseech that we may not be suspected of a wish to throw any kind of shade upon the late Dean Hederman, or upon his behavior and character as a husband, when we nevertheless openly acknowledge that his lady, who has been a widow only one year, now really seems like one escaped from prison, and even a little wrong in her head from very joy. But the amazement of all deans will be diminished when it is known that our dean's lady was now upon her first great journey into the world; and that she, spite of her five-and-fifty years, and her considerable corpulence, was more green and inexperienced in the ways and adventures of the world than many girls of fifteen: thanks to the late dean's principles, which held that a woman ought to keep herself at home in her own house, as well as to some Chinese methods of carrying out these principles. Besides which, our widow was delighted to travel, and much amused by every thing remarkable or adventure-like; and it often happened that her large eyes were somewhat weary of staring, ready to start out of her head; and her mouth, with being wide open in astonishment at the occurrences which, in one way or another, seemed to be extraordinary, and which to her young eyes might easily be so, and which were all noted down in a neatly-bound book, afterward to be communicated to her "sister at Haparanda," to which sister she was now on her way. In short, our dean's widow was a very happy person, and, moreover, the most friendly, the most discreet, the most helpful dean's widow in the world—a regular shepherdess of a flock, which all the ladies on board the Ornskold, on this journey, sufficiently could testify. Miss — found her to be so I know, and immediately took a fancy to her; while she, the dean's lady, felt a sort of astonished admiration for Miss —, by turns being ready to kill herself with laughing at her witty fancies, and by turns staring at her with the secret question to herself whether Miss — was quite right in her mind. And when Miss —, who so remarked the naive views of men, and things taken by the dean's lady was heard, in the third morning of the journey, to sing forth from her berth with wonderful quavers,

"Come, hermit, come, and if thou hearest
Within thy breast a heart;
For me the sun shines in the sky,
The moon can peace impart!"

The dean's widow seized her hand, pressed it, and whispered—

"Ah! such adventures, such adventures as one has when one travels! Yes, they can not be described! They are too extraordinary—too extraordinary!"

Miss —, who saw that her song had made a profound impression upon the dean's widow, promised herself another time to heighten the effect she had produced; and now, when she saw the good lady advancing toward herself and the colonel, she felt inclined to astonish her by a bravour-aria.

The dean's widow seated herself at a little distance from Miss — with her eyes wide open, fixed upon her. The colonel, who already knew something of Miss —'s talent, and who understood the part he ought to act, said in a persuasive tone:

"Would you not now, while the greater number of the passengers are eating their dinner, be pleased to regale us up here with a song? You sing so—so—hum, so refreshingly!"

"Ah, yes!" said the dean's widow.

"Ah," said Miss —, very bashfully, "my voice is just nothing at all, but my method—my method is tolerably good, perhaps also a little uncommon, and—, and, if the company really wish it, I will not be diffident."

"Ah, no!" said the dean's lady.

And now Miss — coughed a little, made some starts with her voice backward and forward, and then struck up a bravour-aria, which made the eyes of the dean's lady almost start out of her head in pure astonishment.

Now it must be told that Miss ——'s song really was unusual and amazing. It was not like Jenny Lind's; not at all. Neither did it resemble Grisi's, nor Malibran's, nor Catalani's, nor any of the great singers who have delighted and astonished the world. It was, in fact, like none of them, and yet it had a strange and almost melancholy resemblance or kinship to all the roudades, cadences, and trills, and to all the voices of all the great singers; and we doubt whether even Jenny Lind's song awoke greater astonishment than was awoke by the aria of our not uncommon Miss ——. Besides, she now sung with such ease and fluency that we must excuse our dean's widow if she became confounded, and did not rightly know whether Miss ——'s method was something quite new and supernaturally excellent or not. But when she saw the strange look of the colonel, she began again to have her doubts of the soundness of Miss ——'s reason, and thus she remained in a sort of dejected and wandering state of mind.

"What excellent spirits you have!" said the colonel, later in the day, to Miss ——, whom he accompanied on a walk inland, while the steamboat lay still. "But, tell me, are not you sometimes prodigiously melancholy?—for instance, during the long autumn and winter evenings in the country?"

"Never," replied the lady. "In the winter evenings in the country? That is the very time when I have my most entertaining occupation. I then wind and disentangle raveled skeins and set to rights intricate weaving which nobody else can have patience with. And that is so interesting to me that I often sit up as late as twelve o'clock at it, especially if I have some good friend to talk to me or to read aloud the while. I would never desire any thing pleasanter."

"A singular way of amusing oneself," thought the colonel; "raveled skeins!"

"Yes," continued Miss ——, laughing at the colonel's melancholy tone; "and my good friend, Mrs. Nordenhjelm, when she invited me to spend the winter with her, wrote to me that she had sixty yards of perplexed, intricate weaving for me to set right as my winter amusement. And I replied that, precisely that and nothing else induced me to accept her invitation."

"Ladies are fortunate," said the colonel, with a mixed expression of countenance; "they have always something to disentangle."

These words were provocative of a fresh skirmish between the lady and the colonel, about the occupations of men and women; but, we have not now time to enter into it, because we must speak a little, a very little, about some other of the passengers.

Among these we will merely mention three travelers of the sun, namely, a German, princely, new-married couple, from the primeval forests of Bohemia, who were traveling alone to Avasaxa, to give each other a kiss in view of the midnight sun, after which they would immediately travel back again to their primeval forests and their castle. The lofty pair were remarkable for their splendor, their uncommon beauty, their phlegm, and their almost perfect silence, as well as for their valet and lady's maid, German like themselves, but neither so handsome nor so silent. We next see a French tourist, vivacious, cheerful, witty, perpetually in motion, and perpetually talking either with one person or another, although very few could understand him, and none could answer him excepting the Germans and Miss ——, to whom he confided his discoveries respecting Lapland and the Laplanders. He had with him an excellent gun and three stag-hounds. He was quite determined to taste "a fricassee of Laplanders"—a few small cutlets at least; he would satisfy himself with nothing less. This Miss —— confided to the dean's widow, who looked quite cast down, and made a note of this in her little book.

And now we return to our fourth traveler of the sun, Mr. Theodore, and to his entries in the letter to his friend.

"Friday.

"The sea runs high. The greater number of the passengers are below deck, not very well. I am sole lord on deck, and breathe with delight a purer air. But the sea is dark, and the heavens are so, too. It is evening. We are sailing directly north; and in the north, along the horizon, there is a streak of light, a faint golden gleam upon sea and sky, merely a streak, a little beam of light, but yet—it gladdens me. It is the glimmering that I see of the midsummer journey; and it gives me a good omen. 'The islands of bliss,' the land above the north wind, lies indeed in the north. It is the light of these which beckons toward me. But all around is still gray and cold. And people say that up there it may snow on midsummer day.

"Saturday.

"Clear! clear! Thank God! A glorious day. How wonderfully dissimilar appears the world merely on different days. Every thing now is bright and glittering, and splendid in the light of the sun; but the air is still cold. We see icebergs at a distance in many directions. All the passengers are well, and are cheerful. The youths sing around the steaming bowl. They are glad; they are approaching their homes, their parents, and brothers and sisters, to spend with them the midsummer holidays. The happy ones! Each day some of them troop off. They go singing through the towns where we lie to.

"These little towns! Poor, wretched enough sometimes, but excellently situated and clean; they lie upon the sea-coast, washed by the fresh, salt waves of the sea. They have an appearance of comfort and of pleasantness, which is delightful to me. I should like to live there. And in the church-yard of Hudiksvall, with its green, sunshiny, flower-decorated graves, within sight of the sea, there I should like to rest.

“Evening.

“We have sailed through the whole day past ice, now in great masses resembling ruined houses, now in fantastic forms, as of dragons with crowns and horns on their heads. Glittering and dazzling, they floated past us, and shone in the sunlight, afar, far off in the blue distance. Every fresh mass of ice was announced by an icy wind. In the afternoon, we sailed past an immense ice-field. A large seal lay there basking in the sun. After this, the air changed; it was warm and pleasant. Our captain hailed with his trumpet a ship coming from Haparanda, and inquired whether the ice still lay in the harbor. ‘No, all open.’ A good omen.

“I have made an acquaintance, who is much with me, who sits beside me, sometimes talks, more frequently is silent. I like that, and I like him; I feel it agreeable to be near him. You know that I am a believer in secret sympathies and antipathies. There is some sort of a sympathy which attracts me to this young man, and him to me. He is called Adolph Hjeltn, and is a Norzlander.

“Sunday.

“A Sabbath stillness prevails through nature. There is a stillness even within my soul. This light, this calm, and this wonderfully pleasant air, operates beneficially upon body and soul. I breathe more easily, I feel better. Something youthfully exciting and full of hope moves at times within me. At Ornsköldvik I sprang on shore, found the first blossom of the arctic raspberry, kissed the ground, and—wept. How noble, pure, and honest, is the appearance of Ornsköldvik; such would I that my life should be—ah!

“Mountains of Ongermanland! mountains of Ongermanland! I easily recognized you in your beautiful, changing forms and hues; and the glorious birch-trees upon the hills, which stood like the ancestral heights of an ancient world. There I went on shore, embraced the trees, and made sketches of them. Nature! nature, my nurse, my mother, my only, only mother!

* * *

“My friend, Adolph Hjeltn, is not happy either. He has lost a young, beloved wife. Yet how calm, how pious, how great is his soul in comparison with one which I know! By his side I can not but be ashamed of my disquiet. And wonderful! when I am near him it abates. He magnetizes me as it were. His deep, gentle voice infuses a calm into me; it seems to do me good only to be near him; I like to look at his mild blue eyes. There is the northern mirth and power in them. Their glance and the beams of the sun, fascinate the worm in my breast. It sleeps. And I see no longer ‘the people of the shades.’

“Monday.

“Last evening my friend and I sate on the fore part of the deck as the sun went down behind a great dark cloud. We spoke of the deep mysteries of life, of the heart and of thought. And I can not but love him for that which he said: it warmed my heart, without burning it, pleasantly like the summer-night. Again and again the sun burst through the black cloud before me, and glanced upon us like a divine eye, beaming, penetrating. At length, the whole cloud was sundered by beams of light and dispersed itself in soft purple wreaths, plumes and banners around the conquering monarch. A glorious spectacle! And there I sate beside my friend, calmer than I had ever been before, conversing with him of the beautiful mysteries of life, in harmony with him—and for that moment—with myself. Thus came the night over us. But a night without a shadow. We sate still and saw ocean and heaven dream smilingly, the one mirrored in the other. Oh, the peace of souls united with each other, or—with God!—Eternal longing!

“Tuesday morning.

“Again a night. A story from the Arabian Tales, which will keep me awake for a moment. It was evening. We lay in the harbor of Skellefteo, encoircled by smiling, soft green shores, and upon the calm, mirror-like sea, and with the heaven clear as a glass dome above us. The sonorous voice of the captain had just announced, ‘The steam-vessel waits here four hours!’ Boats came and boats went from the vessel, full of people. Adolph Hjeltn went down in one of them, and desired me to accompany him. An open carriage stood ready on the shore. Adolph took my arm, and compelled me to enter it. The carriage rolled away—guess whither—to Bragesholm!—My friend is the son-in-law of—my step-mother!

“Fate, the great spindle, weaves its threads wonderfully around me. We entered the columnar woods, my columnar wood, so familiar to the dreams of my childhood and of my youth. It was a bright, warm night, full of a wonderful fragrance. ‘Do you know,’ said Adolph, kindly, ‘that is the odor which our fir-woods give out at night? Weak and sick hearts are refreshed by it.’ I said nothing. I could not speak.

“Bragesholm lies at about an hour’s distance from the shore. When we arrived there, the crimson of evening and the crimson of morning were blended together above the dale and the building; and, brightened by the light, stood at the door of the house, like the lady Minnetrost in the Zauberring, a tall lady in light-colored garments. She extended her arms to receive my friend, who threw himself like a son upon her bosom. She offered her hand to me with a kind welcome. To me she was not a stranger. The figure, the light dress, the regular features, the fair complexion, the expression, all were well-known to me, all were as in the former time, although twenty years had rolled between then and now, and the young woman had changed into the old.

"We entered the house. A table was spread in 'the great joy.' I looked around me in silence. All was familiar to me, and yet so strange. I fell into a dream. Adolph woke me by striking me lightly on the shoulder, and saying to his mother—

"Here is a young man, an artist, who has been traveling round the world many years in search of wonderful adventures."

"The old lady fixed her mild eyes upon me; she asked—

"And have you found what you sought?"

"No," replied I, "that which I have found is not worth telling. The world is tiresome and monotonous! People have no longer any wonderful adventures!"

"She smiled gently, as she said—

"Perhaps not, in the outward life. But in the inward, we may all of us meet with something out of the common way there. And upon the whole, no adventures are really remarkable, excepting those which have reference to the inward."

"These words struck me. They opened my heart, as it were; and I was just about to say something agreeable, when I heard a young voice, full of heart and deep feeling, exclaim from an inner room:—

"Adolph! Adolph! ah! is he there?—And I can not come—Adolph come to me!"

"My little Ina, the Innermost!" exclaimed Adolph, and sprang into an inner room.

"I remained standing alone, opposite the old lady. A strange torturing feeling came over me. She was silent. I listened to the buzz of loving and cheerful voices within; the old lady seemed to remark it, and gave me an invitation with her hand to accompany her. I did so, and saw at the distance of a few rooms, Adolph among trees of flowering camellias, bending over I knew not what. He raised himself, and I saw a head, lying in a horizontal position, such heads as that I had seen in the pictures of the old masters, glance forth from an azure back-ground—cheerful, celestial blue eyes, golden hair, a smiling mouth, a pair of white wings or arms, and for the rest—nothing. No, nothing else but a light blue silk coverlet.

"This, however, was what was called the Innermost. What that Innermost really was, I knew not, did not then rightly understand—I fancied that I saw an angel, glancing forth from an azure heaven. I merely wondered why she lay so still, why she did not float freely around, because wings were evidently there. Ah! my friend. They said that this seraph-like being, this Innermost, is—a lame girl, who has been lame these ten years; a suffering human being. But I do not believe them; no, there is a something not quite right about the place, and this Innermost must be an enchanted princess, and every thing here must present itself yet in an altered form.

"When I looked up from her, my eye met another figure, which struck me with new amazement. Ah! was I also to see her here: my childish, my first love, the cherub whose beauty, and whose pride, kindled my heart in the gay early morning of my day. The colors were now paler, but the beautiful, proud enchantress was the same. She sang to us to the harp, about Norrland, about the memories of youth, melancholy, sweet, and powerful night-melodies. I felt the strings of my inner life vibrate—I could not bear it, I was obliged to go into the open air, and then I became calmer. I came in again, and conversed with her.

"The colonel was now come, and Miss—. They all chattered and laughed, and ate and drank—I with them; but my soul was away, or with that beautiful pale woman, who, like me, seemed to have a heart heavy with secret thoughts. We could merely stay another half hour. Adolph, who promised to guide the stranger and myself up to the sun-lit mountain, set off with me; the colonel conducted the beautiful Ida. We all became traveling companions up to Haparanda. From Avasaxa, I return with my friend hither, being invited to do so by him and the old lady. And then—yes, what then? I know not; the future must determine. Now I know only that I am near the beloved of my childhood, carried the same way that she is; that she is fair, and that I still may become her captive. I feel her power still, as in those young years. And she? will it be unproductive of consequences, that we again meet here after our stormy fates? I write this at five o'clock in the morning. I can not get a wink of sleep. It is said that the sun fevers the blood, in the north, at this time; I feel it in my seething veins. To-day I shall see her, shall be with her!—"

* * * * *

"I see how it is—I see how it will be. My evil genius pursues me, and the people of the shades have left me not. Silently steal they through the light. As a child, it was my brother; now it is my friend, who stands between me and happiness, and I become solitary and portionless. Adolph and she love each other. He scarcely remembers me, and she!—Ah! I, poor fool! Oh, my friend! smile not at me, for it is so sad to be always deluded by hope, even if it be folly. She was so beautiful, she smiled so pensively, seemed so kindly to meet my thoughts. Thus was he also toward me. Now I am again solitary. I had a moment of light, and now again it is dark. But be still, Nidhogg, infuser of poison. I will travel to the midnight sun! We, the midnight sun and I, will embrace each other, and then will all become right and clear, and perfect. Or, dost thou not believe that it also will retreat from me—hide from me its countenance?"

God turned away his countenance, say the Scriptures, and man must remain in his darkness.

CHAPTER III.

WE must now return, for a few moments, to the night at Bragesholm, and accompany the rest of our travelers.

By the meeting between Adolph and Ida, every one saw that they had seen each other before, and under circumstances of a very painful character. It was thus. Adolph, when on a journey, had met Ida at one of the German baths, and had been present on the occasion of her husband's being shot. He had supported her at that moment, although not intimately acquainted with her; and though they had parted shortly afterward, each had preserved for the other an impression of esteem and admiration. With this unabated impression they now met, and were glad to recognize each other. It was more than probable that Adolph's determination to become the guide to the perplexed foreigners, and to his new friend the artist, was not wholly counteracted by the prospect of making a part of the journey in company with the beautiful Ida. The "little Sprig," however, held his father fast; and because he was going to set off again, the little lad held him so tightly by the neck, and cried so bitterly when they were about to take him forcibly away, that Adolph, half in jest and half in earnest, cried out, "He shall go with us—I will take him with me;" sprang away with his little son round his neck, and seated him beside him in the carriage; wherewith "the little Sprig" was so delighted, that it was decided the Sprig was to go to see the midnight sun, and therefore Mrs. Cecilia had now to prepare, in all haste, a little bundle of the boy's clothes, and to wrap a warm coat around him, and recommend him earnestly to his father's care. And thus "the little Sprig" became also a traveler of the sun.

Miss — also became one, and went with them at least to Torneo, because there Ida was to be met by her little girl, who was to return with Miss — to Mrs. Cecilia; while Ida, with her uncle, continued her journey to Uleoborg, where she was expected by a family in which she was to give instructions in music. Mrs. Cecilia, who had a deal of that youthful enthusiasm, which is often found in elderly Swedish ladies, would gladly, she said, herself have accompanied them to the mountain of the midnight sun, if she had not been confined at home.

"I shall, however, prepare the feast," added she, joyously, "while you look at the sun, and be ready to receive you with warm napkins when you get back again."

The travelers set off. The colonel, delighted beyond measure by three courses of salmon, the most delicious cutlets from the fatted calf, and excellent pancakes, with arctic raspberry and cloudberry jam in crystal cups; and wondering within himself how such infamous reports about the lady and mistress of Bragesholm could get abroad, and provoked with himself for having believed them. But, we would inform the colonel, that though he, as a guest, might have been at all times well received in Mrs. Cecilia's house, yet it was only within a few years, and since the circumstances of the family had considerably improved, that Mrs. Cecilia had by degrees relaxed the rigid bands of economy which she had imposed upon herself and her children, since which they had lived at Bragesholm as in other well-conditioned houses in the country.

We must now accompany our travelers on board the steam-vessel. Upon the calm, glittering sea, beneath a sky altogether free from cloud, and in an air which it was a pure delight to breathe, Adolph and Ida were together. They had formerly met under bloody and melancholy circumstances in the night of life. Now they saw one another beneath its midsummer day, and found each other beautiful. Surrounded by that ethereal magic light, they sat together during the quiet night, and were happy in being near each other. We can not pretend to say what passed within their hearts, nor whence came that peace, like the dew of morning, which sank down so deliciously and so refreshingly upon her soul, softening the bitter expression of her countenance, and glorifying it with a new beauty; nor whence came that elevating life which shone in his glance, and which animated his beautiful and manly being—that dawning of love's beautiful mysteries! I only rejoice over you—rejoice that you exist upon earth, and bless her with your miracles. How? Does the feeling which shall invite for eternity spring up for a moment, like the passion-flower with its beaming sun? To be sure! There are glances in the human eye, expressions in the human face, tones in the human voice, which present clearer revelations of its innermost life in one moment than could be obtained by fifteen years' acquaintance. Such are called forth in the blossoming moments of the soul, beneath the lightning of the night, and the peace of noon-day. And when, in the northern regions, midsummer is warm and strong throughout nature, and causes by her magic power new flowers to unfold themselves, rare species of butterflies to mount upward with glowing colors, and the woods to breathe forth fragrance, shall the human being be without a feeling thereof? Shall not he sweetly press into the magic circle? Certain it is that the sentiment which possessed Adolph and Ida, and attracted them to each other, was a marvelous one, and caused them to bloom for each other in beauty, without they themselves being aware of it.

It was not until they came to land, and were about to separate, that they both started back, as it were, and became silent. Adolph was to remain with his traveling companions at Haparanda, and Ida was to go to Torneo, on the Russian side of the water, where were her friends and her little girl. The following morning the child was to be left in charge of Miss —, and she and the colonel were to continue their journey to Uleoborg. It was evening when the "Ornsköld" lay to at the most northern city of Sweden.

Adolph accompanied Ida across to Torneo. The colonel staid on board to take charge of the luggage, and see it conveyed to the city.

Adolph and Ida walked silently side by side, each in a singular state of mind, and each glancing down into the heart's wonderful world.

Ida stood upon the bridge over the Torneo river, which unites the two towns, and said—

"I see my friend's house on the shore. Now let us part. Thanks, and—farewell!"

Adolph retained her hand, and said, while he gazed thoughtfully into the river, now bathed by a flood of light from the sinking sun, "Part? I confess that it seems to me inconceivable, impossible that we should part!" Ida smiled mournfully, and her countenance was pale.

"It will not do," continued he, but with a beautiful smile, while his eye rested upon her, with an actual sun-beam, so bright and so warm, "it is not right that when two human beings entirely true to each other, are bright before one another, as heaven and earth are here even in the night—I can not comprehend otherwise than that you must feel as I do, must consider it, as I do, absurd that we should part. Tell me, does it not appear so to you?"

"Absurd! no."

"But—is it painful to you, as it is to me?"

"Yes."

"God bless you for that answer. Ah! how fascinating is candor. But then—why should we part? Tell me, do you not believe that we could remain together—be happy together?"

Ida smiled again mournfully.

"To that question," said she, "I must answer, No. No, I can not be happy any more. My spring, my youth, my hope, my faith, all are gone, forever! That which I once was, I can never more become, and will never more unite any one to my fate."

"Oh, sin not against the highest, the best!" said Adolph, warmly; "do not distrust the renewing power of light and love. Is human life—is human existence more without a sun than nature? And look! nature is new-born all around us."

"There is no sun for a bruised heart, and for hope which is dead, excepting that which shines pale upon—the repose of the grave!" replied Ida, gloomily. "Farewell! thanks for your noble wishes, and for this short midsummer-night's dream. It has made me happy, happier than I have been since—I can not remember when. Am I candid enough?" continued she, smiling. "These light nights are contagious. But this proof of confidence is the greatest, and probably the last which I shall give—to any man. Farewell!"

"Not yet!" said Adolph, excited. "We do not part here. I must see, must speak with you again. I have much to say to you."

"My friends are coming to the bridge. My child!" And Ida hastened toward them, took into her arms, and clasped to her heart, a beautiful little girl with a tenderness which did not at all accord with the snow-cold heart which she had exhibited to Ina. And lovely, little Naima, the image of her mother as a child, hung with delight round her neck.

Adolph was present. He made acquaintance with Ida's friends, talked to them about the midnight sun at Avasaxa, could not comprehend how people could have lived so near, merely a short day's journey from the mountain, and not once have been there to see the nocturnal solemnity, and thus contrived to inspire the friends with an inclination to witness it, and persuaded them that there never could be found more auspicious weather, or a more suitable opportunity for such a journey than just now; in short, he did not leave them until they had firmly determined the following night—midsummer night—to see the midnight sun at Avasaxa. That Ida should accompany them was natural, and quite necessary.

"Col. G—— and Miss ——," said Adolph, "will go with us to-morrow to see the midnight sun. And Miss —— can take charge of little Naima at Avasaxa. Thus, we shall meet to-morrow night."

Ida could not help smiling at the ease and certainty with which Adolph manoeuvred, and determined, and decided for other people what they themselves had never dreamed about. But she did not oppose it, and appeared to have a melancholy pleasure in prolonging for yet a moment her midsummer-night's dream. She did not, however, say any thing, but left the others to talk and arrange. And thus it was determined, that Ida's friends should drive with her and Naima along the Russian bank of the Torneo river, while Adolph and his company proceeded along the Swedish bank, and that they all should meet at Avasaxa.

The large, brown eyes of Miss —— gave a very arch and significant look when Adolph laid before her the arrangement of his newly concerted plans. The half-confidence, however, which Adolph reposed in her, and his earnest entreaty that she would not counteract his arrangements, and that she would accompany him to Avasaxa, together with the lady's own inclination to witness this nocturnal phenomenon, as well as publicly to oblige those whom she really liked, made Adolph's labor so far easy. The colonel, however, was not so easy to deal with. He grumbled dreadfully, and swore at the midnight sun, at the fickleness and the caprices of ladies, at all sorts of unnecessary and foolish undertakings, as well as at having to struggle and clamber up a high mountain at night to see the very same thing that they might see any day upon level ground. Miss —— was obliged to come to Adolph's assistance, and regularly to quarrel with the colonel, and with his laziness, and his love of ease before he became compliant and in a good humor again. The dean's widow was exceedingly pleased when she learned that Miss —— was going on to Avasaxa, and offered her and the company the use of her sister's carriage, and herself as their traveling companion; upon which, Miss — promised that at Avasaxa, and within view of the midnight sun, she would sing for her a melting French ballad.

In the mean time, the Frenchman ran about in Haparanda and Torneo, knocked at every door and inquired after Laplanders and Lapland articles. But he found none any where, and nowhere did any body understand him; in many places, however, they offered him meat and drink, with which kind hospitality he was delighted. The German princely couple slept in preparation for the following night's watching. The lady's-maid and the valet yawned together. Feverish and melancholy, Theodore strolled about, finding rest nowhere.

Adolph was active in making preparations for the morrow's journey; he engaged carriages, horses, and drivers, together with an interpreter—because the people beyond Haparanda speak either Finnish or Lappish—all of which were things not easily to be obtained in that little northern town, by those who were not so lucky as to have friends or acquaintance there. Now, however, the dean's widow proved herself the best and most active of friends, and thanks to her and Adolph, two carriages with their drivers, together with an interpreter, were ready for the morning of the following day. The interpreter's name was Granqvist, and a more Swedish name, or a better interpreter, and guide, we would defy the whole of Norrland to produce.

The following day was hot. The sun blazed in a cloudless heaven. The travelers found it oppressive; the horses could hardly trot along. We sincerely wished that the Countess Ida Hahn-Hahn had been with us. She would then have had quite another impression of the Swedish northern climate than that gray and chilly one of which she speaks in her "Attempted Journey to the North." The enchanting beauty of the meadows by the way; their rich masses of flowers; the encircling birch-woods, the beautiful white animals* which here and there grazed in the woody pastures; the still, clear rivers along whose winding margin the road ran; here and there small peasant-farms, and churches upon promontories of the river, and all this bathed in sunny light, formed a beautiful and a striking scene. They drove as if through a gallery of striking pastorals, one of the features of which was the kindness with which, at the peasants' cottages and the public-houses, the travelers and their servants were received, and regaled with the most delicious milk, without, in any case, being able to enforce payment, not even as drinking-money. The French tourist was overjoyed; "de si bonnes gens ! mais c'est l'âge d'or !" He had already this year enjoyed spring five times; one in Sicily; the second in Paris; the third in London; the fourth in Copenhagen; and lastly, the fifth, the warmest, the most beautiful, here in the neighborhood of the arctic circle. The landscape, however, he found altogether too unpeculiar—as to Laplanders and reindeer, he had not seen them at all: and for the so-much-desired friassee of Laplanders, that began to look doubtful, as he was informed, that at this season of the year, the Laplanders remove with their herds far up among the rocks, where they may find snow and fresher pasturage.

Toward evening, our travelers arrived at Mattarengby, where is the last resting-place on the road. This is a little village of two or three peasants' houses, situated upon an extensive flat of meadow, on the banks of the river, with a Finnish chapel on a height above, and all around, to the very bounds of the horizon, a mass of wooded hills, among which is the mountain of Avasaxa, though it does not appear to elevate itself much above the rest.

Adolph obtained boats and rowers, and at nine o'clock the company began their voyage to the mountain.

The rowers, tall and handsome men, but with that gloomy gravity of feature and demeanor which distinguish the people of Finland, rowed in deep silence. Silent sate the handsome couple from Bohemia, but enjoying the beauty of the evening. The Frenchman sate with his gun in his hand, peeping on all sides for wonderful polar animals, either on two or four legs. And just opposite to him, with eyes and mouth wide open, sate the dean's widow, in secret expectation of some extraordinary adventure, in consequence of the murderous schemes of the traveler, and glancing sometimes at Miss —, to ascertain what she thought and looked for. But even Miss — was thoughtful and silent, and let her white hand play in the waves, while her brown eyes gazed with a half melancholy expression over the beautiful landscape.

Adolph and Theodore sate beside each other, both occupied by the same object, but in how different a manner! Adolph, full of his own plans, his own uneasiness, expectations, wishes, and desires, paid no attention to Theodore, or to the deep melancholy which had taken possession of him.

It would be difficult to give an account of Theodore's state of mind, so chaotic and dark were the images which possessed his soul. A re-action had taken place in his tumultuous feelings. He felt depressed and unhappy, out of the light, as it were, and displeased with himself and every thing.

They rowed round and among low islands, shining with the most beautiful verdure; they floated upon the clear river between innumerable lovely islands, "the islands of bliss!" thought Theodore. But the blessed, the righteous human beings, where were they? Himself? Ah, no, no! never had he felt himself further from the mark than here, where his imagination had pictured it to him. The peaceful evening and the unspeakable beauty of all around him only increased his melancholy.

After an hour's sail, they arrived at the foot of Avasaxa, which rose up before them a shapeless mass of granite blocks and large pebbles, amid that region of wood.

Adolph would gladly have shot like an arrow up the mountain to see if any body were there already, but "the little Sprig" held him fast, required carrying and helping, and politeness demanded moreover that he should offer a helping hand to the ladies. Miss ——— thanked him for her part, but declined it. She should "dance a minuet" upon the mountain with the guide, and should, she said, introduce into it a very "remarkable pas," and besides this, she said such amusing things, that the dean's lady, who came puffing and blowing up after, followed on her heels, and was obliged now and then to stand still that she might not lose her balance out of pure laughter, and thus lost the guide incessantly. The colonel could not help admiring Miss ———'s slender and fine figure, and her ability to dance a minuet on the top of the mountain; he ascended, puffing and groaning, and vowing, by all the gods and goddesses, never to go on such an expedition again.

At a considerable height on the mountain, the ground was tolerably flat. Birches and pines grew there, and rich masses of heath in open spaces among the trees and rocks. A hundred persons were here assembled in little groups, mostly engaged with their provision-baskets. Many languages might be heard spoken, Swedish, Finnish, Russian, German, French. The view from this point was immeasurable over the whole woody, dark district, upon which the sun shone without lighting it up. Bright, but without beams, stood the sun above the horizon, gleaming with a softened light, and casting a purple glow upon the forms on the mountain. Before long, however, this was interrupted by a white cloud. Great columns of smoke ascended here and there along the horizon toward heaven. They arose from new erections in the desert-fields, the signs of the spirit of colonization, which had advanced even into the arctic circle. The night was warm and calm—delightful. Small fires were lighted here and there on the mountain, to drive away the gnats. Every thing seemed to invite to a quiet enjoyment of the great festival of nature. But—who enjoyed it? Not Theodore. His thoughts were painful and gloomy. Not Adolph. He was seeking in the mountain for a figure in a black dress, and questions and doubts agitated him. Would she come? She had not expressly promised. Perhaps she would not come. Or, had any thing happened by the way? And still, as time went on and the midnight hour approached, the stronger became his longing; his uneasiness, his doubt, and lastly his fear, that she would not come, that they now really were parted.

And now it was twelve o'clock. Now the Frenchman fired his piece in the air; now arose the sun in splendor out of the cloud; now the handsome princely couple kissed each other, and see!—now advanced from the wood on the Russian side of the mountain, that beautiful, grave countenance, glowing from the light of the sun, and from the exertion required in ascending; precisely that dark-clothed figure, which alone could make darkness bright to Adolph. And Naima, with heightened color, and beauty like that of a cherub, with bare arms, and dark-brown locks floating on her shoulders, came, led by her mother's hand.

Ida was come, yes, but only to say farewell to Adolph. It was her firm, serious intention, for she had well considered it. She will not, she ought not to listen to his offer, for his own and his mother-in-law's sake, who—she knew it—would not wish her for a daughter-in-law. With pale earnestness, she firmly resolved in her soul not to darken the life of that noble, chivalric Adolph. But still, she will once more see him, upon that she is determined, impress his image upon her soul, like a sun in the night of life, and preserve it there like a beautiful, pure, beaming image—that she will!

But longing and disquiet had increased the fire in Adolph's breast. The warmth, the fervent affection, the tearful gladness with which he received and welcomed her, were not calculated to permit that pale seriousness to petrify, and—she could not help it—her glance returned the expression of his own.

Theodore saw it all—those glances, those existences which melted together in love; heard that whispering of lovers, over which heaven arched itself in beauty; he heard and he saw it, and—he went away.

He hastened away to a part of the mountain where no human voice was to be heard, no living being to be seen.

It was a wild and desolate spot. A bare crag of the mountain here jutted out over a deep abyss. When Theodore reached this point, he was met by a soft, sighing wind, which fanned his breast and his hair, and with wonderful fragrance passed caressingly over his countenance. So lively was this agreeable impression, that Theodore involuntarily started, and looked around him inquiringly, as if he had expected some extraordinary sight.

But he stood alone upon the bare cliff, he and a little tree. It was a pine-tree, which had struck its roots into the cleft of the rock, and had sprung up on the edge of the abyss. It had defended itself against the blast, and had bowed before it, but the stem was, nevertheless, straight and strong, and its head which extended over the abyss was now in full bloom. Theodore perceived, as he advanced toward the tree, that the fragrance of which he had been aware came from its flowers.

He threw his arm around the tree, and supported himself by it. It had spoken to him. He now spoke to the tree.

"And thou dost blossom and diffuse thy glorious perfume in the night, upon the naked rock, on the brink of the abyss, thou little tree! Thou refreshest, thou sustainest the solitary wanderer. And he—shall he be less than thou? Shall he not, like thee, be able to become strong, to grow, to blossom, to give refreshment, although he stands as thou dost, upon the naked cliff of the mountain, above the abyss, solitary in the night, in the storm?"

"Solitary?" and his eye met the sun, which now in the hour of midnight stood above the earth in its mildest splendor, quiet and pure, like a watchful eye beaming with love.

He looked upon the earth. Enveloped in its shadows, it lay beneath his feet sleeping, with its dark woods, its still waters, its silent habitations; all silent, silent!—Soft white mist hung like crape over the valleys, and low sighs arose here and there. They brought to Theodore, as if out of the earth's inmost heart, those words of the lofty song:—

"I sleep, but still my heart wakes ever!"

And he looked again up to the sun, the glowing, wakeful heart, so faithful and warm, whether it be night or whether it be day, always above, always there watching over the beloved.

And the sun spoke to him; a shone deep into his heart, and said—

"There is a greater than I, and he watches over thee!"

Theodore looked down into his own breast, into the most hidden depths of his own being, and behold!—it was light even there. He found there no longer the former darkness, and bewilderment, "the people of the shades" had departed. And out of this innermost depth he heard a voice—it was not his own, although it spoke in his soul, and seemed to cry—

"I am with thee—I watch!"

"Eternal heart, eternal goodness! accept my heart, my life!" whispered Theodore, and extended his arms toward the wakeful midnight eye. And he embraced the little tree—because he must embrace something, and supporting himself against it, he leaned over the abyss, smiling, blooming in the light.

The light shone in him clearer and clearer. Not merely his own being; his life, his sacrifice became clear to him, the line of proceeding which was best for him, his own immediate future became certain to him—every thing became clear.

It was a marriage hour. Overcome by its living joy, Theodore threw himself upon the ground, pressing his forehead and his breast to the soft moss. There fell no dew that night upon the mountain, yet was the moss on which Theodore's head rested moist with silvery drops.

Thus lay he still in a blissful dream. The sun now began to ascend. Like a loving mistress, or a mother who will wake her sleeping darling with kisses, yet fears that he might wake too suddenly, so did the sun's beam touch the earth, first tremblingly, hoveringly, fleetingly; then lovingly, warmly, and at last ardently, passionately.

When Theodore arose, he was bathed with light, as if a full stream encompassed him. The woods and the night were filled with light. There was a murmuring and a humming of the freshness of life, and the song of birds ascended from the earth. Theodore stood there as if new-born, even he, and let himself be kissed by the warm beams. He felt him wedded to the light.

Dear reader! didst thou expect a love-adventure in the light of the midnight sun: the union of lovers and kisses?

Yes. But didst thou count it for nothing when the human being feels himself embraced by the love of God, and gives his heart to him?

Of a truth! More beautiful love-adventures can not occur on earth. And he who experiences them knows it.

But if thou wouldst see any thing of the other sort, the image and the reflection of the first, then look round. Neither is that wanting to us. Nothing can fail—nothing can fall short in the midsummer festival of the far north, where "the God of light himself conducts the nightly solemnity," and infuses into life its dithyrambic hymn, when every thing blooms in the light, human-beings and moss, heaven and earth.

Adolph and Ida likewise. She had come hither pale and grave of soul; turned away from the light. But, while he spoke and said how he would love her—how he would support her in her dark hours, wait, watch in the night until her soul should again become light, her heart become warmed by his fidelity, by his love; how he felt certain that he could make her happy, and that he should become happy through her—then, yes, then irresistibly melted the snow around her heart; her earlier, youthful life returned; she believed, she hoped, she loved again. Her tears fell in silent happiness, but she did not speak, and resisted her own emotions. And now the lovers were interrupted in an unexpected manner.

"The little Sprig,"—we are compelled to say it—who, without any regard for the midnight sun, without a thought for the extraordinary event of the night, had bounded about the mountain with the Frenchman's dogs, became, when he saw the beautiful little girl, rosy-cheeked, bare-armed, dark-eyed, shining in the light of the midnight sun, like a little living fire, our little Sprig became as it were kindled thereby, and quite smitten in a remarkable manner. Thus smitten, he stole very softly toward the little girl, who, during Ida's conversation with Adolph, was left standing alone, and gazed upon her with a countenance of delight and adoration. But Naima looked upon him with dark glances, that gave very little encouragement, and the rosy-red lips seemed to swell with pride. The little Sprig drew himself together—he never had been so submissive before—seated himself upon his heels, and then caressingly embracing her knees, he raised himself up, and gazed beseechingly and delightedly upon her. But the little oriental stood immovable and looked altogether gloomily upon him. Again the little Sprig bowed himself, but this time less submissively—the little Sprig had, in fact, never been so bewitching!—and embraced again the little maiden, but still very gently, caressingly, and with a sentiment of adoration. But still she stood quite immovable and gloomy as before. It had continued too long for the little Sprig, and it weighed too heavy on his heart.

In the third act of the piece, without bending himself at all, he took the little girl in a strong embrace, and that a very forcible one. My private opinion is, that the little Sprig will become a very dangerous fellow one of these days. But now, all at once little Naima set up a tragical sound, and began to cry aloud, at which the little Sprig became both greatly disturbed and terrified. It was this wailing cry which suddenly put an end to the private conversation of the parents, and sent them again to the children, who in a few seconds, forgot, as it were, the past. Upon her mother's arm, little Naima was soon consoled and comfortable again; and the little Sprig, in those of his father, regained his self-possession; but still kept his glance uninterceptedly fixed, as if enchanted, upon the little crimson flame, whose eyes shone with two-fold beauty through the large tears which hung upon their lashes. And when the parents drew near to each other beneath the shelter of the pine-woods, with the children in their arms, it was beautiful to see how Naima's red lips met half-way the rosy mouth of the little Sprig, in a kiss of peace and reconciliation.

But, almost at the same moment, the parents did the same. It was an affectionate, involuntary impulse. A parting kiss, Ida thought. But Adolph said—

"It was your assent to my prayer. I have kissed you as my wife; and the light is our witness."

Ida, deeply excited, could only stammer forth—

"Your mother! your mother!"

"Let me conduct you to her, and beseech her blessing. Return with me, with us, to Bragesholm."

"Oh! she can not wish it—she will not receive me as a daughter!" said Ida. "And my affection for her, and my pride, forbid me to act contrary to her wishes—"

"She desires my happiness," interrupted Adolph; "and you are my wife before heaven. And no one has a right after this to separate us!"

Ida was silent for a moment, and then she said—

"Well, let it be. I will return with you, and see whether she will receive me, whether she will love me as a daughter. Yes, I will return with you."

"Call me Adolph, and say thou."

"Adolph!—thou!" Ida said this last word with a deep blush, as she bent herself over the little Sprig, and clasped him in her arms. Adolph was not jealous. He took little Naima in his arms, and she looked at him at first rather suspiciously, but afterward as if she foresaw what paternal tenderness he would feel for her.

We must now again look after our other travelers.

The colonel had seated himself upon a little ascent by the side of Miss —, and smoked his cigar to keep away the gnats—from the ladies of course. The dean's widow, warm and red, had seated herself just opposite Miss —, with eyes riveted upon her, waiting to see if she would say any thing amusing, or would be sufficiently rested to sing that French ballad. With respect to the midnight sun, they had all three passed this judgment: that it was not any thing at all remarkable; that it was like a great cheese, or a pewter plate, or something of that kind. The Frenchman was something of the same opinion, and thought that nothing here was at all remarkable. He had expected to see nature turned topsy-turvy, the most wonderful human beings and animals; he had not seen a single thing out of the common way. Fortunately, he had promised to purchase Finland ankle-boots, and rein-deer horns, and skins, and he had shot in the reeds a few beautiful, unknown birds: that was some consolation.

The Bohemian couple entertained themselves with wine; and the dean's widow produced a box of sweetmeats, from Haparanda, and treated the whole company with them; they were greatly praised, even by the silent German valet and lady's maid. The other groups upon the mountain opened also their provision baskets, and ate and drank in honor of the midnight sun. Little lads ran about from one party to another, offering water out of wooden vessels, and offering themselves to eat the names of the travelers upon the mountain.

The sun had now ascended up the sky, and the heat began to be great. At two o'clock in the morning, the general descent of the mountain commenced. This, for the young peasant men, was a race over stock and stone. Miss —, however, danced a minuet down the mountain with Granqvist, as she had done in going up, and introduced, in so doing a remarkable 'pas,' and said, moreover, some very amusing things. But the colonel was desperate; and the dean's widow almost melted away by heat and exertion.

In the mean time, when they were again seated quietly in the boat, on the river, which was clear as glass, and when Miss —, now in the gently sinking morning mist, began to sing her melting French ballad, with the most winning moriendos, both the dean's widow and the colonel went into such paroxysms of laughter that he actually was afraid he should be ill in consequence, and laid his hands on his "plexus."

He very soon, however, discovered that he was considerably benefited by the excitement, and he, therefore, became unusually cheerful. The foreigners, who sate with them in the boat, could not tell, at first, what to think of the whole scene, and the Frenchman, at the beginning, looked actually "hébété." But, before long, the whole thing became clearer to him, and he then was quite delighted at the discovery, of what was to him entirely a new talent, and the most remarkable thing which he had met with in the arctic circle. It required a much longer time before the Bohemian couple understood the business; and whether the valet and the lady's maid have come to any satisfactory knowledge regarding it, to this day I know not.

Adolph had engaged a boat, solely for himself, Ida, the children, and Theodore; there he now sate, by the side of his beloved, and the two children lay asleep on a bed of leaves before them. Both sate silent, but with hearts affluent in happiness. The merely being near to a person with whom we feel in sympathy, is sufficient to give the soul a full measure of happiness. There was a completeness in thus silently being together, which mere words would have lessened, or destroyed.

Theodore sate solitarily in the forepart of the boat; he had purposely so seated himself, that he might perfectly see their faces, because he enjoyed a sort of triumph in the feeling that their happiness no longer disturbed his; that he had not lost his friend, that Ida was not that dangerous being to him, which his feverish fancy had believed for one moment. He looked up above their heads to the sun, which with tempered beams now pierced through the morning mist, that enveloped and concealed every other object. But the spirit of God moved over the deep waters, and said—"Let there be light!"

Even now it seemed so to him, and the first words of creation sounded in his soul. He felt himself no longer alone, and he looked up to the sun as to an intimate, as to a friend. It had consoled him; it had lighted him in the night. The mists sank—sank—the sun ascended and blazed forth. Here and there only the small light-green islands gleamed through their white veils; and here, among the islands of the blessed now glided only happy spirits.

When our travelers reached Mattarenghy, the mists had disappeared, and the meadow shone like silver gauze. Upon this meadow, beneath the most beautiful heaven, fanned by odoriferous winds, our travelers spent the entire midsummer day in wandering about, in reposing upon the flowery grass, where shone the arctic raspberry-blossom and the snowy cornels—beneath the shade of the birch-woods, and upon the margin of the bright, calm river. They wished to await the cooler air of the evening before they continued their return. The foreigners, however, had already advanced the same day to Haparanda, where they were not able to find any regular house of entertainment, and feared that they should get nothing to eat; and, before long, this very same danger was to be apprehended for our Swedish friends.

Old Brigitta, who lived at the little peasant farm, which this time served as a resting-place for the travelers, was not at home, but had been fetched away to a distance of nearly fifty miles, to set a child's leg which was broken; the good widow being greatly celebrated for such like surgical skill through the whole district. And on the whole premises no creature was now to be found, nor was there any sign of store of provisions either to eat or to drink.

"Sancta Brigitta!" sighed the colonel, "are we to be starved to death here among all these savage Finns, and amid all this poetry?" And he laid his hands upon his "plexus," which seemed to be in commotion.

"Our fate is dark," sang Miss —, mimicking the tragical tone of the colonel. "But, as to our being starved to death, that I do not believe; at least, not to-day," continued she, consolatorily. "I think of taking upon myself the character of cook; and I believe that I shall come off with as much credit, if not more, than that blessed personage, Sancta Brigitta."

"Nay, only look at that!" said the colonel; and gazed at her with delight.

"And I humbly will take upon me to become Miss —'s kitchen-maid," said the dean's widow, and courtesied and smiled; "because I fancy that at least I can do for that."

"Yes, we shall see," said Miss —, with a thoughtful air. And with that the two went round about the cottage to seek for something to furnish a dinner. But this was a more difficult undertaking than they had imagined, because the peasants in those regions live at this season entirely upon milk and bread, and have no other provision, and very rarely light a fire on their hearths. As far as lovers and philosophers were concerned, it was their duty to enjoy themselves with the food of the pastoral ages; or, if it came to the very worst, to do without any. But for a brave colonel, with a squeamish stomach, and a matter-of-fact dean's widow, and such like dinner-loving people, the small gentry, the little Sprig and Naima reckoned among them!—aid must be solicited from the house of the sexton and the clergyman, and accordingly there was an abundance.

When the colonel returned from the little Finnish church, where he had been to divine service with Adolph and Ida, he found Miss — standing on the hearth with a short white apron on, boiling and roasting, and every now and then issuing commands to the dean's widow about the doing impossible things, which made the latter almost kill herself with laughing, while she waddled about and scolded, as she supposed she should do, in her capacity of kitchen-maid.

The colonel seated himself at the door of the passage which led to the room where Miss — held her sway, in part to enjoy the delicate odor of roast salmon and other roasts, and in part to hear the cheerful voices within, during which he smoked his cigar.

Adolph had made him acquainted with his love affair with Ida, and besought of him to return with him to Bragesholm, whereby our honorable colonel felt himself quite excited. He loved romances, both in life and in books; he was glad that the young people liked one another, and he was pleased to be taken into their confidence. And he had now especially agreeable and cheerful thoughts, while his nose was regaled by odors from the kitchen, his ears by pleasant sounds therefrom, and his eyes followed Adolph and Ida, who, beautiful and happy in each other's presence, wandered in the shade of the birches, while the little Sprig performed summerset after summerset for his little rosy flame of the mountain, all on purpose to persuade her to tumble about with him among the flowers in the grass.

But the unusual smell which issued from old Brigitta's kitchen, and the smoke which rushed curling out of her chimney, allured other guests besides the colonel. There came thither the poor, the maimed and the old; for the poor and the maimed are to be met with even at Mattarenghy, although not in the same proportion as in Paris, London, or Stockholm—by no means. They came in the mean time, and peeped with curiosity and longing into the kitchen. A half famished dog came also, and a cat, which had certainly had kittens lately, and some cackling hens. And Miss — gave to them all a portion of food accompanied by a few words, which were intended to represent Finnish, at which the dean's widow was convulsed with laughter. To the famished dog she gave a savory bone, to the cat a plate of sweet milk, and by the joyful cackle of the hens, any body might hear that they had not been without their entertainment.

But now came a tattered, still young, but sorrow-looking woman, of whom the dean's widow said—

"Nay, don't give any thing to her. Granqvist has just told me that she is a woman of bad character, and, though unmarried, has two children."

"Then she shall have twice as much as the others," said Miss —, "that she may divide it between herself and the children."

"But is that right?" said the orthodox dean's widow; "is it not like laying a cushion under sin?"

"My dear lady," said Miss — mildly, but seriously, "do not let us be severe upon those poor creatures who have suffered enough from the shame, and from the severity of society because of an error, often small, considering their circumstances. The want and the misery occasioned by it, are often very bitter."

And she said to the woman—

"Mother, do you understand Swedish?"

"Yes," answered the woman.

"Do you see, mother, give this to your children. Become a good mother, and our Lord will bless you!"

This trait of kindness touched the heart of the colonel. He took the cigar out of his mouth. And he took—a resolution.

The dinner was spread upon the glorious, flowery turf of the meadow, beneath a large three-branched birch tree. And we question whether a dinner ever tasted so delicious before, or was so heartily praised by the guests.

It was, nevertheless, very simple, as regarded its materials. Roast salmon, boiled salmon, dried salmon, salmon prepared in every possible way was the staple article. And there was also an excellent dish of sour milk, and there were regular pancakes made and fried by Miss —'s own hands. The paucity of plates, knives and forks, spoons and glass, gave occasion for the most delightful communism.

Adolph and Ida drank out of the same glass. Miss — and the dean's widow managed for good and for evil to eat their dinners, the one with a knife, the other with a fork. The colonel ate from the same plate with Theodore, and was merely solicitous that his side of the plate should never be empty. The little Sprig and Naima were very nearly having a little skirmish with their spoons over their one bowl of curds, but the parents pacified the strife, and the dinner passed on for them in almost paradisiacal harmony.

It was evening; the sun had allayed his fiercest beams, and the Finnish people stood or sat outside their huts, smoking with little six-inch long meerschaum pipes, and enjoying the coolness. The colonel, who for the last few minutes had been going about seeking Miss — found her at length, resting from her labors upon a mole-hill by the river's side, and alone, without the dean's widow. The colonel seated himself upon another mole-hill near her, and said—

"You have to-day showed kindness toward man and beast. I shall now see whether you will also show kindness to me."

Miss — looked at the speaker rather surprised, because there was a something solemn in his tone, and agitated in his appearance, which was not common. He continued—

"I have always thought that you were a witty and amusing person; but never until to-day have understood how good you are. Yes," continued the colonel, with the paleness of gentle emotion on his handsome and honest countenance, "yes—there is not indeed much to offer—an old man, and sometimes ailing; but nevertheless, if an honest heart, an honest desire to make you happy, are of any value to you, and if you will make a man—precisely the one whom you see here before you, immeasurably happy, then—take me! Take, together with my hand, my heart, every thing that I possess and have."

And he extended his hand to Miss —, with an expression full of heart-felt kindness.

Miss — sat and heard, and gazed at the colonel with increasing amazement, and could not believe her ears and her eyes. At length, she burst into a hearty fit of laughter.

"But tell me, my dear colonel," exclaimed she, "are you quite out of your senses? You have assuredly had a coup de soleil!"

"Now only see!" said the colonel, "you are laughing at me. That is just what I might have expected. But never mind. You may laugh at me if you will, only believe me, and—have me. Out of my senses! Never in all my days was I more rational than I am at this very moment."

"Do you regard me, then, as being insane?"

"Yes, but only because you think me so—think that I have had a coup de soleil! Shall I take my oath that I know what I say, and what I wish?"

"But have you then no eyes?" exclaimed Miss —; "do you not see that I am old, an old person above fifty?"

"How old am I, then?" said the colonel; "not far from sixty. And yet I can venture to woo, and make a laughing-stock of myself before laughter-loving people, and perhaps get a refusal into the bargain. But all that have I done with full knowledge, and entirely on purpose because I now know—how really good you are, and because I feel that though I am old and infirm, yet that my heart is nevertheless young, and that I can love both fervently and faithfully. And, though you are old too, yet that is all the better, because then we shall grow old together at the same time that we preserve our hearts young. And after all, there is a pretty little bit of life still before us at our age; perhaps ten years, perhaps twenty, perhaps more. My father's mother had completed her hundredth year before she died, and she was an active old woman to the last. And it makes a great difference whether a man goes on his way by himself, and sees how the shadows gather around him, and how he becomes more and more lonely; or whether two go together, partaking of each other's pleasure, or pain; being together early and late, at breakfast in the morning, by the fireside in the evening, shortening for each other the long winter evenings, the long time of shadows; reading with and to one another, laughing with and at one another; that's very good when people like each other, and above every thing, go on liking one another. Look! now it is evening and the sun is going down; but it is still warm and bright. and, though it descends, it does not set. Can it not be the same with the love of the old, with the friendship between a faithful married couple in the evening of life? And, the deuce take me, if I do not love you so much that I once more shall make myself a laughing-stock to you. Yes, laugh at me as much as you like, but take my hand as you have taken my heart! Look there!"

"You know very well, colonel," said Miss —, "as a couple of bright tears fell from the beautiful brown eyes, 'you know very well, that you are the most persuasive person that I know!'"

"Am I?" exclaimed the colonel, "Nay, only look! I did not know that. Then I must be over-persuasive also, and you must give me your hand. Else I shall fancy that you are afraid of my plexus, or that you look upon me as having had altogether a coup de soleil."

"It is a great piece of folly!" said Miss —. "But—you have actually over-persuaded me, and inspired me with the belief that we may become a happy couple. And in that case—the world may laugh at me as it pleases. Let it be!"

"You are divine!" exclaimed the colonel delighted. "Oh yes! let them laugh who will, and let us be happy and laugh at them again. Let us live at Svanevik, and there we will plant that herb which is called old-love, and which blossoms late in the autumn, and keeps green even amid the snow. There you shall help me to live well, and to make both animals and human beings happy. And, when you wind your tangled skeins during the long winter evenings, I will read to you, and the skein of life shall run for us like a play; and if at any time there comes a knot in the thread, why then—we will take snuff together!"

Miss — laughed, half affected to tears, and half amused and quite edified by the colonel's talent for talking, but nevertheless with an uneasy glance for herself.

"What will Mrs. Nordenhjelm say?" said she.

"That you have done very properly and wisely," said the colonel, "if she be indeed the good and sensible lady that you have said. And, as concerns the dean's lady, she is just now coming toward us, and we can try—"

"Not a word, not a word to her, nor to any human being about what has taken place between us, before I have spoken to Mrs. Nordenhjelm about it, or else we shall instantly become enemies. I hardly know myself whether what has happened is real. I am quite bewildered!"

"Do you know, my good lady," said the colonel, half aloud to the dean's widow as she came up to them, and with a mysterious and important air, "do you know that Miss — is not well? She feels herself quite bewildered, and there is a danger that she has received a coup de soleil. It is, therefore, better that she should be left to herself, or else to me who understand such things, and will watch by her. Otherwise something serious may happen—"

The dean's widow looked so amazed and mysterious, that Miss — could not help laughing. But when in the course of the evening, Miss — became more grave, and walked thoughtfully and silently by the colonel's side, the dean's lady became actually uneasy, more especially as the colonel, every time she approached them, shook his head so terrifically and so mysteriously that she did not venture to come nearer, but looked somewhat forlorn, and as if she might sing with Orpheus—

"What shall I do without my spouse?"

In the mean time, the colonel had time fully to open his heart and his plans for the future to Miss —, who thus felt all the more evidently that he was right, that the sun of life even in its descent might be warm, and make its evening that of midsummer.

While they thus walked and talked together, and while Adolph and Ida drank light from each other's glances, and the Sprig and Naïma sate quietly in the grass, and tried to make little garlands, the organ in the church at Mattarengby peeled forth its magnificent voice as it had not done for many years.

Many years ago, it is said, a man from Stockholm—a great musician—obtained the situation of organist in this remote corner of the world. Many peculiar and wonderful things are related of him and his misanthropic temper; but so gloriously could he play upon the organ that all the evil was forgotten, and people became enraptured. And sometimes, when the spirit came upon him, he played alone in the church often late into the night, so that the hearts of those who heard him at a distance were wonderfully affected, and they could not avoid weeping. The old organist had now been dead for many years, and since that time it had been as if it were dead in the church of Mattarengby. This evening, however, the organ was heard to play as in former days, only that the tones were more cheerful and more agreeable. The people of the whole neighborhood, who heard the pealing of the organ listened with wonder, and many said that it must be the old spirit which haunted the church and played the organ; but now his restless spirit certainly enjoyed peace, for that might be heard in the music.

And so it was. The spirit which produced that melody had experienced peace. Theodore composed that night-song to the eternal sun.

The journey in that pleasant, cool, fragrant night was beautiful. Ida wished she could always keep journeying on thus, thus by Adolph's side through the odorous woods. She feared the arrival at Bragesholm. They all of them had a secret dread of it, Adolph, Miss —, and the colonel. Mrs. Cecilia's bright and gentle figure appeared almost fearful to every body.

What would she think? What would she say? was every body's secret thought. And all had an uneasy presentiment that she would not approve, that she would not be pleased.

Theodore thought about her, even he thought of her and Ina with a mixed feeling of uneasiness and longing. The dean's widow alone sate calm in her innocence, thinking of nothing and dozing. But, if she had known how things stood, and what feelings and thoughts occupied her silent companions, she would have been more amazed than ever, and would have sighed with reason—"To be sure! what adventures, what adventures people meet with when they travel! Yes, they are remarkable, very remarkable—"

CHAPTER III.

THERE was at Bragesholm during this time, an unusual state of agitation. There was a putting of things in order, and a baking and a brewing, a scouring, and adorning, a dusting of guest-chambers, hanging of curtains, a movement among the stores in garrets and cellars, an opening of locked-up presses; in a word, there was a mighty bustle, but all in a calm and harmonious manner. But in the court, however, there was a most unmerciful beating and banging of many feather-beds and pillows laid upon tables and tressels, and during all this, Lisa went about with a stick in her hand, straight and formal as a daffodil, with an air of importance and more good-tempered than common; because she had in a high degree what we may call a liking for property, and rejoiced to see the house rich in possessions, in particular, of good bedding. Even she herself had collected together sufficient possessions for a pretty little house. And, although it was her belief and declaration that she had not, and never had any "turn for love," and that we are certainly not astonished at, yet she had almost always lovers—as we imagine, for her properties.

Mrs. Cecilia wandered about every where, ordering and arranging every thing with the calm, decisive eye of the mistress of a family; a very rare qualification, and one which can not be had for the wishing. It might be seen that Mrs. Cecilia was making preparation for a great entertainment, and that her appearance was more cheerful, and that her jokes were more lively than usual. It might be seen, at least Ina saw, that pleasant thoughts occupied her soul, that she felt happy in having money now to spend, in seeing her means increase, and in being able to follow her own inclination to be hospitable and liberal. Besides this, she also had a liking for properties, and what real mistress of a house has it not?—and it gratified her to see her house so well provided and so rich in every kind of good furniture.

But cheerful thoughts are guests, often passing guests, who seldom remain long in the same house.

Mrs. Cecilia stood upon the balcony looking out on the road where she saw two carriages driving along. Every thing was in order in the house to receive the expected guests from the north and from the south, from the east and from the west. And Mrs. Cecilia's heart beat stronger and more cheerfully than it had done for many a year at the thoughts of the approaching meeting which would make a joyful termination to all the anxieties of business, and to the hitherto unhappy position of the family, and because of Adolph and Charlotte, who would, as she hoped and believed, become united forever and afford her support and tranquillity in her old age, as well as for Ina's future life. Mrs. Cecilia saw herself in spirit surrounded by her children at Bragesholm—

Adolph and Charlotte managing the estate, and giving to the others each one his share, and she herself among them, cared for by them and still caring for them, happy in their happiness, and rich in the honor of their worth and reputation. She saw little plants springing up around her knees, like young shoots around the parent tree; she saw all this dreaming far, far into the future, and she smiled.

The traveling-carriages came nearer and nearer and now drove into the court, and now up to the door. The first carriage contained the travelers of the sun. When Mrs. Cecilia saw Ida return, and Adolph assist her out of the carriage and lead her into the house, she felt a pang at her heart, and an anxious presentiment of that which had happened took possession of her. She was pale, and could not altogether conceal her uneasy impression as she welcomed them back; neither were they as self-possessed and as open-hearted as usual. They had all of them a secret in their hearts. But there was no time for explanation or the clearing up of any thing, for directly upon the heels of their arrival came that from the south of Sweden, the eldest son Fridolph, the man in office, "that gentle brother," and his wife Amelia, and with them two of their children, and Charlotte, Mrs. Cecilia's other daughter. And with them came an unexpected guest, whom Mrs. Cecilia received with a little surprise, but very great kindness. This was Captain Reinhold Rapp, who merely once before had been on a short visit to Bragesholm, and who was now particularly introduced by Fridolph. He was a short, broad-built man, of a strong make, with a round, fresh, sun-burned countenance, lively brown eyes, and good teeth, and with beautifully formed hands, although very brown; in short, he was an excellent fellow, with a look of remarkable good humor.

And just as all the guests had arrived, dinner was ready, and every body sat down to table.

Long life to Captain Reinhold Rapp! Thanks be to him, nobody remarked the constrained and uneasy state of mind in which a part of the company found themselves, nor observed the silence of several of the guests, because Captain Rapp talked almost incessantly in a loud voice, and so well, that every body heard him with pleasure. He had lately witnessed some scenes of violence in his district, when a party of rude peasants had fallen upon an assembly of the so-called "readers," during their divine service. He had been present on the occasion, taken part with the persecuted, and defended them from extreme violence, and powerfully supported the authority of his majesty and the law. As Mrs. Cecilia wished for some further information on these subjects, it afforded a splendid opportunity for Captain Rapp to display his descriptive and narrative powers. And, though during this, Captain Reinhold Rapp came forward very frequently, either as an actor or as a speaker, and though he was often heard to repeat, "Thus said I," and "says I," yet it was nothing more than was natural and necessary. And if in the beginning they were somewhat startled by it, in the end they found themselves listening with pleasure, and irresistibly amused and interested in the course of the relation, and, as is said, carried along with the story. For every one felt, and heard, and perceived, that Captain Reinhold Rapp, in all that he said and did, was rapid, sensible, and clever, that was very evident; and nobody, for one moment, could imagine that Captain Reinhold Rapp had not done, and said, and carried out, all that he said he had; for they heard and saw that every thing which he related was the pure truth, and that Reinhold Rapp was a sagacious and a fine fellow, and that it was impossible but that he must carry his hearers along with him; that they must feel and think, and be indignant, and laugh with him.

Perhaps Charlotte was rather weather-beaten by her journey, but certain it is, that at dinner her usually beautiful complexion rather too much resembled the color of the peony. Certain also it is, that she was much occupied by Captain Rapp's narratives; and again and again she hastily turned her eyes from Captain Rapp to her mother, with an anxious and inquiring glance; and, when she saw Mrs. Cecilia's eyes, for the most part, fixed upon the lively narrator, she appeared to breathe more freely.

Charlotte was really a lovely and agreeable girl, who, spite of her seven-and-twenty years, looked remarkably young. She looked fresh and strong, and had that beautiful skin, those bright blue eyes, those white teeth, and that round face, which so agreeably characterize the youthful daughters of Norrland. She seemed, as Ina said, to be really a splendid girl, exactly calculated for a wife and the mistress of a family.

But that she was not at this moment in her usually gay and cheerful state of mind, could not escape any one who was not principally occupied by himself.

Fridolph, the man in office, the gentle brother, was a handsome man, of a fine striking exterior, in which was an expression of more than ordinary kindness and gentleness; and sister-in-law Amelia appeared to be a very proper and well-bred lady, who could carry on conversation excellently. The children were—model children, a girl and a boy, well trained, and who rather looked down upon the little Sprig and Naima, who were altogether too rustic.

Immediately after dinner, other guests arrived. Mrs. Cecilia had not a moment's peace, and it was impossible for any one to have a private interview with her.

Charlotte sought out Miss —, who had withdrawn to her own chamber; and, on entering, she exclaimed—

"Nay, now I must talk to somebody, and open my heart, or else—there'll be an end of me! It is not possible to speak a word with mamma, nor with Ina either. That artist Mr. Theodore, seems to think that he alone has a right to occupy her ear. And now aunt must listen to me, and counsel me, and help me—if possible!"

"Speak, speak, dear child," said Miss —: "I have seen that you have the whole weight of Oreskutan on your heart, and can not breathe freely. Down with it; unburden yourself; I am here to help you."

"Ah, don't laugh at me, aunt, because it is not a laughing matter."

"Heaven forbid, dear child! Only speak out. What is amiss? What is it?"

"Oh, yes! It is—that I—that I am betrothed to Captain Rapp; that is to say, I have given him my consent, provided that mamma will give hers. And now he is here to ask me from mamma; and I am so horribly frightened lest mamma should be vexed—lest mamma should not like it. Because mamma in reality knows nothing of Captain Rapp, and has no idea about what he and I have in our minds, but has quite other intentions for me, that I know, and I had myself quite different intentions six months ago."

"You see, aunt. After Virginia's death, Adolph could not be happy any where but with us—with mamma, Ina, and me. And, when he was very much distressed, mamma used to go to him with the little Sprig in her arms, and show him how lovely and how lively the child was; and when Adolph could not sleep at night, mamma would go up to him and weep with him, and talk to him, and console him, and then he liked to hear me play and sing old songs; and thus by degrees he became more and more cheerful and attached himself more and more to us. And then—I became very much attached to him, that I do not deny. In that way, twelve months went on, and I knew that then the thought arose in mamma's mind that Adolph and I should marry, and it was what she herself wished. I know also that she thought of some time giving up Bragesholm to the management of Adolph, and that she wished to remain there with him—with us. How I came to know all this I can not easily say; I do not rightly know myself, because mamma never mentioned to me a word about Adolph and myself. But, I know of a certainty that such were her thoughts, and I myself thought so, and I fancy that Adolph himself had the same thoughts. Thus things stood, when it was necessary that Adolph must leave us to travel abroad, partly for the sake of his health, and partly on account of that partnership in the great iron-foundry in which he has an interest, and the foreign connections of which he was to extend and improve. He set off, and remained away for nearly half a year. In the mean time we lived in our very quiet way at Bragesholm. Adolph did not often write—because he is no letter-writer—and before long his letters became less frequent and shorter. And then came the long, endless winter, which is so intolerably long up here, especially for us, who never saw a human-creature, partly because we are such a long way from any neighbors, and partly on account of that detestable economy which is so much more needful than agreeable. And one day was so horribly like another, so that there was no difference between them, and every thing was so dreadfully monotonous. Mamma is so excellent and so good, but then mamma has a deal to do with her affairs and her ledgers, and then mamma could sit the whole long evening, even sometimes till two o'clock in the morning, patching and darning for my brothers, or spinning fine flax for table-linen, while Ina read aloud to mamma. And mamma can even walk up and down in "the great joy" when it is moonlight—yes, even at night, and when the lights are put out. In one word, mamma knows not what it is to have ennui. And mamma has also seen, and heard, and lived so much in the world, that she can now live on her memory. But what had I for memories to live upon, to go and promenade in the moonlight on winter-nights? and who never, excepting last winter, was away from Bragesholm, and who never experienced any thing out of the common way since I was born! And spinning is the most drowsy work I know, and mending for my brothers; God bless the eleven lads!—it was purely intolerable. And all those good historical books of which Ina and mamma are so fond, Livy, Patavini, Sturleson, and Co.,—they make me yawn, and I immediately forget all they say. I would a deal rather read now and then a novel, and between whiles have a little dance in the evening, and sledging parties in the day, and a little social amusement, and a little innocent jollity now and then; and for the rest, to do good and assiduously to govern and set things to rights in the world—in my own little world, I mean. Because here in the house I never get on well with my inclination for activity. Everything here, since I came to years of discretion, has gone like clock-work. Mamma does so much herself, and old Lisa would fancy that the world would turn backward if I were to do any thing with my own hand in the house: I had therefore nothing else to do than to sit and look before me, for sitting at my loom, and playing on the piano I reckon as nothing. And year after year it seemed to me that it became more difficult, and required a greater effort to sit so still in the world. And I turned over in my mind the scheme of establishing a factory, or something of that sort when Virginia's death occurred, and Adolph came to live with us. The winter after he was gone became more intolerable, and more wearisome than any other winter had ever been. I regularly longed for a little earthquake, or some sort of a casualty which should make an interruption in the eternal sameness of our life. For, though mamma is excellent and perfect, and Ina is an angel, and the two amuse themselves very well together, yet their temper and mine did not agree, and I had not society in either of them.

"One snowy February day, when we were sitting together in our accustomed blessed solitude, and mamma was sitting spinning with Ina, and I was sewing and yawning because Ina wished me to repeat the names of all the Swedish kings before Gustavus Vasa, and laughed at my distraction and mistakes, I heard all at once a ringing of bells in the court, and I said, 'Mamma, there are bells!' 'No, my child,' said mamma, 'that ringing is in the porcelain-stove!' for we had just fastened the door, and there was actually a ringing in the stove, but it was not that which I heard, but a real ringing of bells in the court. And, when I looked out of the window, I saw a gentleman in a military cap, and wearing a fine crimson sash, who was alighting from a sledge which stood before the door. And this was Captain Rapp, who had come on a visit to transact a little business with mamma. And he remained with us, drank tea, and talked with us for three hours. And how the hours flew! I seemed never to have seen and heard such an excellent and such an amusing fellow as Captain Rapp. He knew every thing, he could make every thing clear, and he could talk about every thing, and he talked well and entertainingly. I seemed to know more in these three hours than I had learned in my whole life. And he knew every thing about Nowland, and talked about the people and the country, so that it quite warmed one's heart. Mamma herself said that she would not have been without that visit for a six-dollar note, so amused was she by it, just as much as I was. And I thought to myself how very delightful it would be to be often with such a pleasant fellow as Captain Rapp. And such an entertaining evening as that we had not again for the whole winter. And now this last winter, or rather autumn, when we again became so solitary, and mamma saw me become pale and thin, and fancied that I was unhappy about Adolph, and so I was, but not as—but I was so lonesome and suffered so from ennui;—mamma, therefore, wrote to Fridolph, to tell him to come and fetch me to his house at H., for the winter, so that I might divert and amuse myself with balls and company. And with this arrangement we were all very much pleased. For Fridolph and I are very fond of each other, although sister-in-law, Amelia, is a little too prim for me, and I am a little too countrified and daring for her, I fancy. Captain Rapp's residence, however, was near to H., and after I came to the city he came continually there, and arranged slegding parties and balls, and always invited me to them, and in this way I had a prodigiously amusing winter, and danced at more than thirty balls. And, in this way, I learned and heard from many people what a good and honorable man Captain Rapp was, and how generally he was beloved and esteemed. And now when I was about to return to Bragesholm, and Captain Rapp held my hand firmly, and said that it was impossible that he could lose me, because I had taken his heart, I discovered that he also had mine, and then—we became betrothed to each other before I rightly knew a word about it; because he is so lively and hasty in all his actions!—And now it all depends upon how mamma takes the matter; because I know very well what she will say. Mamma has always said to her children, when they became capable of judging for themselves, even to me in my factory-schemes, 'Make yourself happy in the way that suits and pleases you best. I shall do all that lies in my power to advance your wishes.' And we know that mamma keeps her word. But for that very reason, one is so terribly afraid of doing any thing against her wishes, or which may grieve her. And now I know that my betrothal with Captain Rapp can not be otherwise than very contrary to mamma's views, because she knows nothing about him, and has decided in her own mind that Adolph and I shall become husband and wife. But it would not have turned out well, because, in reality, he and I are not suitable for each other. He is too lofty and melancholy for me, and I am too much of an every-day person for him. We should never have been as happy as he and Virginia were, she who was mamma again in every thing. But Reinhold Rapp and I are just made for each other, and we shall dance with one another in joy and in sorrow through life, if only mamma, ah! if only mamma will say yes to it, and be pleased! Because, if mamma now says yes, as I know that she will do, but is not pleased, but becomes pale and silent as she is sometimes, when her mind is cast down—and if, besides, Adolph should also be vexed, yes, I could not bear that; and, let it go as it may, I shall be unhappy—at least, in the beginning!—and now tell me, give me good advice. How had I better act? What shall we do?"

"Wait till to-morrow morning," said Miss —, "and then tell every thing. Talk to your mother before Captain Rapp does it. But wait until Adolph has spoken with her. I am very much mistaken if he have not a something to confide to her, a confession to make which will open the way to make it easy for you. If all signs and my own good eyes do not deceive me, Adolph has also chosen a wife—but it is not you; and he longs to speak of it to your mother."

Charlotte clapped her hands.

"Ida! Ida!" exclaimed she, "the beautiful Ida R. Yes, it must be she. I might have understood it by his glances at her after dinner. Where were my thoughts? Ah, thank heaven! Then every thing is clear. Then every thing will become easy, and mamma will be pleased with me and my choice. A good choice in every way, because Reinhold has an estate, and is a respectable fellow. Fridolph has promised to talk with mamma in our favor. Ah! we may be happy after all. A thousand, thousand thanks for this hope. Now I can breathe again. Now Oreskutan is lifted from off my breast. It has lain upon me the whole dinner-time, and I was scarcely able to eat, scarcely able to swallow a morsel. Ah! so excellent! so fortunate!

Now I must go and see if I can talk with Ina; for she must be initiated into the mysteries, and she can talk with mamma for me. She is the minister of domestic affairs, and many things come to her, and are prepared by her before they come to mamma, our most gracious queen and most affectionate mother."

And Charlotte, gay and beaming, embraced Miss —, and danced down the steps to pay a visit in "the little joy," and to have a private conversation with the Innermost.

When she entered, Adolph rose up; and both he and Ina had evidently been weeping. He kissed her small, white hand, and pressed Charlotte's hastily as he went out of the room, and left his seat for her to open her inmost heart to the Innermost.

Toward evening, the two youngest sons arrived, the youths Yngve and Arvid; two handsome, promising lads, the apple of their mother's eye; Ina's darlings, gay and happy to be at home with their mother and sisters. It was not possible this day to have any private and serious conversation with Mrs. Cecilia. All confessions, therefore, were deferred until the morrow. In the evening, Adolph besought his mother-in-law to give him an opportunity for a private conversation early the following day. This request, and the thoughts which it gave rise to, caused Mrs. Cecilia to pass a sleepless night.

Early on the morning of the following day, Mrs. Cecilia met her son-in-law in her boudoir. She was pale, and her hand felt cold in Adolph's, as he, also evidently excited, took her hand and conveyed it to his lips. He sat beside her on the sofa, and said tenderly—

"Do not be displeased with me, my mother, if you find that I have acted too hastily. I am ready to concede that—but I can not regret what I have done!"

Adolph paused for a moment, because he remarked that his mother-in-law gently trembled, and was very pale. She, however, said nothing, but made a sign for him to proceed. Adolph continued, not without embarrassment, but in a manly and determined manner.

"Love has taken me by surprise—I have given my heart, and I wish to give my hand, to the daughter of your friend, my mother, she whom you also know and love."

With an impetuosity which was unusual for her, Mrs. Cecilia interrupted him, as she laid her hand upon his arm, and said—

"Is it done?—can it not be altered?—Have you made up your mind—irrevocably?"

"I have done so!" said Adolph, resolutely, "I have kissed Ida as my bride, and have received her promise to become mine, if you, my mother, will give your approval. This was her stipulation; and she has now returned blither with me, to beg you—to bless your children."

Mrs. Cecilia sighed deeply, and covered her eyes with her hands.

Adolph now gave a hasty account of his first acquaintance with Ida at the foreign bath, and the impression which she then made upon him by her force of character, and her behavior under the most painful circumstances; of their late meeting during the journey to Avasaxa, and of all that took place there. He told her every thing, candidly and honestly. Mrs. Cecilia continued silent, and still kept her eyes concealed by her hands.

"My mother! my mother!" said Adolph, at length, deeply affected, "speak to me, look at me! Is it possible that you can be greatly displeased? that you can be actually opposed to receive as a daughter this glorious Ida, whose character I know that you admire? If it be so, forgive me, my mother, this sorrow, and believe me, that it shall be one day effaced by her affection and mine toward you, by the happiness you will see your children enjoying near you. For I know that you merely desire our welfare, our best welfare. But speak—speak to me, my mother!"

"Adolph," said Mrs. Cecilia, with firmness, but still very pale, "I will be candid with you. You have been, and are very dear to me; none of my sons is dearer, and I can not deny but that this step which you have taken is painful to me—I regard it as too hasty. Ida is not the woman whom I should have wished for Virginia's successor to your hand in my house. I do not believe that she can make a husband happy. Her character, although noble, is too proud, and her temper is not good. I can not deny but that I had other plans, other wishes, for you; but that is the usual weakness of mothers, dear Adolph, and their usual miscalculations. No matter, you had a right to choose for yourself, without reference to any other, except—your little boy. May Ida be a good mother to him, may she make you happy, and she shall not have cause to complain of coldness in me! Of this be certain, Adolph, that the wife you choose will be well received by your mother. May, may she only make you happy."

And with tearful eyes and maternal affection, Mrs. Cecilia embraced her son-in-law.

"And now," continued she, as she went toward her chamber, "I wish to be alone for a moment. At breakfast, you shall bring your Ida to me."

Mrs. Cecilia went into her own room. She wished to collect her mind in quietness, and to calm her excited feelings; for she was painfully excited by what had happened. It was very repugnant to her feelings to see Ida take Virginia's place, and she felt that the old lady of Bragesholm, and the young lady that was to be would never be happy there together. She thought also with uneasiness of Charlotte. Charlotte who had attached her affections to Adolph, how would she like it;—how would she bear it? But Mrs. Cecilia was not long abandoned to these anxious thoughts, for the chamber-door opened, and Charlotte peeped in. When she saw her mother sitting in the arm-chair, pale and serious, she hastened up to her, kissed her, and besought her, with suppressed tears, not to be vexed with her, for that she had something to say, something to confess to her!

Mrs. Cecilia, almost startled, begged of her daughter to speak.

And Charlotte spoke: relating and confessing all that which we already know. It was to her an indescribable comfort when she saw her mother's countenance brighten during her naive relation, and in the end kindly smile. In consequence, Charlotte became more and more eloquent in praise of Reinhold Rapp, and referred to Fridolph to prove the truth of all that she had said in praise of him.

After the confession which Adolph had made, it was actually a little consolatory and alleviating to Mrs. Cecilia to hear Charlotte, who at once relieved her from all anxiety as to her daughter's unhappy attachment, although it awoke some fear in her mind lest she also had been over hasty in her selection of a friend for life. Mrs. Cecilia, however, said—

"My dear child! you know that you are at liberty to choose and to determine for your own life's happiness, according as you think it best, and that I will not interfere in so important a matter as marriage. On this subject, people must choose and determine for themselves, and I have that confidence in my Charlotte, as to believe that her choice will redound to her honor; and if I now beg that a little time may intervene before the affair is finally concluded, it is because I should wish to see myself that you are fully assured as to your choice, and that you yourself are satisfied; and also because I myself should like to become better acquainted with him to whom it is confided to conduct my beloved child from her maternal home, as well as to leave her happiness in his keeping. He must, indeed, be a very good young man, if I am to be contented with him. But that I hope Captain Rapp is, and I shall talk with Fridolph about him, and with himself if he wishes it. And, in any case, I hope that he will remain at Bragesholm as long as he can."

Mrs. Cecilia said this so affectionately and so worthily at the same time, that Charlotte was deeply affected, and delighted with her maternal kindness and justice, in the true sense of the word, and covered her hands with kisses. Affected and joyful at the same time, she hastened afterward to communicate the good tidings to Captain Rapp, who was waiting at his post, anxiously expectant, and then to Miss —, who also was waiting.

Charlotte had not been ten minutes away, when Miss — made her entrance into her chamber, and with a half-serious, half-comic air of embarrassment, said that she had—a confession to make.

"You also?" exclaimed Mrs. Cecilia, amazed and almost amused by this rehearsal. "Nay, that would be actually too much. Perhaps you, my old, sensible Emily, have allowed yourself to be surprised by love, and have gone and betrothed yourself!"

"Heaven help me! so it is," said Miss —.

"Colonel G—— has wooed me, and I have said, yes, thank you!"

Mrs. Cecilia laughed out aloud. "Nay, that is too foolish," exclaimed she; "and I know not where it will end. All that is now wanting, is that my little Sprig should come and confess that he has given away his heart, and made a choice for life, and that my old overseer should come and make known to me his betrothal with my old Lisa; then it would be complete. I fancy that this hot midsummer has bewitched the people, and has kindled fire both in heart and brain. And even you, dear, old friend? Nay, that is too absurd. You, who were so piously and so seriously to sit and spin, and to play at cards, and to wind yarn and sing old songs with me this autumn and winter, that you now instead, should be thinking of marriage and romantic scenes, and not be a morsel wiser than young folks who have let themselves be surprised by love!"

Thus did Mrs. Cecilia continue to jest and to excoite herself so that Miss — became actually bewildered; and, in the end, quite distressed. When, however, Mrs. Cecilia saw tears flowing from the large brown eyes, she took her friend in her arms, saying—

"Dear Emily, I jest; but now, seriously, I congratulate you. I have heard a deal that is good of Colonel G——, and I think that he looks like a man of honor; and, if he makes you happy, I shall not be offended that you, like all the rest, desert me, and that I must wind my raveled skeins alone. But one thing I shall stipulate for, and that is, that I shall provide for your wedding, and that it shall be held here, at Bragesholm. I will in some way have a part in this universal game at wooing. And we may perhaps have more than one wedding to celebrate here."

If, after this, the little Sprig had actually come and made his confession, and had said that he had been surprised by love, and made his choice, and given away his little heart, it would have been no more than the truth. And Mrs. Cecilia became aware of all this, when, in the course of the day, she saw the little Sprig so joyously skipping and playing about the lovely little Naima, evidently smitten, and the two very soon calling one another husband and wife. And when, on the evening of the same day, the old overseer, after the usual accounts had been given up of the day's work, amid many contortions and bashful coughs, blushing made the confession, that he was thinking of entering into matrimony with that virtuous young woman, Lisa; and that they both had made up their minds, if the gracious lady would allow it, then—yes, then—Mrs. Cecilia began actually to believe that there was some witchcraft afloat, and that the midsummer sun had this year some particularly inflammatory power.

"How will it be with us?" said she, jokingly, to Ina; "it is impossible that we can be without our part in this universal game of courtship. And now I expect that our young artist will be making his declaration and confession to me of us."

The youths, Yngve and Arvid, had also their confession to make, and at the confessional of family love they opened their hearts to the mother and the Innermost. But they were not of so amorous a nature as the former. Yngve stood upon the boundary between two paths, which were opened for his preferment, and the choice between the two was difficult to him. His mother said—

"Do not ask by which you will obtain the greatest advantage to yourself; ask by which you can make your pound most serviceable to your native land."

Arvid had begun his career with uncommon success, but had also met with opposition, envy, hostility, and was made uneasy thereby.

To him the mother said—

"Do you fear the storms? Do you not know, my child, that only through storms can the young tree grow, and become great and strong. But—be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."

The two youths were only in love with mother and sisters, and only smitten by all the charms of nature and a country life.

As concerned Theodore, he was not very far from the confession of which Mrs. Cecilia spoke in jest. There had arisen between the old lady of Bragesholm and himself a kind of relationship, by no means infrequent between elderly ladies and young agreeable men, although strangers in their families. A sentiment as that of mother and son existed between them, which for him, the motherless, had in an especial manner a peculiarly captivating and affecting delight. This may be easily observed in the notes which he made at this time, and wrote to his friend, and which we find here before us.

From Theodore's Letter.

"Bragesholm, July.

"It makes a deep impression when we return from the world's great inn, where all is in motion, coming and going, to a home where permanence has taken up its abode. The tranquillity in the house, the quiet order of the daily movements, every thing bears a stamp of peace and firmness, which upon this rolling globe almost amazes him who has long been whirled about from one part of the world to another, and has almost forgotten—home. We meet in the house-servants with friendly, pleasant countenances; the elder ones have been here at least twenty years, the younger are the children of the dependents of the estate, who consider it fortunate to have them brought up at the hall. All in the house has the air of home, calm, discreet, contented.

"Mrs. Cecilia conducted me through the rooms, telling me their names and traditions—for every room has its own—and showed me the old pictures, the family portraits, Mrs. Martha Orrhane, and her paintings and inscriptions in the great hall—"the great joy," and talked to me of my ancestors. What do you think I felt in all this?

"She has greatly beautified the place all around, planted, laid out, and cultivated. I can well understand how she has grown into unity with the place: how she must love it.

"She treats me with motherly tenderness. She has invited me to remain here as long as I find it agreeable. I fancy she is quite at her ease with me. This feeling makes me happy, and the more I see and hear her, the more impossible I find to believe ill of her. Yes, my dark suspicions vanish before this bright form, as shadows before the eye of day. Like Lady Minnetrost in the Zauberring, she fans with the stems of lilies peace into the swelling and restless bosom. I suffer, in the mean time, from seeing her so gentle and unobtrusively go beside me like . . .

"But I mean no ill. I would only be certain, and become at one with myself about my mode of proceeding . . .

"I ramble out in the warm, cloudless nights, in the magic splendor of a light which is never seen, never moves. I have little sleep. Why should we sleep when we can live and enjoy? Yes, I now enjoy life for a moment, but pretty much as our first parents enjoyed the forbidden fruit . . .

"By day, I am much with the old lady and the Innermost; she, you know, whom I do not yet rightly comprehend what she is. A natural person she certainly is not, for she reads Greek and Latin, Herodotus, Tacitus, till late of nights, and talks like a philosopher; and can at the same time joke and laugh at nothing, like the most joyous child, but with a quick woman's fine sense. And this creature has merely a head—but an angel's head—and a pair of wings. Now, don't tell me that this is a natural person!

"Don't tell me either that I am—in love: for then I shall grow angry. One does not fall in love with the fourth part of a human being, with a head and a pair of wings, though it does utter all the wisdom of the world, and smile and joke bewitchingly.

"But . . . when Odin gave away one of his eyes to get the head of Mimer for himself, I think he did wisely. For you can not pay too dearly for a companionship through life, which makes you never feel lonely, and never feel life poor, but have a living well to go to and draw from.

"I would wish always to be near the Innermost; read to her, draw and paint before her eyes, and talk to her, and learn of her, and serve her as one would worship and serve an enchanted princess. But love! . . .

"Say rather that I am in love with the old lady; for truly I am drawn toward her by a wonderful power. I could sit at her feet, press my face on the hem of her light dress, kiss it, and weep. But sometimes I contend with her secretly, and accuse her of my wasted and erring past unhappy life.

"But, when I am with them—these two—when I talk with them, and they talk with me, I become calm and cheerful. There breathes peace from their spirits. They must, they must be children of a higher light!

"Listen! do you believe that in order to be fundamentally a philosopher, one must necessarily have read philosophical books, and written philosophic theses? Do you believe that the highest results of the highest philosophy may show themselves in a human soul, which has never heard the name of Schelling, or of Hegel? In love! Do you believe that the eternal truth, that wisdom waits to take up her dwelling among men, till the professed philosophers prepare a place for her, and cry—'Here is her grace!' and to mankind—'Here she sits, good people!'

"And if he makes a false announcement, and she does not sit there, do you believe that it deludes or misleads such a soul! O, go! it moves her not! No!—she looks down into the depth of her conscience, and finds there another light, another doctrine, and she flings from her, or leaves behind the false philosophy with—a smile.

"Faith—what is faith? It is the lowest, and it is the highest. It may be the spirit's slavish bowing before a statue, or a letter: it may also be the rational spirit's divination of the eternal truth.

"Is not faith then the spirit's royal road to the Most High? The short cut—the bird's-way over the mountain? . . .

"And would I by this condemn learning and philosophy? by no means. She is the shield, and wall, and fortress; and, like a sun, one day will her word shine over life through all the clouds of thought. But, observe, I think it is thus. When the heavenly Idea descends to earth, and takes up its abode among the children of men, she, in one, goes more to the head, in another, more to the imagination—that wonderful inner room full of clear mirrors of reflection—and, in a third, more to the heart. And all these, the head, the imagination, the heart, have their own mode of receiving and giving forth the heavenly revelation. For, to every one of these she gives herself fully, and yet in a different fashion, and, therefore, they ought to listen to each other.

"But which has the most immediate, genuine perception and view?

"Yesterday, in a quiet hour, I chatted with Mrs. Cecilia. We were alone. She sate and sewed: I gave myself the reins, and talked to her of whatever suggested itself. The dark spirit was then upon me. I gave vent to a whole host of questionings and doubts; all the people of the shades, whom the inquiries of our time have called up, let them now exist, and darken the sun, and spread abroad over life, this and the next—for the two are one—a thoroughly pitch-dark night. I would see how she took it. It irritated me to see her always so calm and so bright; and I would, at least, frighten her a little, and hear the usual exclamation, 'Heaven defend us!' or 'Good gracious!'

"But she said nothing. She quite allowed me to go on talking; and, when I had done for want of opposition, and of something still worse to say than I had said, she merely heaved a gentle sigh, and then looked up, and gazed at me, and smiled! But so kind, so serene, so sweet and full of motherly tenderness, and, at the same time, so arch, that I became confounded, perplexed, and knew not what I should make of this smiling. For not a word did she say in explanation of it; but yet there lay in it a great, unshakable wisdom for herself, for me, and for all the world. A wonderful smile! But since then, it has, as it were, shone down into my soul.

"Whence come such smiles? Are they not beams from some original fountain of light?

"When God would illumine and warm the world, must he first speak and demonstrate? No! But he gives to the sun his smiling beams. First life, then doctrine. First light (wisdom), then the teaching of it.

"And listen! listen! When this spirit, so living, so smiling, is a woman, believest thou not that it has some peculiar significance?

"Why went Numa to Egeria to fetch wisdom? Why listened the wisest of the Greeks to Aspasia's inspirations? Why had all the ancient oracles priestesses? And the Vala and Iduna of the North, alone, the secrets of the origin and object of the world? Why have all people still, to the present day, a feeling of a mysterious power in woman, whom they alternately quail and worship, but almost always—in good or in evil—cause to suffer?

"Is it not because she, the last-born of creation, the closing work of the Creator, now retains a secret and deeper bond of union with all the original springs of life, and that the word of life is still always first born in her soul?

"Fancies! say you, and point to the creatures of the every-day world. You are right, but I am right, also! . . .

"I wander and ride about much on the estate. I visit the peasants and the laborers of the estate in their dwellings. I ask them questions, and let them talk, and I listen and learn. He who needs it might convince himself here, that no property was ever improved in the long run without the improvement and welfare of the working people upon it, and that Christian justice and kindness in these respects are also worldly wisdom. The lower economy must become a higher; must ascend to Heaven and be baptized there, if it is really to fertilize the earth and life. I hear and I see it here; where the servant of the establishment labors with a prospect of becoming a cottager: a cottager if he manage well, a farmer, or a small proprietor; and the cottager and the farmer do not cultivate their land well without caring to adorn their houses, where the day laborer knows that his labor is observed, and finally rewarded, and where the relation between master and servant is full of good will and confidence. Upon the justice and impartiality of the old lady all rely as firmly as upon our Lord's; and so they work with hope. And this lively hope generates joy in labor, and joy in rest; and thus songs arise amid field and meadow, and fill the neighborhood with animating sounds. And of evenings, the young people of the country challenge echo to laughter; and he who does not reckon such gladness as part of the property and produce of country life, deserves no other produce whatever—but . . . I hear and I see, every day, this lady and her family regarded here as a blessing! . . .

* * * * *

"But he who could not come without taking this away; who could come merely as a cloud over the sun, a calamity upon good fortune, . . . why should he come at all? Why should he appear? What does it signify if an insignificant human life disappears silently? . . .

* * * * *

"Do as other people; be like other people!" was always the ideal which was placed before me in very early years. But then I could not, and now . . . I would not be as other people, as people generally. That may sound selfish; perhaps it is so. I can not help it. I stand by it.

* * * * *

"What do you more than others?" says the Saviour, when he desires to elevate his disciples above the ordinary doings of the world.

"He would have us be something extraordinary; that we shall have some peculiar salt in us, that therewith we may salt life.

* * * * *

"And yet if she were capable of doing me injustice; yet if all were inclined to do me injustice, ought I not, notwithstanding, to be able to act right? Right before my own judgment seat; right before that eternal eye which looks into me, and in whose light my soul was once light and happy for a moment! . . .

"And hereafter, how will it be?

* * * * *

"But to the end—often late enough, but still commonly the earnest seeker finds upon the earth his quiet retreat, his peaceful room, where he can kindle his lamp, and make it bright and comfortable around him while the evening passes on, and say—'Here it is good for me to be waiting for the great morning.'

"Yes, many, but the multitude? striving souls; restless souls;—my brothers and sisters!—shall ye find rest before the flower of your life is quenched, the glowing heart sinks in ashes, and snow lies cold and heavy on your breast? There are fire-souls, Phoenix spirits who nourish themselves in fire, who kiss the very flowers which destroy them; who rest on their burning pile with love, waiting to be changed; conscious of a greater destiny on earth, than peace, than happiness!—

Ye happy, ye unhappy! I lament not for you.

In your silent deep, upon your nightly hill, the Highest is with you, coveting or comforting. Ye are alone with him. Ye know it, ye feel it, and that is enough. So was He with Moses, so with Ædipus, so with one far greater than these. He took them aside in their last conflict. They were alone with him: they felt it, and it was sufficient.

"But we, we who live in the lowly valleys of earth, who seek enjoyment and peace, we who only breathe easily in the love and approbation of our fellow-creatures, who desire to warm ourselves in life's sun, wo—ah! I must descend lower yet—who need coffee and cigars, the covered board and the cushioned bed, and who, while we are seeking our peace with heaven, even are seeking comfort on the earth—we legion!—Oh! how difficult to break ourselves loose from the enthralling bond!—

"But, when that is done, then . . . then it must be grand, and I shall breathe more freely; I shall stand upon the mountain as once before, above the north wind, happy in the eternal light.

* * * * *

"But I linger, for . . . I enjoy a brief moment of happiness with mankind, as I never enjoyed it before. I delay my departure. A brief moment. . . O! a brief moment yet let me dream and be glad—be once more a child!

"And if they should love me? If she should be able to receive with joy the returned one, the one arisen from the dead? . . . But it is impossible. It is childish to think of. Sometimes I think it better to take myself away without more ado. And perhaps I should in that do the best and wisest. I wonder if any one would miss me?"

Here ended Theodore's letter.

A week had passed over since the "confession-day," as it was called in the family, and while the younger members of the house, at the suggestion of Mrs. Cecilia, had in every way enjoyed the beautiful weather and the pleasantness of the country, she had written and worked much in quietness, partly in her own room, partly in that of the Innermost, who was a most helpful minister of finance and accountant in the family department.

And so came the day on which the affair of the property should be concluded; and the purchaser, a neighbor of Mrs. Cecilia's, should come with his family to Bragesholm. A few other neighbors were invited also. A dinner was to be given, and Mrs. Cecilia had begged all her friends and her children to remain there over the day.

The day was come, and the neighbors came with their wives and daughters, and their boys, too. The young girls came separately forward and courtesied to Mrs. Cecilia, who must look at their homespun dresses, or at their necklaces of self-made rose-heads. . . And Mrs. Cecilia was very friendly and motherly toward them, praised their cleverness, and called them thou—not because she was related to them, or a particular friend of their parents, but because they were young girls whom she had seen grow up, and she an old and venerable lady. And I have often heard old and amiable ladies address young girls with thou, even on their first acquaintance; and when I myself was young, I was glad to be thus treated. It felt so maternally kind. And so thought evidently the young girls on this occasion; for they blushed and smiled, and kissed the white hand of Mrs. Cecilia, who softly stroked their rosy cheeks. They were evidently delighted with the old lady.

The dinner was—like all great dinners—more ostentatious and profusely sumptuous than was necessary. The colonel had all possible cause to ponder on his dreadful mistake, and to sigh over the wickedness of the world. Mrs. Cecilia sat between the two most distinguished gentlemen, a judge and a proprietor of iron-works—two very amiable, heavy gentlemen. Adolph, as host, sat opposite to her, between Ida and a heavy, good-natured lady. People ate, and drank, and talked. The bottles, which Adolph caused to go briskly round, loosed the bonds of the tongue. But politics came up amid the dinner, and there began to be storm and strife; but Mrs. Cecilia broke it off by proposing a toast for peace—the peace at the table, in fact. And so the strife was laid, but murmuring gently like a storm, and ready to break out afresh: and as Captain Rapp unluckily touched on a parliamentary topic, an apple of discord for the different parties, the dispute burst forth anew, and with so terrible a violence, that it was not to be allayed again easily. Captain Rapp grew hot, and shouted—the colonel screamed; worst of all screeched the gentle brother, and talked only of hanging, and cutting off people's heads, and was especially liberal of treating his fellow-men to the lash. Theodore fired up against him with all the fury of a philanthropist, defended the cause of humanity, and all shouted at once, and no one would listen to the other, and the gentle brother and Captain Reinhold Rapp became the chief opponents. The ladies who, themselves excited, sought to calm the combatants, found only half a hearing. At length Adolph, watching his opportunity, suddenly burst forth, glass in hand, with a lively song, and began—

“Jolly boys, your glasses drain.”

A silence struck across the storm, and the angry words, half by fair means and half by foul, were compelled, to plunge again into the throats of the combatants, washed down by the fiery, peaceful spirit of the wine. Long life, then, to wine and song at the right nick of time. As I have said, the storm was laid, and Mrs. Cecilia did not allow it to rise again. The dinner concluded, as it were, under general dissonance, and Captain Rapp and the gentle brother gave each other no very gentle glances. The judge and the proprietor of iron-works, moreover, were as red in the face as two turkey-cocks.

After dinner, the Innermost received incessant visits from one or another of her friends and acquaintance, and all talked of the fracas at the dinner, and all had their complaints to make, the one of the other, and every one lightened his heart by accusing his opponent of absurdity, extravagance, and folly. The Innermost listened and sympathized, and agreed and disagreed, according to circumstances. “Extravagance was always a folly” yet she could at the same time explain the cause for this excess on the other side; and that in this or that view of things, this and the other person might not be considered so very wrong. And then he was really was wrong as clear as the day, and was perfectly beyond all advice on true subjects, was nevertheless so excellent in other respects. The vehement advocate of severe laws was still so good a man, such an admirable father and master. And he who was completely helpless, culpable, headless—yes, he was headless, and that was the only worst look for him, and thus he was totally unmanageable, and it was really a great pity. . . . And so people were obliged to laugh; and the summa summarum was, that no one went in to see the Innermost who did not come out with a lighter heart—for the unlucky headless one did not come thither—with a brighter look, with a more friendly tone of mind toward his fellow-men, and, with a greater inclination to reasonableness and moderation in his intercourse with those of different modes of thinking.

And when Mrs. Cecilia and her gentlemen of business went into her room with the old overseer, and bade Fridolph and Captain Rapp endeavor during this while to amuse and entertain the rest of the company, they at once united in this undertaking with the most fraternal disposition, and proposed a merry game in the court, in which the gentle brother's long legs, and Captain Rapp's short ones, emulated each other in ability and rapidity in leaping over benches and tressels, and bushes and hedges, which actually looked quite dangerous, and made Mrs. Amelia tremble with anxiety. But Charlotte laughed heartily and all the rest laughed, and leaped one better than the other, but none equal to the two political opponents. Adolph, however, went with Ida to the wood, at a tance from the noise and riot, to endeavor to quillize her unquiet heart.

The deliberations and the games had lasted about a couple of hours, when Mrs. Cecilia sent to desire the members of her family to assemble in her room.

When they entered, she stood up at her writing-table with some papers in her hand. A deep crimson was on her cheek, her glance was bright and cheerful. She looked with pleasure on those who entered, as she said—

“Now, my children, we have a little something to read and write.”

Mrs. Cecilia herself read the deed of sale, of which we have already spoken. The money which was to be paid down had already been said by the purchaser upon the writing table. The business was evidently, in a high degree, advantageous to the family. After the reading of the deed it was to be signed.

Mrs. Cecilia signed her name, and the other interested party stood ready to sign his also below hers, when the old overseer, who had writhed as if in the greatest anxiety of soul, and more than once had wiped the sweat-drops from his brow, suddenly burst forth with the exclamation—

"No! I can not stand it any longer. I can not burden my conscience by letting these transactions with another man's property take place. No!" continued he with still greater violence, and almost choked with emotion, as he drew forward Theodore, who had seized him by the arm; "No—I must, I will speak! I must say that here stands the only person who has a right to make, and to close any bargain regarding the late master's property; here stands the only true heir, the master's own son, Mr. Erik Nordenhjelm!" And with this he pointed to Theodore, who had unobservedly entered the room, and placed himself near the old overseer.

If a dead man in his grave-clothes had risen up before the assembled company, their countenances could scarcely have become paler, or their expression one of more grave astonishment.

"Erik—Nordenhjelm!" repeated Mrs. Cecilia, almost stammering; "Erik Nordenhjelm is dead—dead long ago! We have had certain intelligence of his death!"

Theodore seemed for a moment to struggle with himself, but at length his anxious and excited countenance assumed an expression of determination, and, advancing forward a few paces, he said with severity—

"But if this intelligence be a lie. If Erik Nordenhjelm be not dead—if he still lives!"

"But he is dead!" returned Mrs. Cecilia, as if mechanically, but drew back, as if struck by the glance which Theodore riveted upon her. Her knees trembled; she was obliged to seat herself; and, growing still paler, she repeated once more, "He is dead—dead!"

"He is not dead!" exclaimed Theodore, with stern decision. "He stands before you. I AM ERIC NORDENHJELM!"

There was something in the manner and expression of Theodore (we will still continue to call him so) which did not permit any one to doubt the truth of his words. But, spite of this, Mrs. Cecilia said—

"Have you any proof?"

Theodore made no answer. He merely continued to look at her with a glance of painful and tumultuous feelings, and in this Mrs. Cecilia read proof stronger than all mere outward proof.

And now the old overseer again stepped forward, and said, with violent emotion—

"So truly as I hope God may be my help, both here and hereafter, is he Mr. Erik, the son of my former master, Squire Nordenhjelm. I recognized him, and knew that it was he. Yes that I know, and would take my sacred oath of it."

"How long have you known it?" inquired Mrs. Cecilia, with a grave look at the old servant.

"Only since yesterday with certainty!" replied he; "but I have had my suspicions for several days, because the young gentleman made so many inquiries about things that happened in former times, and I could see that he was better informed in many matters than I was; and I said to myself, 'Give heed! that must be Mr. Erik!—But yesterday I said quite certainly, it is he!—'"

Mrs. Cecilia cast a troubled glance upon her children that stood around her. She trembled evidently, and seemed to be making an effort at self-possession.

"I see how it is," said Theodore, slowly and bitterly, as he looked round upon the disturbed countenances that surrounded him. "I see how it is! And I ought to have known that it would be so. I am not welcome. But, when was I so? Not even to my own mother. And now I can see plainly that every one wishes me away; that they wish me dead!"

"That is not true!" exclaimed Mrs. Cecilia with dignity and decision, as she rose up; "no, it is not so! And, if you be Erik Nordenhjelm, then know, for ten years I looked for you back again, because I had a feeling that injustice had been done to you, and I longed to compensate for it to you by all a mother's affection. On the evening when you fled, I sought for you every where that I might talk with you; but it was too late; you were already gone!—Year after year have I said to myself, He will come again; he will come again some day. Year after year I made inquiries, and sought for traces of the fugitive. And every day, every morning, and every evening, I called down blessings upon him, and prayed for him as a real mother might have done. I managed his property as carefully as if it had been that of my own children, and thought, One day it will be his, and I shall be able to yield up his paternal estate to him in good condition, and free from debt. I grieved over this young lad; and his flight from his father's house was like a nail in my coffin. One of my friends, however, who went abroad with the private intention of discovering his place of sojourn, and, if, possible, to bring him back, sent home the positive intelligence of his death in the South American war. It was a severe blow. It bowed me more than many another sorrow. But time went on, and by degrees I accustomed myself to the thought that he was dead, and that I now was working for my own children. And the thought became dear to me, I do not deny it, because I thought of the young people's future!—But, if Erik Nordenhjelm live; if he be here, and can prove his identity as the son and the heir of my deceased husband, of a truth, he shall be welcome to me, and I shall thank God that he is returned.

that I can do him justice and compensate him for the wrong that was done to him in his youth. He shall receive all his own, and not one of my children will complain that they, on the other hand, are portionless. They, like myself, will, after all, stand here free from blame."

Never had Mrs. Cecilia stood more proudly and commandingly than at this moment, when she stood there, stood alone, with her pure conscience and her correct life, faithful in the performance of duty. She resumed—

"But once more, I ask, have you any proof of what you state? Can you establish and substantiate your claim?"

Theodore answered not a word—he continued merely to regard his mother-in-law with glances in which a sea of tumultuous feelings appeared to surge; and the glances which she returned were still more scrutinizing and penetrative.

"Yes, it is he!" said she, as if to herself, "Yes, it is Erik! I recognize his features, his expression! Yes, it is he. My eyes have been as if darkened!"

"Yes, I recognize you," she continued aloud, "I acknowledge you as Erik Nordenhjelm! But now, Erik, I will ask, why did you come in this manner, under a feigned name, and under false pretences, into the house of your father? Was it right, was it fair, was it kind of you, thus secretly to watch, and wait till you found a moment for coming, not as a son and a brother, but—Erik, why have you acted toward us, as toward enemies? Why do you stand now before me at this moment, without replying, without caring to speak the word which I wish. Erik, of whom are you suspicious? Ah! is it not the error of the child which again appears in the man? Is it not the 'people of the shades' which you talk about, who thrust you from the light, and from those who desire nothing better than to love you?"

Theodore still stood silent, pale, and gloomy, and as if without consciousness; his eyes only spoke.

Mrs. Cecilia looked at him in silence for a moment, after which her countenance brightened to an expression full of maternal kindness and dignity.

"I see how it is," said she, "my poor Erik! you have been away a long time, and you took away with you nothing but bitter memories of home. You were early unhappy, and you have since then never had an affectionate home on earth. You have lost your faith in home, and in love. But, thank God! that you are now at home. You shall not long remain wordless with us, in your home, in your house. You shall soon understand us better, Erik! do not embitter your new life. Forget the past, forget every thing that was bitter; and forgive, forgive the part which I had in it. But I did not, at that time, know either your father or you sufficiently well to interfere. I hesitated, delayed, but, believe me, that moment has cost me more painful tears than it has cost you! But now, Erik—Erik, my son Erik, I shall, perhaps, leave your house and home, but, before that, you must embrace me as a son, and I must welcome you as a mother. Erik—my son—welcome! Welcome, most sincerely!"

And she advanced toward him with extended arms.

"Not yet," said he, turning aside. "We do not fully understand each other yet. And I also have a few words to say. I also have a right to be understood, and to stand here—to a certain extent, at least, free of guilt. Yes, it is true, I have come secretly, secretly; under an assumed name, I have stolen into the house to prove you, to be a spy upon you. But my intentions were not deserving of blame. I wished to know, and to judge, before I acted. I came not hither in good faith. I have suspected and mistrusted the purest, the best. And on that account I am guilty. But I here acknowledge my fault. And now it remains for me to reconcile that with action."

He bowed his knee before Mrs. Cecilia, and said, with a trembling voice—

"Embrace me, my mother!"

She caught him in her arms, and kissed his brow.

"Thanks!" said he, softly; and then rising up, he looked round him.

"Mother, brothers, sisters!" said he "I have seen your countenances become pale; I have seen your glances grow dark at the sight of me. They shall do so no more! The first heir is dead;—you will never see him again."

And with this he rushed from the room.

But Adolph, more rapid than thought, was upon his steps, and seized him at the moment when he was about to throw himself on a horse which stood ready saddled at a short distance from the house.

"Fool!" said Adolph, crimsoning with noble anger, as he seized him with his powerful grasp, "what is the meaning of this? Do you think us capable of profiting by your folly? Do you not know that I shall follow you, let you go wherever you may, and never leave you until I bring you back? See! your mother and your brothers and sisters come to fetch you back!"

Theodore might have escaped from Adolph's grasp—might, in his eccentric state of mind, have leaped upon his horse and sped away, far away into the wide world, where it would not have been easy to follow or to find him. He might have done so, and he would have done so; but when he heard the cry, "Erik! Erik! my son!" uttered from the noblest heart of woman, with an expression of the deepest woe, he could not fly. He stood still; and, when Mrs. Cecilia's outstretched arms touched him, he sank upon her breast.

"My son, Erik!" said she, deeply affected, "will you kill me? Could you believe that after this I could have had one joyful moment?"

You are unjust to me and to all my children, as well as to yourself. You shall, you ought, and you must stop; and that which is just shall be done, as regards you and all the rest, otherwise how else could I be quiet in my grave."

"That which is just!" repeated Theodore, raising himself. "Yes, but what is just in this case? What would have been my father's property, had not my father's wife snatched it from ruin, taken charge of it, and through the fatigue and self-denial of eighteen years, cleared off from it the most oppressive debts? But for this, it would have all melted away to nothing. It is entirely her labor which has made it what it now is, and it is her right to possess and enjoy it. Shall I, a stranger, who have done nothing, been nothing to her, except a sorrow, now come and snatch it out of her hand, and from the children of her heart? If this be the highest justice, it is also the highest injustice! And I will not do it. What do I care for—what do I trouble myself about your law-paragraphs? I know a law, a judgment-seat, which is higher than this, and I appeal to the highest, to the innermost justice!"

"Then," said Mrs. Cecilia with a quick and joyful inspiration, "then you appeal to the Innermost. And by her decision I also am ready to abide. The Innermost shall judge between us!"

"Yes! to the Innermost! to the Innermost!" exclaimed Theodore, delighted. "She shall judge; she shall decide. And that which she says shall be unalterable. She alone properly understands me and every body!"

He again rushed into the house, and all the others followed him. The family party went to the Innermost, to the "little joy!" Many a time before now had the family council assembled in Ina's room, but never on such extraordinary business.

Theodore would speak first, nobody opposed him; and with flowing eloquence he related his history and described the present position of affairs.

Ina was pale and excited, but she appeared less astonished than they had imagined she would have been at the unexpected revelation. She said—

"It is to me as if I had had a presentiment of it. But—I know not; I have not been afraid!"

"She knows; she understands me!" exclaimed Theodore, and kissed her hand.

Now also Mrs. Cecilia spoke, simply but gravely. She presented the affair according to her point of view, and said what ought to be done, if justice were done. She acknowledged Theodore's pure and good intentions; she rejoiced in them, but his enthusiastic notions could not influence her, or prevent her doing her duty according to justice and conscience.

When all had spoken, and every thing had been said, a silence ensued, and all eyes were fixed upon the Innermost.

Ina raised herself half up in bed, rested on one arm, and gazed with her sweet, wise, and affectionate eyes upon those who stood around her—gazed long at her mother, and her eyes filled with tears. Still longer she gazed at Theodore and seemed to read his very heart; and in so doing she began to smile—with a heavenly serenity and love. She spoke, but as if in affectionate pleasantry, gayly and very tenderly at the same time.

"Now I will speak! Theodore shall have the property, but he shall have—us along with it, and we will take care of it for him. He shall thus have no trouble about his property, but he shall have—every thing that he wishes for—all our hearts and all our efforts. For all ours is his, and all his is ours. The estate must remain in mamma's hands as hitherto, and Adolph shall manage it together with mamma as they had arranged it. And they shall apportion to all and each of us his share. Theodore shall live without trouble, free, free as the happy birds out there, and when he will he can fly out into the world as far, and as far as he likes, because that is needful for him. But, he must always return to us, to mamma and me; because this is his home, and here he shall live and continue when he becomes weary, and we shall always long for him when he is away; and, in the mean time, we shall watch over his property as if it were our own, because all his is ours, and all ours is his. And thus nobody will become the poorer, but every body the richer; because we have gained a friend, and we shall all of us become so very, very fond of him and so fond of each other."

If the sun, some beautiful day had talked with the planets (and may it not be so when it beams toward them light and warmth at the moment of midsummer?) it could not have operated upon them very differently to what Ina did upon those who surrounded her. Every one felt that she had said that which was the most beautiful and the best. Every one felt that she had expressed the innermost thoughts and wishes which had darkly moved in the chambers of the heads and hearts of all, and that she had given the only happy solution to the present involved circumstances. She had at once raised her beloved ones out of their earthly, every-day circumstances into the innermost of life, where the light of love and the law of love solve all difficulties, all questionings, and make every thing bright and easy.

Theodore, delighted, bent over the bed, and kissed the smiling, eloquent lips; and then yielded himself to the embraces which welcomed him on all sides. He longest tarried in Mrs. Cecilia's maternal embrace, and wetted her cheek with his tears. He bathed in love as he had formerly bathed in the light of the midnight sun. Every one embraced the Innermost, embraced Mrs. Cecilia, embraced each other. The great embracing seemed as if it never would come to an end, especially as the little Sprig, attended by Naima, now rushed in, and began to cry out, "And me too! and me too!" whereupon he was included in the gen eral movement. Neither did Naïma remain without her share, that I promise you. But now people laughed as they kissed, and thus the excitement, because of the children, became more child-like and joyful. And the children and the innermost, they in the end could not be separated.

There was a ball this evening in "the great joy," and the gentle brother and stern disciplinarian gave himself so completely up to the gallop, that Mrs. Amelia looked on with horror, and nobody knew what would be the end of it; and Charlotte and Reinhold Rapp danced incessantly, always laughing, and with their white teeth shining in their crimson, joyous countenances. And all the shepherds and shepherdesses upon the walls stared and grimaced worse than ever, and Mrs. Martha Orrhane sate, and seemed to look more astonished and more cheerful than ever. And thus they danced till day grew light.

Mrs. Cecilia, however, went to rest before midnight—having commissioned her children to care for the entertainment and pleasure of the guests. She was fatigued by the last several days, and especially by the events of the last, which in many ways had agitated her soul. She longed to collect her thoughts in stillness and rest.

But scarcely had she bolted the door of her room before some one knocked at it.

"Who is there?" asked she.

"The overseer."

She opened it. The old overseer stood there with a distressed look.

"Dear lady," said he; "you are not really angry with me, are you?" And he wept.

"Yes, Hans Ernst," said Mrs. Cecilia, "I am actually displeased with you. But only because you did not immediately tell me what you knew, that Mr. Erik was returned. Tell me why you did not do so?"

"Dear lady, I did not do it because of him! Because when I told him my thoughts, he forbade my speaking of them, and threatened me,—yes, most fiercely—if I said a word. And he would have prevented it, at the last moment, if it had been possible. But you see I could not keep it to myself. I must out with the truth."

"Then it is all right and good," said Mrs. Cecilia, "and you have done all that you ought. And I thank you. Good night, now, dear Hans Ernst. Now, we can both sleep in peace. To-morrow, I will talk further with you. Good night!"

The old lady and the old servant took each other by the hand. Thus parted they, and Mrs. Cecilia remained alone and went to bed. Then she in her solitude again went in thought through all that had occurred, and saw how so many things, nay, indeed, almost every thing, had gone quite otherwise to what she expected and proposed, and how many of her silent plans were overturned. She could not help a half melancholy smile at herself, and at human plans and anticipations in general. She honestly thanked God for the prodigal son's return, and that no unworthy thought or feeling had arisen in consequence in the minds of her children. And, when she remembered Theodore's noble wishes and disposition, and how, instead of bitter constraint, the most beautiful relationship had sprung up between him and his new family, and besides, how much there was which was good in the new connections and circumstances, although they were contrary to her wishes, and would cause her to be more profuse in expenditure and more solitary than formerly—she found renewed occasions for thankfulness and humble rejoicing in the guidance of the highest Being. And when she, according to the beautiful rule of Thorild, which had for a long time been her own, passed in review before her every thing that was good, saying, "That is good! that is good!" she stopped at her completed eighteen years' work, and the bed-cover rested lightly upon her, and the air of the chamber seemed lighter and pleasanter to breathe, as she thought that she had indeed completed this work.

After this, the future occupied her mind. In the stillness of the night, her soul rested by the bed of her youngest daughter considering what would be the best for her. For all the other children she thought also, but most, she thought, and with the greatest tenderness for the lame girl, her innermost, and her darling. The others could now all help themselves. And, for the future, she formed a resolution respecting which we know nothing at present. Sleep did not once visit her bed this night. But her soul was calm. And that was better to her than sleep. And mild and kind she stood the following morning among her still sleepy children and friends.

Three days later there was a great parting-breakfast at Bragesholm. Many of the members of the family and their friends were to set off this day, and among them Ida, whom Adolph was to drive down to the shore in his carriage. In the autumn, it was said, he was to go to Uleoborg, and thence bring Ida to Bragesholm as his wife.

The breakfast-table was richly spread with a great variety of dishes. Of different sorts of bread alone there were seven. The members of the family sitting around the table, gave the impression of a garland of many-colored flowers. Mrs. Cecilia herself sitting between the Sprig and Naïma, looked like a beautiful but nearly out-bloomed rose, between the sweetest little rose-buds. Yes, out-bloomed, but still beautiful. She was especially so this morning, this good Mrs. Cecilia. The bright, noble countenance, more pale than usual, had still something more than commonly bright and grand in its expression, something like a battle won, a completed victory. She wore a new snow-white cap of clear crape, which exquisitely plaited and made up—the work of Ina's small fingers—surrounded her head, and became her extremely well. Again and again Ida gazed at this head, which seemed to her as if she always saw a glory around it. And for many reasons Ida never forgot the appearance of her intended mother-in-law this morning. It stamped itself upon her soul like an ineffaceable image. She herself was dressed in black this morning, as usual, but she had permitted Ina to place a dark red carnation in her hair, and upon her cheek flushed a clearer crimson than usual, from the glances of admiring love which Adolph riveted upon her beautiful face. But her glance was dark, and the proud heart swelled with secret vexation.

Never since the day when she returned with Adolph had Mrs. Cecilia—although at all times friendly toward her—and although she had greeted her worthily, and with maternal affection as her future daughter-in-law—been to her as formerly. No amusing pleasantry, no little soothing caress as so often was the case then, had come to her from Mrs. Cecilia; no single time had she called Ida “my Mrs. Sola!” Ida could not conceal this from herself. Mrs. Cecilia was not pleased with Adolph’s connection, and had no pleasure in seeing her enter her house, and her family circle. All this lay heavy on Ida’s mind. She felt her heart and her pride wounded. She wished not to feel it; she endeavored to persuade herself that it were not so, but she could not succeed.

And she became bitter of mood, and dissatisfied both with herself, Adolph, and the old lady.

But Mrs. Cecilia looked to-day so gay and friendly, that no one could reasonably be vexed with her. She looked around the table upon her children, on the families of all the elder ones who grew up around her, and regarded them all with a feeling of melancholy joy. She saw them ascend in life, and she saw herself go down. She felt herself like a shadow beside these blooming young people, full of the strength of life, but she was glad to see them so, and would not for her own sake that it should be otherwise.

Miss ——— looked jocosely at the young ladies, Amelia and Ida, and upon Charlotte, who bloomed in colors of the rose, and said—

“You fancy certainly, you young ladies, that you are all very handsome, and that the gentlemen think so too. But I must tell you, that none of you are so handsome to-day as—the old lady of Bragesholm!”

“The old lady of Bragesholm,” said Mrs. Cecilia, smiling, and gently blushing, “is now laid aside. She gives place to the young ones; and, when Adolph, with his young wife, returns in the autumn, I shall have left for Innerstalund, and Adolph’s wife will here become the mistress and hostess. And to-day, before we separate, my dear children, I will speak with you about my plans for the immediate future. It is my wish as soon as possible to give up the management of Bragesholm to Adolph and Theodore, who may enter upon it as soon as they are disposed. I feel myself now too old to—”

But here Mrs. Cecilia was interrupted by a general murmur. All declared their satisfaction with her management. They assured her that she was young enough yet to continue it long, and they bade her not to think of giving up the place and management.

“I thank you, my dear children,” said Mrs. Cecilia, kindly and cheerfully. It is gratifying to me that you are satisfied with me, and do not find me old; but I—find myself so. I have felt plainly for some years that I have no longer the strength and activity which are requisite to conduct so large a property, and to labor for the improvement of the people upon it, as it can and ought to be done, according to my belief. It is not possible to shut my eyes to this; my best years are past, and the time is come when it is good for a person to withdraw himself from the world, and move into himself. And in this there is nothing sad, my children. Does not the caterpillar know when it is time for it to spin itself in, and be ready for a change? And shall not a human creature know when the time is come to spin himself in and be still? For he too must spin himself in. He must wrap himself in the swathings of age, and become more alive within himself while he prepares for his great transit. But we must not, therefore, become chrysalises, nor ought we to regard old age as a time of trouble. It is neither right nor grateful to see nothing in the earth but a vale of tears. Has not God, indeed, filled it with the good and the beautiful, for our joy, and has He not given to every human being, and to every age, their own objects to benefit by? Old age has its enjoyments which no other age can know. In its repose, the mind awakes to a clearer perception of much that is good and great, that we had not paid attention to before, and yet does not prevent all activity. If I feel myself too old for Bragesholm, I yet feel myself young enough for Innerstalund, to plant and arrange there, and make of that little place something truly pleasant. That will be at once an employment and a pleasure in my old days, and Ina will assist me in it. First of all we shall put in order the great rooms, so that we may be able to see our friends; and may invite them to the banquet of the returned wedding parties, provided we have first been to the arrival banquet here. I hope we shall be invited.”

Mrs. Cecilia said this with a kindly, jocosely glance at Adolph and Ida, and wished thus to give a cheerful turn to the general feelings. But Adolph and Ida, and indeed the majority at the table, were not cheerful, but were solemnly and sorrowfully affected. Both Adolph and Ida arose, went to Mrs. Cecilia, and implored her earnestly and with emotion that she would not think of quitting Bragesholm, but that she would remain and allow them to surround her as children with their love, and do every thing which could contribute to her comfort and pleasure.

But Mrs. Cecilia stood fast by her resolve, and it was soon seen that she was not to be moved. She bade her children finally not to seek further to do it, and not to speak of it again. She had made up her mind.

Ida drew back as if wounded by Mrs. Cecilia's cold rejection, as it seemed to her, of her sincere well-meaning, and with a feeling, or of a shrinking from her, that she imagined she perceived, when she embraced Mrs. Cecilia, and entreated her not to leave them. Possibly, Ida was mistaken, possibly not; and that Mrs. Cecilia made an involuntary movement to avoid the embrace of her not thoroughly welcome daughter-in-law. For the heart has such feelings, and can not help it: and the body will express them in word, look, or action, in unguarded moments, even in the noblest individuals.

Now arose Theodore, bent his knee in chivalric obeisance before Mrs. Cecilia, and said—

"Hear now my petition! Go and be wherever you will, my mother, but—take me with you, and the Innermost. Adolph may manage, and plant here at his pleasure. I have no desire to go and look after the estates and the fences. It would kill me, and the old overseer would send me to Jericho, and Adolph would be out of patience with me, and I with him, like Agronom. No, let me accompany you to Innerstalund. I will be your chief servant in the place; fetch wood and water, play on the viol, draw caricatures, and read to you occasionally; and occasionally travel, and bring you news from the great world. I assure you that you can not do without me there, just as I can not do without you—that I know; and, therefore, let me accompany you to Innerstalund."

Mrs. Cecilia smiled, and said, "We must hear what the Innermost says about it."

"Oh, then I am certain!" exclaimed Theodore, and started off into the "little joy" to ask the Innermost.

Mrs. Cecilia looked kindly after him, and was evidently pleased at the proposal.

Adolph smiled, too, but did not look cheerful. He felt himself, as it were, thrust aside by the new brother, he who hitherto had been almost the first in his mother's love. He felt now a sensation like jealousy; and, as he felt it, he was excessively displeased with himself. Spite, too, of his lively affection for Ida, he was displeased with her now, for the stiff and almost proud bearing that she maintained toward Mrs. Cecilia, especially since she had felt herself repelled. However this might be, certain it is that Mrs. Cecilia endeavored to remove any unpleasant feeling she might have excited. During the remainder of the breakfast, she spoke many times kindly to Ida, and sought to thaw her cold manner. But no! it did not succeed: Ida seemed only to become stiffer and colder. My dear lady-readers! should ever such a tone of mind come over you toward any one that you thus venerate and love—do not let it gain the mastery of you. Open yourself! Speak! Tell your suffering, or your annoyance, cheerfully, pleasantly, if you can; with tears, if you can not do it otherwise. But speak, and melt the ice in yourself, or in your friend. And if you are about to separate from her, if you are already out of the door, then—turn back; or, if she is already in the street, run after her, lay hold of her, and do not let her go till all has been said, bewept, forgiven, and made all good again. Ah! if you delay, if you let her go, it may be too late, and there may come a time for remorse! . . .

When they arose from breakfast, which was rather a dinner, it was beautiful to see the little Sprig say grace, standing beside Mrs. Cecilia, who held her clasped hands over his blonde head. But either the Sprig was looking too much at Naima, or otherwise was confounded by the number of guests, for the grace stuck fast, and would not proceed, though he had not reached the middle. Mrs. Cecilia said softly, "Well—a?" and gave a little pat to the little head, at which the other half of the grace started out with such a bounce and haste, as made all, not excepting Mrs. Cecilia, smile. "It is well that I keep these two little folks," said Mrs. Cecilia, putting her hands on the heads of the Sprig and Naima, "or I should have missed you too much!" And she looked at Adolph and Ida, so kindly.

But Ida continued silent and pale—she felt herself, as it were, controlled by an evil power; and what evil power is worse than an ill temper? The weather was in a gloomy humor, too; the sun had vanished, the north-wind blew cold, and the leaf, torn from the tree, whirled in the blast. It was a gray, ungenial day, not like the previous sunny one.

And now came the moment of departure. With that proud heart, compressed by tormenting feelings, Ida approached Mrs. Cecilia; she bent, indeed, over Mrs. Cecilia's hand, and received upon her brow and her lips, her warm kisses, but she continued cold still, and her heart did not repent. And, when the heart is dumb, when it is not in what is doing, one may embrace, indeed, kiss, say tender words, but something is wanting still, that is to say—all! And thus it was now, between the old and the young lady, and they parted; and so came all the other leave-takings, and the last preparations for the journey. Ida looked, but could not see Mrs. Cecilia among those who stood at the door, or around the carriage and said good-by; and nodded and waved their hands, and shouted kind words of farewell, as it rolled away with her and Adolph. She looked up at the balcony, the windows, but neither there was Mrs. Cecilia to be seen; and Ida then felt, as it were, a stab in her heart. "She will not see me again!" thought she. The carriage went round to the other side of the building; Adolph and Ida both looked up at all the windows, as they drove around the house, in the hope of seeing at one of them, the white cap and light figure of Mrs. Cecilia—but no, it was in vain!

She was nowhere to be seen; and now melted the proud feeling in Ida's bosom. Now she repented that she had been so stiff, so cold; now did she wish herself back, to take once more a farewell, to kiss the maternal hand, to receive a kind glance and word. Like dark and vacant eyes, the empty windows stared back at her inquiring, longing glances. And Adolph sat silent and gloomy, he too was obviously depressed. And now the carriage turned away from the house, and rolled onward through the avenue toward the open fields. With the tears swelling in her eyes, Ida cast a farewell look back toward the vanishing buildings of the hall, and the old lady, and thought, "I shall never see her again!" But—who is that who stands in the distance there by the red-painted gate, and holds it open for the travelers? The wind flutters in the ample, light garments, and strews the withered leaves about the snow-white head-dress. Is it possible—can it be? Yes, it may be—it is actually the old lady, who has hastened hither by the cross-way, through the garden, to get another sight of her children, to do another service of love, and say to them a tender and affectionate word. Yes, it is the old mother, the Lady of Bragesholm, who stands here and holds open the gate for the travelers, as the humblest of their servants. She stands here, panting, and somewhat out of breath with her hurried pace, but with the color in her cheeks heightened and fresh, and her looks so mild and warm.

"Stop!" at once cried Adolph and Ida. "Stop!" and they sprang from the carriage before it had well stopped, and into the old lady's arms—Ida at her feet. But she was quickly raised, and pressed, how affectionately pressed, to the maternal heart. "O, Ida! Ida! make him happy!" whispered Mrs. Cecilia, and held her to her bosom. And there Ida made a solemn vow to live for that purpose, and there renounced forever the proud, bitter spirit, which had hitherto made her and those about her unhappy. This she felt was broken, as she saw the old lady standing by the gate, meekly, and full of love; and I know not whether any lady in the world ever was so kissed, embraced and idolized, as was, here by the gate-post, the old lady. I only know that I wish I had been there.

As the carriage rolled through the columnar wood, Ida reclined weeping on Adolph's heart. The old, the former Ida, melted away in regretful tears, and the new and more beautiful one arose amid the caresses of affection. That was also a midsummer moment, when the light celebrated its triumph over the darkness.

Snow fell upon the columnar wood, and winter stood dark in its vault, when one night a hundred lights lighted up "the great joy" at Bragesholm, and the whole house shone like a burning crown far out over the snowy fields. There were three weddings at Bragesholm, and the old lady and the Innermost were remaining there to solemnize the great festivities. There were united in peace and joy, Charlotte and Captain Rapp; Miss — and the colonel; the old Lisa and the old overseer; and, like two stars of the first magnitude, shone in the presence of the newly-married, the already wedded, the beautiful dwellers in the heaven of married life, the happy couple, Adolph and Ida.

We might close here, for we see all our friends on the highway to the "land above the north wind," to the native country of light. We see Mrs. Cecilia wandering at Innerstalund, on the bright moonlight nights, while all around her is still; and we see upon her lips yet more frequently a bright smile, as if in a glad surprise at the fact, that while wending merely along the path of duty, and while she had merely been seeking "to do right to every one," she had found—blessedness. We see her here, with the Innermost, constitute the central point of a large family's warmest feelings, and united with all its best thoughts and purposes. We see Theodore with them, as a son and a brother, make their life glad; while they, with every delightful bond, fetter him to home, and make him so happy there, and give him so much to do, that he thinks and feels that he has almost forgotten his right, like the free birds, to seek adventures out in the world. We see "the people of the shades" fly out of his soul, as the high and bright mysteries of life illumine it, in association with the bright and gentle spirits which surround him, which accompany him on his spirit wanderings to every height and depth, and light up every dark mount, with the smiles of gayety or affection. We see Adolph and Ida at Bragesholm with many domestic adventures, and not without many a storm, yet all the more closely united by the triumph of love and fidelity over the demons. We see "old love" blooming at Svanevik far into the autumn, and green even under the snow; while during the long period of shadows, raveled skeins are wound, ballads sung, books read aloud, and we see the happy pair—the colonel and the quondam Miss — sometimes take snuff together. We see, in fine, all our friends here, climb, on the pilgrimage of life, emulously up their Luppio and Avasaxa—the mountains where the sun goes not down. The old lady is already arrived there. But do you know who among all the rest first reached it. Yes. The lame girl: yes, the Innermost!

"But, did she always continue lame? Was she never better?"

My young lady-readers, I will tell you what I have heard said. I have heard that Theodore once journeyed from his northern home, and was absent a whole year for the sake of art, in the native land of art, in the eternal Rome. But, when the summer returned he came back, and the evening sun shone in gold through the columnar wood when he came wandering thither, with a thousand thoughts in his soul, pleasant and painful at the same time. Then he saw in the depth of the wood two bright forms coming toward him, glowing in the rays of the evening sun; the one tall and more venerable, though gentler; the other smaller, slen-derer, bright and charming as a spirit of light. Angels! was the first thought of Theodore. "My angels!" he exclaimed, as he sank into the arms of the mother and the Innermost, beside himself with joy and emotion; for a miracle had happened here. The Innermost, the lame girl, had come to meet him. Yes, a miracle, but a perfectly natural one. The well of St. Ragnhild had been to Ina the pool of Bethesda, whose water an angel had stirred, and given it the healing power.

I have also heard that the Innermost went with Theodore to the altar, and that Mrs. Cecilia made a wedding feast at Innerstalund. But how that is I do not know with certainty, and imagine for the rest, a marriage here, far less important, than that Ina should be, and never cease to be, for Theodore, for her mother, for the house, and for all—the Innermost.

"And the little Sprig, how went it with him and his little flame from the mountain?"

Nay, good reader! now dost thou really demand too much; if thou wishest me to show thee the little Sprig, a married man, and the father of a family, and all that. He is really far from it yet. But I would venture, at the same time, to assert that he is surely enough on the way thither; and we may hope that a little flock of the most delightful little Sprigs will one day thence arise, for it would be a great pity if this excellent family should become extinct in the north.

THE END.
